Preface

This study of certain mutual interests of Abraham Lincoln and Charles Darwin argues that they had surprisingly similar values, purposes, and approaches. It is not a dual biography, although it does trace the somewhat parallel development of the two men and their perspectives mainly in chronological order—except in the introduction, which uses a particular point in their lives to bring forward the subtitled themes regarding the mid-nineteenth-century collision between science and abolitionism. Lincoln and Darwin had no family link, did not share a common profession, were not rivals, came from very different backgrounds, and never met or even visited each other's country. They did not directly influence each other's views, yet they shared certain ideas that actually set them apart from most of their contemporaries. Of course, some contemporaries—and predecessors—did endorse ideas similar to theirs, providing a "common context" that must not be ignored.[1] However, Lincoln and Darwin were not running with the pack but were ahead of it, and they managed to draw it along a path it might not otherwise have chosen (or at least not so soon). When we recognize that Lincoln and Darwin were both leading society toward greater freedom of thought and a greater acceptance of human equality, we begin to understand the debt we owe them.

Lincoln and Darwin could not have been more "contemporary," having been born on the same day, a link significant only for an astrologer, which I am not. My interest in each man had separate origins: the first biography I can remember reading as a boy was of Lincoln, and my fascination with him has never ceased, while my curiosity about Darwin developed only a dozen years ago.

In 2005, a study collated surveys in thirty-four countries where people were asked to respond "true," "false," or "not sure" to the statement "Human beings, as we know them, developed from earlier species of animals." Of those surveyed in the United States, 39 percent answered "false," and the only country with a larger percentage was Turkey (51 percent).[2] Turkey was the only Muslim country in this study, but it was included in a later study of six Muslim countries that indicated that most were even less accepting of human evolution than Turkey, "one of the most educated and secular of Muslim countries."[3] For a quarter of a century, I have taught in an international school in Britain where half of my (highly affluent) students come from America and another large group from Islamic countries. A significant minority of students from these two groups has been raised to accept a religious rather than a scientific view of the origins of mankind, and a few have been openly hostile toward Darwin—while knowing little about him. While endeavoring to learn more about Darwin and about creationism, I increasingly became aware that certain values and interests of Darwin overlapped those of Lincoln, and this awareness in turn made me wish to examine Lincoln in a new light.

I began serious research about 2001, thinking I might easily produce a small book in time to cash in on the 2009 bicentenary of their births. However, relevant material proved far more abundant than I had expected, partly thanks to the digitization of Lincoln's and Darwin's writings. In the spring of 2008, as I was completing my rough draft, David R. Contosta published Rebel Giants: The Revolutionary Lives of Abraham Lincoln and Charles Darwin, which, ultimately, did not explore the topics that interested me and only strengthened my feeling that a brief dual biography was not the best approach to these men and their ideas. Another study, Adam Gopnik's Angels and Ages: A Short Book about Darwin, Lincoln, and Modern Life, appeared just before the 2009 bicentenary, but the main focus of this brief work was on the two men's literary qualities. Dozens of other books about Lincoln or Darwin individually appeared at this same time, and two works particularly overlapped my own interests. Darwin scholars Adrian Desmond and James Moore produced an excellent book-length treatment of the influence of Darwin's abolitionism, Darwin's Sacred Cause: Race, Slavery, and the Quest for Human Origins.[4] And Jason Emerson's brief but well-researched Lincoln the Inventor touches on some issues that appear in this book.

When comparing any two men from roughly the same period who lived in radically different and rapidly changing environments, a good "Darwinian" would note divergent adaptations that might prove instructive. However, in the present case, the test is certainly skewed by the fact that Lincoln and Darwin were not "any two men" but extraordinary figures of the nineteenth century whose impact continues to the present day. Excellent biographies exist for each—all the less reason for a dual biography. It is frequently remarked that in America, annually, only Jesus has more books published about him than Abraham Lincoln; while Darwin has the rare distinction among scientists of never becoming obsolete: his texts are still in print a century and a half after he wrote them, and Darwinism shows no signs of being eclipsed by some new "ism." Measured by any standard of greatness—even down to having one's bearded face on one's national currency—the iconic status of Lincoln and Darwin is confirmed. Yet the fact that they achieved their greatness in very different professions has distracted us from an important point regarding similarities of character that helped to fashion those achievements.

Lincoln, the self-educated lawyer, the brilliant statesman, the Great Emancipator, was also fascinated by science, something rarely mentioned by biographers because he seemingly achieved nothing in that field—except the distinction of being the only president to have obtained a U.S. patent. Before Emerson's recent work, the book that came closest to elaborating Lincoln's scientific interests was Robert V. Bruce's Lincoln and the Tools of War, although this excellent work, now half a century old, concentrates mainly on Lincoln's concerns (as commander-in-chief during the Civil War) regarding innovative armaments. Darwin, the brilliant theorist who was also imaginative in experimentation and masterful at marshalling evidence, was probably not fully aware himself of how much his research was driven by his deep-seated loathing of slavery, as Desmond and Moore have shown. I try to carry further the story of how Darwin's abolitionism influenced his relationships with other naturalists and his treatment of issues and evidence that arose specifically out of the conflict in America over slavery.

The general public knows little about Darwin's hatred of slavery and less about Lincoln's scientific interests, yet an understanding of these can offer new perspectives on the choices and decisions of these men. The abhorrence felt by Lincoln and Darwin toward the rise of what eventually came to be known as "scientific racism" fueled their opposition to two proponents of that view: Lincoln's great political foe Stephen A. Douglas and Darwin's most influential rival (and America's best-known scientist in the mid-nineteenth century), Louis Agassiz.

Although shaped by vastly different environments, Lincoln and Darwin developed similar views on the clash between rationality and religion, views alien to the mass of their contemporaries. However, both took deliberate steps to avoid causing unnecessary offense, and by the time of their deaths, Lincoln was viewed with quasi-religious awe and Darwin with something close to reverence.

I believe that many people, especially in America, who are inclined to reject natural selection and even to demonize Charles Darwin probably at the same time revere Abraham Lincoln. They might dismiss my view that significant parallels exist in the thoughts and values of the two men, yet I would like to convince such people that if they admire Lincoln's intelligence and humanity in fighting the greatest evil of his time, they should also admire Darwin for similar reasons. And if they would denigrate Darwin's rationalism and materialism as reflecting an unwholesome rejection of religious beliefs, then they are in for a shock when they look more closely at Lincoln's attitude toward conventional religion. In a nutshell, if one of these men is great, then so is the other and for similar reasons.

The controversies surrounding these two giants of the nineteenth century are not fading. The recent bicentenary celebrations dwarfed those of a century ago, when some old men still survived who could speak of their personal acquaintance with Lincoln or Darwin. And a few of those who commemorated that first centenary may even have been old enough to recall that half a century earlier, neither Lincoln nor Darwin had yet—at the age of fifty—achieved enough to make anyone think either one was destined for greatness.

Acknowledgments

For answering questions or providing valuable source material, I am deeply grateful to Adrian Desmond, Allen C. Guelzo, James Moore, and especially Wayne C. Temple, who sent several important items, particularly a copy of “Herndon’s Auction List.” Christoph Irmscher provided access to his transcriptions of the Howe-Agassiz correspondence and was kind enough to read early chapters and offer encouragement.

For their generous assistance, I thank the staffs at the British Library and the Wellcome Library in London; Anna Smith, picture researcher at the Wellcome Trust; Adam Perkins of the Department of Manuscripts and University Archives, University Library, Cambridge University; Lynn Miller, Wedgwood Museum Trust, Stoke-on-Trent; Jon M. Williams, Andrew W. Mellon Curator of Prints and Photographs, Hagley Museum and Library in Wilmington, Delaware; Janice F. Goldblum, National Academies archivist, Washington, D.C.; Mary M. Huth, manuscripts librarian, University of Rochester; Lisa Marine, Wisconsin Historical Society, Madison; and Alex Rankin of the Howard Gottlieb Archival Research Center, Boston University.

My research would have been practically impossible but for the availability of four recent and ongoing digitization projects: The Collected Works of Abraham Lincoln, edited by Roy P. Basler, Marion Dolores Pratt, and Lloyd A. Dunlap and sponsored by Abraham Lincoln Association; Abraham Lincoln Papers at the Library of Congress; Darwin Correspondence Project, sponsored by the University of Cambridge and published by the university in Correspondence of Charles Darwin, edited by Frederick Burkhardt and Sydney Smith; and John van Wyhe’s excellent Complete Work of Charles Darwin Online.

For particular assistance, I am most grateful to my son, George Lander, to Jonathan Cheng of the London School of Economics, and to Caroline Troein of Bryn Mawr.

I owe special thanks to my colleagues Perrin Tingley, John Smalley, Jonathan Kendall, and Karl Christiansen.

My editor at Southern Illinois University Press, Sylvia Frank Rodrigue, has been outstanding in her encouragement, wisdom, and high expectations, and Barb Martin, editorial, design, and production manager, has been particularly helpful and efficient. I also benefitted from the excellent suggestions made by three anonymous reviewers.

For her patience, diligence, and useful suggestions made while reading the entire text, my wife, Sarah, is owed a great debt that will require a very long time to pay off.

Despite all this help, I have no doubt managed to retain some errors of fact or judgment, for which I am solely responsible.

Introduction

A man reaching his fiftieth year is more certain than he was at forty that he now possesses more past than future. After weighing his half century of achievements against the narrowing prospect of attaining any more, he might accept that his unfulfilled dreams will remain so and narrow his interests to the comforts of family and friends. Abraham Lincoln and Charles Darwin, upon reaching the age of fifty, each understood that following his own demise and that of surviving family and friends, he would be largely forgotten. It was a fate both men fought against, and, as it happened, within two years both achieved lasting fame. One published the results of two decades of the most far-reaching and contentious scientific research; the other was elected to the highest office in a country that then fell into civil war. Each met great opposition and overcame it to leave a mark still visible and highly controversial a century and a half later.

Charles Darwin on his fiftieth birthday, 12 February 1859, was not with his wife and seven children at their charming home in the Kent village of Downe but was fifty miles away, in Moor Park, Surrey, undergoing a "water cure" at Dr. Edward Lane's hydrotherapy establishment.[1] Ill health had plagued Darwin for years, so the fear of impending death was nothing new. He had long since arranged that what he considered his most important work might yet be given to the world in some form in the event of his early demise. For over twenty years, he had delayed publishing his particular theory—that species came into existence not through God's creative power but through the transmutation of previously existing species by means of natural selection. He knew this would cause great controversy, yet it was not fear of this that made Darwin delay but his keen desire to marshal substantial evidence to support his theory, a process requiring vast reading, consultation with specialists, and even experimentation.[2]

Eight months earlier, in June 1858, that slow effort of gathering and organizing data was suddenly accelerated as ambition—a desire for a certain type of immortality—overwhelmed him. Darwin was thunderstruck to learn that fellow naturalist Alfred Russel Wallace, living on the other side of the globe, had reached conclusions quite similar to his own regarding the mutability of species. Without doing any injustice to his colleague, Darwin was now determined to bring forth his theory, and he was laboring to produce a book, not as large as the multivolume work he had already begun writing yet more extensive than the earlier sketches shown only to a select few.

Until mid-August 1858, death and illness in his family kept Darwin from his work, but during the following six months, the intensive effort to produce a single-volume "abstract" affected his own health so severely that he was too ill to attend the February meeting of the Geological Society that awarded him the much-coveted Wollaston Medal for his many past contributions to geological science. So Darwin was at Moor Park on his fiftieth birthday, the single record of which is a brief letter to his cousin William Darwin Fox, a country parson with a passion for natural history who had trained at Cambridge back when Darwin was there thinking he, too, might become a clergyman.

> I have been extra bad of late, with the old severe vomiting rather often & much distressing swimming of the head; I have been here a week & shall stay another & it has already done me good. . . . My abstract is the cause, I believe, of the main part of the ills to which my flesh is heir to; but I have only two or more chapters & to correct all, & then I shall be a comparatively free man. I have had the great satisfaction of converting Hooker & I believe Huxley & I think Lyell is much staggered.[3]

The abstract was, of course, The Origin of Species by Means of Natural Selection, and Darwin was struggling to reduce his mass of evidence to a single five-hundred-page volume. Had Wallace not forced his hand, he might well have taken several more years to finish his multivolume study. Instead, he spent his fiftieth birthday regretting that he was ill, away from his family, and still two chapters short of completing a lesser work.

After rushing to boil down two decades' research, Darwin suddenly found it difficult to compose the book's ending. A month after his birthday and back at home, Darwin noted in his journal "finished last chapter." A fortnight later, the last chapter was "not even fully written out," and after another two months, he had "now written half." Four days later, Darwin finished—and immediately suffered a physical collapse that sent him back to Moor Park for another week's water cure before he could begin checking proofs.[4]

Despite, or because of, that agonized effort, the last paragraph of The Origin achieved an eloquence rivaling some of Abraham Lincoln's finest speeches:

> It is interesting to contemplate an entangled bank, clothed with many plants of many kinds, with birds singing on the bushes, with various insects flitting about, and with worms crawling through the damp earth, and to reflect that these elaborately constructed forms, so different from each other, and depen> dent on each other in so complex a manner, have all been produced by laws acting around us. These laws, taken in the largest sense, being Growth with Reproduction; inheritance which is almost implied by reproduction; Variability from the indirect and direct action of the external conditions of life, and from use and disuse; a Ratio of Increase so high as to lead to a Struggle for Life, and as a consequence to Natural Selection, entailing Divergence of Character and the Extinction of less-improved forms. Thus, from the war of nature, from famine and death, the most exalted object which we are capable of conceiving, namely, the production of the higher animals, directly follows. There is grandeur in this view of life, with its several powers, having been originally breathed into a few forms or into one; and that, whilst this planet has gone cycling on according to the fixed law of gravity, from so simple a beginning endless forms most beautiful and most wonderful have been, and are being, evolved.[5]

That last word, "evolved," is the closest Darwin came in The Origin to using the term most often associated with his name, "evolution," a word not then possessing its modern meaning. Darwin instead used terms such as "development" or "transmutation" for the broad notion of changing species and phrases like "descent with modification" and "natural selection" to describe the mechanism of that change.[6] Darwin discussed how species change, not how—from nothing—the first species came into existence or whether "species" would then be plural or singular. Darwin equivocated, saying vaguely, with a biblical echo, that "life" was in some way "originally breathed into a few forms or into one."

Darwin endeavored to leave God out of the discussion. He was pursuing scientific truth, not trying to assist those who attacked the majority's belief that God had designed the universe. Yet, he also hoped the weight of his evidence might protect him against that majority's wrath. Darwin's purpose was to show how natural selection worked, not how it began or how it, in one sense, ended: with man. The book contained only two references to man, one frequently quoted, the other not (but discussed further below). The former is on the third page from the end, after Darwin had filled over four hundred pages discussing a myriad of other species: "In the distant future I see open fields for far more important researches. . . . Light will be thrown on the origin of man and his history."

Avoiding natural selection's beginning and ending did not prevent those concepts from seizing the popular imagination, causing great controversies that swirl to the present day. Yet Darwin left out God and man for separate reasons. Logically, although God might have created natural selection, he was not necessary to its ongoing operation. Darwin saw no way to collect data about God's creative activity, and the issue was fraught with other difficulties, social, familial, and personal. Regarding man, Darwin's premise was that natural selection applied to him if it applied at all; and there was more information on man than any other species—yet, when still working on his multivolume study (and before they knew of each other's theories), Darwin told Wallace in December 1857, "You ask whether I shall discuss 'man.' I think I shall avoid [the] whole subject, as so surrounded with prejudices; though I fully admit that it is the highest & most interesting problem for the naturalist."[7]

Although The Origin gave no direct account of man, everyone assumed it did: "man-descended-from-apes" was the theme of most reviews and subsequent debates. Darwin eventually produced two books that did focus on man, and throughout Darwin's earlier research the subject of man was always as important as his beloved beetles, the tortoises, mockingbirds, and barnacles. However, Darwin never mused on "man's fate" or asked, "Why are we here?" Even the more objective question, "Who are we?" became a matter of taxonomy: "What are we?" One important version of that question—one that motivated much of Darwin's research—had been made famous by Darwin's grandfathers before he was born. It involved the image of a black slave, kneeling and in chains, around whom was inscribed the question "Am I not a man and a brother?"

Darwin's family was committed to the abolition of slavery, and his scientific work became his contribution. Although Darwin deliberately challenged explanations of the natural world he found untenable, he also mounted an attack on the growing body of opinion, both popular and scientific, that theorized that slavery was somehow "natural" because, after all, black Africans were clearly not like "us." In The Origin, Darwin implies and in later works argues explicitly that man is part of the animal kingdom, and just as men share ancestors with other species, the human races have a common ancestor—though it was not Adam as many others in the antislavery movement were inclined to believe.[8]

The Origin did not discuss "negroes" or any particular human racial group; however, Darwin's second (and less frequently quoted) reference to "man" is this: "I may add that some little light can apparently be thrown on the origin of . . . the differences between the races of man, which are so strongly marked [and caused] chiefly through sexual selection of a particular kind." He hastened to add, "But without here entering on copious details my reasoning would appear frivolous." Darwin thus hinted at his deep concern with the common ancestry of human racial groups.[9]

Those details were later presented in Descent of Man, yet the topic was just below the surface in The Origin. In the book's full title, On the Origin of Species by Means of Natural Selection, or the Preservation of Favoured Races in the Struggle for Life, "races," of course, was another way of saying "varieties," applicable to plants and animals as well as man. For many of Darwin's contemporaries, the phrase "favoured races" might conjure images not only of man but particularly of white men; however, Darwin had bitter experience of the way natives in Latin America, New Zealand, and Australia suffered at the hands of more "civilised" races, and he had no wish to justify any exploitative colonial practices and was revolted by arguments that slavery was somehow "natural." For this reason, Darwin was greatly disturbed when he saw with his own eyes for the first time an example of animal behavior that suggested slavery might in some sense be "natural."

During an earlier sojourn at Moor Park in April 1858, when Darwin was supposed to be resting and reading novels, his habit of observation caused him during one of his walks to notice a rare type of ant, Formica sanguinea (or rufescens) the "slave-making" ant, and its "slave" Formica nigra. For over a decade, the cruel habits of these "African" ants had appeared in naturalist literature and had even been used to "justify" human behavior, before entomologist Frederick Smith first discovered such ants in England itself in 1854. It was to Smith that Darwin had recently sent enquiries, but now seeing these particular ants himself caused Darwin to mention them in letters, record his observations and experiments, and use this information in the massive work he was then still writing. A year later, when reducing this work to create The Origin, Darwin actually expanded his account of the slave-making ant.[10]

According to biographer Janet Browne, Darwin's "understanding of these biological relationships was probably influenced by his former colonial experiences. Recalling the horrors he encountered in South America, he regarded the red ants' behavior as enslavement rather than any comparable social structure such as symbiosis or co-operation." By writing "slavery" rather than "symbiosis," Darwin simply used the terms employed by earlier naturalists, yet Browne is certainly right that Darwin "felt very uncomfortable providing biological parallels for human practices he found abhorrent."[11] Darwin admitted approaching the subject "in a sceptical frame of mind, as any one may well be excused for doubting the truth of so extraordinary and odious an instinct as that of making slaves." He began humbly enough—"By what steps the instinct of F. sanguinea originated I will not pretend to conjecture"—but then did conjecture that natural selection could explain such an "odious" instinct. Various species of ants feed off the pupae of other species of ant; some develop the useful modification of stealing and storing those pupae; as a next step, some might discover their looted pupae hatching before they had been eaten and put the hatched alien ant to work just like every other ant in the colony; from there it could be a short step to stealing pupae precisely for the future labor rather than for nutrition.

Darwin concluded, "I can see no difficulty in natural selection increasing and modifying the [slave-making] instinct—always supposing each modification to be of use to the species—until an ant was formed as abjectly dependent on its slaves as is the Formica rufescens" (emphasis added).[12] Here is the implied contrast between ant slave-making and human slavery: one species of ant enslaved a different species of ant, but man enslaved other men, so human slavery is not something of use to the whole species. Moreover, in no other case did Darwin declare that a modification made a species "abjectly dependent," but perhaps the phrase reflected his low opinion of plantation owners. In any case, Darwin dismissed any idea that this animal behavior might somehow justify human slavery as "natural."

Although The Origin made no direct reference to human slavery and only brief references to man and human races, all three subjects frequently appeared in Darwin's early notebooks made between 1837 and 1840.[13] Fourteen years before writing The Origin, Darwin had published vivid expressions of his loathing for human slavery. As Darwin spent his fiftieth birthday at Moor Park trying to finish off the last chapters of The Origin and wandering around the familiar grounds, the slave-making ants he had first seen there a year earlier were still on his mind.[14]

Darwin is far less famous than Lincoln for his abhorrence of "slave-making." The Great Emancipator terminated the foulest evil in the American states although half of them had previously permitted slavery, including Lincoln's native state. He once said that he had always felt that if slavery was not evil, nothing was evil, yet his early political career had not been focused on slavery. However, in his fiftieth year, Lincoln was aware that over the previous five years, his various political campaigns had been entirely devoted to that issue.

To preserve national unity, compromises at every political crossroads since the onset of the War of Independence had allowed the continued existence of slavery, which in the 1850s had become the defining political topic. The Republican Party had recently arisen to address the issue ignored by the older parties, and Lincoln had raised himself up from his origins in frontier poverty to become the leader of the Republican Party in his adopted state of Illinois. Through an extraordinary process of self-education, Lincoln had turned himself into a successful lawyer and politician, serving four terms in the Illinois state legislature before spending one term in the U.S. House of Representatives. Twice in the last three years, 1856 and 1858, Lincoln had tried to win a seat in the U.S. Senate, and he reached his half century three months after his second defeat. Although his recent campaign debates with the victor, Stephen A. Douglas, had brought Lincoln much acclaim even beyond Illinois' borders, shortly after that defeat Lincoln wrote to a friend, "Though I now sink out of view, and shall be forgotten, I believe I have made some marks which will tell for the cause of civil liberty long after I am gone"—a consoling thought clearly outweighed by disappointment.[15]

Having failed twice to win a U.S. Senate seat, Lincoln also saw no prospect of winning Illinois' governorship and had no desire to return either to the state legislature or the House of Representatives. The 1860 presidential election was less than two years away, but the Democrats would almost certainly nominate the man who had just beaten Lincoln, and plenty of Republican officeholders back east had greater claims to the party's nomination than the prairie lawyer. The next senatorial election in Illinois was three years away, but the incumbent was a friend Lincoln had helped to elect, while Douglas's seat—unless Douglas was elected president in the meantime—was now safe until 1864. Lincoln was justified in thinking he himself might be all but forgotten by then. A month after his latest defeat, Lincoln wrote to another friend “merely to let you know that I am neither dead nor dying.”[16]

Lincoln might have felt tempted to accept that his political career was over and that he should now devote himself to his legal practice and to his wife, Mary, and their three sons. Resuming legal work would restore depleted funds and take Lincoln’s mind off his lack of political prospects. Some historians have even perceived an attempted career shift, from lawyer/politician to lawyer/lecturer. The lyceums, young men’s clubs, and debating societies provided a ready market for touring lecturers who offered information along with entertainment. Lincoln admired lecturers, possessed broad interests, enjoyed research, and was a highly experienced public speaker with a notorious sense of humor. However, Lincoln only dipped his toe, rather than plunged, into the lecture circuit, beginning in April 1858, a few months before his last senate race—not, therefore, a result of his defeat. It was hardly a new career, lasting only two years (until Lincoln became preoccupied with his presidential bid) and consisting of delivering pretty much the same lecture on five or six occasions, two of them near his fiftieth birthday. Lecturing helped keep Lincoln’s name before the public, but his lecture did not greatly impress many who heard it at the time, and few scholars, until recently, have seen much value in it. However, it was about a topic that Darwin, had he for some reason travelled four thousand miles to be in the audience, would have been able to appreciate—even amid the muddle of examples, political asides, and jokes. Lincoln’s subject was the nature of man.[17]

We know exactly where Charles Darwin was on that shared birthday, but we have no record of Lincoln’s activity. It was formerly thought that Lincoln spent part of that day on a forty-mile train journey home after delivering his lecture the previous evening in Jacksonville, Illinois, but Wayne C. Temple’s research demonstrates that that lecture took place a week earlier, and it was delivered again just over a week later, this time in Lincoln’s hometown, the Illinois capital, Springfield.[18] The very first delivery had occurred ten months earlier, and the last would take place fourteen months later. Only the last couple of deliveries drew large audiences because of Lincoln’s rising political status. Three weeks after presenting his lecture for the last time—and in no way because of it—Lincoln was nominated for the presidency. Friendly newspapers gave glowing reports of the lecture (or chided readers for meager attendances), while others shared the view of one listener who wrote, “I think people generally were disappointed in his lecture as it was on no particular subject and not well connected,” adding that if Lincoln had stuck to politics, “he would have done justice to his subject.”[19] Lincoln’s law partner and later biographer, William Herndon, wrote that the lecture “was a lifeless thing . . . no spirit and no life. The whole thing was a kind of farce and injured Mr. L.’s reputation as a man of sense among his friends and enemies.”[20] Shortly before the last delivery, Lincoln himself wrote, “I am not a professional lecturer. Have never got up but one lecture; and that I think, a rather poor one."[21] He left a manuscript of the lecture with other loose papers in the care of his wife's cousin before departing for the White House, where he later said, "When I get out of this place I'll finish it up and get my friend [Noah] B[rooks] to print it somewhere."[22]

Death intervened, and the manuscript was divided between two private collections and later published as two separate lectures. Thus mangled, considered nonpolitical, and doing little for Lincoln's reputation anyway, the lecture was ignored until recent decades when scholars began to explore the material, especially after Temple demonstrated that the two lectures were really one.[23]

The manuscript's division probably resulted from the fact that one half seems different from the other.[24] Temple suggested that Lincoln wrote it in sections because his legal practice interrupted. Perhaps Lincoln simply rewrote parts: a newspaper account of the lecture's first delivery mentioned topics not in the existing text and ignored others that are. The lecture's second delivery—shortly before his fiftieth birthday—came ten months after the first and also three months after his second senatorial defeat, so he had plenty of spare time for revision.

The lecture, variously titled as "Inventions," "Inventions and Discoveries," and "Discoveries and Inventions," seems to have several themes, most of them ostensibly nonpolitical. Much in the lecture would have interested, or at least amused, Lincoln's contemporary Charles Darwin. Just as Lincoln would have been fascinated to learn of this English gentleman's abhorrence of slavery, Darwin would have been surprised by this frontiersman's curious fascination with science and technology. Probably few who attended the lectures on "Inventions" knew that the speaker had actually taken out a U.S. patent a decade earlier.[25]

Although the lecture had gained Lincoln no obvious financial or political benefit from his unimpressed audiences, he was probably not joking when he later said he planned to "finish" the piece someday. Historian Jason Emerson recently discovered that Lincoln's son Robert knew of a copy of the lecture that his father had carefully written out in a blank book bound with a black cover, and this version may have included some material mentioned in contemporary newspaper accounts but not appearing in the existing fragments.[26] Lincoln may indeed have had future publication in mind—for a lecture that, until recently, was largely dismissed by historians. So what made Lincoln compose this lecture in the first place?

In 1855, Lincoln was riding the Eighth Circuit with two other lawyers, all taking turns reading aloud a lecture entitled "The Necessity, the Reality, and the Promise of the Progress of the Human Race," which George Bancroft had delivered to the New York Historical Society a year earlier. One of the lawyers, Henry D. Whitney, reported that Lincoln informed them "that he had for some time been contemplating the writing of a lecture on man; he said he proposed to review man from his earliest primeval state to his present high development, and he detailed at length the views and opinions he designed to incorporate in his lecture" (original emphasis).[27]

At some time Lincoln acquired a copy of Bancroft's lecture.[28] However, Lincoln did not seek to "imitate" Bancroft, as Garry Wills suggests, but rather to refute Bancroft's emphases.[29] Whitney's account indicated that Lincoln had already thought a great deal on "man and his progress" and discussed how he would approach it—differently from Bancroft.

Other accounts of the origins of Lincoln's lecture do not mention Bancroft. Noah Brooks, a journalist and friend, recalled Lincoln saying in 1865 that his lecture "was not defined, but his purpose was to analyze inventions and discoveries—'to get at the bottom of things'—and to show when, where, how, and why such things were invented or discovered; and, so far as possible, to find where the first mention is made of some of our common things," showing "at least in a fanciful way, that all the modern inventions were known centuries ago."[30] A third source, the wife of Lincoln's fellow lawyer and political ally Norman Judd, said Lincoln and a friend once discussed "the relative age of the discovery and use of the precious metals [after which] he went to the Bible to satisfy himself and became so interested in his researches that he made memoranda of the different discoveries and inventions." Lincoln became "convinced . . . that the subject would interest others, and he therefore prepared and delivered his lecture on The Age of Different Inventions."[31]

That the lecture possibly started off as one thing and became several others perhaps explains its lack of coherence—or even a straightforward title. Mrs. Judd's reference to "precious metals" rings true, for Lincoln had a particular interest in geology (discussed later), and the lecture actually began with the line, "All creation is a mine, and every man, a miner."[32]

Man, Lincoln declared, has had to "dig out his destiny," a characteristic distinguishing him from the animal kingdom. "Man is not the only animal who labors; but he is the only one who improves his workmanship." Darwin might have been impressed when Lincoln, giving several examples of industrious but nonimproving animals, mentioned ants! Lincoln went on to say that man improves his workmanship through "discoveries and inventions." While Lincoln could admire many points in Bancroft's lecture (especially the stress on the unity of mankind), Bancroft's examples of human workmanship were rather parochial—though fitting the occasion of the fiftieth anniversary of the New York Historical Society, for Bancroft had emphasized inventions of the last half century (especially contributions by such NYHS members as Robert Fulton). Although Lincoln sought the origins of inventions—not Fulton's steamboat but the earliest use of steam power—he actually explored the very concept of invention and what it says about man. Unlike Bancroft, who depicted God as aiding man in his progress, Lincoln subtly argued that God had little to do with it.[33]

Without being offensively explicit, Lincoln depicted Adam not as "falling" from a blessed and perfect condition but as a backward savage. He gently made Adam the butt of several jokes. Adam "seems not to have been a very observing man," taking a long time to notice "the obvious fact" that he was naked. Also, after making a serious point about the communication of ideas, Lincoln said Adam used speech "even before the creation of Eve. He gave names to the animals while she was still a bone in his side; and he broke out quite volubly when she first stood before him, the best present of his maker." Having conjured that titillating image, Lincoln next declared that the world's first invention, the "fig-leaf apron," should be credited to Eve rather than Adam, who perhaps did "no more than to stand by and thread the needle" (the last phrase being sometimes used as slang for sexual intercourse). Lincoln could not resist piling on two more jokes: "That proceeding may be reckoned as the mother of all 'Sewing societies'; and the first and most perfect 'world's fair': all inventions and all inventors then in the world being on the spot."[34]

The jests were mild, and Lincoln neutralized any sacrilege by larding the first half of his lecture with authoritative quotations from Scripture. When listing the earliest evidence for the first inventions—clothing, spinning, weaving, iron, transportation by animal and by boat, agriculture, wind power, water mills, and steam power—Lincoln cited biblical evidence, chapter and verse, no less than thirty-seven times. Darwin, who would soon be adding "by the Creator" to the concluding paragraph of The Origin, was in no position to throw stones about such lip service to popular piety—although this may be one reason why the free-thinking Herndon considered Lincoln's lecture such a failure. But Herndon was less likely than Darwin to comprehend Lincoln's cautiously camouflaged point.

One audience member, apparently familiar with Lincoln's courtroom tactics, wrote that the lecture's two halves "forcibly reminded us of his legal argument, wherein he first states the facts in a clear and simple manner, and then reasons from those facts backward and forward to cause and effect."[35] A fellow lawyer once asserted that Lincoln "stated the case of his adversary better and more forcibly than his opponent could state it himself . . . [then] he presented his own case."[36]

After apparently paying homage to the Bible, Lincoln undermined its usefulness for explaining human development. Without blatancy, Lincoln suggested that man had not fallen but risen and not through divine assistance but through a gradual improvement brought about by man's own effort along with a degree of unexplained contingency—chance. For Lincoln's curious mind, the Bible simply left too much unexplained, a point he made humorously: "We can scarcely conceive the possibility of making much of anything else, without the use of iron tools. Indeed, an iron hammer must have been very much needed to make the first iron hammer with. A stone probably served as a substitute. How could the 'gopher wood' for the Ark, have been gotten out without an axe? It seems to me an axe, or a miracle, was indispensable."[37]

Clearly, Lincoln was not relying on miracles any more than primitive man relied on divine assistance to invent a boat: "The sight of a crow standing on a piece of drift-wood floating down the swollen current of a creek or river, might well enough suggest the specific idea to a savage." Similarly, when Lincoln allowed that "it would appear that speech was not an invention of man, but rather the direct gift of his Creator," he immediately equivocated: "But whether Divine gift, or invention, it is still plain that if a mode of communication had been left to invention, speech must have been the first."[38]

Darwin and Lincoln lived a century before the development of scientific dating techniques, but Darwin, like most geologists of his time, already rejected the estimate (extrapolated from the Bible) that creation took place six thousand years ago. Many thoughtful people still assumed that however old the Earth might be, mankind's history was only six thousand years old. As discussed later, Lincoln understood that the Earth was far older than the biblical chronology, but the first part of his lecture seems to nod to the traditional chronology with regard to mankind. Whether or not he accepted that chronology, he let his audience think he did. He also seemed to concede the Bible's scrupulous accuracy when he said that although some "profane [i.e., nonreligious] authors" think spinning and weaving originated in Egypt, "this is not contradicted, or made improbable, by anything in the Bible," because the patriarch Abraham's mention of "thread" did not occur till after his sojourn in Egypt. Of course, this "concession" was again typical of Lincoln's courtroom technique, for it established that the "profane authors" were right that Egyptians, not God's chosen people, invented cloth making.[39]

Thus, Lincoln laid out the Bible's (and Bancroft's) version of man's early development in a way that suggested one could not use "God's will" to explain what made man advance further than animals (as Adam did) or what made some men advance further than others. The second half of the lecture offered Lincoln's own explanation, scarcely mentioning the Bible.

The opening discussion of the second half seems out of place—probable evidence of rewriting and of Lincoln's inability to avoid a bit of politicking. Between a slight reference to unexploited steam power near the end of the first half and a more extensive discussion of its utilization in the second half, Lincoln inserted a long and sarcastic digression on "Young America." Although Lincoln attempted a tie-in ("Is he not the inventor and owner of the present, and sole hope of the future?"), his audience would have understood that Lincoln was launching an attack on the Democratic Party in general and on Lincoln's political foe Douglas in particular.[40] Before long, Lincoln worked his way back to his main topic by borrowing a phrase that the "Young America" faction within the Democratic Party had formerly used against its rivals—"Old Fogy"—and applying it to "the first of all fogies, father Adam," who "according to his chance" was "quite as much of a man" as his descendants. Lincoln then argued that all the advances since Adam's time were the "result of Discoveries, Inventions, and Improvements. These in turn, are the result of observation, reflection and experiment," by which man built on "all he has learned from others" (original emphases).[41]

Learning from others was enormously facilitated by the inventions of "phonetic writing" and later printing. Writing was not divinely given to men, for which reason its development has been uneven among them: "That it was difficult of conception and execution, is apparent . . . [since] so many tribes of men have come down from Adam's time to ours without ever having possessed it."[42]

To writing and printing, Lincoln then added two more "inventions and discoveries" that were "of peculiar value on account of their great efficiency in facilitating all other inventions and discoveries": the discovery of America in 1492 (arguing, "a new country is most favorable—almost necessary—to the emancipation of thought") and the introduction of the first patent laws in 1624 (which "added the fuel of interest to the fire of genius, in the discovery and production of new and useful things").[43]

There the manuscript abruptly ended, leaving the lecturer perhaps to ad-lib some peroration. But there also seems to be a strange insertion between Lincoln's first reference to America's discovery and the patent laws and his actual discussion of them: "Though not apposite to my present purpose, it is but justice to the fruitfulness of that period, to mention two other important events—the Lutheran Reformation in 1517, and, still earlier, the invention of negroes, or, of the present mode of using them, in 1434." Listing the Reformation among inventions "of peculiar value" probably pleased Lincoln's Protestant audience—unless they thought about why he was calling their religion an "invention" and pairing it with another that was worthy of condemnation, slavery. Lincoln gave no further explanation for bringing up either topic (the larger significance of "the invention of negroes" is discussed later).[44]

In his lecture, Lincoln used the word "race" three times, always referring to the entire "human race." He spoke of different "tribes of men," some characterized as "savages." But while he agreed with Bancroft's view that "every man is in substance equal to his fellow man," Lincoln accepted that men have developed differently: not because God made them different or bestowed "inventions" on some but not others but exactly because inventions and discoveries were made by men, giving some advantages over others.[45]

Just as Darwin's phrase "favoured races" did not mean some blessing by God but rather a higher level of development, so Lincoln argued that it is to the invention of writing, for example, that "we owe everything which distinguishes us from savages." Although the institution of slavery had stimulated a degree of "fruitfulness" (or profit) at least for some, slavery, like writing, was an invention. Moreover, its modern version was based on another invention: negro inferiority. Lincoln saw nothing natural, innate, or divinely ordained to justify making blacks into slaves. As Lincoln could read in the Encyclopaedia Americana (which he possessed and cited elsewhere in the lecture), Africans' bondage to Europeans was "invented" in 1434, when a Portuguese captain kidnapped some Africans and sold them to some Moorish families in southern Spain. Unlike slaves in antiquity, these were not debtors, war captives, or even time-indentured laborers. Six years later, the captain repeated the effort, broadened the market, and found others who wished to join in or compete.[46]

Dr. Francis Lieber, who later as president of Columbia College conferred on President Lincoln an honorary doctorate of laws, edited the Encyclopaedia. His article on "slavery" called it "the greatest bar to civilization" and added the "melancholy reflection" that Europeans reestablished slavery in their colonies in modern times after ending it at home in the Middle Ages. Moreover, this "atrocity at which nature revolts . . . could never have reached the height it did, if the color of the slave had not given rise to the idea of his being by nature a degraded being." But Lieber touched on more than mere color, declaring in the article entitled "Negro" that the shape of the cranium allowed "less space for the brain than in some other varieties" of man. However, Lieber asserted, "The opinion formerly maintained, that they were of an inferior variety of animals, would not now find an advocate, or a convert, even in the ignorance or the worst passions of the whites."[47]

By the time he gave his lecture, Lincoln knew that that last assertion was out of date, for in the twenty-seven years since Lieber wrote it, there had indeed arisen serious advocates of the idea that blacks were if not "an inferior variety of animal" then at best an inferior variety of human, one created separately from Adam and on an inferior model. Important men of science were now effectively endorsing the prejudices of those who had some interest or need to view blacks as subhumans. It was a view that neither Lincoln nor Darwin ever accepted. Lincoln's lecture may have been stimulated by Bancroft's—as Darwin needed the catalyst provided by Wallace to produce The Origin—but Lincoln and Darwin also had a larger purpose: to address the incorrect thinking (whether based on religious dogma or weak science) used by some humans to justify enslaving others.

For Lincoln, slavery was wrong because, like it or not, it violated the principle that "all men are created equal." For Darwin, a special creation of mankind (or, worse, of separate groups of men) was wrong because, like it or not, the principle of natural selection applied equally to men and animals. Both principles faced considerable opposition—and still do because neither is subject to mathematical proof, and many people have an interest in treating others as inferiors. Yet, the principles advocated by Lincoln and Darwin have come to be accepted generally, advancing our understanding of man's place in relation to the rest of mankind and to the universe. For crystallizing these views and acting upon them, both Lincoln and Darwin have earned their iconic status as men who not only were products of their times but actually changed their world. Such enduring fame had been quite inconceivable during their first fifty years.

Origins and Education

Abraham Lincoln was named after his paternal grandfather. His maternal grandfather's name is unknown, and probably Lincoln's mother, Nancy Hanks, never knew it herself. Lincoln once confided that his mother "was the daughter of a nobleman," that is, a Virginia planter. This is unconfirmed but not unlikely.[1] The elder Abraham died twenty-three years before his namesake was born: Lincoln's own father, Thomas, was only eight years old when he saw his father killed by Indians in Kentucky. The youngest of three sons, Thomas inherited nothing and lived a hard-working life up to and after his marriage to the illegitimate Nancy Hanks. Abraham Lincoln, like his older sister, Sarah, was born into frontier poverty and raised by illiterate parents.

Although both of Charles Darwin's grandfathers died before he was born, at least he knew their names, as did thousands of other people in the late eighteenth century. Erasmus Darwin was a highly respected doctor, an accomplished poet and writer, a religious skeptic, and a "natural philosopher" (as "scientists" were then called) who once authored a book, Zoonomia, which featured a clear belief that the species of the world were the result not of a single creation but of some evolutionary development. Erasmus was a close friend of Josiah Wedgwood, the prosperous potter, technological innovator, and reform-minded Unitarian. Erasmus arranged for his son Robert to marry Wedgwood's daughter Susannah in 1796. Her £25,000 inheritance added to the wealth coming in from Robert's successful medical practice in Shrewsbury. Thus, both of Charles's parents descended from intelligent and affluent men who were religious dissenters, and his earliest memories were of an imposing five-bay, two-and-a-half-storied house, The Mount, overlooking the Severn River on the edge of Shrewsbury, where he, his older brother, and his four sisters were all born. Until he married and set up his own household, Darwin knew no other home than The Mount.

Lincoln had no memory of his birthplace in Kentucky, being only two when his family left the one-room cabin to rot and moved to better soil ten miles away. When Lincoln was seven, his family moved again, this time ninety miles northwest, out of Kentucky, across the Ohio River, and into Indiana. The Northwest Ordinance of 1787, parts of which did not apply south of the Ohio River, meant that land in Indiana was properly surveyed, and slavery was prohibited, so Thomas Lincoln no longer had to argue with wealthier men's clever lawyers or compete with their slave labor.

Thomas's motivation was not self-interest alone: he was a religious man and believed that slavery was wrong. His son later wrote, "I am naturally anti-slavery. If slavery is not wrong, nothing is wrong. I can not remember when I did not so think, and feel."[2] Darwin, too, came from antislavery stock, with both grandfathers and an aunt active on abolitionist committees.

Abraham Lincoln was raised close to nature, living in unbroken forest, shooting wild turkey through the chinks in the cabin wall, and using an axe almost every day till he was twenty-three. For Charles Darwin, nature was landscaped, conquered by roads and canals, tamed in the greenhouse and orchard and pigeon cot, and read about in his father's vast library. Darwin became fascinated with the natural world, which for Lincoln had always meant grinding labor and something to escape.

When their mothers died, Darwin and Lincoln were, respectively, eight and a half and nine years old. Charles had little memory of the event. His mother was fifty-two and had been an invalid for years, so Charles was mainly looked after by his older sisters before and after their mother's death. Abraham's mother was about thirty-five when she died suddenly, leaving a gaping hole in the vulnerable family. The tragedy would have been far more damaging if his father had not swiftly remarried to a widow with three children who expanded and stabilized the family. Abraham's stepmother proved wonderfully affectionate. Nevertheless, he idealized his "angel mother" and once said, "All that I am or ever hope to be I get from my mother, God bless her."[3] This may be an irrational appraisal of his mother's possible influence, the real message being that Lincoln felt he had inherited no characteristics from his father.

Darwin's whole career revolved around issues of inheritance and "nature versus nurture," yet he never suggested that he had inherited anything from either parent (except considerable wealth). Once, describing his early "taste for natural history," he wrote, "The passion for collecting . . . was very strong in me, and was clearly innate." In the manuscript, the word "innate" replaced "inherent," which had been illogical since he also wrote, "None of my sisters or brother ever had this taste."[4] Darwin saw his own development as being unusual and largely inexplicable. He declared that his "passion for collecting" set him apart, but it was hardly a unique activity for a boy of his era and class, especially one whose mother had raised fancy pigeons, whose father had a fine library well stocked with tomes on natural history, and whose elder brother showed an early interest in science. Yet, the word "innate" subtly excluded any necessary influence from his parents. In his autobiography, Darwin went to great lengths to depict and praise his father's professional skill, extraordinary memory, "powers of observation and his sympathy" yet added, ambiguously, "I do not think that I gained much from him intellectually, but his example ought to have been of much moral service to all his children."[5]

Tales exist—almost certainly untrue—that Abraham Lincoln himself was not actually Thomas's son. Such rumors surfaced during Lincoln's presidency, but whether Lincoln was a source or gave them any credence is unknown.[6] One can empathize with the attitude, hardly unique, "This cannot possibly be my real father!" Lincoln grew unusually tall and lanky, unlike his stocky, five-foot-nine-inch father, which may have added to the other anomaly: the son far outstripping his father's intellect.

Although it is unlikely that Lincoln doubted his father's paternity, he may have believed he inherited fewer qualities from his father than from the anonymous aristocrat who fathered Nancy Hanks. Lincoln later attained a reputation for great powers of sympathy, yet he showed little for his father when he mentioned in an autobiographical sketch that his father "never did more in the way of writing than to bunglingly sign his own name."[7] The harsh adverb would not have been used on his "angel mother"—who could not write her name even bunglingly.

Looking back on their childhoods, Lincoln and Darwin saw themselves, with differing degrees of justification, as self-created through self-education. Indeed, their educational experiences, though radically different, caused tensions with their fathers. Lincoln's expected him to become, like father and grandfather, useful on the farm, which required no schooling; Darwin's father expected his son to follow his father and grandfather into the medical profession. Both fathers were dissatisfied by their sons' education: in Darwin's case because he seemed to gain too little from it and in Lincoln's because he gained too much.

Darwin was tutored by his sister Caroline before the age of eight, then had twelve years of formal education, including two years of medical studies in Edinburgh and three years at Cambridge University—all of which Darwin described disparagingly in his later autobiography. His school's classical curriculum "as a means of education to me was simply a blank," and his verdict on himself was worse: "I believe that I was considered by all my masters and by my father as a very ordinary boy, rather below the common standard in intellect." Yet, Darwin did develop a deep love of reading, partly thanks to the positive example of his older brother, Erasmus. Charles "used to sit for hours reading the historical plays of Shakespeare" as well as Byron, Scott, and Thomson's Seasons. He felt "intense satisfaction" in Euclid's proofs and "a wish to travel in remote countries" after reading a book entitled The Wonders of the World. Erasmus led him into collecting minerals and insects, drying plants, and experimenting in chemistry, an activity sufficiently odd to earn Darwin the nickname "Gas" among his fellow students. White's Selborne sparked an interest in the habits of birds, though he also developed a "zeal" for shooting them.[8] Lincoln, as far as we know, collected nothing and hated hunting, although, almost of necessity, he was a good shot.

Although young "Gas" thought his chemistry experiments with his brother were the best part of his education, he was once "publicly rebuked by the headmaster" for wasting his time "over such useless subjects," and to his "deep mortification" his father once said, "You care for nothing but shooting, dogs and rat-catching, and you will be a disgrace to yourself and all your family." Since Charles "was doing no good at school," his father sent him at an earlier age than usual to Edinburgh, where Erasmus was already studying medicine. The lectures, except those on chemistry, "were intolerably dull," and when Charles attended two operations (in the days before anesthesia), "I rushed away before they were completed. Nor did I ever attend again." Darwin effectively abandoned medical studies, regretting only that he never practiced dissection, which "would have been invaluable for all my future work." Around this period, Charles also "became convinced" that his property inheritance from his father would obviate the need to earn a living, which news "was sufficient to check any strenuous effort to learn medicine."[9]

However, Darwin still enjoyed studying natural science. This was not, like medicine, a respectable profession but mainly an eccentric avocation for gentlemen, often country vicars not obliged to spend much time saving souls. It was actually Darwin's father who "proposed that I should become a clergyman." Sent to Cambridge, he attended only a few compulsory lectures and found the mathematics instruction "repugnant." Darwin later recalled that his time at Cambridge was "worse than wasted" and that his passion for shooting led him into "a sporting set, including some dissipated low-minded young men." Darwin was fairly amazed when his exam results earned him a pass degree.[10]

"But no pursuit at Cambridge was followed with nearly so much eagerness or gave me so much pleasure as collecting beetles." A friend's joke that one day Darwin would be a Fellow of the Royal Society seemed "preposterous" to him. And yet, just as he had attached himself in Edinburgh to a mentor, the sponge expert Robert Grant, Darwin in Cambridge became a devoted acolyte of some of the leading naturalists of the day, the clergymen/geologists J. S. Henslow, William Whewell, and Adam Sedgwick. Darwin attended their lectures and soirées and joined field trips that provided practical experience in geology: "Looking back, I infer that there must have been something in me a little superior to the common run of youths, otherwise the above-mentioned men, so much older than me and higher in academical position, would never have allowed me to associate with them. Certainly I was not aware of any such superiority." These men raised Darwin's self-esteem and offered a model, as did his cousin William Darwin Fox, a devoted naturalist who had just obtained a curacy. After his examinations, Darwin accompanied Sedgwick to Wales on a geological tour that made him yearn for more. He planned an excursion to Tenerife, a Canary Island, having recently read Alexander von Humboldt's Personal Narrative, which, along with John Frederick William Herschel's Introduction to the Study of Natural Philosophy, "stirred up in me a burning zeal to add even the most humble contribution to the noble structure of Natural Science."[11]

Darwin's formal education ended when he was twenty-one, but his self-education—his real education—had begun when he was a child assisting Erasmus's chemistry experiments and expanded in stages, always accompanied by intense and wide-ranging reading. In addition to works on science, his interest in poetry continued for many years, yet eventually waned in middle age, while "books on history, biographies and travels . . . interest me as much as they ever did." He kept up with scientific journals, perused the Times regularly, and found fiction "a wonderful relief and pleasure." Darwin's leisure reading overlapped his scientific interests: he "happened to read for amusement" Malthus's Essay on Population, which greatly influenced his work.[12]

From various sources, one could compile a list of works read by Darwin that would number in the thousands. We have far less evidence regarding what Lincoln read.[13] His autobiographical sketches, legal work, and correspondence mention few books, and his speeches do not cite sources even though they were often based on wide research. Early poverty developed in him the habit of borrowing and reading books rather than buying and displaying them, but he did eventually have a small private library. Much of it was kept at the law office and was intermingled with the much larger collection owned by his bookish law partner, William Herndon. Both Lincoln and Darwin were passionate readers, and if Darwin ultimately read more, it is mainly because he had no need to earn a living and lived longer. While their purposes and opportunities differed greatly, both read far more widely than one might guess, and they read (or, in Lincoln's case, at least had access to) a large number of the same books, which brought Lincoln and Darwin into surprisingly close contact with each other's mental development. Books also helped them to escape their presumed destinies, on the one hand, that of a Shropshire doctor or provincial vicar with a penchant for entomology and, on the other, that of an Illinois farmer or carpenter.

Darwin shared Lincoln's love of Shakespeare, Milton, Gray, and Byron but never mentioned Robert Burns, whom Lincoln adored. A fortnight before his own fiftieth birthday, Lincoln attended a dinner celebrating Burns's centenary. Lincoln "could very nearly quote all of Burns' Poems from memory. . . . He had acquired the Scotch accent and could render Burns perfectly"—though possibly with a Hoosier twang.[14] Darwin, who met people in Edinburgh who had known Burns, may have found Burns's dialect writing unpalatable and felt little "auld lang syne" for Edinburgh. He could not share Lincoln's close identification with Burns's background of poverty, his satirical view of religion, and even his habit of always walking around with a book in one hand. Long before Darwin began to theorize himself out of orthodoxy, Lincoln had already become a religious skeptic partly because of Burns, who, as one early acquaintance said, "helped Lincoln to be an infidel I think—at least he found in Burns a like thinker & feeler."[15]

That Lincoln loved reading Burns or any poet is less surprising than that he was able to read at all. His parents and stepmother were basically illiterate, subscription schools cost money, schooling must have seemed a luxury for others to enjoy, and Abe experienced only a few months of it. He later wrote that "what he has in the way of education, he has picked up."[16] Probably many acquaintances had a similar education, which then languished through disuse. Darwin's environment overflowed with affluent and well-educated people, but in Lincoln's boyhood Indiana, "If a straggler supposed to understand latin, happened to so-journ in the neighborhood, he was looked upon as a wizzard." Darwin met nothing but high expectations at home, at school, in university; but in Pigeon Creek, wrote Lincoln, there was "absolutely nothing to excite ambition for education."[17]

By the time Darwin wrote about his education in his Autobiography in 1876, he was a world-famous scientist who could deprecate his neglect of the opportunities offered by his formal education and even believe his achievements came in spite of that education. When Lincoln wrote in December 1859 of his own education, he was consciously positioning himself as a possible presidential candidate, playing down any hint of intellectualism that might dampen popularity. There is no doubt that Lincoln was actually proud of his hard-won attainments.[18]

"He was the learned boy among us unlearned folks," according to a classmate.[19] Lincoln's ability and eagerness set him apart, and apparently from an early date, he saw education as the means to set himself free. But the path was strewn with obstacles. As one neighbor put it, Lincoln "was a constant, and I may say stubborn reader."[20] His father sometimes had to "slash" him to do his chores. "Lazy" is the word frequently used by contemporaries who shared Thomas Lincoln's inability to accept that his son had ambitions beyond farming. Because his family and neighbors were unaccustomed to seeing anyone in the act of reading, they found Lincoln's habits memorable. "He read setting, lying down & walking in the street"; he read while the plow horse caught its breath; cocked on a haystack; astraddle a woodpile; while others went to a dance; between customers in the post office; under a tree; up a tree. Most often, the descriptions include "lying down": on a trundle bed while rocking a cradle with his foot; flat on his back on a cellar door; usually stretching his six-foot-four-inch frame on the floor.[21] All this was odd to his "unlearned" neighbors—and even to us who love reading but do not live in a cabin crowded with children and devoid of sofas and good lighting.

Reading is largely a solitary activity, but Lincoln was always a sociable character who rubbed along well with his family (except for his father) and was never viewed as an upstart or a snob by his neighbors. He was happy to read aloud to those who couldn't and explained things patiently without showing off, though correcting his father on occasion earned him a slap. As a teenager, he wrote documents for illiterate adults, perhaps even assisting his "bungling" father.

Darwin, like his father and grandfathers, possessed a library. His books were often heavily annotated, and he developed the habit of cutting through the spine of particularly thick books so he could read half at a time. In contrast, there are few examples of marginalia by Lincoln, and mutilating such sacred items was unimaginable. Living in frontier communities with illiterate parents meant a dearth of books in Lincoln's home. During his brief periods of schooling, his teachers used the simplest textbooks, but young Abe's self-education was greatly aided by his stepmother, Sarah, who, though illiterate, at least appreciated learning and brought from her deceased first husband's house not only a King James Bible but also, perhaps, Bunyan's Pilgrims Progress, Aesop's Fables, Defoe's Robinson Crusoe, and Sinbad the Sailor. In the forests of Indiana, Lincoln's first glimpse of Western civilization came through William Scott's Lessons in Elocution with its excerpts from Shakespeare, Homer, Virgil, Milton, Dryden, The Spectator, Pope, Hume, and Dr. Johnson. While loving poetry, Lincoln never shared Darwin's pleasure in reading novels: Lincoln said that he "never read an entire novel" in his life, having once commenced but never finished Ivanhoe; however, a friend testified that Lincoln read at least one whole novel, Nathaniel B. Tucker's George Balcombe (1836). If little of Lincoln's reading was fictional, all of his reading was for pleasure while also being purposeful. Lincoln read William Grimshaw's History of the United States (all forty-nine years of it), Mason Locke Weems's Life of Washington, and David Ramsay's biographies of George Washington and Benjamin Franklin—all providing heroes to emulate.[22] Someone loaned Lincoln The Revised Statutes of Indiana, which also contained the Constitution and the Northwest Ordinance. One piece of campaign literature in 1860, perhaps for the propaganda value, mentioned that Lincoln had read Captain James Riley's popular Authentic Narrative of the Loss of the American Brig "Commerce" (1817), recounting the author's experience as a white slave in North Africa.[23]

When Lincoln left his father's house to live in New Salem, Illinois, his self-education moved up a gear. Having measured the gap between his spoken English and literary English, he worked intensely to master the rules laid down in Kirkham's Grammar and after a relatively short time told a friend, "Bill, if that is what they call a science, I'll subdue another."[24] When Lincoln became a postmaster, newspaper subscribers found their latest issues well thumbed, and customers who struggled with the alphabet appreciated Lincoln's fondness for reading aloud. When not in the post office, he was often by the bank of the Sangamo River with his friend Jack Kelso, a curiously cultured hunter and fisherman, who may have introduced Lincoln to Burns's poetry. They spent hours discussing Shakespeare while Kelso fished and Lincoln didn't. But Lincoln's interests ranged well beyond newspapers and poetry. According to a friend, after grammar, Lincoln studied > Arithmetic, then Natural philosophy, Astronomy & Chemistry, then Surveying, and Law, In the mean time read history & other books, the news papers of the day, in fact any and all books from which he could derive information or knowledge. . . . [Lincoln would] alternately, entertain and amuse the company by witticisms jokes &c, and study his lessons. He never appeared to be a hard student as he seamed to Master his studies with little effort, until he commenced the study of the Law, in that he became wholly engrossed.[25]

To turn himself into a surveyor, Lincoln read Flint's System of Geometry and Trigonometry and Gibson's Treatise on Practical Surveying.[26] By the age of twenty-one, he was perhaps already contemplating a career in law as he worked through Blackstone's Commentaries with the help of a pocket dictionary and Murray's English Grammar, and it was his habit "after reading or studying Murray or Blackstone for two or three hours, to take up Burns' poems, which he read . . . with that hilarity which usually was so peculiar to him."[27] Later friends in Springfield loaned him law books, and he could research his cases in the State Supreme Court library.[28] Later still, as a congressman in Washington, D.C., Lincoln was deemed a "bookworm" because he spent so much time in the old Congressional Library, from which he later borrowed books on military science during his presidency.[29]

Lincoln's interest in geology is discussed later along with the scientific interests of Herndon, his law partner, but for now note that Lincoln, like Darwin, had a special regard for Euclid whose work (as he told a campaign biographer) he "studied and nearly mastered . . . since he was a member of Congress."[30] Lincoln also read the eighteenth-century natural theologian William Paley, whose work greatly influenced Darwin.[31]

The horizons of both men were broadened not only by books but also by the direct effect of travel. While Darwin's youthful voyaging was more extensive and famously life changing, Lincoln's traveling at a slightly younger age was also important to his development. Lincoln never shared Herndon's great interest in botany, and we have no evidence that either of them ever read Darwin's wonderful account of his experiences as a naturalist in The Voyage of the Beagle. Had Lincoln read it, he would have discovered that the book raised issues about slavery that might well have set Lincoln reminiscing about his own experiences voyaging down the Mississippi River.

Voyages and the Experience of Slavery

In the spring of 1828, nineteen-year-old Lincoln made the first of two journeys by flatboat down the Ohio and Mississippi rivers, and about the time when the second one ended, Darwin embarked on a voyage that carried him around the globe. Lincoln's travels lasted a few months while Darwin's trip was supposed to finish in two years but lasted five. Lincoln's purpose was to transport farm produce as frontier settlers had done since moving west of the Appalachian Mountains. Lincoln's father had made the same journey and after selling off his produce downstream (and breaking up his flatboat to sell as firewood) had returned home on foot, but Abe was able to make his return trips by that wonder of the age, the steamboat. Darwin's purpose was anything but commercial—indeed, his father had to pay his expenses. Having recently graduated from Cambridge University, Darwin sought to delay becoming a clergyman by pursuing his interests in natural science. A plan to explore the Canary Islands with some friends fell through, but Professor J. S. Henslow arranged for Darwin to be invited aboard HMS Beagle for its projected two-year voyage charting the coast of South America. Captain Robert FitzRoy needed a "gentleman" to serve as his companion, but it was understood that Darwin could also pursue his naturalist's interests, although a naturalist had already been assigned to the mission.

Before Lincoln's second river journey, he and three companions had to build the flatboat themselves. It was eighteen by eighty feet and made to carry themselves, sacks of corn, barrel pork, and a small herd of hogs on their twelve-hundred-mile journey. HMS Beagle was only ten feet longer and six feet wider than Lincoln's flatboat. There were no live hogs, but salt pork featured prominently among the victuals. There were also the normal supplies and spares for a long-distance voyage, ten cannon and ammunition, seven additional boats carried onboard or on davits, an array of scientific equipment, and a sixty-five-man crew with nine "supernumeraries," Darwin among them. His quarters were in the ten-by-eleven-foot chart room in which he could not stand upright and had to sleep in a hammock above the four-by-six-foot chart table that competed for space with Darwin's personal belongings, his naturalist's accoutrements, and the ship's mizzen mast, poking up through the decks.

FitzRoy's obsessive surveying lengthened both the voyage and Darwin's opportunities to explore the Cape Verde Islands, Brazil's rain forest, the pampas, the Andes, and later Tahiti, New Zealand, and Australia, not to mention the Galapagos Islands. "The voyage of the Beagle," Darwin wrote four decades later, "has been by far the most important event in my life and has determined my whole career."[1] With hindsight, one can see that Darwin's voyage merely confirmed the course he had vaguely set for himself. He had never longed to be a doctor or a clergyman, and science was no longer a hobby. The specimens Darwin regularly sent to Cambridge fascinated the scientific community while his letters to Henslow were read to scientific bodies and printed for private distribution even before Darwin returned. Less than a month after that, the twenty-six-year-old was proposed as a Fellow of the Royal Geological Society.

As Darwin now turned his back on any career other than science (and never stepped aboard another ship), Lincoln decided there was more to life than being a farmer, carpenter, or even a river man. Circumnavigating the globe is quite unlike floating down and steaming up the Mississippi, yet the most significant difference is that Darwin was traveling away from civilization and Lincoln toward it. The Englishman left behind his managed countryside and highly stratified society to experience tropical forests, deserts, mountain ranges, and primitive peoples. Upon first seeing tropical vegetation, Darwin wrote in his diary, "It has been for me a glorious day, like giving to a blind man eyes," and his first walk in a rain forest was practically a religious experience: "The mind is a chaos of delight."[2] To Lincoln, a forest meant being handed an axe and told to start clearing. Trees were meant to be sawed in a mill that rivers were meant to power. The novelties Lincoln experienced on his voyage were social: towns and cities, especially New Orleans, "by far the largest city the two country boys had ever seen, with imposing buildings, busy shops, and incessant traffic. Here they heard French spoken as readily as English." Historian David Herbert Donald thus expressed what Lincoln never did: "perhaps it was too overwhelming."[3] Although Darwin was well read on natural history, his voyage brought him an essential experience of the vast diversity of species and varieties in the natural world. Likewise, although Lincoln's reading had opened worlds beyond the Ohio valley, seeing the diverse cities and peoples of the lower Mississippi must have been illuminating to a frontiersman.

Lincoln's later autobiographical sketch devoted four sentences to his first flatboat trip and ten to the second, though half of those were taken up with an irresistible yarn about someone's idea of sewing up the eyes of the live hogs so they would be easier to drive onto the flatboat; it didn't work.[4] He also later joked that during the first stage of one journey, the Sangamo River meandered so severely that he camped in the same place three nights in a row.[5] Other contemporaries later added some details to these stories, but none of this can compare with the classic travel narrative produced by Darwin, commonly known as The Voyage of the Beagle. The book contained a solid diet of factual and scientific information supplemented with lively opinions, all drawn from the extensive diaries, notebooks, and letters he wrote during his travels.

One common experience upon which both these two young travelers commented was slavery. Although both had already gained various impressions of human bondage, these were broadened during their voyages, probably more so in Darwin's case.

Among Lincoln's four sentences (in third person) about his first flatboat trip to New Orleans, he mentioned that "one night they were attacked by seven negroes with intent to kill and rob them. They were hurt some in the melee, but succeeded in driving the negroes from the boat, and then 'cut cable' 'weighed anchor' and left." Contemporaries later corroborated, or elaborated, parts of this story: "Abe told me so—saw the scar myself," and "Abe fought the Negroes . . . pretended to have guns . . . the Negroes had hickory clubs—my husband said 'Lincoln get the guns and Shoot'—the Negroes took alarm and left."[6]

The story of seeing a slave auction in New Orleans during the second trip is even more dramatic if less reliable. According to Herndon's interview notes, John Hanks, Lincoln's cousin and fellow flatboatman, said, "We saw Negroes Chained—maltreated—whipt & scourged. Lincoln saw it—his heart bled—Said nothing much . . . was thoughtful & abstracted—I can say knowingly that it was on this trip that he formed his opinions of slavery."[7] Hanks had not actually gone all the way to New Orleans and later suggested he heard the story from the third crew member, John Johnston, who had.[8] Nevertheless, the story appeared in Herndon's biography, with the embellishment of Lincoln saying to his fellows, "By God, boys, let's get away from this. If ever I get a chance to hit that thing [slavery], I'll hit it hard." Herndon assured readers that he had "also heard Mr. Lincoln refer to it himself."[9]

Until the age of seven, Lincoln lived in a slave state, where he probably saw slaves marched along the road in chains. After his family crossed the Ohio River, he saw slaves brought across to labor temporarily on land where slavery was supposedly forbidden. The sight of shackled slaves being transported by steamboat "was a continual torment to me; and I see something like it every time I touch the Ohio, or any other slave-border."[10] Even in supposedly free Indiana and Illinois, slavery was a familiar presence, and the only novelties Lincoln could report from his travels were being personally attacked by blacks and sickened by the sight of an actual auction.

Darwin's family was as strongly antislavery as Lincoln's, but before the Beagle voyage, Darwin had no immediate experience of slavery. Less than two months into the trip and shortly after reaching the first slave country Darwin ever visited, Brazil, he quarreled severely with Captain FitzRoy, who "defended and praised slavery, which I abominated." According to Darwin, FitzRoy mentioned that "he had just visited a great slave-owner, who had called up many of his slaves and asked them whether they were happy, and whether they wished to be free, and all answered 'No.' I then asked him, perhaps with a sneer, whether he thought that the answers of slaves in the presence of their master was worth anything. This made him excessively angry."[11] Darwin was later gratified when a visiting Royal Navy captain recounted the story of a slave who was very well treated by his master yet said, "If I could but see my father & my two sisters once again, I should be happy. I can never forget them." Darwin commented archly in his diary, "Such was the expression of one of these people, who are ranked by the polished savages in England as hardly their brethren, even in God's eyes."[12]

Like Lincoln, Darwin also learned something of the desperation of fugitive slaves. He heard that a group were contriving "to eke out a subsistence" in mountains near Rio de Janeiro when a party of soldiers found them. "One old woman, . . . sooner than again be led into slavery, dashed herself to pieces from the summit of the mountain." Darwin added with bitter irony, "In a Roman matron this would have been called the noble love of freedom: in a poor negress it is mere brutal obstinacy." And the notion of slave auctions also shocked Darwin. While staying on a hacienda,

> I was very nearly being an eye-witness to one of those atrocious acts which can only take place in a slave country. Owing to a quarrel and a law-suit, the owner was on the point of taking all the women and children from the male slaves, and selling them separately at the public auction at Rio. Interest, and not any feeling of compassion, prevented this act. I do not believe the inhumanity of separating thirty families, who had lived together for many years, even occurred to the owner. Yet I will pledge myself, that in humanity and good feeling he was superior to the common run of men.

Darwin often indicated how much his own impressions differed from the perceptions of other whites. He was also interested by the slaves' self-perceptions, as he mentioned in "one very trifling anecdote, which at the time struck me more forcibly than any story of cruelty." While trying to make himself understood by a black ferryman, Darwin gesticulated overmuch, and the black, expecting to be hit, dropped his hands to his sides: "I shall never forget my feelings of surprise, disgust, and shame, at seeing a great powerful man afraid even to ward off a blow, directed, as he thought, at his face. This man had been trained to a degradation lower than the slavery of the most helpless animal."[13]

Lincoln and Darwin, while still young men, both had reactions against slavery that were as admirable as they were untypical. Slavery had been widespread for centuries, was taken for granted by most people, and was thought by many to be sanctioned by the Bible. Writing in his Beagle diary, Darwin came close to prophesying about an unknown flatboatman in Illinois: "As far as my testimony goes, every individual who has the glory of having exerted himself on the subject of slavery, may rely on it his labours are exerted against miseries perhaps even greater than he imagines."[14]

The Declaration of Independence proclaims that "all men are created equal," and although Jefferson and many others who signed his composition were slaveowners, it is an important fact—which Lincoln highlighted later in his career—that they viewed slavery as an evil, somehow imposed on America by the British, and now destined for extinction as British rule ended. Many northern states began to abolish slavery through various methods and time scales and assumed the southern states would soon follow, although it was acknowledged that they faced a more complex set of problems. Recognition of that shared conviction and those divergent situations made it easier to tolerate compromises on any national issues relating to slavery on the assumption that such expedients were temporary.

The first national compromise was the 1787 law forbidding slavery in the western lands north of the Ohio River but not south of it—one reason why many small farmers such as the Lincolns later moved north of the river. In that same year, the founders drafting the Constitution thrashed out a set of compromises that they viewed as necessary, temporary, and embarrassing (for which reason they avoided the words "slave" or "slavery"). The Fifth Amendment, protecting property from federal encroachment, effectively guaranteed that the power to abolish slavery would remain as it had been, solely with the individual states.

That year, 1787, also marked two important developments in Britain's antislavery evolution. American independence removed two-thirds of the slaves over whom Britain had previously had jurisdiction, but the Atlantic slave trade itself was still a vast part of the British economy. Recognizing that abolishing the slave trade was the first step toward ending slavery itself, antislavery leaders such as Granville Sharp and Thomas Clarkson founded the Society for Effecting the Abolition of the African Slave Trade. Darwin's grandfather Josiah Wedgwood was the committee member who designed the famous medallion bearing the motto, "Am I not a man and a brother?" He sent some examples to the president of the Abolition Society in America, Benjamin Franklin, to show that abolition "is daily more and more taking the possession of men's minds on this side of the Atlantic as well as with you."[15] Darwin's other grandfather, Erasmus Darwin, described the image in verse:

> The Slave in chains, on supplicating knee,
> Spreads his wide arms, and lifts his eyes to Thee;
> With hunger pale, with wounds and toil oppress'd,
> "Are we not brethren?"—Sorrow choaks the rest.[16]

Also in 1787, Sharp was instrumental in establishing the Sierra Leone Company, which was perceived as a parallel effort: to colonize freed blacks back to Africa. While slaves were scattered throughout various parts of the United States, principally in the south, most British-owned slaves lived in the West Indies, four thousand miles from Britain. About fourteen thousand slaves or freedmen resided in England, and in 1787, the first ships began implementing their repatriation to Africa. Although some black leaders who preferred to remain permanently in Britain withdrew their support for a project that suffered great difficulties, most people viewed colonization not as futile or racist but as the most obvious redress for the original crime of kidnapping Africans—although this remedy was not applied where most British-owned slaves resided, in the West Indies.[17]

The American Constitution had provided that the federal government could end the slave trade after a twenty-year moratorium, and many expected slavery to die out in the United States shortly after the slave trade's scheduled ending in 1808. British abolitionists could look forward to no such date, but after years of political activism—and with the Americans about to cease being consumers or competitive suppliers—the antislavery forces finally obtained Parliamentary approval to outlaw the British slave trade in March 1807.

Despite legal prohibitions, an illicit trade may have brought into America as many as 250,000 slaves between 1808 and 1860, but the growth in slave numbers was mainly the result of natural increase. The slave population grew by half a million in the decade before 1830, when the total stood at two million.[18] This growth would not have occurred without an increased demand. Late-eighteenth-century British inventions helped mechanize the process of producing cotton cloth, and the American invention of the cotton gin in 1793 reduced costs for producing the particular species of cotton that was easiest to grow. The Industrial Revolution in Britain stimulated the growth of King Cotton in the American south.

Private emancipations decreased as the dollar value of slaves rose and as southern legislatures worried that the presence of freed slaves might undermine the slave system. To address this problem, some prominent citizens, mostly southerners, organized in 1817 the American Colonization Society (ACS) to promote the repatriation of blacks to Africa, imitating the Sierra Leone Company.[19] This project soon spread to nonslave states as well but overall had a far greater task and far less success than the British effort. The ACS ultimately failed, yet Lincoln became and long remained a supporter of colonization.

Eventually both the British and American antislavery organizers realized that ending the slave trade had not killed off slavery. Further actions were required, but there was disagreement about how gradual these steps should be. After British antislavery activists formed the Society for the Mitigation and Gradual Abolition of Slavery in 1823, Sarah Wedgwood, daughter of Josiah and the aunt of the teenage Charles Darwin (and of his later wife), was involved in protests that led to the removal of the word "gradual" from the organization's title, although it continued an essentially gradualist approach.[20] Gradualism was even more strongly challenged in America by William Lloyd Garrison, who in his abolitionist newspaper, the Liberator, made it abundantly clear that he would have nothing to do with gradualism, compensation schemes, or constitutional impediments. Although many American abolitionists later distanced themselves from Garrison's radical "immediatism," the gradualist middle ground was eroded not only by the greater activism of the immediatists but also by the stiffening resistance of slaveowners to any type of change.[21]

In 1831 two unsuccessful slave revolts in Jamaica and Virginia highlighted the difference in the British and American situations. The Jamaican revolt hastened Parliament's passage of the Abolition of Slavery Act in 1833, which ordered the end of slavery on 1 August 1834. Yet, the measure was gradualist: only children under six were immediately freed; older slaves became "apprentices" for up to six years, working three-quarters of the time for their owners; and the owners themselves (but not the slaves) were compensated by the British tax-payer to the tune of £20,000,000, or about £37 per slave.[22] Darwin cheered from aboard the Beagle, "What a proud thing for England, if she is the first European nation which utterly abolishes it."[23] Meanwhile in Virginia, the unsuccessful Nat Turner uprising in 1831 influenced a month-long debate in the Virginia legislature about slavery's future. The legislators voted by seventy-three to fifty-eight to continue slavery.[24] Had that important state revived the former trend of state-by-state abolition, patient hope might have been restored. Instead, while Britain was abolishing slavery on all British soil, in America it was increasingly difficult to see how slavery would, or even could, end. "How well I remember thinking," Darwin later wrote, "that Slavery would flourish for centuries in your Southern States."[25]

While Darwin, departing from Brazil, sighed, "I thank God, I shall never again visit a slave country," and his Aunt Sarah fretted as abolition proceeded too gradually, American abolitionists like Garrison adhered to immediatism, causing many other Americans, such as the clerk devouring newspapers in New Salem, Illinois, to see nothing but danger in their approach.[26] The former expectation that slavery would wither away was crushed by its increasing profits and the growing costs, potentially, of compensation or repatriation. Yet, white Americans were loath to accept that such an evil institution must continue solely for economic reasons. With no simple solution in sight, many people resolved the tension by either looking the other way or looking at slavery in a new way: as something not evil. Toward this end, efforts were made to depict slaves as something less than human and more like cattle—an endeavor against which both Lincoln and Darwin later fought.

The Racial Background, Personal Encounters, and Turning Points in 1837

Why blacks were so “suitable” for slavery was a question for which there was no obvious answer. Lincoln’s line about “the invention of negroes” opposed the view that slavery was natural for blacks or divinely planned. But opposition is not refutation. Today, we are still in the process of learning about race, but in the 1830s, this process was in its early stages, with ideas multiplying and diverging just as Lincoln and Darwin embarked on careers that, separately, helped to shape the debate.

The Great Chain of Being had developed from ancient and medieval concepts as a system of classification, or taxonomy, that grouped together plants and animals possessing a collection of similar features. But the metaphor of a chain allowed too many contrary interpretations: unity and relationship, multiplicity and difference, hierarchy, not to mention the purpose of the chain maker and whether he manufactured it all at once or over time. If chain links were grouped into distinct families, one suddenly had several chains, either destroying the metaphor or sending one in search of missing links. In any case, a chain implied permanence, and individual links were not expected to multiply or divide.

As European plants and animals were studied more closely thanks to the microscope and overseas exploration, it became difficult to keep even broad classes separate: even plants and animals overlapped with “zoophytes.” Worse, the sacred distinction between animals and men came under assault. European explorers encountered widely different types of men: not just black men in Africa but also Indians, Orientals, Malays, Lapps, and Hottentots, among others; and newly discovered animals—orangutans and chimpanzees—seemed uncomfortably similar to humans.[1] Alexander Pope expressed it darkly, “[Man] hangs between; in doubt to act, or rest: / In doubt to deem himself a God, or Beast.”[2] It was one thing to be between God and animals, perhaps even part angel; it was something else to be partly a brute. Mankind seemed no longer a link but a set of links, with some men more brutish than others.

Establishing how many groups of men existed proved difficult. In 1684, the Frenchman François Bernier came up with four, but sometimes six, categories of mankind. Richard Bradley (1721) said five; David Hume (1748) four or five; Carl Linnaeus (1758) had four; Oliver Goldsmith (1774) six; and Johann Friedrich Blumenbach (1775) four and later (1781) five, after which five was fairly standard.[3] With multiplicity came ranking, for even the great Linnaeus's characterizations were usually value laden, so that whites (or Europeans or Caucasians) came out best. More difficult than description was explanation: how did humans come to be so varied? The Bible, as usual, allowed contrary interpretations: one view—later called "monogenism"—holds that variations must have arisen after God's single creation of Adam and Eve, while the other—"polygenism"—proposes that the variations resulted from separate divine creations implied elsewhere in Scripture.[4] On one level, polygenism simplified matters: human races were not only different but designedly so. However, polygenists then diverged over whether God had expressed this racial distinction through some mark on Cain or on Ham or on some earlier pre-Adamite creation or on some separate creations in regions unknown to the Hebrews. Monogenists were spared that debate yet were burdened with explaining how Adam's descendants diverged. Climatic differences or degenerative diseases were often cited to explain variations in color and just as often refuted. Some said that men started out white and then degenerated; others that the original color of man was "tawny" with changes spreading in either direction from there. Few suggested an essentially black origin (the more common view today).[5] Because color seemed an awkward measure of variation, "facial angle" was regularly employed after the 1770s. When distinguishing between humans and animals, many placed blacks outside of the human species, while those who insisted that all races of men were members of the same species found it necessary to repeat the view frequently in the face of disbelief.[6] But the very concept of a species had become a problem even though by the 1750s Linnaeus had extended to animals and men the principle John Ray had used back in 1682 to define a plant species: a set of individuals who reproduce new individuals similar to themselves.

By this definition, blacks' ability to breed with (for example) whites and produce fertile offspring indicated they were members of the same human species. Yet, some refused to believe this, and even Linnaeus was troubled by alleged examples of fertile offspring successfully bred from separate species. It was mooted that blacks were not fully human because they were themselves hybrid products of some early intercourse between men and apes. Tales of man/ape couplings had multiple (and somewhat contradictory) purposes, supposedly explaining how blacks came into existence and why they are so "bestial," and usually involving a male ape breeding with an unwilling (or sometimes willing) black female—which nonsensically made blacks progenitors of their own hybridity. Nevertheless, the garbled theory was deemed at least possible by such men as Linnaeus, the influential French naturalist Le Comte de Buffon, Lord Monboddo, Thomas Jefferson, Dr. Benjamin Rush, and Dr. Charles White.[7]

Some observers connected physical variations with mental capabilities. Those who agreed that blacks were mentally deficient might dispute whether this resulted from historical deprivations (the ravages of slavery) or simply being inferior by nature, the former being remediable, the latter not. David Hume declared that blacks were "naturally inferior to whites" and that blacks enslaved in the colonies showed none of the "symptoms of ingenuity" evident in even the "most rude and barbarous of whites."[8] In 1812, Georges Cuvier, the French Aristotle, deemed Africans "the most degraded of human races, whose form approaches that of the beast and whose intelligence is nowhere great enough to arrive at regular government."[9]

By the 1830s, the Great Chain of Being had become a collapsed cat's cradle, with no agreed definition for "species," "man," or "race" and with contradictory explanations for the causes and future outcomes of perceived racial differences. Today, despite DNA evidence that the genetic difference among human races is negligible, many people still take for granted that biological difference implies intellectual inferiority in certain races; and in the early nineteenth century, whatever philosophers or scientists had to say, the vast majority of people held that view. Lincoln and Darwin were raised in a world in which European superiority seemed proved, not by physical but by social data: comparative technology, social organization, and imperial control. It is not amazing that both men were affected by this view, but it is surprising how much they rejected it. Both gave an early demonstration of this at about the age of twenty-three.

For a generation, the U.S. government's policy toward the Indian tribes east of the Mississippi had been to move as many of them west of the river as could be bribed, threatened, or tricked into going. But the Sauk and Fox tribes soon regretted their decision to cooperate, and their leader, Black Hawk, led two thousand of them back into Illinois. The state governor called for militia to drive them out, and Lincoln joined Sangamon County's company. Militiamen chose their own officers, and Lincoln's unit elected him—a man they had known less than a year. It was, Lincoln recalled in 1859, "a success which gave me more pleasure than any I have had since."[10] Lincoln's company never saw any action, but having nothing better to do and needing the money, he reenlisted twice, until honorably discharged.

Popular with his men, Lincoln demonstrated real ability as a leader and made friends later important to his career. In an era when politicians boasted of any military exploits, Lincoln forever cracked jokes about fighting no Indians but having "a good many bloody struggles with the musquetoes."[11] Lincoln was only once in serious danger—from his own men.

An old Indian wandered into the militia's camp, and though he carried a certificate of good character from American authorities, some of Lincoln's men prepared to shoot the man, saying, "We have come out to fight the Indian and by God we intend to do so."[12] Lincoln had no reason to like Indians. They had killed his grandfather "by stealth," and he evidently had no qualms about fighting Indians or about the removal policy. Every frontiersman knew these wars involved atrocities on both sides. Lincoln's men had already seen another militia unit's casualties: "horribly mangled—heads cut off—heart taken out—& disfigured in every way"; and "strong men wept" over mutilated civilians. The militiamen's blood was up, and killing this old Indian was, to them, different from killing a white man. But in the end this popular captain placed himself between his men and the Indian and reportedly said, "Men, this must not be done. He must not be shot and killed by us."[13]

Unlike a commissioned officer in the regulars, an elected captain of short-term militia could expect arguments: "The Indian is a damned spy"—before, it had been enough that he was an Indian. Then some fool suggested Lincoln lacked guts. "If any man thinks I am a coward let him test it," said the young captain. Assuming he meant a wrestling match—and they had admired his prowess in plenty of those—they grumbled about his advantage in strength and size. "Choose your weapons then," he replied, showing he would risk serious harm to himself or to his opponent—and all for the sake of a savage that most of Lincoln's men, like most of his contemporaries, barely considered a human being. The militiamen calmed down, and the old Indian was spared.

About three months after Lincoln's discharge, Darwin had his first opportunity to learn how Europeans in Latin America treated the native populations. While collecting specimens in the interior, he heard stories about the frontier war between whites and Indians: "The Indians torture all their prisoners & the Spaniards shoot theirs."[14] One "very intelligent" soldier recounted how in the most recent campaign more than a hundred Indians, men, women, and children, were taken or killed—"for the soldiers sabre every man" while "all the women who appear to be above twenty years old are massacred in cold blood." When Darwin exclaimed that this seemed "inhuman," the soldier replied, "Why, what can be done? They breed so!" Darwin rightly called this a "war of extermination" and related tales of the Indians' desperate courage. When three Indian prisoners were killed one after the other for refusing to betray information, the last said, "Fire, I am a man and can die!" Darwin added, "Not one syllable would they breathe to injure the united cause of their country!"[15]

Part of FitzRoy's purpose on this voyage was to return to Tierra del Fuego three natives who had been taken to England three years earlier and schooled in English and Christian ways. Darwin, having lived with these "civilised" natives for several months, was shocked when he first saw Fuegians in their original habitat: “These poor wretches were stunted in their growth, their hideous faces bedaubed with white paint, their skins filthy and greasy, their hair entangled, their voices discordant, and their gestures violent. Viewing such men, one can hardly make oneself believe that they are fellow-creatures, and inhabitants of the same world.”[16] And yet, Darwin believed in their essential humanity and attributed the differences between the “civilised” and the “savage” to social development rather than to any specific racial differences. On first seeing the Fuegians, “the reflection at once rushed into my mind—such were our ancestors.”[17] Darwin also pondered how the physical environment might influence development. After observing that the Fuegians’ numbers were not decreasing, Darwin explained, “Nature by making habit omnipotent, and its effects hereditary, has fitted the Fuegian to the climate and the productions of his miserable country. . . . I believe, in this extreme part of South America, man exists in a lower state of improvement than in any other part of the world.”[18]

Back in his Edinburgh days, Darwin had been privately tutored in taxidermy by a black freedman, John Edmonston, who had been trained by the eccentric English naturalist Charles Waterton. Darwin called Edmonston “very pleasant and intelligent.”[19] Becoming acquainted with FitzRoy’s “civilised” Fuegians aboard the Beagle, Darwin was “incessantly struck . . . how similar their minds were to ours.”[20] At the first landfall, the Cape Verde Islands, Darwin enthused that he had never seen anyone “more intelligent than the Negros, especially the Negro or Mulatto children,” who showed curiosity and perception about his silver pencil case and percussion gun.[21] Darwin seemed to expect his readers to doubt his descriptions of positive qualities in nonwhites.

Comparing FitzRoy’s “civilised” Fuegians and the original article, Darwin saw the effects of social conditioning. The precivilized Fuegians’ lack of private property “must for a long time retard their civilisation,” whereas in Tahiti, where missionaries had “inculcated the value of property,” the natives “now fully understand the value of money, and prefer it to old clothes or other articles.” Revealing some conditioning of his own values, Darwin noted, “It requires little habit to make a dark skin more pleasing and natural to the eye of an European than his own colour.” Darwin was quite willing to reject other observers’ views, as when he wrote that the Australian aborigines “appeared far from being such utterly degraded beings as they have usually been represented.” Sometimes he praised the work of missionaries, sometimes not, but always asserted that groups can make forward or retrograde steps: “It is a pleasant thing to see the aborigines advanced to the same degree of civilisation, however low that may be, which their white conquerors have attained.” But he noted that while the Fuegians had had little contact with Europeans, the number of Australian aborigines “is rapidly decreasing,” and the same was happening to the Indians of Patagonia. Like Lincoln during the Black Hawk War, Darwin hovered above other men’s racial prejudices: "The varieties of man seem to act on each other in the same way as different species of animals—the stronger always extirpating the weaker"—thus differentiating men as "varieties" not "different species."[22]

As the Beagle neared home Darwin wrote in his diary the same thought that had struck him when he first saw the wild Fuegians: "One's mind hurries back over past centuries: could our progenitors be such as these?"[23]

While Darwin encountered different human varieties by traveling overseas, Lincoln could observe "aliens" by staying in America, the land of immigrants. In the 1830s, the population was swelled by over half a million immigrants—four times as many immigrants as in the previous decade, while in the following decade the number nearly trebled. Along with Englishmen following in the footsteps of Lincoln's English forebears, increasing numbers came from Germany and Ireland. And while European immigrants were pushing aside Native Americans, they were also dragging in Africans in chains. The social, economic, and political issues that ensued from all this mixing of people were of importance to political leaders—and Lincoln became one when he managed to win a seat in the state legislature shortly after his service in the militia.

Some Americans, unhappy that politicians had not stemmed this flow, joined the anti-immigrant American Party, better known as the Know-Nothings—a nickname reflecting either secretiveness or embarrassment about the party's discriminatory basis. If such a party could establish itself in a nation comprising immigrants' descendants and could rant about foreign tongues and religion in a country that had always absorbed foreign speakers and was the only one on Earth to have religious tolerance written into its Constitution, then one can imagine how exercised that nation could become about men of other races.

Lincoln expressed the link between antialien feeling and antiblack feeling when explaining in 1855 why he could never be a Know-Nothing:

> How could I be? How can any one who abhors the oppression of negroes, be in favor of degrading classes of white people? Our progress in degeneracy appears to me to be pretty rapid. As a nation, we began by declaring that "all men are created equal." We now practically read it "all men are created equal, except negroes." When the Know-Nothings get control, it will read "all men are created equal, except negroes, and foreigners, and catholics."[24]

When the Beagle returned to England in 1836, Darwin discovered that antislavery agitation in Britain continued because immediatists like his Aunt Sarah were fighting the gradualist legislation that had established an "apprentice" system intended to keep adult blacks in forced labor for another six years. While that campaign continued in Britain, in America, twenty-eight-year-old Abraham Lincoln—now, in 1837, a lawmaker himself—took his first public position on the issue of slavery.

As abolitionist activity expanded both in Britain and America, proslavery elements in America's southern states grew increasingly angry. Their legislatures appealed to northern colleagues to denounce abolitionism, and the Illinois legislature found itself debating a lengthy resolution to that effect. On the national stage, Henry Clay regularly denounced abolitionists for endangering the Union, and Lincoln allegedly once said of his political hero, "I never had an opinion upon the subject of slavery in my life that I did not get from him."[25] Yet, in 1837, Lincoln reacted to abolitionism in a significantly different way.

The antiabolitionism resolution before the legislature maintained "that the right of property in slaves is sacred" under the federal Constitution, adding that "the General Government cannot abolish slavery in the District of Columbia, against the consent of the citizens of said District without a manifest breach of good faith."[26] The upper house approved the resolution unanimously. In the lower house, the voice vote proceeded alphabetically all the way to the *L*s before anyone voted nay. After that, only five more colleagues joined Abraham Lincoln's vote against the seventy-seven-vote majority.

No political advantage was to be gained by opposing the resolution or in submitting a written "protest" some weeks later to explain his negative vote. Most of Lincoln's fellow Whigs had voted for the resolution, and only one, Dan Stone (a native of Vermont), cosigned the "protest" that stated that he and Lincoln > believe that the institution of slavery is founded on both injustice and bad policy; but that the promulgation of abolition doctrines tends rather to increase than to abate its evils; . . . that Congress . . . has no power, under the constitution, to interfere with the institution of slavery in the different States; . . . that the Congress has the power . . . to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia; but that power ought not to be exercised unless at the request of the people of said District.[27]

"The kernel of the whole event," as historian William Lee Miller rightly stresses, "is that Lincoln and Stone did, and the assembly did not, say plainly that slavery is unjust." Some have suggested that Lincoln and Stone delayed their "protest" until other issues were settled, but a "more striking point," as Miller puts it, is "that they issued any written 'protest' at all."[28]

The apparent disharmony in condemning slavery as immoral and abolitionists as harmful is resolved by understanding Lincoln's concept of how slavery might best be ended. "Like many of his contemporaries," comments biographer David Herbert Donald, "Lincoln viewed slavery as an institution that would die out if it was confined to the areas where it already existed."[29] Although Lincoln himself did not record that particular view until 1845 and a decade later began to doubt the possibility of a "peaceful extinction of slavery," presumably in 1837 he did believe slavery was destined to die a "natural death"—exactly what abolitionists had stopped believing.[30] Their evidence was the growth of King Cotton, the increasing number of slaves despite the cessation of the slave trade, and the fight over Missouri's admission in 1820, which demonstrated southern leaders' reluctance to accept any geographical limit to the spread of slavery. But in 1837, none of this had yet convinced Lincoln that the abolitionists were right.

Lincoln had plenty of straws to grasp at. The British were debating whether to accelerate their abolition process, and their navy was actively suppressing the Atlantic slave trade. In the last two decades, emancipation had either begun or been completed in a dozen other countries. Mexico abolished slavery in 1829—a major reason why American slaveowners living in Texas had revolted against Mexican rule and were now seeking (to the horror of abolitionists) admission to the United States as a slave state. The Virginia legislature nearly voted for abolition and might yet do so. In 1832, Clay had secured a form of federal funding for the American Colonization Society. Lincoln might even have taken heart from the desperation of southern efforts to shield slavery from abolitionist propaganda by preventing the distribution of antislavery writings in the mails, by imposing a "gag rule" in Congress to counter a massive petition campaign, and, of course, by appealing to northern legislatures for antiabolitionist resolutions.

The two-month gap between Lincoln's negative vote and his protest may not signify a delay as much as a reaction to a new provocation. John C. Calhoun, the south's most eminent voice, speaking on 6 February in favor of extending the "gag rule," startled the Senate by urging that slavery "is beyond the jurisdiction of Congress" and that "Abolition and the Union cannot coexist." More shocking was Calhoun's rejection of the notion that slavery was evil: "far otherwise; I hold it to be a good, as it has thus far proved itself to be to both [races]."[31] Whether or not Calhoun's speech influenced Lincoln and Stone, it was on this key point that they drew a moral line that others refused to draw and Calhoun was willing to cross.

In the same month as Lincoln's "protest," there occurred in London a "moment more than any other in Darwin's life" that, according to biographer Janet Browne, "deserves to be called a turning point." Darwin had recently received important information from ornithologist John Gould regarding specimens brought back on the Beagle. Darwin scribbled in a notebook, "The same relation that common ostrich bears to Petisse, extinct guanaco to recent: in former case position, in latter time." In essence, this means that since two types of South American "ostriches" could be shown to be two different species, this geographical difference might somehow relate to the chronological difference between extinct South American mammals and existing ones. Here was evidence that species were not immutable but could somehow change. Darwin now realized, as Browne points out, that "[Charles] Lyell's general principles linking past with present could be applied to the biological world as much as to the geological."[32]

Six years earlier, Darwin had boarded the Beagle without planning to test any theory about species, yet early in the voyage, he found evidence to support someone else's theory about geology.[33] In preparation for the voyage, J. S. Henslow advised him to study the recently published first volume of Lyell's Principles of Geology but "on no account to accept the views therein advocated." Darwin ignored the latter advice and instead became a disciple—for long the only one—of Lyell's theories. "I am proud to remember," Darwin wrote in old age, "that the first place . . . which I geologised, convinced me of the infinite superiority of Lyell's views over those advocated by any other work known to me."[34]

Lyell's theory, dubbed "uniformitarianism," maintains that geological evidence did not fit the Christian story of a creation of the Earth followed (as most geologists then believed) by a gradual cooling of the Earth's core, after which the planet was stable. Instead, according to science historian Martin J. S. Rudwick, Lyell argues that landmasses are continually rising and falling according to pressure from internal molten rock while rain, rivers, and glaciers cause erosion and sedimentation and that these present-day processes are "fully representative of those that have acted in the past, not only in kind but also in degree." There is no beginning or end in Lyell's "system," because "the overall pattern of earth history has been steady-state or cyclic, and not directional at all."[35] Along with this cycle of new land being made and old land destroyed, Lyell accepts that there were "new species arising and old ones becoming extinct in a gradual 'birth' and 'death' of species. . . . [H]e found causes for species extinctions in disturbances to the fine balance of interspecific competition, disturbances initiated by climate, land and sea changes," but because Lyell rejects the transmutation of species, "he left unexplained how new species were 'created.'"[36] According to Rudwick, because the fossil evidence was then so limited, "Lyell has no great difficulty in arguing here that the apparent progress in the rank of organic life is an illusion, owing simply to the differentially selective preservation of terrestrial and aquatic animals." Lyell recognizes no progression from simpler to more complex organisms, thus rejecting the radical thinking of Jean-Baptiste Lamarck and of Darwin's own grandfather Erasmus Darwin. Lyell felt that his nonbiblical view of geology actually supports a biblical view of organic life: only God created species which were "immutable," and if the fossil record suggests that new species sometimes appeared, then these result from subsequent phases of new creation, the creation of man being the greatest of these and of an entirely different order. Although fossil evidence suggests man first appeared in geologically recent times, Lyell argues that this is not evidence of "a progressive system." "Lyell maintains this inconsistent position," according to Rudwick, "because he makes a sharp separation between man's physical and mental characteristics: man's evident superiority is due to his power of reason, particularly his power of improvable reason, which is precisely the feature that distinguishes him from other animals" (original emphasis).[37]

Although Darwin felt that Lyell's ideas liberated science—or at least geology—from dependence on the Bible to understand nature, he would later address Lyell's inconsistency in applying uniformitarianism to both geology and organic life—but not to man. Eventually, Darwin employed Lyell's gradual elevation and subsidence of landmasses as part of an explanation for changes in organisms: changes that were "uniform" in their law-like causes but "progressive" in their long-term effects. As Darwin later said in a different context, he eventually "out-lyelled Lyell" by applying an important aspect of uniformitarianism to all species.[38]

Yet all that was in the future. During the Beagle's voyage, Darwin was overwhelmed by the tremendous variability he found in plant, animal, and most intriguingly, in human life, all seeming at first glance to conflict with uniformitarianism. Observing how Australian marsupials were so similar and yet so different from analogous species on other continents, Darwin jested in his diary, "An unbeliever in everything beyond his own reason might exclaim 'Surely two distinct Creators must have been [at] work.'" But after puzzlement at God's failure to come up with a more uniform blueprint, Darwin found reassurance when he saw how an Australian lion-ant caught its prey in the same intricate way that European lion-ants do: "Now what would the disbeliever say to this? Would any two workmen ever hit on so beautiful, so simple & yet so artificial a contrivance? It cannot be thought so.—The same hand has surely worked throughout the universe."[39]

During the last weeks of the voyage, Darwin began to reflect more deeply on the variations noticed among similar animal groups in the separate Galapagos Islands and among similar yet differentiated foxes in East and West Falkland islands, noting that "the zoology of Archipelagoes will be well worth examining; for such facts would undermine the stability of Species."[40] Six months later and back in England, the specialists' reports on the specimens he had brought back made Darwin think his wild speculation about the mutability of species might be valid.

In March 1837, Darwin received confirmation that the Galapagos mockingbirds differed not only from any other known species but also from each other, depending on which island they inhabited.[41] These diversities, not just of variants but also of species, were also apparently true of the tortoises, and now there was further corroboration regarding Galapagos iguanas. And the evidence was not only from the islands. Gould, who declared the mockingbirds separate species, saw a similar diversity between Darwin's specimens (some fossil) of South American ostriches. Darwin now saw a pattern of distribution that was not confined only to islands or determined solely by geography but also related to the patterns of extinctions found in geologists' fossil discoveries.

This was the turning point at which Darwin embraced the concept of transmutation advocated by his own grandfather Erasmus and Lamarck, even though their explanations for how transmutation worked seemed utterly insufficient. Unfortunately, Darwin could not openly discuss the issue with colleagues because transmutation was tarred by the Lamarckian brush, and the religious implications were severe.

Groping for some explanation of how transmutation actually occurred, Darwin found "a theory by which to work" in the following year.[42] When, two decades later, Darwin published a theory regarding transmutation of species, he avoided any discussion of the human species: it would take another dozen years before he published on that. And yet, from the start, mankind was on Darwin's mind and particularly the issues of race and slavery, as his notebook jottings from 1838 demonstrate. Early in that year, as Parliament was finally ending slavery on British soil, Darwin scrawled, "Animals—whom we have made our slaves we do not like to consider our equals.—Do not slaveholders wish to make the black man other kind?"[43] In May, Darwin showed that he disagreed not just with slaveholders but with most of his own race:

> Has not the white man, who has debased his nature by making slave of his fellow Black, often wished to consider him as other animal.—it is the way of mankind & I believe those who soar above such prejudices yet have justly exalted nature of man—like to think his origin godlike, at least every nation has done so as yet.[44]

In August 1838, Darwin jotted in a notebook "origin of man now proved."[45]

Both Darwin and Lincoln considered slavery immoral and recognized that any notion that blacks were not fully human helped to delay abolition. Lincoln supported efforts to circumvent the majority's bigotry or apathy (rather than attack it head on) by advocating policies of gradual change and, later, colonization. Darwin would not only assert that men were all of one species: he also sought to prove it. Darwin needed to convince an opposition of elite scientists, many of them his mentors, while Lincoln had to win votes among the prejudiced masses from which he himself had sprung.

Bigotry and bad science were obstacles to an enlightened view of races and their relationships, but another obstacle was religion. And soon, both Lincoln and Darwin had to make crucial choices about the way to present their own evolving religious views.

Religious Reformation

The literature about Lincoln's and Darwin's religious opinions is vast because those beliefs in differing ways posed a challenge in their own time and for subsequent generations. Darwin's work has greatly influenced the Western world's view of divine purpose, and Lincoln's amalgam of unorthodoxy and religiosity remains a puzzle. Since both men had reasons to be deliberately ambiguous about personal views that not only influenced public opinion but also changed over time, the evidence is controversial and needs plenty of context—therefore, the topic must be discussed at more than one stage in each life.

England had an established church, but both of Darwin's parents came from a nonconforming tradition. In the United States, there was no established church but a mass of competing denominations, particularly on the barely settled frontier. Britain exhibited more religious toleration than most countries, yet religious dissenters still faced practical disadvantages and even civil disabilities. No such inequalities existed in America, though extralegal forms of prejudice could have similar effects. During Darwin's childhood, his comfortably middle-class family actually leaned away from mild dissent and toward loose conformity. Lincoln's formative years were passed in places like Pigeon Creek, where the "meeting house" still smelled of freshly cut timber and the preachers were often itinerants, or New Salem, where there was no real church at all.

Having lost their mothers at an early age, Lincoln and Darwin felt the influence of their fathers' religious views, to which they reacted quite differently. Darwin's father had turned against his own father's radical deism, keeping his views to himself and having his children baptized in Shrewsbury's Anglican church—although, in the Wedgwood tradition, their mother led them to the town's Unitarian chapel on Sundays. After her death, the family attended the Anglican church. For Dr. Darwin, the issue was social rather than theological, appearances mattering more than doctrine. Lincoln's family lived amid the fluctuations of denominational splits and evangelical competition. His parents were married by a Methodist preacher but joined local Baptist congregations.

However different the English and American religious environments, children generally adopted their parents' religious choices, a pattern followed by young Charles and his siblings and also by young Abe's sister—but not by Abe.

Up to his early twenties, Darwin barely gave a thought to religious matters and certainly did not question the literal truth of the Bible. Although he spent morning chapel cribbing Virgil, when running late to class he prayed for God's assistance to avoid a beating.[1] Lincoln, on the other hand, seems to have looked askance at religious practices from a remarkably early age. There is no obvious explanation, but it may reflect Lincoln's intellectual precociousness and antipathy toward his father.

Lincoln's father and stepmother were formally accepted into the Pigeon Creek Baptist Church when Lincoln was fourteen; his older sister joined three years later; and when the family left the area, the twenty-one-year-old Abe had still not joined. He attended services, enjoyed reading the Bible, and (as his affectionate stepmother later recalled) "would hear sermons preached—come home—take the children out—get on a stump or log and almost repeat it word for word." Another source put it differently: ten-year-old Abe's mimicry of the "style & tone of the old baptist preachers" interfered with chores until his father "would come and make him quit—send him to work."[2] While his father may have been less concerned about blasphemy than work-shyness, Abe may have begun to link his father's lack of ambition to his religious piety.

After his family moved to Illinois in 1830, Lincoln was helping to clear a neighbor's land when Peter Cartwright, a well-known Methodist circuit rider then running for governor, came by. The neighbor recalled that Lincoln, "awkward and very shabbily dressed," argued with Cartwright, who "laid down his doctrines in a way which undoubtedly seemed to Lincoln a little too dogmatical." The neighbor admired how Lincoln "met the great preacher in his arguments, and the extensive acquaintance he showed with the politics of the State—in fact he quite beat him in the argument."[3] It may have been on political rather than religious points that the uneducated Lincoln, barely twenty-one, scored against an experienced orator, but his later encounters with the famous evangelist were decidedly about religion.

While the lanky farmhand was sparring with a preacher, Charles Darwin was at Cambridge supposedly preparing for the Church. Darwin was not averse to becoming a country clergyman with leisure for natural history pursuits, and yet "I had scruples about declaring my belief in all the dogmas of the Church of England." This was putting the point mildly, considering his Unitarian antecedents, but becoming a clergyman—even obtaining a degree at Cambridge—required acceptance of the Thirty-Nine Articles. "Accordingly I read with care Pearson on the Creeds and a few other books on divinity; and as I did not then in the least doubt the strict and literal truth of every word in the Bible, I soon persuaded myself that our Creed must be fully accepted."[4]

At Cambridge, Darwin preferred "beetling" to theology, but a useful overlap was found in the writings of William Paley, some of which were required texts. Darwin admired the "clear language" of Paley's Moral Philosophy, the "logic . . . of his Natural Theology," and "could have written out the whole of the Evidences [of Christianity] with perfect correctness." Paley considered nature so full of design that there had to be a designer: his famous analogy was of a pocket watch found by the wayside that proved the existence of a watchmaker. According to historian John Hedley Brooke, there are two main interpretations of Darwin's embrace of natural theology in his youth. One view is that he "found God in nature rather than deduced God's existence from it" (original emphases), as when during his first walk in a Brazilian rain forest, he felt moved by nature. The other view is that Darwin narrowed the scope of natural theology by taking the view that God's designs were to be seen "in providential combinations of laws rather than in specific organic structures."[5] But whether nature revealed God as the creator of laws or as the author of repeated interventions, Paley provided Darwin with a theology that was logically organized and buttressed by nature, and this helped make conventional religion acceptable to Darwin. Still, Darwin was concerned that when the time came for ordination, he might not be able to answer yes when some bishop asked if he felt "inwardly moved by the holy spirit."[6] He overcame his scruples sufficiently to take his degree in 1831 and then found opportunities to delay ordination until the voyage of the Beagle eventually shelved the whole idea.

As Darwin set off on his life-changing trip, Lincoln returned from his second journey down the Mississippi River and settled in New Salem, Illinois, where later reports from acquaintances suggest Lincoln was developing highly unorthodox views, influenced by the skeptical writings of Voltaire, Thomas Paine, Constantin-François Volney, and Robert Burns. Calvinist predestination and eternal punishment for all but the "elect" were satirized in Burns's poem "Holy Willie's Prayer," which Lincoln quoted so fondly that a friend said, "That was L[incoln's] religion."[7] Doubting that God would inflict eternal damnation was the mildest part of Lincoln's unorthodoxy. More shocking was that Lincoln followed Paine in rejecting the Bible's literal truth and Jesus's divinity.[8]

Lincoln and Darwin were in their early twenties when the former, just entering politics, became most extreme in his infidelity, while the latter, circumnavigating the globe, reached the high-water mark in his orthodoxy. Darwin's "firm conviction of the existence of God, and of the immortality of the soul" was heightened while experiencing "the grandeur of a Brazilian forest." Darwin's faith withstood the corrosive influence of hard-nosed seamen, who once "heartily laughed" at him "for quoting the Bible as an unanswerable authority on some point of morality."[9] Others recollected that Darwin attended Protestant religious services wherever possible and felt "shock" when a shipmate "openly avowed disbelief in the flood."[10]

Meanwhile, in New Salem, it was Lincoln who caused “shock” around the cracker barrel in Sam Hill’s store by expounding on the fallibility of scripture and the lack of evidence for Jesus’s incarnation and resurrection and by writing two pieces on religion in 1834, one of which was probably destroyed at the time, while the other was only identified in 1994. Lincoln had boarded and worked at Hill’s store, which was his campaign headquarters when he ran for the state legislature. One candidate, who had defeated Lincoln in 1832 but was defeated by him in 1834, was Cartwright, the politically ambitious Methodist preacher. Cartwright had previously defended in a newspaper his opinion that more Methodists should be appointed locally as teachers in the growing “common school” movement. Lincoln wrote a scathing reply, accusing Cartwright of all manner of hypocrisy and adding, “I believe the people in this country are in some degree priest ridden.” The letter, paid for as an advertisement, was not signed by Lincoln but by Sam Hill, who had his own reasons for disliking Cartwright but lacked the ability to write such a piece. Whether or not Lincoln wrote it as a favor for Hill, Hill signed it as a favor for—or to protect—Lincoln.[11]

Evidence strongly suggests that, also in 1834, Lincoln wrote a “book” (more likely some folded sheets) on “infidelity” that attacked “the divinity of Christ—special inspiration—revelation &c.” Apparently, Lincoln showed it to Hill, who promptly threw it in a red-hot stove to save Lincoln’s reputation. Some voters in the recent election had been reluctant to back Lincoln because he was said to be a “deist” or an “infidel,” and certain friends realized that he must stop. The matter was generally hushed up: over three decades later, former acquaintances were reluctant to discuss it, and one who was away from New Salem at the time claimed that he never learned anything of it on his return.[12] But many years after Lincoln’s death, it was reported that Hill’s wife had once asked Lincoln, “Do you really believe there isn’t any future state?” and he allegedly replied, “Mrs. Hill, I’m afraid there isn’t. It isn’t a pleasant thing to think that when we die that is the last of us.”[13]

Albert Taylor Bledsoe, a fellow Kentuckian transplanted to Illinois and close friend of Lincoln in the 1840s, later felt Lincoln had deliberately disguised his attitude toward religion. After West Point and a stint in the Episcopalian ministry, Bledsoe turned to law, practicing in Springfield from 1839 to 1848. Bledsoe was one of the few men who had known Lincoln well—sometimes having an office adjoining Lincoln’s and living in the same boardinghouse for a while—yet later came to despise him. After Lincoln’s death, Bledsoe wrote a review of the biography by Ward Hill Lamon, who had employed William H. Herndon’s evidence about Lincoln’s early years as an “infidel.” “From our various conversations,” Bledsoe commented bitterly, “. . . we had supposed that we had some adequate idea of his religious sentiments, but Colonel Lamon’s work has dispelled this illusion.” While Lincoln never pretended to believe “in the being of God, or in a moral government of the world, much less in the truth of Christianity . . . he always seemed to deplore his want of faith as a very great infelicity, from which he would be glad to be delivered; and all this was uttered with an air of such apparent modesty, that his gloom . . . awakened in our minds no other feeling than one of deep compassion."[14] That compassion clearly dissipated after Bledsoe read Lamon's biography.

Lincoln's religious views were submerged sufficiently so that in 1836 he received more votes than any other candidate in his district. Spending more time in Springfield to attend the legislature and study law, Lincoln became a political ally and friend of Ninian W. Edwards, leader of the Springfield's loftiest social set. Edwards gave Lincoln a present, The Works of William Paley, perhaps thinking Lincoln's faith in God's existence needed shoring up.[15] Paley's "natural theology" may have succeeded, just as it had earlier bolstered Darwin. Yet Lincoln did not entirely stop criticizing Christian orthodoxy and scriptural authority, and he apparently began to use "nature" in his arguments.

Early in 1837, shortly after Lincoln settled in Springfield as a partner in John T. Stuart's law firm, he wrote (ungrammatically) to a friend, "I've never been to church yet, nor probably shall not be soon. I stay away because I am conscious I should not know how to behave myself."[16] Lincoln avoided church but not religious debate. The law office was next door to the court clerk's office, and one clerk, James H. Matheny—nine years Lincoln's junior but later a groomsman at his wedding—recounted to Herndon that:

> Lincoln used to talk Infidelity in the Clerks office. . . . Lincoln attacked the Bible & New Testament on two grounds—1st From the inherent or apparent contradiction under its lids & 2ndly from the grounds of Reason—sometimes he ridiculed the Bible & New Testament—sometimes seemed to scoff [at] it. . . . Sometimes Lincoln bordered on absolute Atheism: he went far that way & often shocked me. I was then a young man & believed what my good mother told me. . . . Lincoln would come into the clerk's office where I and . . . others were writing or staying; & would bring the Bible with him—read a chapter—argue against it.[17]

Significantly, Matheny's very next phrase is: "Lincoln then had a smattering of Geology if I recollect it." Lincoln was now using "expert testimony," employing not just reason but also science against revelation. Allen C. Guelzo argues that Lincoln probably read Charles Lyell's Principles of Geology, but he might also have read the American edition of Robert Bakewell's Introduction to Geology (1813), or William Maclure's Observations on the Geology of the United States of America (1817) or even the 1804 translation of A View of the Soil and Climate of the United States, by Volney, the French deist whose skeptical Ruins supposedly influenced Lincoln's religious thinking.[18] In addition to reading, Lincoln's surveying job may have sparked his interest in geology, and certainly, he was later acquainted with at least three geologists in Illinois.

While Lincoln may have brought geology into religious debates, Darwin probed the subject deeply during the Beagle voyage, just as his faint interest in a church career waned.[19] After the voyage, as Darwin groped for some mechanism to explain transmutation, he read widely and sought information from colleagues without sharing with them his scientifically unorthodox notions. After reading Lyell's latest thinking in the fifth edition of the Principles, published in 1837, Darwin wrote in the margin, next to Lyell's argument that variation in species can only go so far before it must stop: "If this were true, adios theory."[20]

Wary of revealing his theorizing to his colleagues, Darwin poured his thoughts into a series of notebooks. He expressed his frustration that religious feeling tolerated new laws discovered by astronomers and geologists but balked at "fixed laws of generation" because they touched mankind too closely.[21] "Why is thought being a secretion of the brain, more wonderful than gravity a property of matter? It is our arrogance . . . our admiration of ourselves."[22] Increasingly seeing evidence for those "fixed laws" in the Beagle specimens, Darwin gradually abandoned some conventional religious beliefs. Darwin spent hours conversing with the free-thinking intellectuals who made up the London coterie in which his brother Erasmus moved. "During these two years," he later wrote, "I was led to think much about religion. . . . I had gradually come by this time, to see that the Old Testament from its manifestly false history of the world, . . . was no more to be trusted than the sacred books of the Hindoos, or the beliefs of any barbarian."[23]

Darwin did not suddenly lose faith. Not "until a considerably later period" of his life did he think much "about the existence of a personal God." Perceiving that the New Testament contradicted the Old, he wondered if God made "a [new] revelation to the Hindoos," would he let them retain their earlier beliefs? "This appeared to me utterly incredible." Darwin believed that the New Testament did not have to be discarded with the Old; however: "The clearest evidence would be required to make any sane man believe in the [Christian] miracles; . . . the men at that time were ignorant and credulous to a degree almost incomprehensible by us; . . . the Gospels cannot be proved to have been written simultaneously with the events . . . they differ in [too] many important details . . . to be admitted as the usual inaccuracies of eye-witnesses." While claiming no "novelty" in these "reflections," Darwin "gradually came to disbelieve in Christianity as a divine revelation." His "complete" disbelief in orthodox Christianity developed so slowly as to cause "no distress, [and] . . . I have never since doubted even for a single second that my conclusion was correct." Far from distressed, Darwin felt relief. The teaching that "men who do not believe, and this would include my Father, Brother and almost all my best friends, will be everlastingly punished" he called "a damnable doctrine."[24] This was the same criticism that Lincoln found so agreeable in Burns's "Holy Willie's Prayer." Like Lincoln, Darwin avoided throwing out the baby with the bath water—the moral with the miraculous—for, while writing of one "damnable doctrine," he also used the words "beautiful" and "perfection" to describe "the morality of the New Testament."

Darwin apparently discussed religion with his father in 1838, at the same time that the subject of marriage arose. His father advised Darwin "to conceal carefully my doubts, for he said that he had known extreme misery thus caused with married persons. Things went on pretty well until the wife or husband became out of health, and then some women suffered miserably by doubting about the salvation of their husbands, thus making them likewise to suffer."[25]

Dr. Darwin sought to preserve his son's future happiness in marriage, just as Hill hoped to secure Lincoln's political prospects by throwing his "book on Infidelity" into the red-hot stove. Lincoln gradually became less blatant about his views, while Darwin, though already circumspect, presently failed to follow his father's advice.

Darwin may have couched his religious views in the best possible terms when he proposed to his cousin Emma Wedgwood in 1838. Ten days after he had returned to London to prepare the house for his future wife, Emma wrote to him, mostly with family news but adding a long expression of her "fear that our opinions on the most important subject should differ widely. . . . My reason tells me that honest & conscientious doubts cannot be a sin, but I feel it would be a painful void between us. . . . I should dread the feeling that you were concealing your opinions from the fear of giving me pain." She asked Charles as "a favour" to read a passage from the Gospel of John.[26]

Lincoln's marriage courtship was far more complicated, but after one broken engagement, Lincoln finally married Mary Todd, whose intellectual attainments, social graces, and political connections far exceeded those of most of the women he had encountered previously. Although Mary did not inform her sister and brother-in-law of her plan to marry Lincoln until a few hours before the ceremony, and Lincoln did not tell his "best man" until late in the afternoon, the wedding, on the evening of 4 November 1842, was not an impulsive move: Lincoln had obtained the license, booked a clergyman, and had the wedding ring engraved: "Love is eternal." The two weddings were barely sacramental events. The Darwins' Anglican ceremony was modified to respect Unitarian sentiment, the attendance was small, and within two hours the newlyweds were eating sandwiches on a train for London. The Lincolns' suddenly announced wedding was conducted in Mary's sister's house by a minister of the Episcopalian church that Lincoln did not attend and that Mary abandoned for another a decade later. The Darwins' first child was born eleven months after their marriage, but when the boy was baptized, there were no godparents because Charles and Emma objected to "religious proxies." Lincoln's first child came along almost exactly nine months after Lincoln's marriage, and apparently only the last of their four sons was baptized.[27]

Despite marital disharmonies—not only more public in the Lincolns' case but also probably more exaggerated by contemporary notice—both marriages, begun in some trepidation, successfully lasted "until death us do part," with none of the partners ever being unfaithful. "Infidelity" was a problem only in the religious sense. Mary Lincoln was superficial in her religious sensibilities and probably felt satisfied that her husband, though not an orthodox Christian, was a truly good and moral being. He was careful—at least by the time she met him—not to disturb other peoples' religious feelings, although Mary had difficulty getting Lincoln to attend church. Compared with Mary Lincoln, Emma Darwin was far more devout, despite coming from a Unitarian tradition. Her husband—the erstwhile trainee for a country parsonage—had by the time of their marriage developed ideas that would shake the Christian world and create a painful wound in their marriage.

Sometime after Lincoln used geology in arguing against scripture in 1837, he became more wary about discussing religion at all. In October, Lincoln wrote a letter to a newspaper expressing concern that a political opponent had asked one of Lincoln's friends if "he ever heard Lincoln say he was a deist."[28] His friend Matheny reported that as Lincoln "grew older he grew more discreet—didn't talk much before strangers about his religion."[29] The change must have been fairly swift, for by 1838 or 1839, when Herndon came into the circle of Matheny and Lincoln, he apparently never heard about the "book on Infidelity" even though Herndon himself was a freethinker.[30] Lincoln now kept to himself views that might alienate clients, voters, and members of the Edwards circle with whom he increasingly socialized. Any rumors of Lincoln's unorthodoxy failed to prevent his reelection to the legislature in 1838 and 1840.

In January 1841, Lincoln was depressed after his first engagement with Mary Todd broke down, so he stayed for a month with Joshua Speed, his closest friend for the last three years but recently returned to his (and Lincoln's) native state, Kentucky. A skeptic himself, Speed knew as much as anyone about Lincoln's religious views, but when Herndon later sought his opinion, Speed wrote cautiously, "I think that when I first knew Mr L he was skeptical as to the great truths of the Christian Religion. I think that after he was elected President, he sought to become a believer—and to make the Bible a preceptor to his faith and a guide for his conduct."[31] Speed offered one story to Herndon (and alluded to it in two later letters) that cast a pious light on Lincoln's religious views. Speed's mother had presented the "moody & hypochondriac" Lincoln with a Bible, advising him to read it and "adopt its precepts and pray for its promises." Later, as president, Lincoln sent Mrs. Speed a photograph with an inscription recalling that gift.[32]

After returning from Kentucky, Lincoln wrote to Speed's sister in Louisville, recounting the surprisingly cheerful behavior of a group of slaves being transported in chains on the same steamboat that carried Lincoln. He added the pious comment, "How true it is that 'God tempers the wind to the shorn lamb,' or in other words, that He renders the worst of human conditions tolerable, while He permits the best, to be nothing better than tolerable. . . . Tell your mother that . . . I intend to read [the Bible] regularly when I return home. I doubt not that it is really, as she says, the best cure for the 'Blues' could one but take it according to the truth."[33]

Those sentences epitomize Lincoln's self-presentation regarding religion. An avid reader of the Bible, Lincoln knew that his ability to quote scripture with great appropriateness always impressed listeners. However, Lincoln qualified Mrs. Speed's suggestion that the Bible was a cure for melancholy by adding "could one but take it according to the truth"—the difficulty being that he did not take much of it as true. To say so bluntly would offend; not to say it at all would be hypocritical. The balancing bar that kept him from falling off that tightrope was his use of language: if his Bible-quoting, his use of scriptural analogies, and his carefully phrased allusions to himself made people feel comfortable about his religious views, that was fine with Lincoln.

Darwin also became more careful about how he presented his interlinked religious and scientific views. Although some were discussed with his father and possibly his brother's progressive friends in London, Darwin remained cautious toward his scientific colleagues.[34] It was his own reading of Malthus's Essay on the Principle of Population—which stated that as human populations grow faster than resources, some of the population will always fail in the competition to survive—that gave Darwin a "theory by which to work." He called his theory "natural selection" in contrast to the artificial selection applied by men in the breeding of plants and animals. Although the idea needed much filling out, Darwin felt he had identified a mechanism for transmutation excelling (if not entirely supplanting) Lamarck's "acquired characteristics." This success occurred shortly before he married Emma, and some aspects disturbed her.

After the newlyweds were living under the same roof in London, Emma was reluctant to discuss religion face-to-face and wrote her husband another letter. She couched her feelings in terms that might appeal to his scientific sensibilities, expressing concern that his absorption in "following up yr own discoveries" might prevent him giving "attention to both sides of the question." She connected Erasmus's influence with Charles's loss of "some of that dread & fear which the feeling of doubting first gives & which I do not think an unreasonable or superstitious feeling." Darwin's response is unknown. He could not stop his research or the conclusions to which it led, as Emma must have realized. Darwin folded up the letter and at some point wrote on the outside "When I am dead know that many times I have kissed & cryed over this."[35]

When Joshua Speed wrote to thank Lincoln for helping him through a crisis regarding Speed's upcoming marriage, Lincoln's reply suggested that, however skeptical both men were, they could accept the notion of a Supreme Being who is in control—although perhaps Lincoln worried that Speed would not believe he was being sincere. "I am not sure there was any merit, with me, in the part I took in your difficulty; I was drawn to it as by fate; if I would, I could not have done less than I did. . . . I always was superstitious; and as part of my superstition, I believe God made me one of the instruments of bringing your Fanny and you together, which union, I have no doubt He had fore-ordained." After reassuring Speed that his marriage was, as it were, made in heaven, Lincoln applied the concept to himself: "Whatever he designs, he will do for me yet. 'Stand still and see the salvation of the Lord' is my text just now."[36]

Either Lincoln retained some predestinarian aspect of his parents' religion despite, like Darwin, rejecting all Christian orthodoxy or he simply determined for himself that, logically, an omnipotent and omniscient God might well direct events according to His own plan, however unknowable. Lincoln had scraped his religion down to this essence, and the (admittedly ambiguous) evidence does not compellingly suggest that he ever abandoned this position or developed it further. Referring to his religion as "my superstition" was perhaps meant to reassure Speed that Lincoln was not abandoning rationalism and had circumscribed this bit of "faith."

Much has been written of Lincoln's fatalism, determinism, and belief in "the doctrine of necessity."[37] Of course, reconciling such a view with free will and moral responsibility is an age-old problem, and balance is harder to achieve than simple vacillation. In Lincoln's case, the conflict was intense. He seemed to believe in an all-knowing Creator who can direct events, but he had also freed himself from his own most obvious destiny by laboring hard to raise himself up through education and experience. As historian William Lee Miller expresses it, "We might say that his own life, which would be shot through with choices that made a difference, would disprove his own youthful theory [of necessity]."[38] Lincoln's dilemma came from recognizing that he was exceptionally able, ambitious, and successful—without ever discovering what made him so.

The scientifically minded Lincoln tried but failed to put everything down to reason. In a speech in 1842, Lincoln could declare, "Happy day, when, all appetites controlled, all passions subdued, all matters subjected, mind, all conquering mind, shall live and move the monarch of the world," yet eight months later, he could ask his newly married best friend: "Are you now, in feeling as well as judgement, glad you are married as you are? From any body but me, this would be an impudent question not to be tolerated; but I know you will pardon it in me."[39] Lincoln was "impatient to know" Speed's answer because such feeble evidence as another man's feelings about his married state might help Lincoln decide whether to propose again to Mary Todd. Thus did Lincoln juggle emotion and reason just as he juggled fatalism and free will.

In the middle of 1842, Darwin found time, amid numerous projects, to write out a thirty-five-page sketch of his transmutation theory. Employing the phrase "natural selection" for the first time, Darwin laid out his basic argument, beginning with the "unnatural selection" of domestication of animals by men, bringing in the struggle for resources derived from Malthus, carefully noting the numerous potential objections to his theory but holding back the detailed evidence building up in his notebooks. Man as a selector (domestication) was contrasted with nature as a selector (natural selection), but the effect of selection on humans themselves was studiously avoided, even though the subject had featured prominently in Darwin's notebooks for the last four years. Not only was the topic too emotive but also Darwin accepted that God might still be deemed the instigator of natural selection as a primary law, something that "should exalt our notion of the power of the omniscient Creator."[40] With his theory on paper and no clear plan for its future, Darwin returned to other publishing tasks and continual note taking.

At the same time, the ambitious Lincoln, while becoming a successful lawyer, planned his next political move as his fourth term in the legislature drew to a close. He began maneuvering in 1842 for a party nomination for a congressional seat and found himself the victim of a whispering campaign. Accusations that his upmarket marriage made him "the candidate of pride, wealth, and aristocratic family distinction" were patently absurd, but Lincoln was worried by "the strangest combination of church influence against me . . . it was every where contended that no Christian ought to go for me, because I belonged to no church, was suspected of being a deist."[41]

When he failed to get the nomination—for reasons relating more to party seniority than religion—Lincoln cleverly pushed through a resolution effectively creating a "succession" so his turn would come in the election after next. Lincoln settled back, concentrated on the law, and waited for the congressional election of 1846 to roll around. If Lincoln thought that by saying nothing offensive about religion during the interval he could bury the religious issue by 1846, he was wrong.

In 1843, a year after writing out the first sketch of his theory, Darwin briefly overcame his reluctance to mention it to any of his scientific colleagues. When zoologist George Waterhouse sought Darwin's advice about problems he and every other naturalist had with taxonomy, Darwin knew the problem was in the very endeavor "to discover the laws according to which the Creator has willed to produce organized beings . . . [which] means just nothing. According to my opinion, (which I give everyone leave to hoot at . . .) classification consists of grouping beings according to their actual relationship, i.e. their consanguinity, or descent from common stocks." After revealing a bit more about "linking all, say the Mammals, into one great, quite indivisible group," Darwin pulled back: "But it is no use my going on this way." The seed fell on stony ground: Waterhouse's eventual publication attacked any notion that groups of animals "blend perceptibly into each other."[42]

Six months later, Darwin tried again, this time with Joseph Dalton Hooker, eight years his junior, an admirer of The Voyage of the Beagle, and recently returned from a similar voyage. Hooker was a fine botanist whose father supervised the Royal Botanic Gardens at Kew. In the midst of a growing and mutually admiring correspondence, Darwin suddenly confided in Hooker, explaining the circumstances that led to the "very presumptuous work" he had been engaged in for seven years, before breaking the news: "At last gleams of light have come, & I am almost convinced (quite contrary to opinion I started with) that species are not (it is almost like confessing a murder) immutable." After disclaiming any connection with "Lamarck nonsense," Darwin added, "I think I have found out (here's presumption) the simple way by which species become exquisitely adapted to various ends. . . . You will now groan & think to yourself on what a man have I been wasting my time in writing to. I should five years ago, have thought so."[43]

Darwin waited several agonizing days for Hooker's reaction, which proved positive, though measured.[44] Hooker's intelligent questions evinced no shock about religious implications but rather a willingness to help. Emboldened, Darwin soon revised his first sketch, producing one over two hundred pages long, perhaps intending someday to show it to Hooker. Again, Darwin left out the risky—and at this stage unnecessary—issues of God the designer and the origin of man. In Hooker, Darwin had found a confidant and a wise critic who became a lifelong friend.

In that same year, 1844, Lincoln also gained the closest thing to a protégé that he ever had, although his relationship with Herndon was never as close as Darwin's with Hooker. Billy Herndon, born in 1818 (a year after Hooker), had met Lincoln when he first came to Sangamon County. Herndon's father was in the legislature with Lincoln, and from about 1838 Herndon worked and boarded at Speed's store, where Lincoln also then lived. Herndon was a bright young man but had left Illinois College without a degree. He married in 1840, decided to study law, and became a clerk in the office of Logan and Lincoln. Sometime late in 1844, Lincoln, who was amicably ending his partnership with Stephen T. Logan, bounded up the stairs to the office and asked Billy if he wanted to become his legal partner. An amazed Herndon said yes, and the papers were drawn up.

Scholars have speculated about why Lincoln chose Herndon, and there must have been speculation at the time, to which Herndon gave his own answer: "I don't know and no one else does."[45] To add a new suggestion to all the others: although Lincoln did not need technical legal information from Herndon and was not in the habit of speculating out loud with anyone, Herndon could be useful to Lincoln in one particular way. One of Herndon's peculiarities was that, even more than Lincoln, he was mad about reading, especially scientific works. At college, Herndon "acquired an unmanageable appetite for books." An exuberant Springfield bookseller reportedly said that in the 1850s, "Mr. Herndon read every year more new books in history, pedagogy, medicine, theology, and general literature, than all the teachers, doctors, and ministers in Springfield put together."[46] In 1866, an eastern journalist deemed Herndon's one of the best private libraries in the west. Although a portion of it—a thousand books, many of which may have been owned by Lincoln—was put up for auction by an impoverished Herndon in 1873, he still possessed (or, less likely, reacquired) enough books to fill the walls of a sixteen-feet-by-sixteen-feet room in 1879.[47] Many of whatever books Herndon and Lincoln separately owned were, after 1844, adorning the shelves and tables of the office of Lincoln and Herndon, and many more were added over the next seventeen years until Lincoln's final departure for Washington. "I had an excellent private library," Herndon later recalled, "probably the best in the city for admired books. To this library Mr. Lincoln had, as a matter of course, full and free access at all times." Herndon then gave the following sample: "Locke, Kant, Fichte, Lewes; Sir William Hamilton's Discussions on Philosophy; Spencer's First Principles, Social Statics, etc.; Buckle's History of Civilization, and Lecky's History of Rationalism; . . . the works of Paine, Parker, Emerson and Strauss; Gregg's Creed of Christendom, McNaught on Inspiration, Volney's Ruins, Feuerbach's Essence of Christianity, and other works on Infidelity." Herndon offered this particular sample to demonstrate Lincoln's access to progressive and infidel literature, adding, "Mr. Lincoln read some of these works."[48]

Neither this list nor Herndon's 1873 Auction List specify which works Lincoln actually read.[49] Separate evidence suggests Lincoln had read Paine and Volney in his youth, and a reliable source indicates that Lincoln admired and was possibly influenced by some writings of the transcendentalist, liberal theologian, and antislavery activist Theodore Parker. (Herndon idolized Parker and corresponded with him for six years until Parker's death in 1860.)[50] There is no independent evidence that Lincoln ever read any of the other works listed above. However, a contemporary wrote that at the end of an office day, Lincoln would remark, "Billy, what book have you worth while to take home tonight?" and another source related that Lincoln "would stretch himself on the office cot, aweary of his toil, and say, 'Now, Billy, tell me about the books;' and Herndon would discourse by the hour, ranging over history, literature, philosophy, and science."[51]

Whether Lincoln experienced these works directly or only vicariously, records show that Darwin had read most of these authors and knew several personally. In 1850, Lyell brought back from a trip to America some of Parker's writings—probably antislavery pamphlets—for which Darwin thanked him.[52] The other writers listed above either wrote for or were reviewed in the Westminster Review, and through his brother, Darwin was familiar with the "Westminster circle." The Review itself is one of several English periodicals to which Herndon apparently subscribed.[53] It is unknown whether Herndon purchased Darwin's Voyage of the Beagle, but the auction list shows that he possessed a copy of The Origin of Species.

In his later biography of Lincoln, Herndon was contradictory and haughty about Lincoln's reading habits, writing that Lincoln "read less and thought more than any man in his sphere in America. No man can put his finger on any great book written in the last or present century that he read thoroughly"; and that Lincoln "often quoted" the Bible and Shakespeare but "never read either one through." Herndon expressed frustration that Lincoln's interests differed from his own, and although Lincoln probably enjoyed Herndon's efforts to act as a mentor on some subjects, Herndon never felt he had much effect. After mentioning a few works on slavery that both he and Lincoln read, Herndon added, "After reading them we would discuss the questions they touched upon and the idea they suggested, from our different points of view. I was never conscious of having made much of an impression on Mr. Lincoln, nor do I believe I ever changed his views."[54]

One book Herndon owned and Lincoln certainly read also had a significant impact on Darwin. Vestiges of the Natural History of Creation was first published anonymously in London in 1844 by the Edinburgh writer and publisher Robert Chambers. Obviously influenced by Lyell and many other scientific writers, Chambers rejected special creations and instead argued for a progressive "development" that involved not only plants and animals but also geology (cutting across Lyell's view) and, indeed, the entire cosmos. No area escaped Chambers's analysis, from astronomy to zoology, and he included man as developing according to "natural laws" originally laid down by the Creator. Chambers was a good writer whose cheerful and elegant explanations of the latest arcane research made Vestiges a publishing phenomenon. Herndon seems to have owned an 1853 edition.[55]

According to Herndon's two slightly differing accounts, James W. Keyes, a tailor in Springfield, either gave or loaned Lincoln the book "which interested him so much that he read it through." The book's "doctrine of development or evolution . . . interested him greatly, and he was deeply impressed with the notion of the so-called 'universal law'—evolution." (The term "evolution" was probably not yet in common usage whenever Herndon and Lincoln discussed "development.") According to Herndon, after reading the book Lincoln "did not extend greatly his researches," although Lincoln "subsequently read the sixth edition of this work, which I loaned him." Herndon believed that "by continued thinking in a single channel [Lincoln] seemed to grow into a warm advocate of the new doctrine." In Herndon's view, this was Lincoln's only "investigation into the realm of philosophy. . . . 'There are no accidents,' he said one day, 'in my philosophy.'"[56]

When collecting materials for a biography of Lincoln, Herndon obtained from Keyes a statement that, while never mentioning Vestiges, discussed only one topic, Lincoln's religious beliefs: "Mr Lincoln . . . believed in a Creator of all things, who had neither beginning nor end, who possessing all power and wisdom, established a principal, in Obedience to which, Worlds move and are upheld, and animal and vegetable life came into existence. A reason he gave for his belief was, that in view of the Order and harmony of all nature which all beheld, it would have been More miraculous to have Come about by chance, than to have been created and arranged by some great thinking power." All this accorded with what Lincoln had read in Vestiges and before that in Paley's work on natural theology. However, Keyes continued, regarding "Christian theory," Lincoln "said that it had better be taken for granted—for by the test of reason all might become Infidels on that subject, for evidence of Christ's divinity came to us in a somewhat doubtful shape." Lincoln did not "express any preference" for one denomination over another and allowed that Christianity was "ingenious . . . and perhaps was calculated to do good."[57] Regarding Vestiges's possible influence on Lincoln, Herndon later wrote:

> Mr. Lincoln had always denied special creation, but from his want of education he did not know just what to believe. He adopted the progressive and development theory as taught more or less directly in that work. He despised speculation, especially in the metaphysical world. He was purely a practical man. . . . He held that reason drew her references as to law, etc., from observations, experience and reflection on the facts and phenomena of Nature. . . . He was a materialist in his philosophy.[58]

Lincoln may have "despised speculation" partly because it kept getting him in trouble politically. As noted earlier, suspicions in the "religious community" helped deny him a nomination in 1842, and in 1846, when Lincoln did gain the nomination, he discovered that his Democratic opponent—his old rival Reverend Cartwright—was willing to use rumors about "infidelity" against him. However, the sixty-two-year-old Methodist preacher found himself repeatedly outfoxed on the stump by the thirty-seven-year-old Lincoln, who at one point boldly attended one of Cartwright's revival meetings. The preacher shouted from the platform, "If you are not going to repent and go to Heaven, Mr. Lincoln, where are you going?" Lincoln replied that he was, in fact, going to Congress.[59] But shortly before election day, Lincoln heard that Cartwright was "whispering the charge of infidelity against me."[60] Lincoln felt it necessary to respond with a handbill "To the Voters of the Seventh Congressional District."[61] This handbill, first discovered and published in 1942, was so ambiguously worded that it has been cited by scholars arguing for and against the view that Lincoln had grown more religious by 1846.[62] Neither a straightforward confession of faith nor a comprehensive denial of the charge of infidelity, this text demonstrates Lincoln's "damage limitation" technique of stating carefully worded truths from which incorrect inferences could easily be drawn. In the text below, some of those potentially false inferences or disguised facts are inserted within brackets.

> FELLOW CITIZENS:
> A charge having got into circulation in some of the neighborhoods of this District, in substance that I am an open scoffer at Christianity, I have by the advice of some friends concluded to notice the subject in this form. That I am not a member of any Christian Church, is true; but I have never denied > the truth of the Scriptures [although denying whatever seemed false]; and I have never spoken with intentional disrespect of religion in general, or of any denomination of Christians in particular [although questioning Christianity in general]. It is true that in early life [although "no longer"] I was inclined to believe in what I understand is called the "Doctrine of Necessity"—that is, that the human mind is impelled to action, or held in rest by some power, over which the mind itself has no control; and I have sometimes (with one, two or three, but never publicly) tried to maintain this opinion in argument [as if merely a debating point]. The habit of arguing thus however, I have, entirely left off for more than five years [as if no longer believing it]. And I add here, I have always understood this same opinion to be held by several of the Christian denominations [as if, despite previous denials, it was not a problem, anyway]. The foregoing is the whole truth, briefly stated, in relation to myself, upon this subject.

> I do not think I could myself, be brought to support a man for office, whom I knew to be an open enemy of, and scoffer at, religion [his own "scoffing" having been in private]. Leaving the higher matter of eternal consequences, between him and his Maker [as if he believed in some future punishment], I still do not think any man has the right thus to insult the feelings, and injure the morals, of the community in which he may live. If, then, I was guilty of such conduct, I should blame no man who should condemn me for it; but I do blame those, whoever they may be [i.e., Cartwright], who falsely put such a charge in circulation against me.

> July 31, 1846. A. Lincoln.

In a letter written to an editor a fortnight later, Lincoln not only named Cartwright but also counterintuitively defined "false accusation" as making "an assertion without knowing whether it is true or false, the accidental truth of the assertion" being no justification. Standing on this thin ice, Lincoln could "aver, that he, Cartwright, never heard me utter a word in any way indicating my opinions on religious matters, in his life."[63]

At this point, only two facts were important: Lincoln had not committed to paper any statement about his religious views that could be proven untrue; and between writing the handbill and the letter, Lincoln had defeated Cartwright by an unprecedented majority in the district and a two-to-one margin in Springfield. Whatever his Maker might decide about Lincoln's "eternal consequences," the voters were indeed sending him to Washington, D.C.

Whether Lincoln read Vestiges before or (more likely) after the 1846 election, it had no direct effect on his contretemps with Cartwright, except that the "determinism" found in Chambers's work meshed with the "doctrine of necessity" that Lincoln to some degree accepted. For Charles Darwin, deeply engaged in his own investigation of "development," Vestiges had much more impact.

When Vestiges first appeared in London in October 1844, Darwin had only recently written the longer sketch of his theory, showing it to no one, not even Hooker, while nevertheless making arrangements for its publication "in the event of my sudden death."[64] Emma was eventually allowed to read it and even made some corrections in style—writing "a great assumption" in the margin beside Darwin's effort to explain the evolution of the eye.[65] The next time Darwin was in London, he found that the popular Vestiges was unobtainable, so he skimmed a copy in the British Museum.[66] "The writing & arrangement are certainly admirable," Darwin wrote to Hooker, "but his geology strikes me as bad, & his zoology far worse."[67] While joining the intelligentsia in trying to guess the author, Darwin was "much flattered and unflattered" when this "strange unphilosophical, but capitally-written book" was even attributed to him.[68] Chambers would not admit authorship, but Darwin and Hooker suspected him, especially after Darwin received a presentation copy from the publisher shortly after he and Chambers first met at a British Association meeting in 1847. Chambers had delivered a paper on marine terraces, citing some of Darwin's work, and while the audience responded negatively, Darwin offered support.[69]

On his own copy of Vestiges, Darwin made extensive notes, mainly about problems to avoid. The circular system of classification was all wrong, and Chambers's use of terms like "higher" and "lower" would be spurned in favor of phrases like "more complicated."[70] Darwin saw that Vestiges's effort to appease religious sensibilities (by taking "it for granted . . . that God created animated beings, as well as the terraqueous theatre of their being") did not prevent pious venom being added to the legitimate criticisms of the book's scientific flaws.[71] When Darwin's former professor Adam Sedgwick wrote a withering review, Darwin "read it with fear & trembling," as he reported to Lyell, "but was well pleased to find, that I had not overlooked any of the arguments, though I had put them to myself feebly as milk & water."[72] He later scribbled on his copy of Sedgwick's review, "The publication of the Vestiges brought out all that could be said against the theory excellently if not too vehemently."[73]

Vestiges's reception reenforced Darwin's instinct to make sure his facts were plentiful and accurate, to stick to biology and zoology, and to avoid theological issues, which meant postponing the subject of man because natural selection could be supported just as well with evidence from other species. Before springing his theory on fellow scientists—however much popular opinion was softened by Vestiges—Darwin must endeavor to bring more naturalists of stature onto his side. And also he decided he must develop his skills as a specialist, something he had never really done, relying on other naturalists—and now Hooker—for detailed work. In a recent letter, Hooker had criticized a French naturalist who endlessly theorized when he did "not know what it is to be a specific naturalist," and Darwin felt stung: "How painfully (to me) true is your remark that no one has hardly a right to examine the question of species who has not minutely examined many."[74]

In 1846, while Lincoln was making arrangements before departing for Congress, Darwin finished various publishing chores, including a new edition of the Voyage of the Beagle, so he could settle down to the serious and specialist study of a particular family of creatures, barnacles. Darwin thought this research would require only a year or two. Lincoln was hoping that in that amount of time he might be able to launch a long-term career in Washington, climbing the greasy pole of national politics. Both men's expectations proved wrong.

Career Preparations and Rivals, 1845–49

Before embarking on his study of barnacles, Darwin decided to revise his part of FitzRoy's Beagle publications, issuing it separately as The Voyage of the Beagle. This new edition would reach a wider public for whom Darwin served up a few small hors d'oeuvres of natural selection. For example, regarding the Galapagos material, he added, "Seeing this gradation and diversity of structure in one small, intimately related group of birds, one might really fancy that from an original paucity of birds in this archipelago, one species had been taken and modified for different ends."[1]

Something else crept into the last chapter, completed in August 1845, just after Darwin read Charles Lyell's new book about his recent travels in the United States. Annoyed by Lyell's suggestions that slaves were treated benignly by their masters, Darwin wrote to Lyell, praising his book generously but adding tersely, "Your slave discussion disturbed me much; but as you would care no more for my opinion on this head than for the ashes of this letter, I will say nothing except that it gave me some sleepless, most uncomfortable hours."[2] To Lyell's accommodating reply, Darwin responded that he wished "the same feelings had been apparent in your published discussion."

> But I will not write on this subject, I should perhaps annoy you, and most certainly myself. I have exhaled myself with a paragraph or two in my Journal on the sin of Brazilian slavery; you perhaps will think that it is in answer to you; but such is not the case. I have remarked on nothing which I did not hear on the coast of South America. My few sentences, however, are merely an explosion of feeling. How could you relate so placidly that atrocious sentiment [of a planter quoted by Lyell] about separating children from their parents; and in the next page speak of being distressed at the whites not having prospered; I assure you the contrast made me exclaim out. But I have broken my intention, and so no more on this odious deadly subject.[3]

That Darwin could use this harsh tone when addressing Lyell—to whom he had actually dedicated his new volume—demonstrates the depth of his feeling, as do the book's "few sentences" that begin "I thank God, I shall never again visit a slave-country" and continued for over a page with descriptions of several horrors he had witnessed in Latin America: the sound of moaning coming from a house where he suspected a slave was being tortured, an old lady who kept thumbscrews for that purpose, staying in a house where a "young mulatto" was beaten "and persecuted enough to break the spirit of the lowest animal," a six- or seven-year-old boy struck with a horsewhip while his father trembled, a negro afraid to ward off a blow. Darwin also reviled those who thought any cheerfulness in a slave proved that slavery is "a tolerable evil" or who believed slaves can speak truthfully about their condition in front of their masters. He was infuriated that slave owners "profess to love their neighbours as themselves, . . . believe in God, and pray that his Will be done on earth!" He acknowledged the guilt of the British "and our American descendants, with their boastful cry of liberty" but was consoled that Britons "at least have made a greater sacrifice, than ever made by any nation, to expiate our sin."[4] The presentation copy of The Voyage reached Lyell just before he departed for a second tour of the United States, where he found that Americans' feelings on the issue of slavery had moved closer to an explosion than three years before.

Darwin apparently chose barnacles for his specialist study partly because of Louis Agassiz, one of the few contemporaries of whom it can be said that his influence was felt both by Darwin, whom he met in 1840, and by Lincoln, who must have known Agassiz's work long before the naturalist visited the White House for a significant conversation in 1865. Born in Switzerland in 1807 and initially trained as a doctor, Agassiz moved into natural history, studying under such great pioneers as Alexander von Humboldt and Georges Cuvier. While mastering geology and zoology, Agassiz became most renowned as an ichthyologist, yet Darwin first noticed him because of his startling theory that glaciers and moving ice sheets could better account for the transportation of "erratic boulders" than the action of giant icebergs drifting in ancient seas, the Lyellian view adopted by Darwin. Agassiz also asserted that the "parallel roads" at Glen Roy in Scotland were not, as Darwin had argued in 1839, "marine beaches" but the result of glacial action creating lakes. In 1840, Darwin sent him a copy of his Journal and Remarks in which he had criticized some of Agassiz's work on glaciers, although the accompanying letter said diplomatically that "your work on Glaciers . . . has filled me with admiration. As I have briefly treated of the boulders of S. America in the accompanying volume I thought you possibly might like to possess a copy; and sending it you, is the only means I have of expressing the regret I feel at the manner in which I have alluded to (although probably the fact is unknown and quite indifferent to you) your most valuable labours on the action of Glaciers."[5]

While the opinions of other geologists wavered on the topic, Darwin had difficulty accepting that Agassiz might be right. In 1843, Darwin wrote about his Glen Roy theory being "for a time knocked on the head by Agassiz's ice-work—but it is now reviving again."[6] In the following year, Darwin mentioned to Joseph Dalton Hooker—who had only recently read Darwin's view that species could change—that "Agassiz has lately brought the strongest arguments in favour of immutability."[7] As late as 1846, after exclaiming to a colleague that "Agassiz or Buckland . . . will sneer" at his efforts to obtain fresh data about Glen Roy, Darwin himself sneered that "there never was a more futile theory" than Agassiz's glacier lake.[8] A few days later at a conference in Southampton, Darwin heard a presentation by Agassiz in which he suggested that "a monograph on the Cirripedia [barnacles] was a pressing desideratum in Zoology." That at least is how Darwin later recounted Agassiz's words in two letters, one to Agassiz himself: "your sentence . . . much helped to decide me."[9] Darwin had a long-standing interest in marine invertebrates, and some specimens from the Beagle voyage had never been written up properly.[10] A year had passed since Hooker's remark made Darwin consider studying in depth a particular species, and now Agassiz's statement provided a peculiar stimulus.[11]

Agassiz's fame was ascending rapidly. Already an honorary member of scientific societies in France and America, in Britain he received further memberships and the Geological Society's Wollaston Medal. His brilliance and charm won many supporters, including Lyell, who helped arrange for Agassiz to deliver lectures at the Lowell Institute in Boston. There Agassiz achieved stunning success, accepted a Harvard professorship, married into a Boston Brahmin family, and eventually became not only a citizen but also America's most famous scientist in the mid-nineteenth century.[12]

Still smarting over Glen Roy, Darwin now labored to gain his own reputation as an expert on a particular species—one that Agassiz had already admitted was outside his own expertise.

The America that Agassiz entered in 1846 was increasingly convulsed by the issue of slavery, and Lincoln had seen one painful result—when his hero Henry Clay lost the presidential election in 1844. Lincoln had labored in the previous presidential election in 1840 and was elated when William Henry Harrison, the Whig candidate, won and equally deflated when Harrison died of pneumonia after a single month in office. John Tyler, the first vice president to fill a suddenly vacated office, was actually a Democrat, and the Whigs floundered. Lincoln was then delighted when the Whigs nominated Clay in 1844 and crushed when Clay was narrowly defeated by the Democrat James Polk. Clay might have won if some Whigs had not abandoned the party because, like the Democratic Party, it had avoided the issue of slavery. As first happened in 1840, those wishing to protest against slavery voted for the new Liberty Party, which won few votes outside of New York but enough in 1844 to prevent Clay from winning that state's crucial electoral votes.

Lincoln complained about those who thus helped the Democrats regain control of the presidency, but blaming abolitionists was pointless: the Whigs needed to achieve something that would help them retain the growing antislavery vote.[13] Lincoln himself would work on this before the end of his term in Washington, D.C. However, Lincoln's initial effort upon first arriving in December 1847 was an attempt to surpass the reputation of his main political rival. Just as Darwin had begun and would long continue a scientific duel with Louis Agassiz, so Lincoln had, a dozen years earlier, found his great political opponent in Stephen A. Douglas.

Douglas was four years younger than Lincoln and a foot shorter. "The Little Giant" had origins in Vermont almost as humble as Lincoln's, and he settled in Illinois only a year or two after Lincoln. At twenty-one, Douglas passed the bar and was practicing law in 1834 when Lincoln first met him. Douglas was bright, ambitious, and belonged to Illinois' dominant Democratic Party, which steadily raised him to the office of public prosecutor, then to the state legislature as its youngest member, then to the Land Office as Registrar, and eventually to the House of Representatives in Washington—four years before Lincoln got there. Occasionally, in court cases and in the state legislature, the two men were on the same side, but usually they were opponents. Lincoln pulled out all the stops to ensure that his law partner, John T. Stuart, defeated Douglas in a congressional race, during which Lincoln wrote to a fellow Whig: "We have adopted it as part of our policy here, to never speak of Douglass at all. Isn't that the best mode of treating so small a matter?"[14]

In January 1838, Lincoln made a high-flown speech in Springfield in which he never mentioned Douglas by name yet alluded to him as possessing extraordinary and dangerous ambition, like "an Alexander, a Caesar, or a Napoleon . . . a man possessed of the loftiest genius, coupled with ambition sufficient to push it to its utmost stretch."[15] Suspiciously similar attacks on Douglas appeared around this time in letters probably written by Lincoln to the Sangamo Journal.[16] "Lincoln despised Douglas," said one contemporary, while another declared that Lincoln "always admitted that Douglass was a wonderfully great political leader and with a good cause to advocate he thought he would be invincible."[17] Lincoln rarely thought Douglas advocated for a good cause, but he could see in Douglas many of his own virtues and ambitions. It grated that Douglas did less to hide his ambition yet seemed to fulfill it more easily. After performing poorly in a debate with Douglas around this time, Lincoln was "conscious of his failure," said a witness who "never saw any man so much distressed."[18] The Christmas season of goodwill found little expression in Lincoln's descriptions of Douglas: "not now worth talking about," he wrote on 23 December 1839, and in a speech three days later, he declared that Douglas was "deserving of the world's contempt."[19]

When Douglas went to Congress in 1843, he quickly established a reputation for excellent speaking and clever compromise that brought him swift reelection. Douglas supported Polk's expansionist line, helped bring about the long-delayed annexation of Texas, and leapt to defend Polk against attacks by the likes of John Quincy Adams, who suggested (correctly) that the president had deliberately inflamed a border dispute in order to cause the Mexican-American War, by which Polk intended to add to the United States what later became New Mexico, Arizona, Nevada, and California.

When Lincoln finally made it to Washington, he showed none of the reserve expected from a freshman congressman. Trying to make a name for himself quickly, Lincoln attacked the legality of the war's origin with better arguments than those already made by Adams and refuted by Douglas. In well-researched speeches, Lincoln analyzed Polk's prewar maneuvers and asked Polk to name the "spot" (in relation to the disputed boundary line) where in April 1846, as Polk had claimed, innocent Americans had been viciously attacked by Mexican troops. But a year and a half had passed, and because Douglas had recently been elected to the Senate, he was not present in the House in December 1847 to rise to Lincoln's bait, and everyone else simply ignored him. The only name he made for himself was coined by opponents: "Spotty Lincoln."

During his second year in Washington, Lincoln tried to achieve something worthwhile by drafting an ambitious measure regarding the highly politicized topic of slavery in Washington, D.C. Like many representatives in Washington, Lincoln was pained that the country's largest slave traders had their warehouse—which Lincoln termed "a sort of Negro livery-stable"—within sight of the Capitol. Also, he may have been present on the evening when three hired slave-catchers invaded his boardinghouse to arrest a black waiter who had been allowed to work to save up the money his master demanded for the purchase of his freedom—until the master changed his mind.[20] Since Washington, D.C., was not a state, and slavery was not protected by "states' rights," it had long been the point of conflict between abolitionists and their opponents. Lincoln sought a rational compromise consistent with the principles he had expressed on this very issue in his first "protest" against slavery in 1837.

Lincoln's plan involved freeing all children born to slave mothers after 1850; allowing federal officials to retain slaves as personal servants; allowing owners to remove their slaves from D.C. or receive federal payments for the full value of slaves they freed; once the District was "free," putting in place "active and efficient means" for arresting and returning any fugitive slaves who came into the District; and allowing a majority of free white male citizens in D.C. to accept or reject the plan in a referendum.[21]

Lincoln worked quietly to rally support from all sides, but when the proposal became public, the support vanished. Abolitionists, with their moral rather than practical viewpoint, objected to compensation for slave owners—though that had helped British emancipation to succeed sixteen years earlier. Also, many abolitionists were actively engaged in helping fugitives, so they considered Lincoln's move to establish in Washington (where none existed) a system for returning fugitives a retrograde step. Southerners, meanwhile, had for years fought any move by Congress to interfere with slavery where it existed, especially in Washington, and failed to appreciate that Lincoln's plan bent over backwards to appease them. John C. Calhoun himself dismissed the plan as misguided and dangerous to southern rights.

"Abandoned by my former backers and having little personal influence," Lincoln later said, "I dropped the matter knowing that it was useless to prosecute the business at that time."[22] Lincoln was doubly disappointed by his colleagues' lack of compromise and his own failure to achieve something of lasting value. Lincoln's plan would have emancipated few if any slaves, yet it could have marked an important turning point, restarting the momentum of emancipation and countering the expansion of slavery. It could have established, at initial low cost, the principle of compensation, which might have reduced "north versus south" antagonism by having everyone share the cost of eliminating an evil from which the whole country had economically profited. It could have shown the federal government using the power it did possess but with due regard for local opinion—exactly what Lincoln had advocated in 1837.

In view of Lincoln's later attacks on Douglas's policies, Lincoln's regard for "local opinion" is somewhat ironic. In the recent presidential election, the Democrats had advocated a policy of local consent called "popular sovereignty": allowing the citizens of a territory to decide whether a state seeking admission to the Union should prohibit slavery. However, the principle had actually been proposed even earlier during the final debate on the admission of Texas—by then congressman Stephen A. Douglas.[23] A year after Lincoln left Washington and during the storm of controversy that resulted in the Compromise of 1850, it was Douglas who played the key role in applying "pop. sov." to the territories recently taken from Mexico. While both Lincoln and Douglas preferred to let local people rather than the federal government choose whether slavery should be prohibited, the crucial difference between them is that Lincoln had proposed using "local consent" to end slavery in a place already possessing it, while Douglas applied "pop. sov." to allow slavery into territories where it did not yet exist under law. Since August 1846, Congress had been deadlocked over the Wilmot Proviso, which sought a federal prohibition against slavery in any new territory that might be gained from Mexico; Lincoln supported the proviso, while Douglas pushed "pop. sov." as an alternative, one much preferred by the southern states.

Lincoln finally left Washington in March 1849, having failed to achieve enough to escape the system he himself had helped to create whereby the prominent Whigs in his district took turns seeking a two-year term. Lincoln now tried and failed to obtain the position of General Land Office Commissioner, which would have trumped Douglas's former state-level position and would politically counterbalance Douglas's current chairmanship of the Senate Committee on Territories. When news arrived that he had not obtained the position, Lincoln laid down in depression for an hour or so and later said, "I hardly ever felt so bad at any failure in my life."[24] He turned down a dead-end governorship of Oregon territory and considered a return to the state legislature too retrograde. So, without political office, Lincoln was back to practicing law and hoping for some unforeseeable opportunity.

By March 1849, Lincoln's career in national politics had apparently come to an end after only two years. Meanwhile, Darwin was realizing that his study of barnacles, supposedly requiring only a year or two, would take considerably longer. An early discovery made the whole project seem more useful to his theory of natural selection than expected, so Darwin decided he must compare the Beagle's barnacle specimens with those that colleagues all over the world might dredge up for him (sometimes literally). Then he added fossil specimens. A less thrilling discovery was that the numerous body parts for each barnacle needed to be individually classified, a job done under a microscope with needles and minute tweezers. Preparing separate slides for further examination proved unimaginably slow work, delayed further by grave health problems.[25]

Darwin revealed his early exultation to Hooker, the only naturalist who had yet seen Darwin's 231-page sketch on natural selection. Without utterly rejecting Darwin's theory, Hooker still doubted that new species could be derived from previous ones, pointing out numerous problems and offering intelligent criticisms, all greatly appreciated by Darwin. Briefly but hyperbolically, Darwin explained the importance of his current discoveries:

> I should never have made this out, had not my species theory convinced me, that an hermaphrodite species must pass into a bisexual species by insensibly small stages, & here we have it, for the male organs in the hermaphrodite are already beginning to fail, & independent males ready formed. But I can hardly explain what I mean, & you will perhaps wish my Barnacles & Species theory al Diabolo together. But I don't care what you say, my species theory is all gospel.[26]

But in mid-March 1849, Darwin had to leave his barnacles behind temporarily and travel to Malvern to undergo three months of cold showers in an effort to restore his collapsing health.

There has been growing interest in the way the illnesses of famous people might have influenced their behavior and possibly history. Although Lincoln has not escaped the attention of armchair diagnosticians, they have been speculatively poking at a patient who was essentially so healthy that he could tolerate surprisingly well the stresses of a presidency that would have broken most men. On the other hand, "Darwin's medical history," as medical historians Roy Porter and G. S. Rousseau write, "has been, and remains, one of the 'source of the Nile' mysteries of nineteenth-century scholarship."[27] Entire books have been shaped by, or even devoted to, Darwin's malaise.[28] Although his mysterious malady undoubtedly affected both the pace and direction of his research, a discussion of Darwin's personal health—or that of Lincoln—is tangential to this work. Rather than survey how the present world has applied science to their biographies, the more relevant task is to probe how they applied science to their world, especially to the subjects of man and God.

Mortality, Invention, and Geology

Like many contemporaries, Darwin and Lincoln suffered tragic losses of family members to the ravages of disease; however, they had less capacity than many contemporaries to find solace in religion, and the deaths may indeed have contributed to their loss of faith. Before reaching their teens, Darwin and Lincoln had lost their mothers, and a few years later, Lincoln's only full sister, Sarah, also died. Darwin was in his late thirties and Lincoln in his early forties when their fathers passed away. Far more painful was the tragic loss of children. Darwin's third child, Mary, died less than a month after her birth in 1842. Emma Darwin wrote, "Our pain is nothing to what it would have been if she had lived longer and suffered more."[1] That proved all too true for both families a few years later. Lincoln's second son, Edward, was sickly from an early age and died in February 1850 of pulmonary tuberculosis at the age of three.[2] A little over a year later, Darwin's second child, ten-year-old Annie, also died, probably of tuberculosis, after a long illness.[3]

Eddie's death affected Mary Lincoln deeply, contributing to her decision to move from the Episcopal church favored by her Edwards in-laws to the Presbyterian church, where she had many friends. But three years after Eddie's death, Mary wrote to a friend, "I grieve to say that even at this day I do not feel sufficiently submissive to our loss."[4] Emma used similar words in a letter written the day after Annie's death: "I hope I shall be able to attain some feeling of submission to the will of Heaven."[5] The following day, Charles wrote to his brother, "Poor Emma is well bodily & firm, but feels bitterly & God knows we can neither see on any side a gleam of comfort."[6] There is no evidence that Emma's religious beliefs or practice were altered, though she may have come closer to understanding the harsh view Darwin expressed a few years later about "the clumsy, wasteful, blundering low & horridly cruel works of nature!"[7]

Lincoln's reaction to Eddie's death was muted. "We miss him very much," he wrote to his stepbrother. Mary later asserted that Eddie's death directed her husband's heart "toward religion."[8] The Presbyterian minister who performed

Eddie's funeral service, Reverend James Smith, soon became a family friend, and within two years, Mary underwent formal examination to join his church. Lincoln now rented a pew and when not on the circuit or campaigning often accompanied Mary to Sunday services. Lincoln could find much to admire in Reverend Smith, a former deist converted at a camp meeting in Indiana, who in 1843 published a massive tome entitled The Christian's Defense, Containing a Fair Statement, and Impartial Examination of the Leading Objections Urged by Infidels against the Antiquity, Genuineness, Credibility, and Inspiration of the Holy Scripture. Lincoln saw the book before 1850 and later possessed a copy. Smith delivered sensible sermons, took an interest in education and temperance, and was a member of the Illinois State Colonization Society, which Lincoln also supported.[9]

Smith's influence on Lincoln is much disputed, but there is no evidence that Lincoln changed his mind about the main doctrines of Christianity.[10] Unlike his wife, Lincoln avoided formal membership of any church, although liberally supporting his wife's and other Springfield churches. Although "one could argue logically that an ambitious politician or statesman might utter religious platitudes in public to sway voters," this was not, according to historian Wayne C. Temple, the case with Lincoln, who "professed his belief in God" on many occasions both public and private.[11] Nevertheless, Lincoln did not mind if more frequent church attendance not only pleased his society-conscious wife (who joined the First Presbyterian simultaneously with three of her best friends) but also helped submerge old rumors about his own deism.

If Lincoln attended church more after Eddie died, Darwin's attendance apparently decreased after Annie's death. He continued to support the village church and was on friendly terms with its vicar, but on Sundays, after accompanying his family to the lych-gate, Darwin reportedly became accustomed to remaining outside or going for a walk.[12] Yet, this decline in Darwin's church attendance, like the increase in Lincoln's, may have resulted from such mundane concerns as Lincoln's desire to promote a more conventional image and Darwin's fear of being embarrassed by his turbulent digestive system.

Darwin's ill health drove him to try out the latest medical technology (Dr. Gully's Water Cure) in 1849, the same year in which Lincoln made a serious effort to contribute something of his own to the history of technology—though he did not refer to it in his lecture on "Discoveries and Inventions" a decade later.

Most Lincoln biographies mention the oddity that he is the only president ever to obtain a U.S. patent and perhaps briefly link this to his wider interest in technology.[13] But far more significant than the fact that Lincoln obtained a patent is his very idea of becoming an inventor.

In September 1848, as Lincoln and Mary were returning to Springfield after his first session in Washington, they watched from aboard a river steamboat as the crew of another steamboat that had run aground labored to get free of the sandbar by lightening the vessel and shoving loose planks and empty barrels under the hull.[14] Lincoln knew from his flatboating days the complications of shifting sandbars and variable drafts. He had begun his political career campaigning for improvements in river navigation and knew that New Salem had expired partly because the Sangamo River was too difficult for steamboats. Now Lincoln reasoned laterally: when it is not possible to dredge or widen rivers or to provide alternatives such as canals or railroads (the latter having barely reached Illinois by then), perhaps steamboats themselves could be fitted with a device to create additional buoyancy as needed.

The problem of turning a clever idea into a practical reality intrigued Lincoln. Before returning to Washington for the second session, Lincoln constructed a model of his invention, hardly difficult for a carpenter's son who had formerly built an entire flatboat. Lincoln used a neighbor's carpentry shop and, according to Herndon's acerbic account, spent a good deal of time in the law office whittling on the model and explaining "its merits and the revolution it was destined to work in steamboat navigation."[15]

Lincoln carried his model back to Washington and engaged a patent agent to phrase the patent application properly and a draughtsman to prepare the necessary drawings of his "new and improved manner of combining adjustable buoyant air chambers with a steam boat or other vessel for the purpose of enabling their draught of water to be readily lessened to enable them to pass over bars, or through shallow water, without discharging their cargoes." On 22 May 1849, Lincoln was issued Patent Number 6,469.[16]

To bring the invention to life would have required commercial and manufacturing contacts, capital, and some entrepreneurial spirit, but Lincoln was busy trying to recoup his finances and support his family from the fees he split with Herndon. Perhaps Lincoln dreamed that some entrepreneur would take up his idea, manufacturing the product under a license giving Lincoln a percentage of worldwide sales: the "fuel of interest" Lincoln later mentioned in his lecture "Inventions." However, the dream remained a dream. At some point, Lincoln gave friends in Springfield a demonstration of how his invention worked, using a large horse trough for the trial.[17] After that, nothing more was heard of the invention until Scientific American mentioned it as a curiosity shortly after Lincoln became president-elect.[18]

Herndon later quipped that Lincoln was as bad at making inventions as he was at lecturing about them, yet his invention was not absurd: later, certain dredging machines and modern submarines employed something similar.[19] But his timing was poor, for he addressed a problem already being solved by better dredging, improved port facilities, and expanding canal and railroad systems. Twenty years earlier, when steamships were still new and railroads practically nonexistent, Lincoln's "adjustable buoyant air chambers" might have improved river transportation and even saved New Salem. Yet the facts that Lincoln's invention failed to meet expectations but succeeded in making him unique among presidents are less significant than Lincoln's ability to imagine himself achieving success through the same superior intelligence that raised him from a field hand to riverboatman, clerk, militia captain, surveyor, lay theologian, lawyer, propagandist, and legislator. In his fortieth year, Lincoln added "inventor" at the very time when, unfortunately, he had to subtract "legislator." He would not, it seemed, feed his family by making inventions or laws but by being a successful lawyer.

The very railroad system that made Lincoln's invention obsolete created legal problems and litigation that provided a major source of Lincoln's income.[20] Railroads also improved Lincoln's home life as he could now return home from the circuit on weekends. Railway development also greatly affected Darwin's work. His troublesome internal organs made travel unappealing, except to some spa, but the railways helped information to flow in a way not matched again until the invention of the Internet. Railways and steamships caused a huge expansion in national and international postal systems, and Darwin was able during his barnacle research to collect information and specimens from other naturalists in a manner inconceivable a generation earlier.

Because Darwin immersed himself for eight years in barnacle studies, an observer might have considered that to be his major contribution to science: the complete classification of a major infraclass (Cirripedia) of crustaceans. One of Darwin's children growing up during these years remarked while visiting a neighbor's house, "Then where does he do his barnacles?"[21] But "doing" his barnacles was secondary to Darwin's life's work. The crustaceans posed classification problems that Darwin now realized he could solve through his still-secret theory of species "modification through descent." Also, Darwin was earning a respectable reputation as a precise observer, dissecting, describing, and publishing. Louis Agassiz, famed for his vast knowledge of natural science while also a world authority on fish, had never thoroughly mastered a class as vast as the barnacles. He had beaten Darwin in geology, but now Darwin challenged Agassiz on his own ground (or water).

The financial success of the law practice allowed Herndon to expand his intellectual horizons with further book purchases and journal subscriptions, resources Lincoln could exploit as well. A noted "book-worm" in the Library of Congress, after returning from his brief stint in Washington, Lincoln thirsted for knowledge with new zeal. Herndon commented, "Lincoln from 1849 to 1855 became a hard student and read much, studied Euclid and some mathematical books, read much in the political world."[22] The scattered evidence of Lincoln's research during this period suggests little of it was literary, most was political but a great deal was scientific.

When Herndon later asked one of Lincoln's closest acquaintances "whether Mr. Lincoln was given to abstract speculation," Joseph Gillespie replied, "He wanted something solid to rest upon, hence his bias for mathematics and physical sciences." Gillespie recounted Lincoln's theorizing—"even before he had read the philosophical explanation"—that a musket ball fired horizontally and one dropped vertically would hit the ground at the same time. "He was fond of astronomy but I can't call to mind any reference of his to geology. He doubtless had read and thought of the subject but it did not engage his attention to the degree that astronomy and mechanical science did."[23] In contrast, Lincoln's former law partner John T. Stuart told an inquirer in 1860, "I consider [him] a man of very general and varied Knowledge—Has made Geology and other Sciences especial Study."[24] Another Lincoln associate, David Davis, according to Herndon's notes, believed that Lincoln read "no histories, novels, biographies &c," but that "his mind struggled to arrive at moral & physical-mathematical demonstration . . . had a good mechanical mind and knowledge . . . studied Euclid . . . the exact sciences."[25]

Herndon himself was interested in natural science, taking his children for carriage rides into the countryside "to teach them botany, geology, and ornithology." One nephew never "saw a botany book that knew more about plants"; and in 1867, Herndon knowledgably described regional geology to a journalist, adding, "We had no need of Agassiz out here to tell us what things meant."[26] Although Herndon at times despaired of his student, he approved of Lincoln's fascination with Vestiges and illustrated Lincoln's interest in science with this recollection:

> Sometime about 1855 I went into a bookshop in this city and saw a book, a small one, entitled, called, I think, The Annual of Science. I looked over it casually and liked it and bought it. I took the book to Lincoln and H.'s Office. Lincoln was in, reading a newspaper of value; he said me: "Well, Billy, you have got a new book, which is good, I suppose. What is it? Let me see it." He took the book in his hand, looked over the pages, read the title, introductions, and probably the first chapter, and saw at a glance the purpose and object of the book, which were as follows: to record, teach, and fully explain the failures and successes of experiments of all philosophies and scientists, everywhere, including chemistry, mechanics, etc. He instantly rose up and said that he must buy the whole set, started out and got them. On returning to the office he said: "I have wanted such a book for years because I sometimes make experiments and have thoughts about the physical world that I do not know to be true or false. I may, by this book, correct my errors and save time and expense."[27]

The Annual of Scientific Discovery: or, Year Book of Facts in Science and Art, Exhibiting the Most Important Discoveries and Improvements in Mechanics, Astronomy, Geology, Zoology was edited from 1850 to 1866 by David Ames Wells, a former student of Agassiz who was later appointed chairman of the National Revenue Commission by Lincoln.[28]

Herndon's later auction list included a wide range of scientific works, most presumably purchased by Herndon. "When I heard of a good work, I ordered it, English, French or German, if the two latter were translated," he related. He imported books from London including works by "English scientists, all of which I devoured with relish. . . . I kept abreast of the spirit of the age. . . . I was of a progressive turn of mind and tried to get Lincoln in the same channel of thought." No doubt some of Herndon's purchases were too speculative for Lincoln's liking, for he "would snatch one up and peruse it for a while, but he soon threw it down with the suggestion that it was entirely too heavy for an ordinary mind to digest."[29] Yet, many of the books that Herndon later auctioned must have appealed to an inventor and may have been Lincoln's own purchases, such as the Reverend J. Blakely's Theology of Inventions (1856) and John Beckman's two-volume History of Inventions, Discoveries and Origins (1846), a History of Wonderful Inventions (1849), and Patent Office Reports (ten nonconsecutive volumes beginning in 1847 and none dating from after Lincoln's departure from Springfield in 1861). Among the many natural history books are several major works on geology, and those published before 1861 include: W. R. Johnson, On the Use of Anthracite in the Manufacture of Iron (1841), Charles Lyell, Manual of Elementary Geology (probably sixth edition, New York, 1857), Hugh Miller, Footprints of the Creator (1849) and Popular Geology (1859), Robert Dale Owen, Key to the Geology of the Globe (1857), David Page, Introductory Textbook of Geology (perhaps the 1854 edition), and Edward Hitchcock, Religion of Geology and Its Connected Sciences (1851) and Religious Truth Illustrated from Science (1857).[30] Several of these authors were British and their works well known to Darwin.

Lincoln's interest in geology, begun before 1837, was nourished not only by Vestiges and Wells's Annual but also by Lincoln's service in the early 1850s on the state Board of Canal Commissioners.[31] Canal building and search for iron and coal had spurred the development of state-funded geological surveys early in the nineteenth century, and by the 1840s, over twenty states had established them.[32] Illinois tardily established its own geological survey in 1851 and appointed a medical doctor, J. G. Norwood, as the first state geologist. By the end of 1853, Norwood and two assistants had collected vast numbers of minerals and fossils, and the collection resided temporarily in various locations in Springfield.[33] There was tension between legislators and geologists over whether the latter should be seeking fossils to aid the classification of strata rather than simply reporting on mineral resources and also over politics. One of Norwood's assistants, Amos H. Worthen, ran unsuccessfully as a Whig for the state legislature in 1854, after which the legislature's Democrat majority drove him from his assistant's position. Worthen then worked for the nation's foremost geologist, James Hall of the New York Geological Survey, who was so pleased with Worthen's fossil collecting that he named ten newly discovered species after him. When the Republicans gained control of Illinois in 1858, they replaced Norwood with the politically correct Worthen.[34] Hall had written a recommendation for Worthen and had encouraged scientists Agassiz, James Dwight Dana, and Edward Hitchcock to do the same. Yet Hall hedged his bet by also supporting another candidate, Joseph Henry McChesney. About thirty years old and an early graduate of the progressive (and strongly antislavery) Oberlin College in Ohio, McChesney had become "the owner of another large and unstudied collection of fossils" that Hall was eager to obtain. Hall wrote to McChesney that whenever McChesney became state geologist in Illinois, Hall would be pleased to have the chance to describe his fossils.[35] But McChesney had to settle for a position under Worthen.

Three months after Worthen's appointment, Lincoln received a letter from geologist Richard P. Stevens in New York City, apparently an old Republican acquaintance from Danville, Illinois. "I see our friend McChesney has taken the Northern part of your state as his appropriate field. It is sincerely to be wished that the new head of your survey will give the State a good report and contribute to popularize the Science of Geology among the people."[36] Stevens, like McChesney, eventually published a string of new fossil discoveries, and McChesney apparently worked with Hall in Albany for a while. During the 1860 presidential election, McChesney campaigned for Lincoln, and later McChesney benefited from his friendship with the president, who in 1862 effectively gave the geologist a grand opportunity to study in Europe by appointing him U.S. consul in Newcastle upon Tyne.[37]

The only documents connecting Worthen with Lincoln relate to a debt-collection suit in which Lincoln represented the geologist when Worthen was still running a dry-goods business in Warsaw, Illinois, in 1841. However, after November 1859, Worthen owned a house five lots north of Lincoln's, and his geological collection was for a while in a building just around the corner from the law office.[38] Lincoln probably would not have been surprised that Worthen once complained about meager appropriations from the legislature, blaming "fossilized members of the Senate who are members of orthodox churches, and are afraid of the infidel tendencies of Geology."[39]

Lincoln once demonstrated his interest in geology in an undated fragment stimulated by a visit to Niagara Falls, New York, in 1857.[40] The meditative piece, though ending mid-sentence, demonstrates Lincoln's scientific cast of mind and deserves to be read in full:

> Niagara-Falls! By what mysterious power is it that millions and millions, are drawn from all parts of the world, to gaze upon Niagara Falls? There is no mystery about the thing itself. Every effect is just such as any intelligent man knowing the causes, would anticipate, without [seeing] it. If the water moving onward in a great river, reaches a point where there is a perpendicular jog, of a hundred feet in descent, in the bottom of the river,—it is plain the water will have a violent and continuous plunge at that point. It is also plain the water, thus plunging, will foam, and roar, and send up a mist, continuously, in which last, during sunshine, there will be perpetual rain-bows. The mere physical > of Niagara Falls is only this. Yet this is really a very small part of that world's wonder. It's power to excite reflection, and emotion, is it's great charm. The geologist will demonstrate that the plunge, or fall, was once at Lake Ontario, and has worn it's way back to it's present position; he will ascertain how fast it is wearing now, and so get a basis for determining how long it has been wearing back from Lake Ontario, and finally demonstrate by it that this world is at least fourteen thousand years old. A philosopher of a slightly different turn will say Niagara Falls is only the lip of the basin out of which pours all the surplus water which rains down on two or three hundred thousand square miles of the earth's surface. He will estim[ate with] approximate accuracy, that five hundred thousand [to]ns of water, falls with it's full weight, a distance of a hundred feet each minute—thus exerting a force equal to the lifting of the same weight, through the same space, in the same time. And then the further reflection comes that this vast amount of water, constantly pouring down, is supplied by an equal amount constantly lifted up, by the sun; and still he says, "If this much is lifted up, for this one space of two or three hundred thousand square miles, an equal amount must be lifted for every other equal space, and he is overwhelmed in the contemplation of the vast power the sun is constantly exerting in quiet, noiseless operation of lifting water up to be rained down again.

> But still there is more. It calls up the indefinite past. When Columbus first sought this continent—when Christ suffered on the cross—when Moses led Israel through the Red-Sea—nay, even, when Adam first came from the hand of his Maker—then as now, Niagara was roaring here. The eyes of that species of extinct giants, whose bones fill the mounds of America, have gazed on Niagara, as ours do now. Contemporary with the whole race of men, and older than the first man, Niagara is strong, and fresh to-day as ten thousand years ago. The Mammoth and Mastadon—now so long dead, that fragments of their monstrous bones, alone testify, that they ever lived, have gazed on Niagara. In that long—long time, never still for a single moment. Never dried, never froze, never slept, never rested, [sic].[41]

Later, in his lecture on "Inventions," Lincoln mentioned the traditional dating for creation of about six thousand years ago, but in this earlier piece, "the world is at least fourteen thousand years old" and Niagara "older than the first man." Lincoln connected this revised geological chronology with both scripture and paleontology, but what was Lincoln's source for that date?

For decades geologists had hoped the falls' rate of erosion might somehow serve as a giant clock to give the age of the Earth. One calculation in 1790 suggested the falls had been receding for 55,440 years.[42] In 1830, Lyell cited a recent article asserting that the falls had been excavating the ravine for "nearly 10,000 years," but he cautiously added that "the retrograde movement" probably varied greatly at different times.[43] Lyell visited the falls in 1841 accompanied by Hall, and their findings were separately published by Hall in 1843 and Lyell in 1845.[44] In 1842, “Mr. Hall, by Governor Seward’s direction, caused a trigonometric survey to be made of the fall,” though a few years would have to pass before any data would be able “to throw some true light upon this subject.”[45] Hall wrote in 1843 that the estimates of the age of the falls have “alarmed those who would consider [the Earth] still youthful in years,” yet added that “we may regard the problem as undecided with respect to time . . . [and] impossible to calculate accurately.”[46] Both Hall and Lyell noted the discovery near the falls of mastodon bones, mentioned in Lincoln’s fragment.[47] Lyell later abandoned (without explanation) his earlier estimate of the recession rate and suggested that “35,000 years would have been required for the retreat,” though he still stressed that there was no reason to “assume that the [rate of] retrograde movement had been uniform” over time.[48]

An 1851 souvenir guidebook to the falls avoids any reference to dating but includes a pious outburst: “What a scene for an atheist to look upon, and then deny the existence of an all powerful Creator! . . . Dwell on it, stranger . . . and acknowledge yourself an atom, a mere atom in nature, for that you are, and no more.”[49] That alone might have been enough to elicit Lincoln’s rationalist meditation. In 1857, the year Lincoln probably visited the falls, a new guidebook cited Lyell’s recession rate of “a foot every year” but avoided doing the sums.[50]

Even without guidebooks, Lincoln could have gained relevant information from his neighbor the state geologist Worthen, or from his friend McChesney, both of whom had previously worked for Hall or perhaps from his other geological friend Stevens, by then resident in New York. Lincoln might even have learned about Niagara from a Republican colleague with whom he had campaigned in the past, William H. Seward, Hall’s employer when governor of New York, later Lincoln’s main rival within the Republican Party, and, later still, his trusted Secretary of State.

The trigonometric points that Hall installed (at Seward’s behest) in 1842 have indeed demonstrated that the erosion rate is highly variable (which, ironically, has made Niagara Falls a favorite source of “evidence” for modern-day “creationists”!). Geologists have since worked out from other evidence that the Niagara River could not have begun flowing until the recession of the last ice age, about twelve thousand years ago. So, whatever source Lincoln found for his dating, it was a surprisingly good one.

Herndon enjoyed describing his conversation with Lincoln in 1858, just after Herndon’s first visit to Niagara Falls:

> The recollection of the gigantic and awe-inspiring scene stimulated my exuberant powers to the highest pitch. After well-nigh exhausting myself in the effort I turned to Lincoln for his opinion. “What,” I inquired, “made the deepest impression on you when you stood in the presence of the great natural > wonder?" I shall never forget his answer, because it in a very characteristic way illustrated how he looked at everything. "The thing that struck me most forcibly when I saw the Falls," he responded, "was, where in the world did all that water come from?"[51]

Occasionally deflating Herndon was one of Lincoln's simple pleasures, but Herndon might have been more impressed if he had known that Lincoln had already composed that fragment that mingled his rationalism (and serious consideration of where all that water came from) with a conventionally poetic awe. Herndon would have approved Lincoln's opinion that the falls were "Contemporary with the whole race of men" because it asserted mankind's unity as well as its antiquity. However, that inclusive view was increasingly coming under assault by science, and Lincoln, in addition to his own interest, was probably up-to-date with the scientific debate about race for the simple reason that Herndon was certain to be.

Scientific Racism

In 1845, after Darwin had included in the new edition of The Voyage of the Beagle a heart-felt cry against slavery, he set out on a month-long jaunt northward during which he read Alexander von Humboldt's latest work, volume 1 of Cosmos, which included this agreeable sentiment.

> While we maintain the unity of the human species, we at the same time repel the depressing assumption of superior and inferior races of men. There are nations more susceptible of cultivation, more highly civilized, more ennobled by mental cultivation than others, but none in themselves nobler than others. All are in like degree designed for freedom.[1]

"He is indeed a wonderful man," Darwin wrote of Humboldt in a letter to Charles Lyell, then on his second tour of America. Darwin also mentioned a recent visit to the Dean of Manchester, William Herbert, a considerable expert who "gave me much curious information" about hybrids. Darwin further entertained Lyell with a description of a visit with Charles Waterton, an eccentric Roman Catholic aristocrat but brilliant naturalist: "an amusing strange fellow; at our early dinner, our party consisted of two Catholic priests & two Mulattresses! He is past 60 years old & the day before run down & caught, a Leveret in a turnip field."[2]

Waterton had authored Wanderings in South America, the North-west of the United States, and the Antilles, rarely out of print since first published in 1825. This had an obvious appeal to Darwin, who also had another connection with Waterton. While in British Guyana, Waterton trained former slave John Edmonston in taxidermy, which Edmonston in turn taught Darwin when he was a medical student in Edinburgh.[3] Edmonston's former master had three daughters with his mulatto wife, and Waterton married one in 1829 when she was seventeen. Tragically, she died in childbirth the following year, but her infant boy survived to be raised by Waterton with the help of his sister and his wife's sisters—the "two Mulattresses" mentioned by Darwin.

Darwin no doubt remembered well Waterton's assertion published a few years earlier that "the man under Afric's burning zone, and he from the frozen regions of the North, have both come from the same stem. Their difference in colour and in feature may be traced to this: viz., that the first has had too much, and the second too little sun."[4] Waterton's family offered living evidence about "hybridity." In the same letter mentioning Waterton, Darwin told Lyell about an author who maintained he had never known two mulattoes to have offspring. "Can you obtain any comparative information on the crosses between Indian & Europæans & Negros & Europæans?" Darwin asked.[5] Based on Lyell's inquiries among American friends, Darwin later reported that mulatto families that intermarried for several generations "continued on an average as fertile as either pure whites or pure blacks."[6]

At that time, a belief in the unity of the human species was shared not only by Darwin, Waterton, and Humboldt but also by Humboldt's protégé Louis Agassiz, who wrote in 1845: "Here is revealed anew the superiority of the human genre and its greater independence in nature. Whereas the animals are distinct species in the different zoological provinces to which they appertain, man, despite the diversity of his races, constitutes one and the same species over all the surface of the globe." However, Agassiz soon abandoned this view.[7] Logically, it was inconsistent to suggest that God created different species of animals in all those "different zoological provinces" but not (according to traditional monogenist teaching) different species of man. Yet, logic probably had less to do with Agassiz's reversal than the fact that shortly after arriving in America to make a lecture tour, Agassiz underwent a bizarre conversion, not on the road to Damascus but in "the city of brotherly love," Philadelphia.

In December 1846, Agassiz wrote a long letter to his mother recounting his first two months' experiences in America. A portion of this letter was excluded when later published by Agassiz's widow but was restored in 1981 by Stephen Jay Gould, the brilliant Harvard paleontologist whose office was in a museum built by Agassiz:

> It was in Philadelphia that I first found myself in prolonged contact with Negroes; all the domestics in my hotel were men of color. I can scarcely express to you the painful impression that I received, especially since the feeling that they inspired in me is contrary to all our ideas about the confraternity of the human type (genre) and the unique origin of our species. But truth before all. Nevertheless, I experienced pity at the sight of this degraded and degenerate race, and their lot inspired compassion in me in thinking that they were really men. Nonetheless, it is impossible for me to repress the feeling that they are not of the same blood as us. In seeing their black faces with their thick lips and grimacing teeth, the wool on their head, their bent knees, their elongated hands, I could not take my eyes off their face in order to tell them to stay far away. And when they advanced that hideous hand towards my plate in order > to serve me, I wished I were able to depart in order to eat a piece of bread elsewhere, rather than dine with such service. What unhappiness for the white race—to have tied their existence so closely with that of Negroes in certain countries! God preserve us from such a contact.[8]

This experience helped Agassiz to resolve the earlier paradox—that all creatures seem to have been created in distinct and differing zones except (according to Genesis) humans—and it also suited his taxonomic approach, that of an extreme "splitter" continually "discovering" new species. According to Gould, Agassiz "once named three genera of fossil fishes from isolated teeth that a later paleontologist found in the variable dentition of a single individual."[9] But this change in his view of the species of man from "unity" to "plurality" (or from monogenism to polygenism) was immediately reinforced when Agassiz met Dr. Samuel G. Morton in Philadelphia and saw his "unique collection of human skulls," as Agassiz informed his mother. "Imagine a series of six hundred skulls, mostly Indian, of all the tribes who now inhabit or formerly inhabited America. Nothing like it exists elsewhere. This collection alone is worth a journey to America."[10]

Agassiz was delighted when Morton gave him "a copy of his great illustrated work" (presumably Crania Americana) in which measurements of cranial capacity were used to rank different races, with Caucasians having greatest capacity, Negroes the least, and Mongolians, Malays, and American Indians in between in descending order. Morton's measuring system has since been entirely discredited, but his data then suited Agassiz's new convictions. Because Agassiz's trip to America soon turned into permanent residence, and because, as Gould expresses it, "No man did more to establish and enhance the prestige of American biology during the nineteenth century," the fact that this scholar from Switzerland embraced polygenism partly explains why the latter came to be viewed as an "American" theory. The other reason is that many more American naturalists also adopted this view, especially southerners.[11]

Prior to his arrival in America, Agassiz had apparently never seen blacks or slavery. Darwin, in contrast, virtually inherited an abhorrence of slavery, enjoyed a positive relationship with the first black he encountered, John Edmonston, and was intrigued rather than disturbed by his contacts with other races during the Beagle voyage. Darwin's research was partly driven by his desire to demonstrate that blacks and whites belonged to the same human species.

Lincoln did not initially approach race from a scientific standpoint, but his experience of blacks and slavery went far more deeply. As a child in a slave state, a young man traveling by flatboat or steamboat, a lawyer handling cases involving slavery, and a guest on two slaveholding plantations in Kentucky (Joshua Speed's and Lincoln's in-laws'), Lincoln encountered the institution frequently. The 1840 census listed 115 African Americans living in Springfield, 4.5 percent of the town's population. Although Illinois outlawed slavery, six of those blacks were listed as "slaves," three of them owned by friends of Lincoln, including his later brother-in-law Ninian Edwards. Most of Springfield's blacks were free, although the census listed many as "indentured." Most free blacks worked in menial jobs, but some were self-employed, and Lincoln used one of Springfield's two black barbers. Before Lincoln left Springfield in 1861, at least twenty-one blacks were living within three blocks of Lincoln's home. "By twentieth century standards," one scholar writes, "the Lincolns lived in an integrated neighborhood."[12]

Lincoln later learned about scientific thinking on the subject of race, but his main interest in blacks was political, while men like Darwin and Agassiz endeavored, however unsuccessfully, to keep scientific objectivity above any personal interest. Agassiz had no desire to defend slavery or attack biblical authority, but his views made him see human species and races differently from the Genesis view of unity. Combining the patterns he saw in the geographical distribution of vast numbers of species with his notions of the massively destructive power of glaciers, Agassiz concluded that God's creation was more complex than the Hebrews who wrote the Bible could understand. An omnipotent God could cause more than one creation, and an inscrutable God had no need to explain why. Separate creations fit the evidence better than the Eden story, and Agassiz always said that science provided better testimony than scripture of "the plan of the Creator."[13]

Agassiz also concluded that a species moving outside the zone for which it was created (and that was created for it) might not prosper, and if it tried to breed with another species that, however similar, had been created separately in a different zone, the offspring might be weakened or even infertile. Abandoning Le Comte de Buffon's classic concept of "specific infertility" as the defining criteria for species, Agassiz decided that some interbreeding could occur without proving that two creatures are truly of the same species but that such interbreeding was essentially unnatural, against God's plan, and resulting in offspring so degraded that their survival as a hybrid would be short lived. These conclusions, Agassiz believed, reenforced the immutability of "real" species, now defined by their "primordial origins" in different locations. In short, by adopting multiple creations and a limited kind of interbreeding between species, Agassiz felt he had strengthened the arguments against transmutation.

Darwin was moving in the opposite direction. Creation, whether occurring in one place and time or several, was replaced with natural selection, a multitude of small, unplanned adaptations in millions of species over great swathes of time. This, of course, jettisoned the immutability of species, yet Buffon's specific infertility was as awkward for Darwin as it was for Agassiz, for opposite reasons. Agassiz had to depict hybridization as possible but ultimately impermanent. For Darwin, hybridization was not only possible but necessary to preserve and spread modifications (or variations) throughout a species. Darwin upheld specific infertility because his theory insisted that different races of men could all interbreed successfully since they were all actually of the same human species, but they were also variants, splitting from the same tree, identifiable but also potentially liable to further change. Whatever caused earlier "splittings" could cause later ones, and some variants might prove for social rather than biological reasons more successful in the struggle for survival than others. While Agassiz and others praised Morton's cranial research, Darwin found Morton's work "too credulous" when citing other researchers' evidence on hybridity. Darwin noted "a want of exactness in the manner Morton gives the facts." Morton was not "a safe man to quote from."[14]

As his barnacle project expanded, Darwin sought barnacles from Dr. Augustus A. Gould, a Boston physician, author of a major work on Mollusca in 1841, and recently coauthor of The Principles of Zoology with Louis Agassiz. Darwin had not applied to Agassiz, but Gould communicated some information to Agassiz that caused him to send additional barnacles for Darwin's study. About seven weeks after writing to Gould, Darwin sent to Agassiz a reply to a letter that has not survived. After first thanking Agassiz for the barnacles he and Gould were sending, Darwin said, "In your letter . . . you say you should like to hear what results I have arrived at; as far as the limits of a letter go, it will give me real pleasure to do so."[15]

After telling how Agassiz himself had inspired this barnacle research, Darwin summarized his findings but politely requested that Agassiz "not mention my present results" partly because they were tentative and "partly because I should like to have the satisfaction of publishing myself." Along with the suggestion that Agassiz might in some sense steal his material, a slight barb is also in Darwin's remark that he had made out the homologies of the barnacles "with certainty from dissection & not from analogies." After describing a plethora of variations in barnacle reproductive systems, Darwin suggested, "You will laugh at this account, but I assure you I would not presume to tell you anything, of which I was not sure, from repeated examinations of specimens taken at different periods & from different countries." Darwin subtly indicated that he had found far more variation among barnacles than any theory based on separate creations or limited geographical distribution could account for. Darwin postscripted: "I do not suppose I shall finish my Monograph for two or three years—my health allows me to work very little." This prediction—slightly more realistic than earlier ones—signaled Agassiz to await Darwin's publication before using his material in any public lectures.[16]

Nearly two years passed before Darwin wrote to Agassiz again, in June 1850, to thank him for the gift of his book Lake Superior, an account of Agassiz's first natural science "expedition" in the tradition of Waterton, Humboldt, and, indeed, Darwin. The book was filled with data that interested Darwin and theories he disliked about "the direct intervention of a Supreme Intelligence in the plan of Creation." Agassiz believed that except when otherwise transported by men, "animals must have originated where they live, and have remained precisely within the same limits since they were created. . . . [T]he order which prevails through creation is intentional."[17]

Darwin wrote a gracious note of thanks for "your most kind present of Lake Superior: I had heard of it, & had much wished to read it, but I confess that it was the very great honour of having in my possession a work with your autograph, as a presentation copy, that has given me such lively & sincere pleasure. I cordially thank you for it. I have begun to read it with uncommon interest, which I see will increase as I go on."[18] Although a biographer of Agassiz has quoted these lines to indicate Darwin's admiration, "uncommon interest" is not critical acclaim, and this letter must be set against one Darwin sent a week earlier to Lyell: "Agassiz has sent me his Lake Superior Book,—is not that an immense Honour!"[19] That this was meant to be ironic becomes evident from later statements by Darwin and his closest associates.

Darwin waited two months to read Lake Superior and then scored and annotated the text, pasting four pages of notes in the back of the volume.[20] Darwin's letter had also thanked Agassiz again for the barnacles "you & Dr. Gould were so good as to send me" but then commented that while one species appeared to be exclusive to America and another exclusive to Europe, the other three were found in both—contradicting Agassiz's thinking on geographical distribution. Darwin provided brief descriptions, "though I do not know whether you will care to hear about them." Darwin also said he had not yet examined the two specimens that "you sent me from Charlestown."[21] Darwin meant Charleston, South Carolina, where Agassiz had four months earlier addressed the American Association for the Advancement of Science (AAAS). Darwin had undoubtedly heard from Lyell about Agassiz's success as a popular lecturer in Boston and New York and during his first visit to South Carolina in 1847. These earlier lectures, reported in newspapers and later issued as a pamphlet, continued to develop the polygenist view of the races of man that Agassiz had adopted after his experiences in Philadelphia.[22] Although many northerners were reluctant to accept a view clashing with Genesis's account of a single creation and single family of man, many southerners welcomed the change. As Darwin suggested in a letter, "I wonder whether the queries [in recent publications] . . . about the specific distinctions of the races of man are a reflexion from Agassiz's Lectures in the U.S. in which he has been maintaining the doctrine of several species,—much, I daresay, to the comfort of the slave-holding Southerns."[23]

At the 1850 AAAS meeting in slaveholding Charleston, Agassiz for the first time presented to a scientific assembly his developed opinion that "viewed zoologically, the several races of men were well marked and distinct." Their geographical distribution indicated that "these races did not originate from a common centre, nor from a single pair," so the differences were both primordial and permanent.[24] Most of Agassiz's audience were familiar with Morton's work since Dr. Josiah Nott of Mobile, Alabama, who delivered a paper immediately before Agassiz, had been promoting Morton's polygenist view even before Agassiz adopted it. A scion of a prominent South Carolina family, Nott had earned his medical degree in Philadelphia, where he became familiar with Morton's work, and by 1843, Nott was publishing in books and learned journals his polygenist views on the demonstrable inferiority of negroes.[25] Nott was thrilled to have this European-trained Harvard professor on their side and told Morton, "With Agassiz in the war the battle is ours. This was an immense accession for we shall not only have his name, but the timid will come out from their hiding places."[26]

Because polygenists like Nott rejected the Genesis story of a single creation, many saw themselves as modern Galileos suffering persecution. These included George Robins Gliddon, a bumptious and unscholarly Egyptologist, and E. G. Squier, a more serious student of the antiquity of American Indians.[27] Both rejected the traditional dating of creation to 4004 B.C. as far too recent, and both supplied Morton with skulls that, based on Morton's dubious measurements, allowed them to agree that from the dawn of human history, the different races of men had remained unchanged and unchangeable. Although Agassiz had adopted similar views, by Nott's standard Agassiz was "timid" because he not only maintained that his observations of nature simply revealed "the plan of the Creator" but had also bothered to publish an article in the Christian Examiner, Boston's widely read Unitarian organ, to demonstrate that multiple creation did not contradict but merely supplemented the Genesis account.[28] This article was part of a publishing phenomenon, as this one scientific issue about the unity or plurality of man spilled out of the learned journals and received wider coverage exactly because of its religious and political implications.

While Morton and Nott had been publishing scholarly tomes or in serious journals (which even brought Nott to the attention of the visiting Lyell), Nott began spreading the polygenist gospel more widely through popular southern journals such as De Bow's Review.[29] Also, Nott's books were widely reviewed in both Whig and Democratic journals.[30] In one such journal, Squier published a long article, "American Ethnology," which includes a reference to Morton's view that "Negroes were numerous in Egypt, but their social position in ancient times was the same that it now is, that of servants and slaves."[31]

However, a major advocate of the "unity of man," Dr. John Bachman, opposed Nott and Agassiz. A native of New York who had moved to South Carolina for his health thirty-five years earlier, Bachman became a devoted southerner (and later a fervent secessionist), but he was also a Lutheran minister and an outstanding naturalist who considered polygenism both heretical and scientifically unsound. Darwin had met him in London twelve years earlier, when Darwin admiringly copied into his notebooks various ideas gained from the American. Bachman now published his views in the most respected scientific publication in the south, the Charleston Medical Journal and Review. Bachman attacked Morton's assertions on grounds partly religious but mainly based on his own expertise regarding geographical distribution of animals and issues of hybridity. Bachman and Morton began a lively exchange in the pages of the journal that lasted for months.[32]

Bachman's book The Doctrine of the Unity of the Human Race Examined on the Principles of Science appeared shortly after the Charleston meeting. It received a brief notice in the American Journal of Science and a long and negative review by Nott in De Bow's Review.[33] Various reviews in 1850 mentioned Charles Pickering's Races of Man; and Their Geographical Distribution, first printed in 1848 as one of a projected twenty-four volumes of reports of the U.S. Exploring Expedition that had sailed the Pacific Ocean in 1838–42 under the command of Charles Wilkes, USN. This American version of the Beagle voyage was funded by Congress, which, unfortunately, also supervised the publication of its specialist reports, five of which were never completed (including two volumes on ichthyology farmed out to Agassiz). The congressional committee controlling the project authorized print-runs of a mere one hundred or two hundred copies, and the committee chairman, Senator Benjamin Tappan of Ohio—brother of two of America's staunchest antislavery activists, Arthur Tappan and Lewis Tappan—particularly disapproved of an early draft of Pickering's anthropological report.[34] Wilkes had to arrange that "the parts of his paper on the races of man that you criticized and objected to" were altered so that "you could have no possible objection to its publication, now."[35]

During the voyage, Pickering wrote to his close associate Dr. Morton that although formerly believing there were only five races of men, he had now seen eight and expected to see more. If others wished to believe all the races belonged to one species, he was "content to let them have their way," but Pickering believed that the various races had "different origins, or, were originally placed in different countries," which was also Morton's view. Now, to gain Tappan's imprimatur, Pickering watered down his language, creating what one reader called "the oddest collection of fragments that was ever seen . . . amorphous as a fog, unstratified as a pudding, and heterogeneous as a low priced sausage."[36] The first commercial edition of Pickering's Races of Man was produced in 1850 in London by an editor who actually thought Pickering was arguing for the unity of the human species![37] A better-informed reviewer who compared Pickering's Races of Man not only with Bachman's recent Doctrine of Unity of the Human Race but also with a second journal article that Agassiz had published in the Christian Examiner regretted Pickering's "guarded style of expression," praised Bachman's "thoroughness of investigation . . . and triumphant establishment of [his] conclusions," and criticized "both the nature of . . . and the manner in which Prof. Agassiz has presented [his views] to the public. . . . We do not perceive that any new law has been established, or any new principle developed."[38]

Agassiz's first article in the Christian Examiner had sought to counter charges of irreligion, and the second denied subsequent charges of serving the interests of slave owners. But after disclaiming "any question involving political matters," he later asserted that it was "mock-philanthropy" to assume all races have the same abilities and that "human affairs with reference to the colored races" would be better if we understood "the real difference" rather than "treating them on terms of equality."[39] A third article in the Christian Examiner reduced all the issues to a single stark choice: either one accepts the evidence of geographical distribution and the "primordial" differences between human races as reflecting a divine plan or one accepts a single "Garden of Eden" creation but must then account for subsequent distributions and well-known variations by appealing to some natural law that allows for "development" (or transmutation) of species. He commented, "Recognition in the animal creation of specific [divine] thoughts excludes . . . the idea of a natural development from law, and acknowledges a personal, intelligent God."[40]

Agassiz's rejection of all "development" theories espoused by Lamarck, Erasmus Darwin, and "Mr. Vestiges" (and lurking in Charles Darwin's private sketches and notebooks) crystallized the issue. "I must confess," Lyell later wrote, "that Agassiz . . . drove me far over into Darwin's camp . . . for when he attributed the original of every race of man to an independent starting point . . . the miracles really became to me so much in the way of S. Antonio of Padua."[41]

Yet, the market for polygenism was strong. Nott had earlier assured Squier, "All the . . . articles I have written on niggerology have been eagerly sought for at the South, and in the present excited state of the political world, I think the thing will go well."[42] The excitement in the "political world," which had been building up before Lincoln left Washington in 1849, nearly broke up the United States in 1850. The territories acquired through the Mexican-American war raised the question of whether slavery might expand into these regions. The Wilmot Proviso, which Lincoln supported, had sought to prevent this extension of slavery but was stopped by southern opposition in the Senate. However, after the Gold Rush made it imperative to admit California into the union, the issue boiled over as Californians expressed their desire to enter as a free state. Southerners would not accept this without concessions on several other slavery-related issues, and during the protracted negotiations, there were serious calls in the south for secession if denied the right to extend slavery. Henry Clay came out of retirement, returned to the Senate, and in January 1850 proposed a series of compromises. Congress debated furiously but could not pass the "omnibus bill," and it was only in September that the compromise bills were finally steered one by one through Congress by the chairman of the committee on territories, Stephen A. Douglas.

Lincoln played down Douglas's role in the passage of the Compromise of 1850 and had already advised the Whig who was supposed to take his place in Congress to oppose any extension of slavery but not if secession proved a genuine threat, for "of all political objects the preservation of the Union stands number one."[43] There was much for Lincoln to dislike in the compromise's appeasement of the south. The problem of slavery in Washington, D.C., itself, on which Lincoln had labored in vain, was lamely "settled" by abolishing the slave trade there but not slavery itself. The new Fugitive Slave Act was a travesty, and, worst of all, the territories of New Mexico and Utah were opened to the possibility of slavery on the basis of popular sovereignty, whereby the citizens of a given territory rather than Congress could decide for or against slavery. The greatest champion of this policy was now Douglas. Lincoln, from his law office in Springfield, uttered no protest, but when eighty-three prominent Illinois Whigs and Democrats signed a call for a meeting of citizens to endorse the proposed compromise, Lincoln's and Herndon's names were not among them.[44]

Although numerous other countries far less democratic than the United States had recently abolished slavery, it might now continue indefinitely in America, nourished simultaneously by the compromise and the southern slave owners' newfound justification provided by the theory of separate creations. Despite raising some orthodox hackles, Louis Agassiz himself had cobbled together a compromise between the religious and scientific worldview. Slave owners had always found divine support in scripture, and now they could read "the plan of the Creator" in nature. As polygenism spread through the popular press, millions of Americans who were not slave owners also felt inclined to accept a scientific view that so conveniently reconciled their religious notions and racial prejudices. Darwin felt he had a better explanation for racial diversity that did not involve God; and Lincoln, in a later lecture, blamed man, not God, for "the invention of negroes."

Having read widely and also drawing on Herndon's even wider reading, Lincoln was more aware of these scientific debates than most Americans. In the 1850s, the strongly antislavery Herndon expanded his library with publications about slavery and quite a few on race.

> I was in correspondence with Sumner, Greeley, Phillips, and Garrison, and was thus thoroughly imbued with all the rancor drawn from such strong anti-slavery sources. . . . Every time a good speech on the great issue was made I sent for it. . . . Lincoln and I took such papers as the Chicago Tribune, New York Tribune, Anti-Slavery Standard, Emancipator and National Era. On the other side of the question we took the Charleston Mercury and the Richmond Enquirer. . . . I purchased all the leading histories of the slavery movement, and other works which treated on that subject.[45]

Herndon owned at least two books by Agassiz, both collections of popular lectures dating to the period after Lincoln had moved to the White House. But "Herndon's Auction List" also included Hugh Miller's Footprints of the Creator, first published in Britain in 1849 and strongly attacking the "development" theory as popularized in The Vestiges. Herndon probably owned the 1850 American edition that included a twenty-six-page "memoir" of Miller written by Agassiz, who proudly took credit for bringing this "successful combination of Christian doctrines with pure scientific truths" to the American public.[46]

The scientific debate waned somewhat after the Compromise of 1850 dampened political flames, and Morton's death in May 1851 ended his joust with Bachman in the Charleston Medical Journal. A hiatus occurred as the rumor that Agassiz was writing a book about special creation proved false, and Nott, assisted by George Gliddon, was for three years busy producing a book-length treatment of polygenism based on Morton's notes.

Herndon bought a book published late in 1854 by George Fitzhugh and entitled Sociology for the South; or, the Failure of Free Society. According to Herndon, the book "defended and justified slavery in every conceivable way" and also "aroused the ire of Lincoln more than most pro-slavery books."[47] Fitzhugh, a Virginian lawyer and social theorist, demonstrated a perverse shift in slave-owning culture that no longer saw "the peculiar institution" as an embarrassment, or expected it gradually to extinguish itself, or sought merely to protect slave states from outside interference but instead hoped to expand a system that it proudly defended. According to Fitzhugh, the negro "is but a grown up child, and must be governed as a child, not as a lunatic or criminal. The master occupies towards him the place of parent or guardian." He based his conclusions on "the course of nature, the lessons of history, [and] the voice of experience."[48]

Although Fitzhugh later converted to "scientific racism," in Sociology for the South he rejected the polygenism that enthralled so many fellow southerners, "first, because it is at war with scripture, which teaches us that the whole human race is descended from a common parentage; and, second, because it encourages and incites brutal masters to treat negroes, not as weak, ignorant and dependent brethren, but as wicked beasts, without the pale of humanity." In 1854, Fitzhugh was still content to defend slavery as being part of the "higher law" of God, who did not make blacks as "brutes" but as "weak" men and "instituted slavery from the first, as he instituted marriage."[49] He specifically disparaged "the doctrine of the 'Types of Mankind,'" which was actually the title of an influential 738-page polygenist volume that had appeared earlier in 1854. Nearly a thousand people subscribed to the first edition, and nine more editions appeared before 1871.[50] Darwin, who disliked it even more than Fitzhugh did, though for different reasons, owned and cited the work, usually with distrust.[51] It does not appear in "Herndon's Auction List," and whether Lincoln ever read the work or merely read about it, he would have shared Darwin's distaste. The Types of Mankind was the work Nott and Gliddon had been preparing for the last three years, using notes of the late Dr. Morton, to whom they dedicated the volume. They also enhanced their work by including a prefatory essay written by Harvard professor Louis Agassiz.[52]

The Types of Mankind and the Kansas-Nebraska Act, 1854–55

In the autumn of 1850, Charles Darwin, who earlier had thanked heaven he would never have to visit another slave country, wrote to his cousin that he sometimes speculated about emigrating, perhaps to Australia, "or what I fancy most, the middle States of N. America."[1] Darwin never left the British Isles again, but while he fantasized about moving to the American midwest, it appears that a resident of that area, Billy Herndon, was intellectually escaping in the opposite direction. Beginning in the early 1850s, Herndon expanded the law office's library with not only works on slavery but also a surprising number of British publications: collections of essays from the London Times and from the universities of Oxford, Cambridge, and Edinburgh and odd volumes of Blackwood's, North British Review, Edinburgh Review, Chambers' Journal of Popular Literature, Arts and Sciences, Chambers' Papers for the People, and Chambers' Repository (the last three coedited by Robert Chambers, anonymous author of Vestiges).[2]

Herndon also obtained forty-nine issues of the Westminster Review, from 1851 to 1868, which was edited during some of these years by the brilliant Marian Evans, later known as George Eliot. Before taking control of the Westminster Review, Eliot had translated David Friedrich Strauss's Life of Christ and Ludwig Feuerbach's Essence of Christianity, both possessed by Herndon. According to Eliot's 1851 prospectus, the Westminster Review stood for the "law of progress," maintaining "that the institutions of man, no less than the products of nature, are strong and durable in proportion as they are the results of gradual development."[3] Thomas Huxley became the journal's science reviewer in the early 1850s, though not at that time sharing Eliot's devotion to "development": he upset her by writing (in another journal) a scathing review of Vestiges's latest edition.[4]

Darwin met Huxley in 1851, finding the young man as brilliant as he was acerbic. Although later becoming the greatest champion of Darwin's natural selection, Huxley's admiration for Darwin was already clear in 1854, when he wrote a brief notice (which Herndon might have read in Springfield): "Mr. Darwin's present work shows him to be as able an observer of nature on the small as on the large scale. It deals with the anatomy and metamorphoses of certain crustaceans, those well-known barnacles, in all their varieties."[5] After eight years' labor, Darwin had finally completed his study. Darwin considered using the material as a vehicle for introducing his theory of natural selection but decided the barnacles deserved their own place among specialist studies while his theory required broader comparative data.

The eight years of struggling to classify these amazingly variable barnacles had not only reenforced Darwin's conviction that natural selection was correct but also gained Darwin valuable contacts with naturalists worldwide, many struggling with classification problems in their own fields. As Huxley had noted, Darwin had proved his ability to specialize as well as theorize and was thrilled that the Royal Society cited his recent work when awarding him the Royal Medal for Natural Science in 1853. Darwin's closest colleague, Joseph Dalton Hooker, who was on the award committee, indicated the magnitude of the victory by pointing out, "I neither proposed you, nor seconded you, nor voted for you."[6]

Darwin was now better positioned to bring his theory before a world better prepared to receive it. The thousands of new specimens discovered by recent British and American expeditions kept an increasingly professional body of naturalists busily "lumping" or "splitting" each other's particular varieties and species. And in the background, surviving continued insult and slowly gaining ground, was the development concept. The Lamarckian view simply would not die, and Vestiges, still selling widely ten years and ten editions since its first appearance, continued to spread the gospel, as did Herbert Spencer's work and the whole tone of the "Westminster set." Darwin knew it would take time to pull together his notes and work out the scheme for presenting the evidence as convincingly as possible: building half a bridge would not get him to his destination.

As Darwin finished up his barnacle work, Louis Agassiz was not far from his thoughts. When Charles Lyell passed on a copy of Agassiz's Lake Superior, Darwin reminded Lyell (with a dose of irony) that "the great man honoured me with a copy" earlier.[7] Darwin's view of Agassiz was probably echoed in what Hooker, Britain's greatest botanist, wrote to his American counterpart Asa Gray of Harvard at the beginning of 1854: "I have long been aware of Agassiz's heresies. His opinions are too extreme for respect and hence are mere prejudices. They are further contradicted by facts. Lyell and I have talked him over by the hour."[8]

Lyell, Hooker, and Darwin often shared their correspondence, and Hooker began showing Darwin some of his letters from Gray, starting with Gray's response to Hooker's condemnation of Agassiz. Darwin had once met the American when he was touring England in 1839, and now he thanked Hooker for passing along Gray's letter, adding, "how very pleasantly he writes."[9] One thing Gray so pleasantly describes is his decreasing respect for Agassiz. "It often does more harm than good" to combat Agassiz's views in public. "I confine myself to trying to show him that his own data do not at all necessitate the conclusions he sometimes draws from them."[10] Darwin, tongue firmly in cheek, commented to Hooker:

> I cannot quite understand why you & [Gray] think so strongly that it "does more harm than good to combat [Agassiz's] views." It is delightful to hear all that he says on Agassiz: How very singular it is that so eminently clever a man, with such immense knowledge on many branches of Natural History, should write such wonderful stuff & bosh as he does. Lyell told me that he was so delighted with one of his [Agassiz's] lectures on [i.e. against] progressive development &c &c, that he went to him afterwards & told him "it was so delightful, that he could not help all the time wishing it was true." I seldom see a Zoological paper from N. America, without observing the impress of Agassiz's doctrines,—another proof, by the way, of how great a man he is.

Huxley, in his recent review savaging Vestiges, called Agassiz "the great investigator . . . whose lively fancy has done at least as much harm to natural science as his genius has assisted its progress." Darwin praised the review but thought Huxley had been "rather hard on the poor author" of Vestiges: "But I am perhaps no fair judge for I am almost as unorthodox about species as Vestiges itself, though I hope not quite so unphilosophical." On Agassiz, Darwin added, "I am rather sorry you do not think more of Agassiz's embryological stages, for though I saw how excessively weak the evidence was, I was led to hope in its truth."[11] Agassiz's notion that the fossil sequence of the paleontological record somehow reflected the stages in the embryological development of the four main branches of the animal kingdom appealed to Darwin and had no direct relation to multiple creations.

After telling Hooker how Huxley had made "mincemeat with Agassiz's embryonic fish," Darwin mentioned that he would "begin to look over my old notes on species" as soon as he had finished sending "ten-thousand Barnacles" back to their donors. When Darwin returned specimens to Augustus Gould in Boston with effusive thanks, he asked Gould to forgive him for "sending in the same box the specimens which Prof. Agassiz was so kind as to send me, & a copy of my work for him.—When you next see Prof. Agassiz, will you be so good as to give him my cordial thanks & my kind & respectful remembrances."[12] So, only indirect thanks from the normally punctilious Darwin: there is no evidence of further communication between the two until 1858.

Darwin had been a collector, explorer, observer, describer, and dissectionist, and, at all times, a theorist, but now he became a serious experimenter and continued so for the rest of his life. His first experiments, begun in April 1855, concerned whether seeds might have been transported long distances without losing their ability to germinate.[13] The question—whether identical species could have arisen in separate continents without separate creation or transportation by humans—had interested Darwin since at least 1837.[14] Although Hooker dismissed Darwin's notion in both letters and published work, Darwin never yielded to Hooker's authority. In April 1855, Darwin informed Hooker, "I have begun my seed-salting experiments," which involved Darwin's entire family looking after dozens of jars filled with artificial seawater and various seeds.[15]

Darwin gloated over the successful results. "You are a good man," he told Hooker, "to confess that you expected the crop would be killed in a week, for this gives me a nice little triumph. The children at first were tremendously eager & asked me often 'whether I should beat Dr Hooker?'!!" Darwin removed the sting by adding: "If you knew some of the experiments (if they may be so called) which I am trying, you would have a good right to sneer for they are so absurd even in my opinion that I dare not tell you."[16] Hooker himself obtained some seeds washed up on the Azores Islands, planted them at Kew, and had the "unutterable mortification" of seeing them germinate. Darwin enjoyed Hooker's mock humiliation but stressed the real point: "It is the funniest thing in the world that you do not rejoice; for you have (& I never have) put in print that you do not believe in multiple creation, & therefore you surely should rejoice at every conceivable means of dispersal."[17]

The connection between these experiments and Agassiz's multiple creations is evident in a report Darwin submitted to the Gardeners Chronicle: "As such experiments might naturally appear childish to many, I may be permitted to premise that they have a direct bearing on a very interesting problem, which has lately, especially in America, attracted much attention, namely, whether the same organic being has been created at one point or on several on the face of our globe" (emphasis added).[18] Darwin posted a copy of that report to his new correspondent Asa Gray, whose response was the first letter in the Darwin-Gray correspondence to mention Agassiz. "I am most glad to be in conference with Hooker & yourself, on these matters, and I think we may, or rather you may, in a few years settle the question as to whether Agassiz's—or Hooker's views are correct: they are certainly widely different." Thanking Darwin for the paper on "your experiments on seeds exposed to sea-water," Gray said he would have it reprinted in the American Journal of Science "as a nut for Agassiz to crack."[19] Along with occasional references to Agassiz, the correspondence was for the moment filled with Darwin's questions about geographical distribution of plants, suggestions of future lines of research, and Gray's generous offers of further assistance.

When writing about Agassiz and nuts, Gray had presumably already read Agassiz's prefatory sketch in Joseph C. Nott and George R. Gliddon's Types of Mankind, which had been published over a year earlier. Gray and Darwin had still not mentioned the book in their correspondence, and Darwin had yet to read it. Certainly, he could guess its contents after reading various reviews, including one in the Westminster Review in July 1854. "Grant that the Negro is a distinct species," Huxley summed up ironically, "or even a metamorphosed orang, if you will, and what difference does it make to the social effect of [slavery]? [It] is an evil to society—because it degrades the man who practices it and increases the proclivity to crimes injurious to society in himself and others. And we are bound to put down the slaveholders for precisely [this] reason. . . . Ethnology had better perish as a science than be swamped by the accession to her ranks of the Legrees of the South."[20] Huxley knew Uncle Tom's Cabin but did not adore it as Emma and Charles Darwin did. Darwin probably tolerated Huxley's flippancy about blacks because Huxley's antislavery position was as solid as his dislike of multiple creationists.

Despite or because of Huxley's review, seventeen months passed before Darwin read Types of Mankind in December 1855, but he could have read Agassiz's preface when it was reprinted in October 1854 in a journal Darwin often read.[21] That he did so is suggested by his comment in November 1855, after thanking Lyell for passing along two pamphlets by John Bachman, probably those based on Bachman's four separate reviews of Types of Mankind—two of which were scathing about Agassiz's preface. "It is most useful to see what is said on all sides," Darwin told Lyell, "though I am surprised, from what I remember of Bachman, that he did not do the thing better, & that he deals in assertions, which I do not believe he can substantiate by a single fact."[22] A month later, Darwin himself finally read the Types of Mankind. Whether he had previously seen Agassiz's "Sketch" or not, Darwin now reacted with an outburst of negative marginal notes: "How false," "What forced reasoning!" "Primordial begs the question," and "Look at same race [native Americans] in United States & S. America." On a sheet of notes pinned to the last page, Darwin expressed in a nutshell how his view of human racial groupings differed from that of Agassiz, Nott, and Gliddon: "As mere naturalist, excepting from blending of races to certain extent, independently of crossing, I sh[oul]d look at races of man as deserving to be called distinct species, yet I consider as descended from common stock, so come back at common belief." Darwin's original emphasis points out that two factors—variations (or gradations) within racial groups and cross-breeding between them—already weaken the authors' view that human races are distinct species; but Darwin's new theory of descent from "common stock" actually aligns him somewhat with the earlier "common belief" (descent from Adam and Eve). The note continues, "only difference is name whether to be called species or variations."[23] For Darwin, there are in a sense no species, only degrees of variation, and the variation between human races is small—how small is what he would continue to research and then discuss in his two later books on man. In On the Origin of Species, Darwin would say only that his theory of natural selection as applied to animals might someday "throw light" on the origin of human beings. Ironically, Agassiz felt his theory of multiple creations did the same thing, as he stated in his preface for Types of Mankind:

> [T]he geographical distribution of all the organized beings now existing upon the earth . . . cannot fail to throw light, at some future time, upon the very origin of the differences existing among men, since it shows that man's physical nature is modified by the same laws as that of animals, and that any general results obtained from the animal kingdom regarding the organic differences of its various types must also apply to man.[24]

Perhaps Darwin remembered Agassiz's supposed throwing of "light" when he used the same phrase four years later. But it was not a case of imitation being the highest form of flattery, for what Darwin felt was contempt. At the bottom of the last page of the preface, Darwin scribbled: "Oh proh pudor Agassiz!" (Oh for shame!)[25]

There is no evidence that Lincoln or Herndon ever read Types of Mankind, but they probably read Huxley's review in the law office's copy of the Westminster Review or other reviews such as those in Putnam's Monthly Magazine, a Whig organ (soon to become Republican). Notices in southern journals were often summarized in the Charleston Mercury and the Richmond Enquirer, which the two lawyers also received.[26] Although Lincoln would not disagree with Types's antiscriptural position, these reviews showed that religious sentiment could help to limit the general acceptance of the polygenist view of human races. Lincoln could also see that when natural science veered into social science, problems arose. This was not Euclid, the proofs were not demonstrable, and the biology behind Dr. Samuel G. Morton's craniometry and Agassiz's multiple zones of creation, while impressing many, did not convince all serious reviewers. When even more controversial evidence was dragged in from philology, ethnology, and Egyptian archaeology, those eager to be convinced perceived concurrence, while others simply saw accumulations of logical flaws. Agassiz's contribution to Types raised some reviewers' estimation of multiple creation but tarnished others' opinions of Agassiz.

Convincing or not, the ideas promoted in Types of Mankind arose precisely when the debate about slavery in America was taking a new turn. In the past, whatever the difficulties in abolishing slavery where it existed, the actual expansion of slavery territorially was difficult for southerners to advocate because slavery was generally held to be "wrong"—morally, politically, or economically. But the ethical view usually relied on the notion that blacks were fellow human beings—a notion now under attack intellectually by those promoting separate creations and politically by those advocating separate decision making—that is, "pop. sov."

Lincoln could see that this new polygenist view was dangerous but also vulnerable to an attack—which Lincoln was about to launch for an entirely separate reason. However, Lincoln knew enough science to recognize his own limitations and, more important, those of his audience: rather than employing directly the terminology of geographical distribution or hybridity, one might better attack these new doctrines by appealing to religious sentiments and emphasizing the new doctrine's antitraditional and counterintuitive nature. This Lincoln would do by reminding his listeners of their trust in the Bible, in the Declaration of Independence, and in their own sense of rightness: not a very scientific approach yet ultimately grounded in the real world as a practical formula for political success.

The year 1854 was not so much a turning point for Lincoln or Darwin as simply the year each got back on track. Having finally completed his barnacle work, Darwin was perhaps partly spurred on by the rise of scientific racism, which may also have had some influence on Lincoln's thought and action.[27] But what energized Lincoln primarily was the passage of the Kansas-Nebraska Act in May 1854.

Senator Stephen A. Douglas's prime intention in introducing this bill was to improve his chances of winning the Democratic Party's presidential nomination. His strategy was to please the railroad interests in Illinois by promoting the "northern route" for the projected transcontinental railroad between the Pacific Ocean and Chicago without displeasing the southern wing of the party who preferred New Orleans as the eastern terminus. Ostensibly, Douglas's more noble purpose, as chairman of the Senate committee on territories, was to facilitate the country's development through the swift admission to statehood of the remaining territories in the northern half of the Louisiana Purchase.

Because the Missouri Compromise had prohibited slavery in those territories, southerners were likely to delay future admissions. Douglas thought he could break the logjam by applying popular sovereignty so local citizens rather than Congress could wrangle about whether to permit slavery in their new state constitutions. But southerners would support Douglas only if the compromise's prohibition was formally repealed. Douglas predicted correctly that this more radical step would cause a "hell of a storm" but thought he could ride it out, earning southern support by doing so.[28] The bill was introduced on 4 January 1854 and after bitter debate became law on 30 May.

The Kansas-Nebraska Act altered Lincoln's life, but the question is whether it simply created a vital political opportunity or actually angered Lincoln so much that he felt compelled to speak out against slavery in a new way. When Lincoln said in October 1854 that Douglas "should remember that he took us by surprise. . . . We were thunderstruck and stunned; and we reeled and fell in utter confusion," he was making a rhetorical point about unprepared forces swiftly rallying to oppose the act.[29] His later campaign biographies depict him as a man unexpectedly drawn into the fight, not a politician exploiting an opportunity: "I was losing interest in politics, when the repeal of the Missouri Compromise aroused me again"; "In 1854, his [legal] profession had almost superseded the thought of politics in his mind, when the repeal of the Missouri compromise aroused him as he had never been before."[30]

Lincoln's law partner and biographer, Herndon, echoed these professions of unexpected transformation but also recognized the political opportunism.

> Now, however, a live issue was presented to him. No one realized this sooner than he. . . . That man who thinks Lincoln calmly sat down and gathered his robes about him, waiting for the people to call him, has a very erroneous knowledge of Lincoln. He was always calculating, and always planning ahead. His ambition was a little engine that knew no rest.[31]

Historian William Lee Miller's analysis of Lincoln's actions in 1854 allows for political opportunism but repeatedly emphasizes that Lincoln "rose to the occasion" morally by beginning—and for the next six years continuing—to make with exceptional clarity the case that slavery was evil.[32] Although Miller accepts that Lincoln had always opposed slavery, he stresses that in 1854, Lincoln "dropped all the old Whig topics" and "concentrated only on slavery" by "stepping forward by his own initiative to join the great argument about his country's future."[33]

There are two problems with Miller's analysis. First, Lincoln "dropped all the old Whig topics," including those (according to Miller) "on which the Democrats were vulnerable," exactly because Lincoln was encouraging some Democrats to oppose Douglas and therefore was not looking for vulnerable points in Democratic policies generally but in Douglas particularly. Second, Miller himself notes that two years before the Kansas-Nebraska Act was proposed, Lincoln was "making the transition, by way of condemning those who denied . . . the application [of the statement 'all men are created equal']"; and Miller merely creates an illusion of innovation by suggesting that in 1852, Lincoln was "treating the Declaration only in its historical context" and did not until 1854 begin "using it as a moral norm for today."[34]

Lincoln was capable of considering the Declaration in its "historical context" and as a "moral norm" simultaneously and did so in 1852 in his eulogy of his hero Henry Clay. Lincoln emphasized the universal (and not merely historical) concept behind the Declaration's phrase "all men are created equal" by noting that Clay "did not perceive, that on a question of human right, the negroes were to be excepted from the human race." Lincoln asserted that > a few, but an increasing number of men, . . . for the sake of perpetuating slavery, are beginning to assail and to ridicule . . . the declaration that "all men are created free and equal [sic]." So far as I have learned, the first American, of any note, to do or attempt this, was the late John C. Calhoun; and if I mistake not, it soon after found its way into some of the messages of the Governors of South Carolina.[35]

Lincoln was probably unaware that Calhoun had been directly influenced by the work of Morton and that one former governor of South Carolina, James H. Hammond, who was outspoken about negro inferiority, was a friendly correspondent of Nott. However, Lincoln quoted a letter sent "only last year" to a St. Louis, Missouri, newspaper by an "influential clergyman of Virginia" who said that the phrase "All men are born free and created equal" was unbiblical, invented by Voltaire, "baptized by Thomas Jefferson," exploited by "professional abolitionists," and merely a "coin in the political currency of our generation. I am sorry to say that I have never seen two men of whom it is true." Lincoln responded, "This sounds strangely in republican America. The like was not heard in the fresher days of the Republic." He then contrasted this clergyman's notions with a Clay quotation about "the benevolent efforts among free men, in behalf of the unhappy portion of our race doomed to bondage."[36] What Lincoln so strongly reacted against in this 1852 eulogy was the view that received so much attention after Agassiz and Nott addressed the American Association for the Advancement of Science (AAAS) conference in Charleston in 1850. Lincoln never referred to polygenism by that or any other technical term, and yet he did note that the idea of "saying all men were not created equal" sounded "strangely" indeed.

In short, intellectually and morally Lincoln had already been "aroused" before 1854, and the Kansas-Nebraska Act essentially provided a political opportunity because Lincoln recognized that Douglas had blundered, and Lincoln could now use a moral argument (based on the antipolygenist view that "all men are created equal") in order to create the political force that might stop his old rival in his tracks.[37]

Slavery's opponents had hitherto developed an array of somewhat ineffective ways to attack the "peculiar institution." Lincoln realized that the real value in concentrating on the Kansas-Nebraska Act was that one was then fighting for so little: the reversal of a repeal of a prohibition against slavery's expansion. It was a fight around which a Whig in Illinois might, for one time only, hope to rally support not only from other members of the dissolving Whig party and from the clamoring Free-Soilers, abolitionists, and Know-Nothings but even from temporarily disaffected members of Douglas's Democratic Party. That party throughout Lincoln's residence in Illinois had held a controlling majority everywhere except Sangamon County. To Lincoln's amazed delight, many of Douglas's fellow Democrats had suddenly split off as "anti-Nebraska Democrats."

Although Lincoln might have attacked the Democrats on various other issues, his tactic was not to raise issues around which Democrats could be rallied (and thus heal their split). Lincoln needed to win over at least some Democrats if he was ever to have a chance of being elected by the state legislature to sit in the Senate in Washington. The old rail-splitter now saw that Douglas's Kansas-Nebraska Act had handed him a wedge: he would now complete the split by promoting a policy to reverse not only the repeal of the Missouri Compromise but also the repeal of "the ancient faith," a phrase Lincoln used frequently over the next few years, which nicely rolled together the Declaration of Independence and traditional single creation of Genesis. It was the old-time religion and good enough for Lincoln. He stressed the moral argument not because it was so difficult but because, to him, it was so obvious, and he sensed that most people, despite their deep prejudices, shared at least the essence of his view. Douglas had blundered by adopting two new and primarily southern views: slavery's right to expand and the polygenist view that blacks were not fully men. Armed with "the ancient faith," Lincoln could stand as popular champion against both views.

However, Lincoln's new weapon, sufficient for slaying such a doubleheaded monster, also cut on both edges. If, ultimately, the Kansas-Nebraska Act was evil because blacks were actually men and so on, then must we do more than merely halt slavery's expansion? Must we force other states to free their slaves? Must we grant those "fellow men," once freed, the right to settle in Illinois, to enjoy equal protection under law, to serve on juries, to vote? "In fact," Miller points out, "Douglas was going to beat him over the head with that."[38]

In 1854, both of Illinois' senators were Democrats. Douglas was not up for reelection until 1858, but in early 1855, a newly elected state legislature would decide whether to reelect James Shields, Douglas's colleague in the Senate, who also supported the act.[39] If the upcoming statewide election altered the state legislature from a Democratic majority to a working coalition of Whigs, Free-Soilers, Know-Nothings, and Anti-Nebraska Democrats willing to vote against Shields, then some Anti-Nebraska Democrat—or perhaps a Whig with broad support—might be elected. It seemed Lincoln's only opportunity to move up the political ladder.

Lincoln did not sit back and await events but began systematic research into the historical background of the current issues, "nosing for weeks in the State Library, pumping his brain and his imagination for points and arguments," as one hostile newspaper put it.[40] Too often described by historians as a fatalist or a believer in divine providence, Lincoln took full control and worked tirelessly to influence the coming struggle.

The Politics of Race

Despite holding no political office, Lincoln managed to spearhead the campaign in Illinois against the Kansas-Nebraska Act prior to the statewide elections at the end of 1854. He nearly won the U.S. Senate race but was compelled, in order to prevent James Shields or another pro-Douglas Democrat from winning, to ask his supporters to shift their votes to an Anti-Nebraska Democrat. Lincoln then joined the new Republican Party and gained its nomination to challenge Stephen A. Douglas in his reelection bid in 1858, which drew national attention through the Lincoln-Douglas debates. Despite losing to Douglas in that race, Lincoln became the Republicans' choice to oppose Douglas in the presidential election in 1860. For our purposes, the fascinating details of these maneuvers, coalitions, and debates must largely be set aside to concentrate on why and how, over those six years, both Lincoln and Douglas referred in their speeches and debates to the issue of whether or not blacks were fully equal humans.

In his eulogy for Henry Clay in 1852, Lincoln had already shown awareness of recently arisen polygenism by stressing that blacks were not "to be excepted from the human race." However, Douglas, like many of his political allies, may have felt encouraged to believe that their policies were bolstered by the new "science."

When John C. Calhoun declared on the floor of the Senate in 1837 that slavery was a "positive good," he offered no "scientific" evidence about race, but later he supported similar statements with evidence from the 1840 census indicating that free blacks in the north suffered more from mental disorders than slaves in the south. Although the census figures were soon shown to be entirely wrong, Calhoun ignored this and was later delighted to receive cranial information from Dr. Samuel Morton and archeological information from George Gliddon, all indicating that blacks had been created separately from whites as an inferior model of man.[1]

When Calhoun died in 1850, other politicians carried the polygenist torch. Not only was South Carolinian James H. Hammond linked to Josiah Nott but Alexander H. Stephens, Robert Toombs, and Robert B. Rhett were three more "leading southern politicians who adopted the argument from science in their defense of the slave system."[2] Some version of the polygenist view was accepted by most Democrats and many Whigs, north and south.

Douglas was greatly interested in science but has never been shown to be directly linked closely to polygenist scientists. He was certainly as aware as Lincoln of the new anthropology, which may help to explain a shift in Douglas's approach to slavery. In 1848 (two years before the main launch of the polygenist debate), Douglas had reacted fairly negatively to Calhoun's views: "In the North it is not expected that we should take the position that slavery is a positive good—a positive blessing. . . . We say to you of the South, if slavery be a blessing, it is your blessing; if it be a curse, it is your curse; enjoy it, on you rest all the responsibility."[3] But according to historian Harry V. Jaffa, the reason why, after 1848, "Douglas never again spoke so openly of the vicious tendency of the Southern 'positive good' school" was that he came to believe that "practical measures directed toward the containment of slavery could succeed only if they did not involve the abstract question of the intrinsic good or evil of slavery."[4] Although Jaffa is correct, a further explanation for this change of view is that sometime after 1850, Douglas came to accept the polygenist view that blacks are inferior by nature and somehow had to be controlled by whites.

Biographers of Douglas have overlooked one direct connection between Douglas and one propagandist for polygenism. Dr. John H. Van Evrie, a New York physician, publisher, strong Democrat, and vehement racist, wrote in 1864 that "ten years ago," he had published a pamphlet that "first promulgated to the world the simple, obvious, every day, but momentous truth, that so called slavery was the normal condition of the Negro."[5] The pamphlet, entitled Negroes and Negro "Slavery": The First an Inferior Race; the Latter Its Normal Condition, was published in several editions in 1853 and 1854 and was later expanded into a book in 1861.[6] Van Evrie has been dismissed as a "perpetually indignant" figure on the fringe who "did not influence the tide of battle" within the scientific community's debate, and he himself admitted that his pamphlet's "profound impression" was not based on its "originality or profundity" but rather on its "novelty" in showing that a "truth so obvious" had been "so long thrust out of sight by the mental dictation of the enemies of American institutions." However, Van Evrie may well have achieved his stated desire to influence politicians rather than scientists.[7]

When Van Evrie wrote to Calhoun in 1846 to condemn the "sickly sentimentality" that made some New Yorkers advocate granting suffrage to blacks, he made no scientific argument. But by the time his pamphlet appeared in 1853, Van Evrie had clearly adopted polygenism: "[the negro] is not a black white man, or a man merely with a black skin, but a different and inferior species of man." He quoted the most extreme statistics from Morton's skewed cranial measurements, borrowed Nott's notion that "the Mulatto, or Hybrid of the fourth generation, is as sterile as the mule," and complained that Agassiz did not "rise above the prejudices of Boston" and more "boldly grapple" with the absolute diversity of different human species.[8]

The pamphlet's second edition carried endorsements from southern spokesmen including Secretary of War Jefferson Davis and publisher J. D. B. De Bow, and a decade later, Van Evrie described how he had tried to bring his ideas to the attention of other politicians, though "some of the most intellectual men then in Congress, hesitated to accept the doctrine announced." Specifically, Stephens of Georgia (a Whig colleague when Lincoln was in Congress) was mentioned as a reluctant convert. Van Evrie also recounted, "Some few Northern men, then in Congress, assented to the new doctrine in private, but declined the responsibility of standing by the truth in public, and the late Senator Douglas distributed a considerable number of copies among his constituents, under the frank of Mr. Slidell."[9]

If this self-serving account is true, it provides an important insight into Douglas's attitudes: reluctant to appear to be personally influenced by scientific speculation, yet basically agreeing with polygenists and using Van Evrie's pamphlet to influence constituents. Van Evrie admired Douglas so much that during the Civil War, when publishing a Copperhead newspaper, the New York Day Book (later New York Caucasian), he printed immediately below the banner: "'I hold that this Government was made on the WHITE BASIS, by WHITE MEN, for the benefit of WHITE MEN and THEIR POSTERITY FOREVER' S. A. Douglas"—words from the first great Lincoln-Douglas debate in 1858.

During the seven months between the introduction of the Kansas-Nebraska bill early in 1854 and Douglas's return to Illinois to defend the act, there were heated discussions in Congress that Lincoln, reading about them in Springfield, noted for future reference. However, only occasionally did those congressional discussions raise the issue of black and white equality, in contrast with the prominence it received in exchanges between Lincoln and Douglas over the next six years. Various members of Congress opposed the bill's provision for extending slavery, and some condemned slavery as counter to God's creation of all men as descendants of Adam and to the Declaration of Independence's principle that "all men are created equal."[10] Douglas moved slightly closer to a scientific argument when he opened the formal debate by saying he disliked "the system of legislation on our part, by which a geographical line, in violation of the laws of nature, and climate, and soil, and of the laws of God, should be run to establish institutions for a people"—the language of Agassiz's "geographical zones."[11]

A clearer reference to scientific racism came in the speeches of Senator John Pettit of Indiana, who spoke of "the principle that two races distinct in their organization, in the volume and amount of intellect, of mind, of brain, different in the rapidity of the coursing of the blood through their veins, cannot live and enjoy equality together." By saying that these arrangements all resulted from "the stern decree of the Almighty himself," Pettit accepted Agassiz's reconciliation of religion and polygenism. And Pettit parroted Van Evrie's line when he added, "Look to any point in history, ancient or modern, and you will find the same truth developed. . . . Where one race is inferior to the other, it is necessarily subservient, and it is only a question of extent as to whether they shall be slaves fully or slaves partially." Turning to a point raised earlier by others—and mentioned many times later by Lincoln—Pettit said:

> It is alleged that all men are created equal, and the Declaration of Independence is referred to, to sustain that position. However unpopular, or however displeasing it may be to the mass of my fellow-citizens, I am constrained to dissent from any such position or dogma. It is not true in fact; it is not true in law; it is not true physically, mentally, or morally that all men are created equal. . . . I hold it to be a self-evident lie. . . . Tell me, sir, that the slave in the South . . . with but little over one half the volume of brain that attaches to the northern European race, is his equal, and you tell me what is physically a falsehood.

Having brought cranial measurement into the debate, Pettit also elaborated Douglas's argument that "the climate, the latitude, the soil, the heat, and cold—shall determine the line of demarkation where slavery may or may not go." Finally, Pettit quoted the sort of statistics that Nott had used to create a false impression about the decline of black population in the northern states and its increase in southern states: "Thus speak the statistics . . . so far as philanthropy, kindness, and humanity to the black himself is concerned, he would be better off in slavery than out of it."[12]

The following day Charles Sumner of Massachusetts responded forcefully that no one had the right to hold "in bondage their fellow-men, only 'guilty of a skin not colored like their own.'" When Pettit came under further attacks, he countered, "It is utterly false that men are, either mentally, morally, physically, or politically, created equal, whatever ought to have been their condition. But blame the Almighty, not me."[13]

Reading these congressional debates, Lincoln must have noted that while Douglas avoided discussions of race and concentrated on political principles, other politicians referred to the question of racial equality. When the opportunity arose, Lincoln would bring that issue to the fore.

Among Lincoln's writings from this period are important undated fragments probably intended to crystallize thoughts before speeches or debates. The beginning of one fragment is lost but obviously asserted that slavery is wrong, > made so plain by our good Father in Heaven, that all feel and understand it, even down to brutes and creeping insects. . . . So plain, that the most dumb and stupid slave that ever toiled for a master, does constantly know that he > is wronged. So plain that no one, high or low, ever does mistake it, except in a plainly selfish way; for although volume upon volume is written to prove slavery a very good thing, we never hear of the man who wishes to take the good of it, by being a slave himself. . . . Most governments have been based [on the idea that] . . . some men are too ignorant, and vicious, to share in government. Possibly so, said we; and, by your system, you would always keep them ignorant, and vicious. We proposed to give all a chance; and we expected the weak to grow stronger, the ignorant, wiser; and all better, and happier together [original emphasis].[14]

Lincoln referred not to separate creations of races but to God creating in all of humanity (and even in animals) an innate understanding that slavery is wrong. The issue of race was muted. The slave was not described as black; some slaves were "dumb and stupid" (meaning others were not); and that condition was not inherent since slaves might become "stronger" and "wiser"—exactly the possibility that Types of Mankind denied. Race provided no justification for slavery, and no one had ever chosen that "positive good" for himself.

Lincoln first spoke against the Kansas-Nebraska Act in August 1854 but the first speech for which we have a fairly complete summary took place in Bloomington, Illinois, on 26 September. Douglas had just returned to Illinois to try to heal the breach within his own party before Whigs could exploit it in the state elections. He encountered some angry audiences but was a masterful speaker, confident he could restore party unity. When Douglas was to speak in Bloomington, Lincoln asked to share the rostrum. Douglas understandably refused, but Lincoln simply announced that he would address the pressing issues later that evening.[15]

Like many of Lincoln's major speeches, this one contained ample evidence of research into the history of attempts to limit the expansion of slavery and the nature and intent of earlier compromises. Lincoln made only two rather subtle references to the racial issue: chiding Douglas (who was present) for calling "the new party Black Republicans" in order to "pander to prejudice," and mentioning "the famous Georgia Pen, in Washington, where negroes were bought and sold within sight of the National Capitol," which was "offensive" to "all good men, Southerners as well as Northerners."[16]

On 4 October, following a Douglas oration in Springfield, Lincoln delivered, according to William Lee Miller, "the first great speech of his life."[17] Comparing the repeal of the Missouri Compromise to tearing down a fence that had kept cattle and hogs out of a field, Lincoln asked if anyone could think slave owners would stay out any more than the animals would: "Even the hogs would know better—Much more men, who are a higher order of the animal world." That humorous remark was echoed more seriously later: "It is said that the slaveholder has the same right to take his negroes to Kansas that a freeman has to take his hogs or his horses. This would be true if negroes were property in the same sense that hogs and horses are. But is this the case? It is notoriously not so." Lincoln offered evidence that even "southern men do not treat their negroes as they do their horses." Four hundred thousand negroes in the United States were "free": "Can you find two million dollars worth of any other kind of property running about without an owner?" The masters who freed these negroes clearly believed they had "mind, feeling, souls, family affections, hopes, joys, sorrows—something that made them more than hogs or horses." Lincoln pointed out that the overseas trade in slaves but not in any other commodity was "classed with piracy and murder" and that "the Southern people, the Slaveholders themselves, spurn the domestic slave dealer, refuse to associate with him, or let their families associate with his family."[18]

A few days later, Lincoln followed Douglas in giving a speech in Peoria, Illinois.[19] He improved several points made earlier at Springfield but also raised new points, partly in response to Douglas's efforts to depict Lincoln as an abolitionist wishing to free blacks in the south so they could flood into Illinois and demand absolute equality on all levels. Just as Lincoln's whole argument depended on "the ancient faith" in all men being created equal, Douglas's position depended on the belief in race superiority that allowed white men to enslave black men or to keep them out of their states. Laying out his views cautiously, Lincoln asked whether when slaves are freed, we should then > make them politically and socially, our equals? My own feelings will not admit of this; and if mine would, we well know that those of the great mass of white people will not. Whether this feeling accords with justice and sound judgment, is not the sole question, if indeed, it is any part of it. A universal feeling, whether well or ill-founded, can not be safely disregarded. We cannot, then, make them equals.[20]

This passage is a favorite for those wishing to portray Lincoln as a straightforward nineteenth-century racist, though many scholars have emphasized how carefully Lincoln worded his statements, so that his listeners might hear rather more than he was saying.[21] First, equality is qualified as political or social, not biological or intellectual. Second, the issue is not whether slaves are "our equals" inherently, primordially or by divine will, but whether we can "make" them equals. Lincoln says his "feelings will not admit of this," not that his reason demands or forbids it. Indeed, he contrasts "feelings" on one side and "justice and sound judgment" on the other. And, having said his "feelings will not admit of this," he immediately allows the possibility: "if mine would." As a politician, he cannot safely disregard "a universal feeling," but he does not say that feeling is correct or that he agrees with it—rather, it might be "ill-founded."[22]

In another part of the speech, Lincoln dismissed as "a palliation—a lullaby" the notion that climate could prevent slavery from moving into Kansas, pointing out that five existing states as far north as Kansas already contained over eight hundred thousand slaves: “It is not climate, then, that will keep slavery out of these territories.” Lincoln further developed his view that most people, even southerners, found it difficult to treat blacks as animals. He reworked a point about “hogs” and ended up discussing what Darwin would later call a “social instinct” but Lincoln called “human sympathies”:

> [W]hile you thus require me to deny the humanity of the negro, I wish to ask whether you of the south yourselves, have ever been willing to do as much? . . . The great majority, south as well as north, have human sympathies, of which they can no more divest themselves than they can of their sensibility to physical pain. These sympathies in the bosoms of the southern people, manifest in many ways, their sense of the wrong of slavery, and their consciousness that, after all, there is humanity in the negro.

For evidence, Lincoln again noted that southerners and northerners together had legislated that participation in the Atlantic slave trade was a capital crime: “The practice was no more than bringing wild negroes from Africa. . . . But you never thought of hanging men for catching and selling wild horses, wild buffaloes or wild bears.” Also, Lincoln pointed out that “something” caused even slave owners to ostracize domestic slave dealers and to free a surprising amount of slave “property.” Asking “What is that SOMETHING?” Lincoln answered, “In all these cases it is your sense of justice, and human sympathy, continually telling you, that the poor negro has some natural right to himself—that those who deny it, and make mere merchandise of him, deserve kickings, contempt and death.”[23]

Lincoln then tied this issue of negro humanity to what others considered the central issue—the extension of popular sovereignty:

> The doctrine of self government is right . . . but it has no just application, as here attempted. Or perhaps I should rather say that whether it has such just application depends upon whether a negro is not or is a man. If he is not a man, why in that case, he who is a man may, as a matter of self-government, do just as he pleases with him. But if the negro is a man, is it not to that extent, a total destruction of self-government, to say that he too shall not govern himself? When the white man governs himself that is self-government; but when he governs himself, and also governs another man, that is more than self-government—that is despotism. If the negro is a man, why then my ancient faith teaches me that “all men are created equal”; and that there can be no moral right in connection with one man’s making a slave of another.[24]

Having returned to the Declaration of Independence, Lincoln pointed out, “When Pettit . . . called the Declaration of Independence ‘a self-evident lie’ he only did what consistency and candor require all other Nebraska men to do.” Lincoln said Douglas had stated “that he always considered this government was made for the white people and not for the negroes. Why, in point of mere fact, I think so too." With the phrase "mere fact," Lincoln distanced himself from Douglas's actual pleasure in the fact. Lincoln argued that Douglas's "great mistake" is that he "has no very vivid impression that the negro is a human; and consequently has no idea that there can be any moral question in legislating about him." Lincoln then contrasted Douglas's lack of human sympathy with the "totally different view" taken by "the great mass of people": "They consider slavery a great moral wrong; and their feeling against it, is not evanescent, but eternal. It lies at the very foundation of their sense of justice . . . and, I think, no statesman can safely disregard it." From the brief reports of Lincoln's next major speech at Chicago on 27 October, it appears that Pettit's "self-evident lie" came in for another drubbing as much as Douglas.[25]

When the state elections took place, Douglas's Democrats lost their majority in the state legislature to the mixed multitude of the Whigs, Free-Soilers, Know-Nothings and Anti-Nebraska Democrats. Lincoln worked feverishly to get this body to fuse in order to elect him rather than a Douglas supporter to the U.S. Senate. However, in the end, Lincoln could only keep Douglas's candidate out by telling the large minority of legislators who supported him to shift their votes to an Anti-Nebraska Democrat, Lyman Trumbull. It was a bitter disappointment but also "a great consolation," said Lincoln about Douglas's forces, "to see them worse whipped than I am."[26] Lincoln knew Douglas's own senate seat would be in contention in 1858, and as the anti-Douglas forces in Illinois gradually merged into the new party developing among antislavery forces in other northern states, Lincoln, though holding no office, managed to make himself leader of this Republican Party in Illinois.

More than his personal defeat, other recent developments caused Lincoln to abandon his former belief that there would someday be a "peaceful extinction of slavery." Citing the Kentucky legislature's failure in 1849 to initiate a gradual emancipation, "together with a thousand other signs," including that the Declaration's concept of equality was now called "a self-evident lie," Lincoln wrote in a letter, "The Autocrat of all the Russias will resign his crown, and proclaim his subjects free republicans sooner than will our American masters voluntarily give up their slaves." A few days later, Lincoln replied to a letter from his old confidant Joshua Speed.[27] Lincoln first pointed out that their views were not as different as Speed had apparently suggested: "You know I dislike slavery; and you fully admit the abstract wrong of it. . . . I do oppose the extension of slavery, . . . [and] if for this you and I must differ, differ we must." Lincoln reminded Speed of a steamboat journey they made in 1841: "You may remember, as I well do, that . . . there were, on board, ten or a dozen slaves, shackled together with irons. That sight was a continual torment to me; and I see something like it every time I touch the Ohio, or any other slave-border."[28] Lincoln stressed the "abstract wrong" by emphasizing that he could not think of slaves as simply another form of property and closed with a seething statement (quoted earlier in a different context):

> Our progress in degeneracy appears to me to be pretty rapid. As a nation, we began by declaring that "all men are created equal." We now practically read it "all men are created equal, except negroes." When the Know-Nothings get control, it will read "all men are created equal, except negroes, and foreigners, and catholics." When it comes to this I should prefer emigrating to some country where they make no pretence of loving liberty—to Russia, for instance, where despotism can be taken pure, and without the base alloy of hypocracy [sic].

Mentioned in both letters was Russia, the mascot for autocracy as America was for democracy. Both nations had antiquated systems of unfree labor that rivaled each other for odiousness, though Russia lacked the "justification" of enslaving a different race. Lincoln had formerly assumed that the southern states would eventually follow the example not of Russia but of the northern states, Britain, and numerous other countries. However, that assumption, based on continued agreement that slavery was an evil since blacks were men, was being eroded by polygenism.

Having previously read and loathed George Fitzhugh's Sociology for the South, Lincoln may not have been aware that an editorial appearing in the Richmond Enquirer on 15 December 1855 was written by Fitzhugh. Although he had not yet adopted the polygenism of Nott, Gliddon, and Agassiz, Fitzhugh now defended slavery by declaring it had nothing to do with race but, as a labor system, was simply "good" per se: "While it is far more obvious that negroes should be slaves than whites . . . principle of slavery is itself right and does not depend on difference of complexion."

Lincoln decided this "rather rank doctrine," as he called it, might be turned to good use. He and Herndon hatched a plan to arrange for part of the editorial to be republished in a local newspaper that supposedly supported the Know-Nothing Party but was actually funded by Democrats hoping to split the anti-Democrat vote. The plan worked: the editorial was republished, the newspaper was "almost ruined," and Lincoln "joined in the popular denunciation, expressing great astonishment that such a sentiment could find lodgment in any paper in Illinois."[29] In at least two other speeches delivered in 1856, Lincoln referred to the new doctrine in the Richmond Enquirer, and some of Lincoln's undated notes for a speech show he planned to read out and ridicule a newspaper clipping (perhaps the same one) from the Richmond Enquirer and two more from the New York Day-Book—Van Evrie's racist newspaper.[30]

In May 1856, Lincoln gave what is known as the "Lost Speech," a supposedly impromptu but actually well-planned address delivered so stirringly that the journalists present all stopped taking notes as the emotion and cheering distracted them. A brief newspaper summary and a version made forty years later by one witness who said he had taken notes are the only records. Lincoln, though asked, never produced a written version for campaign purposes: he may have been quietly pleased that some of his more extreme remarks thus remained off the record. Yet, he had no way of knowing that no reporter would take down his words, which, in any case, were well received by an intelligent audience, and he made similar remarks in subsequent speeches.

The single newspaper summary suggested that Lincoln declared, “The sentiment in favor of white slavery now prevailed in all the slave state papers, except those of Kentucky, Tennessee and Missouri and Maryland.”[31] The line nearest to this in the reconstructed version is: “And if the safeguards to liberty are broken down, as is now attempted, when they have made things of all the free negroes, how long, think you, before they will begin to make things of poor white men?”[32]

If Lincoln was wrong to suggest that it was widely held in the south or by men like Stephen A. Douglas that slavery could be extended to white people, he nevertheless made the point that the slavocracy was morally bankrupt, that the Declaration’s “all men” was ironically being taken literally, and that the only racial distinction that applied was skin color. In a similar vein, in the same (reconstructed) speech Lincoln supposedly said, “The whole country will turn out to help hang the [horse]thief; but if a man but a shade or two darker than I am is himself stolen, the same crowd will hang one who aids in restoring him to liberty. Such are the inconsistencies of slavery, where a horse is more sacred than a man.”[33]

This issue of color was raised in another undated fragment of Lincoln’s writing:

> You say A. is white, and B. is black . . . the lighter, having the right to enslave the darker? . . . By this rule, you are to be slave to the first man you meet, with a fairer skin than your own. . . . You mean the whites are intellectually the superiors of the blacks, and, therefore have the right to enslave them? Take care again. By this rule, you are to be slave to the first man you meet, with an intellect superior to your own.[34]

William Lee Miller has suggested Lincoln may have been influenced by a similar argument in Francis Wayland’s Elements of Moral Science, but Wayland did not mention “color,” and Lincoln might as easily have been thinking of an 1849 letter written by Henry Clay, who also ridiculed the “principle of subjugation, founded upon intellectual superiority.”[35] Lincoln later quoted this letter in a speech in 1858, while campaigning not merely to promote the Republican Party but to take over personally Douglas’s seat in the U.S. Senate.[36]

Campaigning, 1856–58

In late summer of 1856, as Lincoln made speeches throughout Illinois supporting the new Republican Party, a zoologist at Yale University received a letter from an English colleague. "We are all here now much interested in American politics—You will think us very impertinent, when I say how fervently we wish you in the North to be free." James Dwight Dana, an expert on crustaceans who had assisted Darwin's studies, probably deciphered Darwin's allusion to a catchy campaign slogan of John C. Frémont, the antislavery Republican candidate in the 1856 presidential election: "Free Soil, Free Labor, Free Speech, Free Men, and Frémont." But when a slice of the northern vote went to the anti-immigrant Know-Nothing Party, the Democrats managed to elect James Buchanan, who would make no move against slavery. Thus, the north failed to elect a candidate "for freedom," no doubt upsetting Darwin and Dana and quite infuriating Lincoln.[1]

Everything else in the letter was science, including Darwin's reference to Louis Agassiz's unwillingness to learn from his errors: he "seems to me to retreat a step & take up a new position with a front so bold as to be admirable in a soldier." Darwin cautiously mentioned that he was "becoming, indeed I should say have become, sceptical on the permanent immutability of species: I groan when I make such a confession, for I shall have little sympathy from those, whose sympathy I alone value." The latter group apparently did not include Agassiz, who, "if he ever honours me by reading my work, will throw a boulder at me." Darwin let Dana know that his sympathy was valued and that he was in good company: "It may sound presumptuous, but I think I have to a certain extent staggered even Lyell."[2]

For several months, Charles Lyell had been urging Darwin to publish his theory, and as early as 1854, Lyell told a colleague about something "which will figure in C. Darwin's book on species."[3] But while Darwin was distracted by his experiments with seed dispersal and then pigeon breeding, Lyell grew impatient, having just read an article by Alfred Russel Wallace that seemed to have ideas similar to those about which Darwin was so coy.[4] Lyell himself began a new journal—on species, starting with notes about Wallace's article.[5]

Wallace's careful efforts to avoid offending religious sensibilities caused Darwin to fail to see the real significance in Wallace's early article, annotating it with comments such as "It seems all creation to him . . . put generation for creation & I quite agree." Lyell visited Darwin, saw the experiments, chatted about transmutation, probably discussed Wallace's article, and pressed Darwin to "publish some small fragment of your data, pigeons if you please & so out with the theory & let it take date—& be cited—& understood." Perhaps as encouragement, Lyell added, "The multiple creation of Agassiz will one day rank with spontaneous generation." Lyell had also heard that Darwin met with Joseph Dalton Hooker, Thomas Huxley, and Thomas Wollaston and "made light of all species & grew more & more unorthodox."[6] Darwin was intensifying his effort to build a consensus for transmutation, discovering how much interested colleagues would and would not accept. Lincoln was not the only one forging an alliance.

Darwin now began to write in earnest, and by July 1856 he had opted for a "big book . . . as complete as my present materials allow."[7] The first two chapters on variation under domestication were completed by autumn, but questions kept popping up, so Darwin continued consulting experts far and wide. He confessed to Hooker that each struggle to explain some odd distribution of plant species "drives me to despair . . . & not being able to do so gives in my eyes the multiple creationists an awful triumph." If a single case of multiple creation "could be proved, I should be smashed."[8] When one fellow naturalist, S. P. Woodward, who had provided useful information to Darwin for months, praised Agassiz for protecting "our ancestors" by doing "battle with the transmutationists," the correspondence ended after Darwin mentioned in his reply, "I do not see that I shall have to beg any further favours."[9] Likewise, some queries about fish that might have gone to Agassiz went instead to Dana, who (like zoologist John Gould before him) sometimes reported the replies he received after forwarding the questions to Agassiz.[10]

Meanwhile, Darwin let Dana know that he was "getting M.S. ready for press" but doubted he would publish "for a couple of years." As his "big book" grew bigger, Darwin constantly sought information from Asa Gray, who was forced by Darwin's questions to rethink his own ideas. Together, they developed a statistical approach to plant distribution, and in September 1857, Darwin paid Gray the compliment of sending him a four-page enclosure laying out his basic theory. "I think it can be shown," Darwin explained in the accompanying letter, "that there is such an unerring power at work, or Natural Selection (the title of my Book), which selects exclusively for the good of each organic being."[11]

Saying that anything selects "for the good" had religious implications, yet Darwin tried awkwardly to depersonify natural selection. Contrasting it with multiple creations, Darwin wrote, "What a jump it is from a well marked variety, produced by natural cause, to a species produced by the separate act of the Hand of God." Still, Darwin broke off the thought: "But I am running on foolishly." The two friends might disagree on whether the "unerring power at work" was caused by "the Hand of God," but both rejected Agassiz's multiple creations.[12] Their alliance was sealed with humor at Agassiz's expense, for a quotation from Agassiz (picked up from Lyell) became a joking catch-phrase between Darwin and Gray: "Nature never lies!"[13] With Huxley, Darwin was more frank: "I have always suspected Agassiz of superficiality & wretched reasoning powers; but I think such men do immense good in their way. See how he stirred up all Europe about Glaciers."[14]

Neither Darwin nor any of his correspondents immediately mentioned that in 1857, Agassiz contributed to another Nott and Gliddon publication even less scientific than The Types and entitled Indigenous Races of the Earth. In a three-page letter included in the preface, Agassiz concentrated on making two points about one species—man. First, citing recent work by Richard Owen identifying three distinct species of monkeys, Agassiz argued that if such similar anthropoids were nevertheless different species, the same was true of the different races of men. Agassiz then strayed even further beyond his expertise by arguing that those who suggested that mankind's common origin was demonstrated by the philological evidence of a common ancient language were simply wrong.[15] Gray sent Darwin an amusing account of how Agassiz ("foolish man") asserted that languages do not "derive from other languages any more than species derive from other species" and then failed to get the joke when Gray agreed that the statement was "perfectly logical."[16]

In 1858, Darwin wrote to Agassiz for the first time in eight years and for the same reason as last: to thank him for a presentation copy, in this case, of the first parts of his Contributions to the Natural History of the United States of America. The volumes were impressively lavish, as was Darwin's praise for Agassiz's generosity (though not for any of his particular findings): "I thank you most truly for this magnificent present; & feel much flattered & gratified by this mark of your esteem. I have eagerly turned over the pages & plainly see that there will be much of the highest interest to me." Part 1, entitled Essay on Classification, bore directly on the main issue underlying Darwin's own half-finished book, which would never accept that classifications had to be "grounded firmly on the concept of the immutability of species" and were merely "translations, in human language, of the thoughts of the Creator."[17]

Darwin asked Huxley's opinion of "Agassiz's Contributions—not that I have yet begun to read it," but within a few weeks, he did read it and eventually annotated it and wrote an abstract. Darwin told Gray, "I am disappointed: I cannot realise his rules on the value of the higher groups, & all his prophetic &c &c types." Nearly a year later, agreeing with Huxley's view, Darwin wrote that the Essay on Classification "is all utterly impracticable rubbish, about his grades

&c &c. But, alas, when you read, what I have written on this subject, you will be just as savage with me."[18]

By that time, Darwin was no longer working on the massive Natural Selection, which probably would have taken him at least until 1861 to finish. Suddenly, Darwin felt the need to produce an "abstract" of that larger, unfinished work, to go into print as Origin of Species.

It is a familiar if complex story how the arrival at Down House in June 1858 of another essay by Wallace, sent to Darwin with a request that he perhaps show it to Lyell, caused Darwin to abandon his plan for a multivolume work and instead publish a single volume—which would be the only work Darwin ever produced without full source references (750 having already accumulated in Natural Selection, now set aside). The story has four key points. First, Darwin now saw what he had missed in Wallace's earlier article: that Wallace had somehow reached the same conclusions about transmutation that he had. Second, Darwin faced an ethical dilemma not only about losing priority to Wallace but also about having their theory born prematurely, without the substantiation Darwin was halfway to producing. Third, Darwin had to deal with this dilemma just as severe illness was raging through his own household, and an infant son was dying. Finally, the entire episode demonstrated the strong personal and professional support that Darwin had won from Lyell and Hooker, who came magnificently to his rescue, while the final result did justice to Wallace, who also became a stalwart ally.

Wallace's essay, along with extracts from Darwin's "sketch" and a copy of the enclosure sent to Gray in 1857, was read before the Linnaean Society meeting on 1 July and published in the society's journal, establishing Darwin's priority and the fact that his theory had remained consistent. The reaction of the Linnaean Society members was relatively subdued because the men doing the reading, Lyell and Hooker, had the highest reputations yet could hardly be questioned on work that was not their own. Of the actual authors, one was still in the Malay Archipelago and the other was that day attending his infant son's funeral. Darwin tried for a while to proceed with Natural Selection but soon decided to postpone that work and get something into print that was more coherent than the pieces now published. By October, Darwin was certain the "abstract" of Natural Selection would have to be "a small volume . . . published separately."[19]

The announcement at the Linnaean Society had more impact in America, galvanizing Gray to launch a frontal assault on Agassiz, with whom Gray was losing patience. He complained to Hooker about the damage Agassiz caused "by associating himself with Gliddon and Nott, and by his views on human species . . . always writing and talking ad populum—fond of addressing himself to an incompetent tribunal."[20] Now that Darwin's (and Wallace's) theory was in the public domain, Gray felt he could employ Darwin's ideas without robbing him of any future credit. According to his biographer, "Gray's whole spirit quickened at the thought of bringing Agassiz to bay with Darwin's tools."[21]

In December 1858, Gray presented to a meeting of the Cambridge Scientific Club an informal outline of his new view about the distribution of plants in eastern North America and eastern Asia. Only two men in the room fully understood that Gray was undermining everything Agassiz had recently published, yet Gray reported that Agassiz "took it very well indeed." Agassiz was preoccupied by dealings with wealthy philanthropists, legislators, lawyers, bankers, and architects as he labored to realize his cherished dream, a Museum of Comparative Zoology, which probably seemed more important than quibbling about plant statistics.[22]

Before the next confrontation, Gray asked a colleague to come up from New York so he could watch Gray "knock out the underpinning of Agassiz's theories about species and [turn] . . . some of Agassiz's own guns against him." Gray's presentation depicted Agassiz's basic view as offering "no scientific explanation of the present distribution of species over the globe" and merely "affirming, that as things now are, so they were at the beginning." He then described "the idea of the descent of all similar or conspecific individuals from a common stock." Agassiz defended his own theories as being "founded on observation of the animal kingdom": multiple creations better explained the distribution of flora than extensive migrations or climatic changes. "What rubbish Agassiz talks," Darwin told Hooker after reading of these proceedings.[23]

While Gray promoted Darwin's views in America even before they were known to be Darwin's and American scientists began to take sides, Darwin was still writing the abstract he hoped would prove convincing. "Last chapter, but one," he told Wallace in January 1859, "hard enough with my poor health," which was about to force him to take a few days' hydrotherapeutic rest at Moor Park, where he spent his fiftieth birthday. Had it not been for the sudden appearance of Wallace's essay, Darwin acknowledged, "I almost think that Lyell would have proved right & I should never have completed my larger work." He added sincerely, "I owe indirectly much to you."[24] Lincoln could have written the same line to the man who had recently brought him nationwide fame, temporarily at least, in what are now the most famous debates in American history.

After failing to win a U.S. Senate seat in 1855, Lincoln campaigned for Frémont in the 1856 presidential race, only to see him lose. As dramatic developments—bloodshed in Kansas, the Supreme Court's intervention, and Douglas's break with President Buchanan—provided Democrats and Republicans with ammunition, Lincoln and Douglas essentially continued the debate begun in 1854, though it grew more heated when the confrontation became head-to-head in 1858.

Democratic newspapers in Illinois never ceased to connect Lincoln with radical abolitionists, declaring that Lincoln's "niggerism has as dark a hue as that of Garrison or Fred Douglass"; that a Lincoln speech was "prosy and dull in the extreme—all about 'freedom,' 'liberty' and 'niggers'"; and that Lincoln was "the depot master of the underground railroad."[25] Nevertheless, Lincoln's stature within the Republican Party steadily increased while Douglas's position within the Democratic Party grew awkward. The rivals' speeches, and later their formal debates, dealt with wide-ranging issues (as well as mutual misrepresentations), yet the actual discussion of race, while never overtly scientific, was at the heart of the matter.

Douglas's position was both helped and hurt by the Supreme Court's Dred Scott decision in March 1857. Most of the Court's members were southerners, who now chose to address issues relating to slavery, apparently hoping to settle some of them peacefully—in contrast to the growing violence in Kansas and even on the floor of Congress. The decision seemed to support Douglas by overturning the Missouri Compromise's prohibition of slavery north of the 36° 30′ line as unconstitutional. This was only the second time in its history that the federal Supreme Court had overturned a federal law—which Douglas's Kansas-Nebraska Act had effectively nullified already by allowing popular sovereignty to determine whether slavery could be prohibited or not. While Douglas took comfort from the Dred Scott decision, Lincoln and others argued that the court's decision could be interpreted as undermining popular sovereignty: if Congress could not constitutionally prevent a citizen from taking his property (slaves) into a federal territory, how could a mere territorial government do so?

Chief Justice Roger B. Taney, writing the majority opinion, went beyond the call of duty—and, indeed, beyond the rational judicial arguments for which he was normally acclaimed—in order to express a view on negro racial inferiority. Taney argued that Dred Scott could not bring a suit because, despite being born in the United States, he was not a citizen: not because of his slave status (the issue of the suit) but because he was a descendant of Africans who "were not intended to be included, under the word 'citizens' in the Constitution . . . on the contrary, they were at that time considered as a subordinate and inferior class of beings who had been subjugated by the dominant race, and, whether emancipated or not, . . . had no rights or privileges but such as those who held the power and the Government might choose to grant them." Taney specified that if the phrase "all men are created equal" had been intended to "embrace" negroes, then the signers of the Declaration of Independence would have been "utterly and flagrantly inconsistent with the principles they asserted" and "would have deserved and received universal rebuke and reprobation."[26]

Forty years earlier as a young lawyer, Taney had defended a Baltimore minister accused of stirring up insurrection among slaves and had argued that his client's only sin was to quote the Declaration of Independence and insist "on the principles contained in that venerated instrument [by which] every friend of humanity will seek to lighten the galling chain of slavery."[27] Taney's change of heart was possibly a severe reaction against the threat of abolitionism, but his language in the Dred Scott decision also echoed the polygenist view of the "primordial" nature of Africans: "The unhappy black race were separated from the white by indelible marks, and laws long before established, and were never thought of or spoken of except as property."[28]

Douglas, in a speech in Springfield, Illinois, in June 1857, endorsed Taney's view, adding that the signers of the Declaration were only asserting that a "British subject, born on American soil was equal to a British subject born in England. . . . They did not mean the negroes and Indians—they did not say we white men and negroes were born equal." He also agreed that negroes belonged to an inferior race incapable of self-government but went much further by adding supposedly historical and scientific assertions about "the sad and melancholy results of the mixture of the races" in Spanish and French colonies. Although no term as esoteric as specific infertility passed Douglas's lips, he echoed the polygenist view that a "great natural law . . . declares that amalgamation between superior and inferior races brings their posterity down to the lower level of the inferior, but never elevates them to the high level of the superior race. . . . Amalgamation is degradation, demoralization, disease and death."[29]

Two weeks later, Lincoln, now the leading spokesman for Illinois Republicans, used the same location to reply to Douglas. He paraphrased Taney's assertion that "the public estimate of the black man is more favorable now than it was in the days of the Revolution," countering that "as a whole, in this country, the change between then and now is decidedly the other way; and their ultimate destiny has never appeared so hopeless as in the last three or four years." Citing new limitations on emancipation and prohibitions against the free black person, Lincoln declared, "All the powers of earth seem rapidly combining against him. Mammon is after him; ambition follows, and philosophy follows, and the Theology of the day is fast joining the cry." As "philosophy" was then the usual term for "science," Lincoln was referring to the rise of polygenism.[30]

Regarding Douglas's assertion that amalgamation caused dire physical and moral degradation, Lincoln conceded only that there was a "natural disgust in the minds of nearly all white people, to the idea of an indiscriminate amalgamation of the white and black races." Lincoln did not say he shared this disgust but charged Douglas with wishing "to appropriate the benefit of this disgust to himself." Lincoln then mocked Douglas's argument that Republicans insisted "that the Declaration of Independence includes ALL men, black as well as white . . . only because they want to vote, and eat, and sleep, and marry with negroes!" He called it a "counterfeit logic which concludes that, because I do not want a black woman for a slave I must necessarily want her for a wife. I need not have her for either, I can just leave her alone." Lincoln added an important distinction he would repeat many times: "In some respects she certainly is not my equal; but in her natural right to eat the bread she earns with her own hands without asking leave of any one else, she is my equal, and the equal of all others." Lincoln argued that the Declaration's signers "intended to include all men, but they did not intend to declare all men equal in all respects, [such as] color, size, intellect, moral developments, or social capacity." Lincoln mocked Douglas's view, "The English, Irish and Scotch, along with white Americans, were included to be sure, but the French, Germans and other white people of the world are all gone to pot along with the Judge's inferior races."[31]

Using statistics from the 1850 census, Lincoln ridiculed Douglas's horror "at the thought of the mixing [of] blood by the white and black races." Of 405,751 mulattoes in the United States, "very few" were "the offspring of whites and free blacks."[32] While some mulattoes were born in or had fled to the north, the 348,874 mulattoes in the slave states were "all of home production." Lincoln's statistics appealed to reason rather than prejudice and suggested the mulatto population was growing despite Douglas's polygenist image of languishing hybrids. Lincoln did not use Douglas's pejorative term "mongrel," and while an abolitionist might have charged that mulattoes were frequently the result of rape, Lincoln mocked the slave owners' tendency to euphemism by saying mulattoes resulted from "home production." The statistics did not absolutely prove that treating blacks more like equals reduced "amalgamation," but the overall effect was a novel argument for treating blacks as fellow humans: "These statistics show that slavery is the greatest source of amalgamation; and next to it, not the elevation, but the degeneration of the free blacks. Yet Judge Douglas dreads the slightest restraints on the spread of slavery, and the slightest human recognition of the negro, as tending horribly to amalgamation."[33]

Douglas continually urged Democrats to endorse his and Taney's racist position. One Illinois county duly denounced any effort to place "negroes on an equality with white men," rejecting the "claim that the declaration of Independence asserts that white men and negroes were created equal by the Almighty," while a friendly newspaper reported Douglas saying that "Black Republicans . . . will allow the blacks to push us from our sidewalk and elbow us out of car seats and stink us out of our places of worship." Lincoln recorded both incidents for possible later use as some Republicans began to argue that Douglas was not so bad after all, since he had broken with President Buchanan over Kansas.[34] To keep the anti-Douglas forces unified, Lincoln emphasized that Douglas remained content to see slavery spread.

With his famous "House Divided" speech, Lincoln accepted the Republican nomination to challenge Douglas for his senate seat. Boldly laying out the most pressing issues around which to rally the party, Lincoln stressed that Douglas gave no sign of disapproving of slavery itself. However, Lincoln did not raise any purely racial issues and offered none of the usual arguments for the view that "all men are created equal" or against the propaganda about amalgamation. It was Douglas who resurrected these matters when replying to Lincoln's "House Divided" speech in Chicago on 9 July 1858.[35]

Ignoring Lincoln's political and constitutional arguments against the Dred Scott decision, Douglas declared that Lincoln "thinks it wrong because it deprives the negro of the privileges, immunities and rights of citizenship, which pertain, according to that decision, only to the white man. I am free to say to you that in my opinion this government of ours is founded on the white basis. It was made by the white man, for the benefit of the white man, to be administered by white men, in such manner as they should determine." While allowing that the "inferior" races "should be permitted to enjoy . . . all the rights, privileges and immunities which he is capable of exercising consistent with the safety of society," Douglas repeated that amalgamation only resulted in "degeneration, demoralization, and degradation below the capacity for self-government."[36]

The following evening Lincoln again made light of Douglas's fear of amalgamation. "The Judge regales us with the terrible enormities that take place by the mixture of races; that the inferior race bears the superior down," said Lincoln, before turning to Douglas. "Why, Judge, if we do not let them get together in the Territories they won't mix there." Near the end of his speech, Lincoln pressed his case with a reference—almost unique for Lincoln—to Jesus: "The Savior, I suppose, did not expect that any human creature could be perfect as the Father in Heaven; but He said, 'As your Father in Heaven is perfect, be ye also perfect.' He set that up as a standard, and he who did most towards reaching that standard, attained the highest degree of moral perfection. So I say in relation to the principle that all men are created equal, let it be as nearly reached as we can."[37]

In another undated fragment written around this time, Lincoln was contemptuous of religious figures, such as the Reverend Frederick A. Ross, author of Slavery Ordained of God (1857), who claim to find a clear answer in the Bible to a question such as "'Is it the Will of God that Sambo shall remain a slave, or be set free?' The Almighty gives no audible answer to the question, and his revelation—the Bible—gives none—or, at most, none but such as admits of a squabble, as to its meaning. No one thinks of asking Sambo's opinion on it. So, at last, it comes to this, that Dr. Ross is to decide the question."[38]

Lincoln had also suggested in his Chicago speech that the debate over race missed the real point. "Let us discard all this quibbling about this man and the other man—this race and that race and the other race being inferior, and therefore they must be placed in an inferior position . . . [and] once more stand up declaring that all men are created equal." But a week later in Springfield, Douglas plunged further, "I am not only opposed to negro equality, but I am opposed to Indian equality. I am opposed to putting the coolies, now importing into this country, on an equality with us, or putting the Chinese or any inferior race on an equality with us." He also caricatured Lincoln's scriptural argument, saying Lincoln thinks "that the Almighty made the negro equal to the white man" and "that the negro is his brother." Douglas denied "that the negro is any kin of mine at all. And here is the difference between us."[39]

On the same day, Lincoln replied that his views "may be misrepresented, but cannot be misunderstood. . . . [Blacks] are not our equal in color; but . . . they are equal in their right to 'life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness.'" He again appealed to religious sentiment: "In pointing out that more has been given you, you can not be justified in taking away the little which has been given him. All I ask for the negro is that if you do not like him, let him alone. If God gave him but little, that little let him enjoy." Again, by saying "you" and "if" Lincoln avoided endorsing opinions he might not share while specifying no actual inferiority.[40]

Later, in Lewistown, Illinois, Lincoln again connected religion with the signers' description of the Creator's action: "Yes, gentlemen, to all His creatures, to the whole great family of man. In their enlightened belief, nothing stamped with the Divine image and likeness was sent into the world to be trodden on, and degraded, and imbruted by its fellows. They grasped not only the whole race of man then living, but they reached forward and seized upon the farthest posterity." Lincoln's "imbruted" expresses the same idea found in notes (probably written to prepare for the formal debates with Douglas that began on 21 August) accusing Douglas of "moulding public sentiment to a perfect accordance with his own [views] . . . that negroes are not men."[41]

As the first formal debate got under way in the town of Ottawa, Illinois, Douglas pulled out all the stops, linking Lincoln's name (as he had done before) to that of the well-known African American abolitionist Frederick Douglass, referring always to the "Black Republican" or "Abolition" Party, and working on his audience's prejudice by asking, "Do you desire to turn this beautiful State into a free negro colony, ('no, no,') in order that when Missouri abolishes slavery she can send one hundred thousand emancipated slaves into Illinois, to become citizens and voters, on an equality with yourselves? ('Never')." Douglas also combined religion with a natural-law argument—the first time he employed this so fully—that might have come straight from Nott, Gliddon, Fitzhugh, or Van Evrie: if "the Almighty ever intended the negro to be the equal of the white man, . . . he has been a long time demonstrating the fact. For thousands of years the negro has been a race upon the earth, and during all that time, in all latitudes and climates, wherever he has wandered or been taken, he has been inferior to the race which he has there met."[42]

Lincoln replied carefully, clarifying his position by quoting at length (as he did repeatedly over the next few weeks) from his own Peoria speech of 1854. He, too, stressed "nature" but in the form of "natural rights":

> I have no purpose to introduce political and social equality between the white and the black races. There is a physical difference between the two, which in my judgment will probably forever forbid their living together upon the footing of perfect equality, and inasmuch as it becomes a necessity that there must be a difference, I, as well as Judge Douglas, am in favor of the race to which I belong, having the superior position. I have never said anything to the contrary, but I hold that notwithstanding all this, there is no reason in the world why the > negro is not entitled to all the natural rights enumerated in the Declaration of Independence, the right to life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness.

Although acknowledging that there was "a physical difference" between the races that "will probably" prevent "perfect equality" on a practical basis and make inequality a social "necessity," Lincoln neither praised nor condemned that situation. So that his prejudiced audience need not view him as a hopeless idealist, he said he was "in favor" of having his race hold "the superior position." This might upset radical abolitionists, but Lincoln measured what his audience could accept and what he himself could live with. Crucially, he again made that statement conditional ("inasmuch as it becomes a necessity").[43]

In the second debate, in Freeport, Illinois, Douglas went further by associating Lincoln with Douglass through a dubious story of having recently seen in Freeport "a carriage, and a magnificent one it was, drive up and take a position on the outside of the crowd; a beautiful young lady was sitting on the box-seat, whilst Fred Douglass and her mother reclined inside, and the owner of the carriage acted as driver. I saw this in your own town." According to one account, someone in the crowd shouted, "What of it?" Douglas was pleased to expand:

> If you, Black Republicans, think that the negro ought to be on a social equality with your wives and daughters, and ride in a carriage with your wife, whilst you drive the team, you have perfect right to do so. I am told that one of Fred Douglass's kinsmen, another rich black negro, is now traveling in this part of the State making speeches for his friend Lincoln as the champion of black men.

Again someone shouted, "What have you to say against it?" Douglas replied, "All I have to say . . . is, that those of you who believe that the negro is your equal and ought to be on an equality with you socially, politically, and legally, have a right to entertain those opinions, and of course will vote for Mr. Lincoln." Lincoln ignored all this, perhaps to concentrate on more substantial issues or because he saw the crowd was already with him.[44]

Between the second and third debates, Lincoln made several other speeches and dealt with the race issue by simply quoting from his Peoria speech of 1854. At Carlinville, Illinois, however, he introduced some lateral thinking: that to deny blacks "natural rights" in America was somehow wrong since "no sane man will attempt to deny that the African upon his own soil has all the natural rights that [the Declaration] vouchsafes to all mankind." At Edwardsville, Illinois, Lincoln again referred to the Democrats' effort at "dehumanizing the negro."[45]

In the third debate in Jonesboro, Illinois, both men repeated their stock arguments, but Douglas's list of "inferior races" now included "the Fejee, the Malay, or any other inferior and degraded race," again suggesting familiarity with polygenist literature. Since Douglas continued to raise the amalgamation issue, Lincoln again resorted to ridicule in the fourth debate in Charleston, Illinois. After repeating the point that the white man holds “the superior position” (but not saying “is superior”), Lincoln jested, “I am now in my fiftieth year, and I certainly never have had a black woman for either a slave or a wife. So it seems to me quite possible for us to get along without making either slaves or wives of negroes.” He added that he had never seen “a man, woman or child who was in favor of producing a perfect equality, social and political, between negroes and white men” with one exception “and that is the case of Judge Douglas’s old friend Col. Richard M. Johnson. [Laughter.]” Johnson, who died in 1850, was a Kentuckian, former Democratic vice president, and bachelor known for having two daughters by a slave he treated as his wife. Having won that laughter, Lincoln turned his sights back to Douglas:

> I have never had the least apprehension that I or my friends would marry negroes if there was no law to keep them from it, but as Judge Douglas and his friends seem to be in great apprehension that they might, if there were no law to keep them from it, I give him the most solemn pledge that I will to the very last stand by the law of this State, which forbids the marrying of white people with negroes.

Lincoln added that since only the state legislature could change that law, “I propose as the best means to prevent it that the Judge be kept at home and placed in the State Legislature to fight the measure.” Douglas sought revenge by mentioning Douglass four times, describing him as “Lincoln’s ally,” no doubt because a few weeks earlier, “the negro” had made a widely reported speech ridiculing Douglas and praising Lincoln. Punning on the similarity of their surnames, Frederick Douglass had said, “Once I thought he was about to make the name respectable, but now I despair of him, and must do the best I can for it myself. I now leave him in the hands of Mr. Lincoln.” This was the first time the abolitionist mentioned Lincoln, quoting approvingly from Lincoln’s “House Divided” speech.[46]

In the fifth debate in Galesburg, Illinois, Douglas quoted Lincoln’s earlier appeal to “discard all this quibbling” about race and then asserted, “This Chicago doctrine of Lincoln’s—declaring that the negro and the white man are made equal by the Declaration of Independence and by Divine Providence—is a monstrous heresy.” Lincoln countered this vehemently (and somewhat incautiously) by arguing that Douglas was the “heretic”:

> I believe the entire records of the world, from the date of the Declaration of Independence up to within three years ago, may be searched in vain for one single affirmation, from one single man, that the negro was not included in the Declaration of Independence. I think I may defy Judge Douglas to show that he ever said so, that Washington ever said so, that any President ever said so, that any member of Congress ever said so, or that any living man upon the whole earth ever said so, until the necessities of the present policy of the Democratic party, in regard to slavery, had to invent that affirmation.

Repeating that Douglas saw no distinction between the ownership of blacks and "of horses and every other sort of property," Lincoln pointed out that Jefferson once said regarding slavery that "he trembled for his country when he remembered that God was just," and he offered to pay Douglas "the highest premium in my power . . . if he will show that he, in all his life, ever uttered a sentiment at all akin to that of Jefferson."[47]

The sixth debate at Quincy, Illinois, raised nothing new about race, although Douglas quoted various statements by Lincoln on "negro equality" to depict them as contradictory—which was easily done, given Lincoln's tendency to word his statements so the audience could read into them more than he actually said. But when Douglas suggested Lincoln was afraid to declare in the more proslavery south of Illinois the same views that he professed in the more antislavery north, Lincoln pointed out that all his views and Douglas's were in print all over the state.[48]

In the last debate in Alton, Illinois, all the set pieces were brought out for their final performance, although Lincoln labored to explain away a problem that arose from his assertion at Galesburg that until three years ago, no one had ever said, "The negro was not included in the Declaration of Independence." A letter to a newspaper asserted that Henry Clay had done just that, so Lincoln now quoted extensively from Clay's speeches, splitting some hairs unconvincingly. Lincoln argued that, formerly, some politicians had said that the statement "all men are created equal" was simply untrue (for even among whites inequalities existed), but now some politicians—perhaps espousing polygenism—were declaring that the statement was true for all members of the white race but not for negroes because they were not fully men and therefore lacked the capacity for self-government. Lincoln thus got himself out of a hole by continuing to characterize Douglas's view as a recent break with "the old faith."[49]

Despite his tremendous fight over a period of four months, Lincoln learned a few weeks later that the state legislature was still controlled by the Democrats, enough of whom were sufficiently loyal to reelect Douglas to his Senate seat in January 1859. Lincoln was disappointed, yet in letters to friends, he took consolation in a battle well fought, and this is consistent with another fragment of writing that must date roughly to this period. He admitted that "the honors of official station" were appealing, "yet I have never failed—do not now fail—to remember that in the republican cause there is a higher aim than that of mere office." And he reminded himself that it took "a hundred years" for British reformers to end their slave trade while arguing against the "stealthy 'don't care' opponents; the 'dollar and cent opponents'; the 'inferior race opponents'; and the 'religion and good order opponents.'" And "school-boys know that Wilberforce and Granville Sharp helped that cause forward; but who can now name a single man who labored to retard it?"[50]

Although defeated in a second Senate race, Lincoln did not give up the struggle. He was soon back in the thick of the fight against the Democrats, the slavocracy, and Stephen A. Douglas, while the Republican Party sought a candidate who could beat Douglas in the presidential election of 1860. Lincoln undoubtedly wanted to be that candidate but knew the likelihood of his nomination was minute.

For a brief spell, Lincoln gave the appearance of simply returning to his family and law practice and to a new activity, lecturing. But his only lecture did not go down particularly well, possibly because his message about man's ability to control his own destiny was somewhat lost amid the jokes, the playfulness with the Bible masked as orthodoxy, and the indirect references to Douglas. Only one important line about race slipped in: Lincoln's mocking reference to "the invention of negroes, or, of the present mode of using them, in 1434." Negroes had existed before the fifteenth century and so had slavery, but it was not until then that slavery was somehow justified by race. And what Lincoln had been mulling over even before 1854 was a more recently invented notion about "the negro": that civilized nineteenth-century men should continue this barbaric fifteenth-century practice of slavery because some authorities had recently decided that negroes were not only different or alien but also incapable of looking after themselves since they had been created separately from white men and as an inferior lot. It was a notion that tried to make slavery seem "good," when Lincoln had always known—and suspected everybody else knew, deep down—that slavery was always evil.

Publications and Crocodiles, 1859–60

By the time he turned fifty in February 1859, Charles Darwin had been working on his abstract for seven months and thought it nearly finished. Yet another eight months passed before Darwin signed off the corrected proofs. Immediately, on 2 October, the exhausted Darwin escaped to another water-cure establishment, this time in Yorkshire, to await the 22 November publication date for On the Origin of Species by Means of Natural Selection.

Darwin had deliberately left man out of The Origin for reasons explained over a decade later, in the introduction to The Descent of Man:

> During many years I collected notes on the origin or descent of man, without any intention of publishing on the subject, but rather with the determination not to publish, as I thought that I should thus only add to the prejudices against my views. It seemed to me sufficient to indicate in the first edition of my "Origin of Species," that by this work "light would be thrown on the origin of man and his history," and this implies that man must be included with other organic beings in any general conclusion respecting his manner of appearance on this earth.[1]

Darwin's notebooks confirm how long and how intensely he had "collected notes" on man, only to set them aside so that the data employed to demonstrate natural selection would not include the shocking idea that man had not been directly created in God's image. However, the subject of mankind's origins simply refused to be postponed.

Charles Lyell had been keeping his own notebooks on species since 1855, but in 1859, just after reading the proof sheets for The Origin, he began writing Darwin long letters in which the topic of man kept recurring.[2] Lyell suggested it was "impossible that intellectual powers of a species should be much improved by the continued natural selection of the most intellectual individuals." Darwin countered that intellectual powers could be as important for the welfare of an individual as "corporeal structure," therefore "the most intellectual individuals of a species" could be "continually selected." He added that the "effects of inherited mental exercise" might also assist certain individuals—an example of Lamarckian "acquired characteristics" that Darwin never completely abandoned. Although Darwin needed to ponder this further, for the moment he was content to allow that the different human races might vary not only in skin color and hair texture but also, theoretically, in intellect, whether resulting from long-standing or recently acquired inheritance. However acquired, a differential in intellect might help explain the devastation he witnessed when the Beagle carried him to Brazil, Australia, and South Africa, where whites were destroying nonwhite populations: "I look at this process as now going on with the races of man; the less intellectual races being exterminated. But there is not space to discuss this point." In another response to Lyell, Darwin wrote, "The Races of Man offer great difficulty. . . . I do not think the doctrine . . . of Agassiz that there are several species of man, helps us in the least," but he again broke off: "Much too long a subject for letter."[3]

A few days later, he sent a letter to Agassiz to accompany a gift copy of The Origin. Darwin's publisher was sending presentation copies to nearly a hundred of Darwin's friends and colleagues, and early in November, Darwin began posting separate notes to announce the gift and, in some cases, to cushion its landing. The note written to Agassiz on 11 November was more terse than most:

> I have ventured to send you, a copy of my Book (as yet only an abstract) on the origin of species. As the conclusions at which I have arrived on several points differ so widely from yours, I have thought (should you at any time read my volume) that you might think that I had sent it to you out of a spirit of defiance or bravado; but I assure you that I act under a wholly different frame of mind. I hope that you will at least give me credit, however erroneous you may think my conclusion, for having earnestly endeavoured to arrive at the truth.[4]

No reply is recorded, and some time passed before Darwin heard—indirectly—of Agassiz's reaction to the book itself, but in the meantime, and even before the book was on general sale, Darwin began to receive comments from others, including reviewers, who had received gift copies. The Athenaeum's reviewer, jumping feet first into the issue Darwin had avoided, asked, "If a monkey has become a man, what may not man become?"[5] Darwin disliked "the manner in which [the reviewer] drags in immortality, & sets the Priests at me & leaves me to their mercies. . . . He would on no account burn me; but he will get the wood ready & tell the black beasts how to catch me."[6] Equally unpleasant was a letter from Darwin's old mess mate Admiral Robert FitzRoy: "I, at least, cannot find anything 'ennobling' in the thought of being a descendant of even the most ancient Ape."[7] Likewise Darwin received a scathing letter from his old Cambridge professor Adam Sedgwick, who impishly referred to himself as a "son of a monkey."[8]

Fortunately, there were many more encouraging letters of support and admiration, such as those sent by a London-based naturalist Darwin had long respected, William B. Carpenter.[9] Darwin was even more pleased when Carpenter published two highly favorable reviews.[10] Carpenter, who was strongly antislavery, did not hesitate to note The Origin's implications for the study of man: "Orthodoxy (on this side of the Atlantic at least) is decidedly in favour of the abolition of the two-and-twenty species into which man has been divided by some zoologists."[11]

Darwin frequently commented to close associates about the number of scientists who seemed to be accepting that natural selection resolved many questions while raising many more. Clergyman, author, and amateur naturalist Charles Kingsley sent Darwin such words of praise that Darwin asked permission to quote them in the next edition. This was soon underway as Darwin's publisher wrote that the first edition of 1,250 copies had sold out on the first day, and he wished to print 3,000 more.[12] Darwin insisted on a few changes, including this on page 481: "A celebrated author and divine [Kingsley] has written to me that 'he has gradually learnt to see that it is just as noble a conception of the Deity to believe that He created a few original forms capable of self-development into other and needful forms, as to believe that He required a fresh act of creation to supply the voids caused by the action of His laws.'" Darwin also inserted three words in the final sentence of the book: "There is a grandeur in this view of life, with its several powers, having been originally breathed by the Creator into a few forms or into one." Likewise, Darwin added at the front of the book an epigraph by eighteenth-century divine Joseph Butler, author of Analogy of Religion, Natural, and Revealed (1736), a highly rational and influential effort to show that morality and religion are essential components of nature and common life: "The only distinct meaning of the word 'natural' is stated, fixed, or settled; since what is natural as much requires and presupposes an intelligent agent to render it so, i.e., to effect it continually or at stated times, as what is supernatural or miraculous does to effect it for once." Darwin was signaling that natural selection could be considered a secondary cause, the primary still being God. Interestingly, a journalist friend of Lincoln's listed "Butler's Analogy of Religion" as the first of three "philosophical books" that he knew Lincoln particularly liked.[13] Arguably, Lincoln could accept more of Butler's views than Darwin could.

While Darwin was seeing the first two editions of The Origin through publication, Abraham Lincoln was engaged in his only venture into the world of book publishing—although nearly half of his book was essentially produced by Stephen A. Douglas, for it was a collection of their speeches and debates, mostly during the 1858 Senate campaign. If one subtracted Douglas's half as well as the parts where both speakers repeated or quoted the same arguments in subsequent debates, the core of Lincoln's argumentation would fill about a fifth of the volume's length. While Darwin was boiling his work down to an "abstract," Lincoln was compiling a work that was hugely repetitious: yet, that was part of the message.

He wanted a larger public to know that, despite Douglas's allegations, both men had been consistent in their views from start to finish. If Douglas, as seemed likely, was soon to run for the presidency, Lincoln wanted it known that Douglas had not modified his views simply because he had got himself in trouble with the Buchanan administration and with the more radical of southern leaders. Lincoln made clear that Douglas remained the only politician in America who had not declared that slavery was either a good or a bad thing.

Although Lincoln lost the Senate election, he had weakened Douglas's position generally and repulsed his worst attacks on the Republican Party. Lincoln decided also that other Republican leaders—William H. Seward, Salmon P. Chase, and Edward Bates, for example—were putting forward the party's message in ways that were not always the most helpful to the national party. It took Lincoln over a year to get his book before the public, during which time Lincoln increasingly received invitations to speak in other states on behalf of Republican candidates and principles. The purpose of the book evolved from helping the party generally to improving his own growing chances of becoming his party's nominee for the 1860 presidential election—an unlikely prospect when he started the work. Even during the debates, Lincoln had compiled a "scrapbook" of newspaper accounts and later filled gaps with further newspaper reports, "being desirous," he told a friend, "of preserving in some permanent form the late joint discussions." A month later, the issue was no longer merely preservation: "There is some probability that my Scrap-book will be reprinted."[14]

Lincoln managed successfully to avoid the appearance of self-promotion, to create a text that did not falsify his own or Douglas's original statements, and to prevent anyone, especially Douglas, gaining a veto over any aspect of the book. Modern analysis indicates that Lincoln did indeed make only "small verbal corrections"—as he described them when predictably accused of being unfair to Douglas.[15] Fortunately, a group of Ohio Republicans decided Lincoln had the potential to lead the party rather better than Chase, Ohio's ambitious governor, and rather publicly arranged for the debates to be printed in Cincinnati. However, Lincoln actively ensured that neither the Ohioans nor Douglas gained any editorial control over the project.[16]

Various delays meant that The Political Debates between Hon. Abraham Lincoln and Hon. Stephen A. Douglas in the Celebrated Campaign of 1858 in Illinois did not go on sale until May 1860, but the publishers later claimed thirty thousand were sold—which, at that point, was several times more than On the Origin of Species.[17] Sales were helped by the fact that Lincoln had by then become the Republican Party's candidate for the 1860 presidential election, expecting to challenge the Democratic Party's presumed nominee, Stephen A. Douglas.

The Ohioans who backed the publication had been impressed not only by the 1858 debates but also by speeches Lincoln gave in Ohio, Indiana, Iowa, Wisconsin, and Kansas prior to local elections in the fall of 1859. The speeches mostly covered familiar ground, but Lincoln raised new points in response to a speech Douglas delivered in November 1858, shortly after the Illinois campaign. Trying to shore up support in the south, Douglas said in Memphis:

> If old Joshua R. Giddings [a noted abolitionist] should raise a colony in Ohio and settle down in Louisiana, he would be the strongest advocate of slavery in the whole South; he would find when he got there his opinion would be very much modified; he would find on those sugar plantations it was not a question between the white man and the negro, but between the negro and the crocodile. He would say that between the negro and the crocodile, he took the side of the negro. But, between the negro and the white man, he would go for the white man.[18]

Douglas's point, amid the jesting, was that environment determined interests that determined values, slavery being "natural" in the southern climate and (less explicitly) the negro being "natural" for slavery. More than nine months passed before Lincoln found the suitable occasion to respond, when Ohio Republicans invited him in September 1859 to visit in order to counter the effect of Douglas's campaigning in their state. By the time Lincoln arrived in Columbus, Douglas had already spoken there a week earlier, using the crocodile story again: "In Ohio it is a question only between the white man and the negro. [laughter.] But if you go further South you will find that it is a question between the negro and the crocodile. [Renewed laughter.]"[19]

In a long speech, Lincoln mentioned Douglas's crocodile story three times in order to caricature the amorality of Douglas's position.

> [T]here is no wrong in slavery, and whoever wants it has a right to have it, is a matter of dollars and cents, a sort of question as to how they shall deal with brutes, that between us and the negro here there is no sort of question, but that at the South the question is between the negro and the crocodile. That is all. It is a mere matter of policy; there is a perfect right according to interest to do just as you please.

Lincoln again charged Douglas with undermining traditional views.

> [T]here has been a change . . . and a very significant change it is, being no less than changing the negro, in your estimation, from the rank of a man to that of a brute. They are taking him down, and placing him, when spoken of, among reptiles and crocodiles, as Judge Douglas himself expresses it. . . . [He is] blowing out the moral lights around us; teaching that the negro is no longer a man but a brute; that the Declaration has nothing to do with him; that he ranks with the crocodile and the reptile. . . . [T]here is now going on among you a steady process of debauching public opinion on this subject.[20]

Lincoln repeated this attack the following day in Cincinnati, adding that Douglas "did not make that declaration accidentally at Memphis. He made it a great many times in the canvass in Illinois last year, (though I don't know that it was reported in any of his speeches there,) but he frequently made it. . . . It is, then, a deliberate way of expressing himself upon that subject."[21] Lincoln's memory may be better than our records, but there is no evidence—and it is unlikely—that Douglas mentioned crocodiles during the Illinois campaigns. Lincoln also drew some doubtful inferences: "that if you do not enslave the negro you are wronging the white man in some way or other, and that whoever is opposed to the negro being enslaved is in some way or other against the white man. Is not that a falsehood?" Lincoln argued that there was no "necessary conflict between the white man and the negro," that "there is room enough for us all to be free," and that Douglas was actually making "a sort of proposition in proportion, which may be stated thus: As the negro is to the white man, so is the crocodile as a beast or reptile, so the white man may rightfully treat the negro as a beast or a reptile." Lincoln apparently repeated this point in speeches in Indiana and Wisconsin, adding: "These are Douglas' sentiments. The man who expresses such sentiments as these can see no moral wrong in slavery."[22]

Building on the political momentum of his successful tour in Ohio and Indiana, Lincoln was pleased to accept an invitation to speak in February 1860 at the Cooper Institute in New York City. In his address, Lincoln focused almost entirely on the issue of federal power relating to the extension of slavery into federal territories. Backed up by solid research, Lincoln proved that the views of the founding fathers differed from those of Senator Douglas and Chief Justice Roger B. Taney. But underlying this issue, Lincoln said, was the fact that Republicans considered slavery an evil while their opponents considered it a good. All else flowed from this. Significantly, Lincoln did not explain why slavery was evil, apparently seeing no need to tell this particular audience that blacks were human beings.[23] During a subsequent tour of New England, Lincoln returned to the usual themes. Only newspaper summaries exist for most of these speeches, but when Lincoln spoke in Hartford, he employed for the first and last time the phrase "natural theology" while playfully inverting William Paley's "design argument" to prove not God's existence but slavery's evil: "I think that if anything can be proved by natural theology, it is that slavery is morally wrong. God gave man a mouth to receive bread, hands to feed it, and his hand has a right to carry bread to his mouth without controversy." Lincoln thus acknowledged the question of whether God had or had not ordained that the different races of men were "equal," but he ridiculed those (such as Douglas) who thought "that the Almighty has drawn a line across the country, south of which the land is always to be cultivated by slave labor; when the question is between the white man and the nigger, they go in for the white man; when it is between the nigger and the crocodile, they take sides with the nigger." Lincoln's use of "nigger" further disparaged Douglas's attitude.[24]

Everyone understood the battle between Lincoln and Douglas to be about slavery, but it was actually about mankind. When Douglas first tried out his crocodile story on a Memphis audience in November 1858, he was stressing the negro's superiority to a reptile and inferiority to a white man. Lincoln argued in the September 1859 that there was no "necessary conflict between the white man and the negro," because both were men. Three months later, when On the Origin of Species arrived from England, racial conflict was not ostensibly the topic of the book, which instead described how conflict, or at least competition, might occur both between and within rather mutable but nonhuman species. And although the book did not even discuss mankind, everyone understood that it somehow had great bearing both on human origins and diversification.

More Debates and New Reviews

The first copies of On the Origin of Species sent to America went mostly to New England during the winter of 1859–60. Harvard's Asa Gray had already employed Darwin's theory in tense debates with Louis Agassiz and had reported to Joseph Dalton Hooker that Agassiz "was worried a great deal." Twenty years later, he remembered Agassiz exhorting him privately: "Gray, we must stop this."[1] Agassiz had escaped briefly to Europe in June 1859 to purchase materials for his new museum, pick up the Cross of the Legion of Honor in Paris, and dine in London with old friends such as Richard Owen and Sir Charles Lyell.[2] His visit left no trace in the correspondence of Darwin, then checking proofs of The Origin. Agassiz was back in Boston by the fall and probably received his copy just before Christmas 1859, as did Gray.

Agassiz's reading of The Origin was slowed as he heavily annotated his presentation copy, still preserved in Harvard's Museum of Comparative Zoology. Gray read Darwin's book between Christmas and New Year and praised it to Hooker with great emphasis before adding that Agassiz "says it is poor—very poor!! (entre nous). The fact is he growls over it, like a well cudgelled dog,—is very much annoyed by it—to our great delight." Expecting Agassiz to write a review, Gray began working on one himself: "And really it is no easy job. . . . I doubt if I shall please you altogether. I know I shall not please Agassiz at all."[3]

Darwin entered the new year in a fine mood and penned another ironic statement to Gray: "That great man Agassiz, when he comes to reason seems to me as great in taking a wrong view as he is great in observing & classifying."[4] The first edition of The Origin had already garnered some good reviews and converted a few fence-sitters, a second edition was about to appear, and Darwin was delighted that Lyell, whose authority with the public far exceeded his own, was now planning to include "a grand discussion" on the origins of man in the next edition of Principles of Geology.[5]

Soon Gray informed Darwin that Agassiz "has been helping the circulation of your book by denouncing it as atheistical in a public lecture! I suspect, also, he means to attack it in the Atlantic Monthly. The book annoys him; and I suppose the contrast I run between his theories and yours will annoy him still more." Gray discovered that Agassiz was also attacking Darwin and Gray in classroom lectures, remarking on the "laziness" of "those naturalists who adopt some pleasing but false theory like that of Darwin instead of investigating the difficult point of Science." An infuriated Gray wrote a few days later to Francis Boott (his and Darwin's mutual friend in London) that he wanted "to stop Agassiz's mouth with his own words, and to show up his loose way of putting things. He is a sort of demagogue, and always talks to the rabble." Darwin asked Hooker to preserve part of one of Gray's letter that was "rich about Agassiz" and informed his publisher that he was pleased by the "excitement my Book has made amongst Naturalists in U. States," repeating Gray's point that Agassiz's denunciations made "a fine advertisement!"[6]

Suddenly, Darwin was shocked to learn from Gray that in The Origin he had wrongly attributed to Agassiz a moderately embarrassing statement about having difficulty in distinguishing different types of embryos.[7] Agassiz denied he had ever said it, Gray hoped Darwin could provide a reference, and Darwin had to admit he had confused Agassiz with Karl Von Baer. Darwin's explanation to Gray unattractively combined remorse with self-defense: "I have shamefully blundered. . . . Please forward enclosed to Agassiz & read if you think worthwhile. I wrote all latter part of volume from memory, & it is a blessing more blunders have not yet been detected: but the state of my health left me no choice: I felt on the point of quite breaking down." The enclosure—presumably an apology—is not recorded or mentioned elsewhere in Darwin's or Agassiz's correspondence, unless there is some connection with Darwin's statement to Gray two months later that a Harvard chemistry professor visiting England "brought me direct from Agassiz all sorts of very civil speeches. What can this mean? I hope to God A. is a sincere man; I had always fancied that he was so." Darwin prefaced this, "I shall be very curious to see Agassiz's remarks" in the anticipated review.[8]

Darwin described Gray's review for the American Journal of Science as "admirable; by far the best which I have read." He added needlessly, "By the way if Agassiz writes anything on [the] subject, I hope you will tell me."[9] The strengthening alliance between Darwin and Gray was obvious to Boott, who perceptively commented to Darwin that Gray "does not grapple with your hypothesis, . . . nor do I see how he could, in the wish he had to oppose Agassiz."[10] The Gray-Darwin alliance could not be put at risk; differences between them were submerged. When Gray maintained in publications and in correspondence that there was some divine planning in the universe that Darwin's natural selection in no way undermined, Darwin did not wrangle, considering Gray's assertion useful against charges of atheism: "I have been interested by your theological remarks in the Review, but I must reconsider them." He wrote of "an uncomfortable puzzle . . . quite beyond the scope of the human intellect" and shielded himself with the fact that Gottfried Leibniz had attacked Sir Isaac Newton's law of gravity as "'subversive of all Natural Religion'!!" To Lyell, Darwin wrote, "How splendidly Asa Gray is fighting the battle," while to Hooker, he expressed amusement, "Agassiz pities me much at being so deluded."[11]

Although William H. Herndon probably purchased his copy of The Origin soon after it appeared at the end of 1859, Lincoln had little free time and probably less inclination to read such a work. Lincoln's secretary John Hay later wrote that Lincoln "made no attempt to keep pace with the ordinary literature of the day, [although] sometimes he read a scientific work with keen appreciation, but he pursued no systematic course."[12] It appears that Herndon believed Lincoln never read The Origin. Once, after mentioning works by various authors including Darwin, Herndon wrote, "Lincoln read some parts of these books and reviews. I admit he read none of them thoroughly at a sitting; he would read by snatches, a little here and there now and then." Lincoln was "a firm believer in the theory of development," said Herndon, but "as presented in The Vestiges of Creation."[13] On whether Lincoln changed his views about religion after becoming president, Herndon wrote, "There is no evidence of this, especially as to the extent of the change, nor which way. Did he go toward the force and matter theory of the universe, toward [Herbert] Spencer and Darwin?"[14] The very question shows Herndon had little idea what Lincoln might have thought of Spencer or Darwin. Herndon deeply admired Spencer, carefully annotating and indexing his 1855 London edition of Principles of Psychology, but if Herndon ever discussed Spencer or Darwin with his law partner, it was probably a fairly one-sided conversation.[15] Even if Lincoln never read The Origin, he could not have avoided the numerous reviews that appeared in several publications to which he had access. Indeed, no one with any interest in science could have been unaware of Darwin's general views—if only because they were so strongly opposed by America's best-known scientist, Louis Agassiz.

In the late spring of 1860, Darwin thanked Alfred Russel Wallace for his generous praise of The Origin and mentioned his delight that Lyell "this autumn will publish on Geological History of Man." "One thing I see most plainly," Darwin told Hooker, "that without Lyell, yours, Huxley & Carpenter's aid my book would have been a mere flash in the pan."[16] These expressions of modesty by Darwin, although sincere, also served to bind colleagues more closely to him. While Lincoln was busy garnering support as he launched his campaign for the Republican presidential nomination, Darwin was letting others campaign on his behalf through favorable reviews, arranging foreign editions and translations, and defending Darwin's views at scientific conferences. Gray performed most of those tasks in America, but Darwin was also ably defended when the British Association for the Advancement of Science met in Oxford in June 1860.[17] Darwin chose not to attend, partly because of his own and his eldest daughter's ill health and mainly because the discussions, like so many of the reviews, were bound to concentrate on man's descent from earlier forms, the topic Darwin hoped Lyell would soon be treating authoritatively. For Darwin, any indignity from being descended through an unplanned process from some hairy primate was vastly outweighed by the social value of demonstrating the equality among men logically implied by that common origin. However, Darwin knew that his critics were interested not only in whether man was "created" once or several times in different places but also in whether God had any hand in it at all—a subject even more carefully avoided in The Origin.

The main event at Oxford occurred at a session opened by a native of Liverpool but now professor of chemistry in New York, John William Draper.[18] Draper was known for his denunciations of organized religion, and the title announced for his address, "On the Intellectual Development of Europe, Considered with Reference to the Views of Mr. Darwin," caused rumors that either Bishop Samuel Wilberforce or Owen would use Draper's presentation as an excuse to launch an attack on Darwin's views. Wilberforce did exactly that, alluding at some point to earlier remarks by Thomas Huxley and asking whether "it was through his grandfather or grandmother that he claimed descent from a monkey." The actual wording of the question is as uncertain as the wording of Huxley's famous reply: "If I would rather have a miserable ape for a grandfather or a man highly endowed by nature and possessed of great means and influence, and yet who employs those faculties for the mere purpose of introducing ridicule into a grave scientific discussion—I unhesitatingly affirm my preference for the ape."[19]

Almost as startling as this exchange was the interjection at its end by an admiral who rose to his feet with a Bible in his hand. Robert FitzRoy, Darwin's old companion from the Beagle, attended the conference to make a report on meteorology but stayed to hear the discussion of Darwin's theories. He exclaimed to a departing audience paying little attention that he was sorry he had ever given Darwin the opportunity to collect evidence for his "shocking theory." J. S. Henslow, Darwin's old Cambridge mentor, who had chaired the session, mentioned this to Darwin, who replied, "I did not hear of poor FitzRoy with the Bible at the Geographical Section—I think his mind is often on Verge of insanity."[20]

"I really think his mind has deteriorated within a few years," Gray wrote to Hooker—not about FitzRoy but about Agassiz and as some explanation why by the end of March 1860 he still had not published his review of The Origin. "I do not wonder that he hesitates to commit himself to print."[21] When Agassiz's review finally appeared in the American Journal of Science in July, it was in the form of a ten-page "digression" from a two-page discussion of jellyfish that was to appear in the third volume of Agassiz's Contributions to the Natural History of the United States, then "in press." The tone and language were unscholarly verging on the ungentlemanly, declaring that "the arguments presented by Darwin in favor of a universal derivation from one primary form . . . have not made the slightest impression on my mind, nor modified in any way the views I have already propounded." Agassiz dismissed Darwin's work with phrases such as "unsupported by fact," "ingenious circumlocution," "illogical deductions and misrepresentations," "he overlooks," "he ought to know," "has failed to establish a connection," "he does not even seem correctly to understand," "futile," and "remote from the truth." Agassiz's conclusion was unsurprising apart from the moralizing point in the final clause: "I shall therefore consider the transmutation theory as a scientific mistake, untrue in its facts, unscientific in its methods, and mischievous in its tendency."[22]

Defending Darwin's theory in the July and August issues of Atlantic Monthly, Gray picked up on Agassiz's last remark by writing that "several features of [Darwin's] theory have an uncanny look. They may prove to be innocent: but their first aspect is suspicious, and high authorities pronounce the whole thing to be positively mischievous."[23] Gray was skilled at defending Darwin's views without appearing partisan—and, indeed, without mentioning his disagreement with Darwin about God's possible role. But it was exactly because Gray argued that natural selection was not incompatible with "design" that he was able to minimize the science versus religion dispute—in contrast to Darwin's "bull-dog" in England, Huxley, who reveled in baiting bishops. Rather boldly, Gray also raised the controversial topic of man. While Agassiz's review had avoided the issue (and any reminders of his own views about negroes), Gray was the first to suggest that natural selection actually resolved the debate between what he termed "uni-humanitarians" and "multi-humanitarians."

> Indeed, when we consider the endless disputes of naturalists and ethnologists over the human races, as to whether they belong to one species or to more, and if to more, whether to three, or five, or fifty, we can hardly help fancying that both may be right,—or rather, that the uni-humanitarians would have been right several thousand years ago, and the multi-humanitarians will be a few thousand years later; while at present the safe thing to say is, that, probably, there is some truth on both sides.[24]

Gray skirted around the problem that man's "common ancestor" was no longer Adam by first looking to the future and offering the appealing prospect that the present species of man might make further progress. Gray's discussion of human origins had less appeal.

> It is only the backward glance, the gaze up the long vista of the past, that reveals anything alarming. Here the lines converge as they recede into the geological ages, and point to conclusions which, upon the theory, are inevitable, but by no means welcome. The first step backwards makes the Negro and the Hottentot our blood-relations—not that reason or Scripture objects to that, though > pride may. The next suggests a closer association of our ancestors of the olden time with "our poor relations" of the quadrumanous family than we like to acknowledge.[25]

Gray's Atlantic Monthly review is very likely the source that brought Lincoln closest to The Origin, assuming he probably never read the book himself. And just now, since political tradition prevented the Republican nominee from hitting the campaign trail personally, Lincoln perhaps had leisure to scan the Atlantic Monthly. Having once said we should "discard all this quibbling" about races while simultaneously parrying Douglas's pseudoscientific attacks on the inferiority of black people, Lincoln could appreciate Gray's use of ambiguous language that left it to the reader to work out how equal or unequal this made whites and blacks. After undermining Agassiz's notion of separate primordial creations, Gray went no further than to say, "It is practically very difficult, perhaps impossible, to draw a clear line between races and species. Witness the human races, for instance." We know from Lincoln's fragment about Niagara Falls that he accepted that the Earth's history was much longer than the traditional six thousand years, so he would have been interested by Gray's assertion that the Earth has, indeed, been around long enough for the slow processes of natural selection to have taken place. Assuming Lincoln was at least aware of Agassiz's opposition to Darwin's views, he could have admired Gray's clever defense of those views by using his opponent's own testimony: "Agassiz tells us that the same species of polyps which are now building coral walls around the present peninsula of Florida actually made that peninsula, and have been building there for centuries which must be reckoned by thousands."[26]

While preserving the religious concept of design, Gray admitted that natural selection jettisoned the traditional date and manner of the Biblical creation, a point expressed less elegantly by Josiah Nott to fellow polygenist E. G. Squier in August 1860: "I have been well enough to skim Darwin's book—the man is clearly crazy, but it is a capital dig into the parsons—it stirs up Creation & much good comes out [of] such thorough discussion."[27]

In his references to early man, Gray employed information beyond his own botanical expertise, such as the man-made flint tools found beside the bones of animals now extinct. Lyell was investigating exactly this evidence for inclusion in his study of early man—for which Darwin was waiting impatiently. "I expect your Book on Geological History of man will with a vengeance be a bomb-shell," he told Lyell at the end of July. "I hope it will not be very long delayed."[28]

To Huxley, Darwin described Agassiz's review as a "weak metaphysical & theological attack on the Origin" and to Lyell as "not good at all. . . . Asa Gray tells me that a very clever friend has been almost converted to our side by this Review." Darwin told Gray he was "surprised that Agassiz did not succeed in writing something better. How absurd that logical quibble: 'if species do not exist how can they vary?' As if anyone doubted their temporary existence." The review seemed "hardly worth a detailed answer (even if I could do it, & I much doubt whether I possess your skill in picking out salient points & driving a nail into them)."[29]

Darwin arranged to have Gray's Atlantic articles republished in Boston and London as a pamphlet entitled Natural Selection Not Inconsistent with Natural Theology. A Free Examination of Darwin's Treatise on the Origin of Species, and of Its American Reviewers. Although doing this mainly to deflect religious criticism, Darwin was also promulgating Gray's discussion of the origins of man, the topic on which he himself was delaying any publication while hoping that Lyell would soon be publishing his work.

Darwin and Lyell exchanged ideas on man's origins during the summer and fall of 1860, with Darwin clarifying that the human races are "certainly descended from single parent" and "infinitely closer" to each other "than to any ape"; that it was "probable that the races of man were less numerous & less divergent formerly than now"; and that perhaps one or more among the races of man had already "become extinct," such as "some lower & more aberrant race, even than the Hottentot"—whose existence Darwin had good reason to fear might soon end. Darwin concurred with Lyell that the "White man is 'improving off the face of the earth' even races nearly his equals." He pointed out that "Agassiz & Co. think the Negro & Caucasian are now distinct species," yet whether the polygenists would have called them different species when they were formerly "less distinct" is essentially a "vain discussion" since they do not accept that species change anyway.[30] This last point suggests Darwin found Gray's argument—that natural selection reconciled monogenist and polygenist views—less than convincing; however, Gray's view would later prove more relevant than Darwin's when polygenists discovered they could co-opt natural selection to serve their own purposes by, in effect, replacing "multiple creations" with "multiple variations" as the explanation for the inequality between races.

Meanwhile, Darwin was pleased that, along with Lyell and Gray, Henslow was also investigating whether the discoveries of flint tools really provided evidence of men existing at the same time as now extinct animals. Meanwhile, Huxley was continuing to argue against Owen's sharp distinction between man and other primates by coming up with concepts such as a "pithecoid pedigree" for mankind that in no way lowered "the great and princely dignity of perfect manhood." However, Lyell then broke the news that his "work on antiquity of Man is entirely suspended" while he produce new editions of his two standard works on geology, though he promised these would include "nearly all I can say on the subject."[31] Darwin would have to be patient.

Lincoln also had to allow others to campaign on his behalf while he avoided issuing any statement that might be interpreted as some divergence from the party platform. Meanwhile, southern Democrats had splintered their party by refusing to acknowledge Stephen A. Douglas's nomination and backing instead a second Democrat, John C. Breckenridge. Realizing he could not now win the election, Douglas could nevertheless weaken his foes so that the party might later reunite under his leadership before the next election in 1864. He might also limit Lincoln's electoral success in the north, yet, knowing Lincoln was almost certain to win, Douglas did his best to dissuade southern legislators from carrying out their threat to secede from the Union if a "Black Republican" was elected president. Douglas broke with tradition and toured the whole country, giving speeches with a grace that came from serving his country and not worrying that Lincoln might turn up for some debate.

Cooling his heels in Springfield, Lincoln probably read in the New York Times that Douglas, while pretending not to be politicking, tarried for a few days in August in Newport, Rhode Island, coinciding with the fourteenth annual meeting of the American Association for the Advancement of Science (AAAS). "Prof. Agassiz's address on Methods in Zoology, . . . had the first place on today's programme," wrote the Times reporter. "The hall . . . accordingly was excessively crowded with visitors, among whom [was] Senator Douglas." Reading on, Lincoln could learn that "Prof. Agassiz's address, however, was quite brief; nor did he touch any of the grand theories of Life—only in a single sentence skirting along the verges of the great Darwin problem."[32] On the previous day, while discussing someone's ethnological paper, Agassiz "threw out some linguistic observations—the same as occur in his communication to Nott and Gliddon's Indigenous Races—which proved him far from being as strong on philosophy as he is on fossils."[33] The Times reporter also accused the AAAS of "either cowardice or incompetence [because] the great Darwin question . . . [was] purposely and pointedly ignored."[34]

The AAAS, like the nation, was suffering from internal tensions, some sectional, some personal, but both sometimes overlapping on "the Darwin question." Few southern scientists attended this year's meeting, yet they held the balance between larger factions and found themselves controlling the association's higher offices.[35] Senator Douglas knew all about such maneuverings and the risks of compromising with southerners. If Lincoln's election triggered secession, Douglas knew the Republicans would have difficulty achieving compromise and that Lincoln would not let the Union fall apart without a fight.

The fear of an upcoming war heightened interest in the presentation on "modern warfare" by Captain Edward B. Hunt of the Coastal Survey. The Times reporter called Hunt's paper "an exceedingly pleasant mélange . . . not so severely scientific in character as most of the papers read." The captain told his audience, "War is the applied science of destructive projectiles, and the philosophy of military material depends on scientific application. . . . Warlike science needs to be progressive." Hunt spoke of "the steam-gun" of the future, the need for chemical production (rather than importation) of niter (or "saltpeter"), replacing smoothbores with rifled handguns and artillery, asphyxiating shells, balloon telegraphic observatories, and much more.[36] In the audience, Douglas may have mused that his opponent back in Springfield would probably read the newspaper account of Hunt's martial presentation with the grim interest of a one-time inventor and soon-to-be commander-in-chief.

Two months later, Lincoln won the presidential election, taking a majority of the electoral votes while winning only 39 percent of the popular vote: in ten southern states where the Republican party did not exist, Lincoln's name was not listed on the ballots. During the following four months, as several southern states seceded and as lame-duck President James Buchanan said he could do nothing about it, Lincoln kept silent, still lacking power to act and feeling that more words might simply exacerbate raw feelings. Although few southerners could vote for the Republicans, more than half voted for the "pro-union" candidates, Douglas and John Bell, rather than for the "secessionist" Breckenridge.[37] Lincoln was not being as irrational as his biographer David Herbert Donald has suggested by believing "that Unionists were in a majority throughout the South and that, given time for tempers to cool, they would be able to defeat the secessionist conspirators."[38]

If that rational hope proved wrong, Lincoln might need to consider the suggestions contained in the paper by Captain Hunt, who would never attend another AAAS conference. The next one was scheduled to meet in Nashville in April 1861, but the war's outbreak prevented it.

Designers and Inventors

Whatever else Lincoln may have seen in the newspapers, about two weeks after his election he certainly read about a speech "recently delivered (I think) before the Georgia Legislature, or its assembled members. If you have revised it, as is probable, I shall be much obliged if you will send me a copy."[1] Lincoln first met the speech's author, Alexander H. Stephens, twelve years earlier when they served as fellow Whigs in Congress. Back then, Lincoln wrote, "Mr. Stephens of Georgia, a little, slim, pale-faced, consumptive man . . . has just concluded the very best speech, of an hour's length, I ever heard." Even Stephen A. Douglas was happy to urge the audience during the 1858 debates to "read the speeches of that giant in intellect, Alexander H. Stephens, of Georgia."[2]

Now, with Lincoln elected president and several southern states already seceded from the union, Lincoln was impressed that on 14 November 1860, Stephens spoke during a stormy debate in Savannah about whether to secede, arguing impressively against secession—which few southern leaders of Stephens's stature had been doing lately. He asserted that constitutional checks should prevent Lincoln from restricting the extension of slavery, and if they did not, then Stephens himself would advocate secession: but he wanted the Republicans, not Georgia, to make the first wrong move.[3]

Lincoln would grasp at any unionist straw in the south, yet he was wary, probably recognizing what Stephens had left out of this address but had included in a speech delivered over a year earlier upon his retirement from Congress. In that 1859 speech, Stephens maintained, "African Slavery with us rests upon principles that can never be successfully assailed by reason or argument. . . . The world is grown wiser, and upon no subject more rapidly than that of the proper status of the negro. In my judgment there are more thinking men at the North now who look upon our system of Slavery as right, socially, morally and politically, than there were even at the South thirty years ago." Stephens admitted that "nearly all" of the founding fathers "were against" slavery, but "it was a question which they did not, and perhaps could not thoroughly understand at that time." According to

Stephens, the ancient Greeks' slave system failed because they enslaved people of their own race, but Americans had avoided this error and increasingly recognized that "subordination is the normal condition of the negro. This great truth, that such was the normal condition of any race, was not recognized in [the ancients'] theories." Going further into natural history, Stephens declared, "'Order is nature's first law'; [and] with it come gradation and subordination [as seen] in the vegetable and animal kingdoms, ranging . . . from the hugest monsters of life . . . to the smallest animalcule. . . . We see similar distinctions and gradations in the races of men—from the highest to the lowest type." Stephens concluded that it was folly to "attempt to make things equal which God in his wisdom has made unequal."[4]

Stephens had actually used a phrase echoing the subtitle of John H. Van Evrie's 1853 pamphlet, Negroes and Negro "Slavery": The First an Inferior Race; the Latter Its Normal Condition. This lends credence to Van Evrie's later claim that he once presented Stephens with a copy of the pamphlet, converting him into the "most complete exponent and advocate of the new doctrine among all the public men of the day."[5] Although Van Evrie's claim of directly influencing both Stephen A. Douglas and Alexander Stephens was unknown to Lincoln, he recognized that the same views, based on the new scientific racism, were offered by both men, if more thoughtfully by Stephens. Yet, Stephens's more recent speech against secession made no reference to race, and possibly Lincoln hoped Stephens had modified his views. When Stephens replied briefly to Lincoln's request for a copy of that speech, he confirmed that the press accounts were substantially correct and closed sympathetically: "No man ever had heavier or greater responsibilities resting upon him than you have in this present momentous crisis."[6]

Lincoln wrote back that he fully appreciated the present peril but said the people of the south had no reason to fear "that a Republican administration would directly, or indirectly, interfere with their slaves, or with them, about their slaves." Lincoln knew this assurance meant nothing: Stephens's argument for delaying secession was to allow southerners to oppose the one policy on which Lincoln could not yield—halting the expansion of slavery. But Lincoln went straight to the more essential difficulty: "You think slavery is right and ought to be extended; while we think it is wrong and ought to be restricted. That I suppose is the rub. It certainly is the only substantial difference between us."[7]

Stephens's reply also sought the essence: "The [Republican Party's] leading object . . . [has been] to put the institutions of nearly half the States under the ban of public opinion and national condemnation. . . . We at the South do think African slavery, as it exists with us, both morally and politically right. This opinion is founded upon the inferiority of the black race." Stephens freely admitted that since the writing of the Constitution, "the changes have been mainly to our side"—exactly Lincoln's point during his debates with Douglas—but also stressed that the union could not be saved by use of force. He could recommend no specific course of action except to suggest Lincoln should say something to modify the threat posed by his party's stated policy. Alluding to scripture, Stephens wrote, "A word 'fitly spoken' by you now would indeed be like 'apples of gold in pictures of silver.'"[8]

There was no further correspondence, yet that scriptural passage goaded Lincoln to write a memorandum as if in reply. In this fragment, Lincoln argued that "there is something back of these," and "that something is the principle of 'Liberty to all'" as stated in the Declaration of Independence. There was no need to make some statement now that might placate the south because "the assertion of that principle, at that time, was the word, 'fitly spoken' which has proved an 'apple of gold' to us."[9]

Both men had boiled the conflict down to the "inferiority of the black race" versus "liberty to all," and Lincoln would not consider that "all" could exclude blacks.

As the excitement over The Origin began to abate, Darwin returned to writing the first volume of his "big book," though he made little progress because of ill health and a sideline into the study of orchids. Meanwhile, he told Charles Lyell he feared "your volume on Geolog. Hist. of Man will slip through your fingers."[10] Darwin continued reading and thinking about man, was delighted to receive a gift copy of Jean Louis Armand de Quatrefages de Bréau's L'Unité de l'Espèce Humaine (1861), asked Lyell to help him obtain an 1850 pamphlet by Samuel G. Morton attacking John Bachman on issues of hybridity, and told Leonard Horner, outgoing president of the Geological Society, that he had learned a great deal from his recent address (which in part dealt with "Evidence of the early existence of the human race") even though Darwin "thought that I had read up pretty well on the antiquity of man."[11]

Darwin's correspondence with Asa Gray slackened after the intense exchanges during The Origin's publication, but also political events proved a distraction for Gray, and their differences over religion were becoming more visible. Although content that Gray's writings seemed to reconcile natural selection with "natural theology," Darwin was grieved "to say that I cannot honestly go as far as you do about Design. I am conscious that I am in an utterly hopeless muddle. I cannot think that the world, as we see it, is the result of chance; & yet I cannot look at each separate thing as the result of Design." Pressed to clarify his objections, Darwin balked, "I have no real objection, nor any real foundation, nor any clear view. As I before said I flounder hopelessly in the mud."[12]

While both Lincoln and Darwin had long since abandoned conventional Christianity, Lincoln was more content with the probability of design. Darwin did not like to see the world as "the result of chance" but allowed that we might see it wrongly in any case. He saw no evidence of a designer or any need to argue the point. For Lincoln, perhaps the most significant, yet bizarre, evidence of a designer, or perhaps of Providence, was the fact of his own life. By normal processes, someone of his origins should not have become the occupant of the White House. Lincoln knew how greatly his development had been the result of his own effort and will, and yet, as he now struggled with a crisis that had made him the sixteenth president of the thirty-three United States and threatened to reduce that number by eleven, Lincoln seemed almost eager to see evidence of Providence—some intended purpose—behind the threatened conflict. When confronting certain developments that were intrinsically inexplicable, Lincoln was at least willing to imagine some supernatural explanation, while Darwin was more insistent that at bottom there was some natural explanation. For all his much-vaunted rationalism, Lincoln still had a capacity, and perhaps a need, for the spiritual. And although Darwin took cover behind Gray's theistic essays, supportive quotations from the Reverend Charles Kingsley, and the Butler epigraph that asserted God's agency in the natural as well as the supernatural, he had little capacity for belief in the supernatural and less need.

About June 1861, Emma Darwin wrote a letter to Charles, the third and apparently last time she used this mode to express her mixed feelings of love for him and spiritual pain at his inability to see a role for God. While she felt "in my inmost heart your admirable qualities & feelings," she also expressed her hope "that you might direct them upwards, as well as to one who values them above every thing in the world." Around this time, Darwin told his friend Gray, "I have been led to think more on this subject [of design] of late, & grieve to say that I come to differ more from you [as a result of] studying lately domestic variations & seeing what an enormous field of undesigned variability there is ready for natural selection to appropriate for any purpose useful to each creature."[13]

Darwin closed that letter on a different topic: "But I suppose you are all too overwhelmed with public affairs to care for science. I never knew the newspapers so profoundly interesting." This was not the first time Darwin's correspondence revealed his concern about the political crisis developing in America, and several of Gray's letters from this time that have failed to survive may have made some reference to Lincoln's election or other political issues. Darwin showed his interest in a postscript: "Have you read Olmsted Journey in the Back Country; what a remarkably interesting Book."[14]

Frederick Law Olmsted, a New Englander who traveled extensively in the south, wrote perceptive accounts of his journeys. Darwin had already admired two that appeared in 1856 and 1857.[15] The book mentioned in Darwin's postscript was published in 1860 and also provided "an admirably lively picture of man & Slavery in the S. States," as Darwin wrote when he recommended Journey in the Back Country (twice) to Joseph Dalton Hooker.[16] One of Darwin's sons remembered his father "talking with horror of his sleepless nights when he could not keep out of his mind some incidents from Olmsted's [book, which] he had lately been reading." Similarly, another son recalled, "The remembrance of screams, or other sounds heard in Brazil, when he was powerless to interfere with what he believed to be the torture of a slave, haunted him for years, especially at night."[17]

In early 1861, as the secession crisis developed prior to Lincoln's inauguration, Darwin wrote to Gray, "I fear that the state of the U. States must stop all interest in everything not political." Gray had recently asked a fellow scientist in Charleston if there were no union men in South Carolina; "I answer none" was the reply.[18]

Lincoln's hopes that pro-union sentiment would eventually push aside the secessionist hotheads were fading as his inauguration approached in March and as Stephens was sworn in as Vice-President of the Confederacy on the very day that Lincoln began his slow train journey to Washington, D.C. Lincoln's farewell to his friends in Springfield struck a deeply religious note: "I go to assume a task more difficult than that which devolved upon General Washington. Unless the great God who assisted him, shall be with and aid me, I must fail. But if the same omniscient mind, and Almighty arm that directed and protected him, shall guide and support me, I shall not fail, I shall succeed. Let us all pray that the God of our fathers may not forsake us now."[19]

Similar sentiments were addressed to audiences all along the roundabout route to the nation's capital. On inauguration day, soldiers lined the streets, and riflemen watched from the rooftops as the president-elect proceeded to the swearing in. His inaugural address offered no concessions on fundamental issues but echoed Stephens's argument that the Republican administration had no authority to interfere with slavery where it already existed. He also paraphrased what he had told Stephens: "One section of our country believes slavery is right, and ought to be extended, while the other believes it is wrong, and ought not to be extended."[20] He did not attempt to explain the basis for those beliefs: whether one considered slavery right or wrong was largely determined by received tradition and economic interest, and scientific racism gave only a veneer of intellectual justification to preexisting attitudes.

Stephens had advised Lincoln that the union could not be maintained by force, and for the same tactical reason that made Stephens delay his support for secession, Lincoln declared he would not launch the first attack. The south would have to strike the first blow, as he knew eventually it would when the federal government, no longer led by the insipid Buchanan, stopped yielding to southern demands for control of federal installations in their states.

Despite southern claims to the contrary, Lincoln knew that the south actually lacked the "just cause" their grandfathers had when they seceded from the British Empire. Instead of basing the Confederate system on liberty, even the most brilliant of southern leaders made the mistake of basing the Confederacy on the doctrine of negro inferiority. Two weeks after Lincoln's inauguration, Stephens delivered what became known as the Cornerstone Speech, which echoed ideas found in Van Evrie's writings and in Stephens's retirement speech two years earlier.

> Our new government is founded upon [and] its cornerstone rests upon the great truth, that the negro is not equal to the white man; that slavery—subordination to the superior race—is his natural and normal condition. This, our new government, is the first, in the history of the world, based upon this great physical, philosophical, and moral truth. This truth has been slow in the process of its development, like all other truths in the various departments of science. It has been so even amongst us. Many who hear me, perhaps, can recollect well, that this truth was not generally admitted, even within their day.

Just as Lincoln in his inaugural called for "a firm reliance on Him, who has never yet forsaken this favored land," so Stephens urged that the slave system was "in conformity with the ordinance of the Creator. It is not for us to inquire into the wisdom of his ordinances, or to question them. For his own purposes, he has made one race to differ from another."[21]

The issue dividing the country could not be resolved through theology or politics, let alone anthropology. Yet, other sciences would be crucial in the coming struggle for survival, since the fittest would be those whose leaders were best able to adopt the latest military technology.

A month after Lincoln's election, Scientific American included a piece entitled "The President Elect's Mode of Buoying Vessels. Patented May 22, 1849": "The merits of this invention we are not disposed to discuss; but we hope the author of it will have better success in presiding as Chief Magistrate over the people of the entire Union than he has had as an inventor in introducing his invention upon the western waters, for which it was specially designed." The editors included a large image of the model in the Patent Office and a copy of the patent itself. They also acknowledged that "among our readers there are thousands of mechanics who would devise a better apparatus for buoying steamboats over bars, but how many of them would be able to compete successfully in the race for the Presidency?"[22]

Unfortunately, this was exactly the moment when the secession crisis boiled over, and Lincoln's success as chief magistrate would be measured by his ability to quell what he always referred to as a "rebellion." Lincoln now had to apply his rational brain to finding a way to save the union. "The tug has to come," he told Lyman Trumbull back in December, "& better now, than any time hereafter."[23] That ruled out two options preferred by many, perhaps most, Americans. One was letting the Confederates go, saying good riddance, and possibly expecting they would return when they realized their folly. The other was, as so often in the past, to cobble together another compromise—but this meant concessions Lincoln could not make without betraying those who had voted for the Republican platform. That left only the resort to force, which courted disaster since the eight slave states then still remaining in the union expected Republicans to make concessions. Lincoln was hoping some of those states would rally to the union if the rebels attacked it before being themselves assaulted by the federal government. A rebel attack might also increase northern support for armed conflict, which is why Lincoln handled the issue of Fort Sumter so carefully, maneuvering the South Carolinians into becoming the aggressors when they began the bombardment on 12 April 1861.

As war became a reality, four more slave states joined the Confederacy and greatly strengthened it by increasing the overall population from five million to nine million. The greatest loss was Virginia, which chose secession after Stephens made a long speech before the legislature: "The enemies of our institutions . . . set out with the assumption that the races are equal; that the negro is equal to the white man. If their premises were correct, their conclusions would be legitimate. But their premises being false, their conclusions are false also."[24] Although President Lincoln was devastated that Confederate territory across the Potomac River was now visible from the windows of the White House, he was relieved that for the moment Delaware, Kentucky, Maryland, and Missouri—the Border States—remained in the union, and that the north responded enthusiastically when Lincoln called for seventy-five thousand volunteers for ninety days' service.

Lincoln intended to avoid the error of George III, who had repeatedly committed too few troops and too late when attempting to suppress the colonial rebellion. It was assumed that the Confederacy would have far more difficulty than the north in recruiting, supplying, and transporting an army. The south's population was less than half of the north's, and nearly half of the Confederacy's people were slaves. Only a quarter of the free population were themselves slave owners, and Lincoln still hoped there were unionists among the less "aristocratic" classes. Transporting men and supplies to defend specific points would be difficult for the south's underdeveloped railroad system, and its industrial base was almost nonexistent. Although the rebels had been able to seize arms and ships at several federal installations, the largest stockpiles of small arms were in the north along with the industries to make new ones. Northerners hoped for a quick victory, but evidently the president and his advisers were also planning for a longer struggle.

Lincoln's call for seventy-five thousand troops on three-month enlistment did not mean he seriously thought that number and period would prove sufficient. While some bandied slogans about one Yankee being worth ten rebels, or vice versa, Lincoln accepted that "exceptional advantages on one side are counterbalanced by exceptional advantages on the other. We must make up our minds that man for man the soldier from the South will be a match for the soldier from the North and vice versa." When Congress assembled in early July, Lincoln requested support for an army of four hundred thousand men, and Congress immediately raised this to five hundred thousand.[25]

That Lincoln thought the war might not end swiftly is also indicated by his effort to bring about technological improvements in the union's weaponry that some experts, including General James W. Ripley, the head of the Army's Ordnance Department, thought unnecessary and even reckless, since there were already large stockpiles of arms. The loss of uniformity and interchangeability in types of ammunition might complicate supply issues, and the war might be over before new designs could be fully tested and manufactured. Lincoln increasingly ignored this sensible view—with tremendous long-term benefits for the union cause—partly because of his own peculiar fascination with science and inventions.

Lincoln's interest in science and technology remained a fixture throughout his life. A young legal colleague recalled seeing Lincoln distracted in 1856 by an exhibition of a "self-raking reaping machine." Lincoln "examined it with much interest" before "explaining, in the fewest words but with great clearness, how power and motion were communicated to the different appliances, especially to the sickle, the revolving rake, and the reel. His faculty for comprehending and understanding machinery I afterward saw exemplified when I heard him argue a patent case."[26]

Lincoln might have read the article about the Illinois State Agricultural Society's "Trials of Reapers" in his 1855 volume of the Annual of Scientific Discovery. In a different trial earlier that year, Lincoln learned a great deal about reapers when some high-priced Ohio patent lawyers retained him to assist as a local attorney in a patent-infringement case between two Illinois reaper manufacturers. When the case was transferred to Cincinnati, the specialist lawyers dispensed with Lincoln's services, but he had already visited the factory and "spent half a day examining and studying Manny's Machine."[27]

In March 1857, a young telegrapher in Pekin, Illinois, noticed Lincoln staring at the telegrapher's key and receiver. Answering Lincoln's questions about various intricacies, the telegrapher found him "already well furnished with knowledge of collateral facts and natural phenomena; and . . . he comprehended quite readily the operation of the telegraph, [even though the] wires had been extended west of the Alleghany Mountains only five or six years."[28]

In September 1859, Lincoln addressed the Wisconsin State Agricultural Society, and despite jokingly calling himself "in some sort a politician, and in no sort a farmer," he discussed agriculture in familiar terms while also stressing the need for exploiting "recent discovery, or invention." He cited Patent Office reports on crop yields per acre; advocated "deeper plowing, analysis of soils, experiments with manures, and varieties of seeds, observance of seasons, and the like"; and judged that "the soil has never been pushed up to one-half of its capacity." He gave an almost Euclidean analysis of the potential for "the successful application of steam power," arguing that any "steam plow" must be "so contrived as to apply the larger proportion of its power to the cutting and turning the soil, and the smallest, to the moving itself over the field," while suggesting that currently, with horse-drawn reapers, "fully nine-tenths of the power is expended by the animal in carrying himself and dragging the machine over the field." Lincoln spoke of the "profitable enjoyment" of studying problems connected with "draining, droughts, and irrigation[,] . . . saving crops, pests of crops, diseases of crops, and what will prevent or cure them—implements, utensils, and machines, their relative merits, and [how] to improve them." He mentioned the assistance to be gained from botany, chemistry, and "the mechanical branches of Natural Philosophy . . . especially in reference to implements and machinery."[29]

Now, less than a month after his inauguration and shortly before Fort Sumter, Lincoln displayed keen interest in the testing and production of weapons when he paid the first of many visits to the Washington Navy Yard.[30] Fascinated by the steam hammers, blast furnace, hydrostatic press, pyrotechnical laboratory, rolling mill, foundries, and all the boring, turning, and planing machinery, Lincoln was equally pleased by the enthusiasm of Captain John A. Dahlgren, who had served at the yard since 1847 and was shortly to replace the previous commander who had deserted to the Confederacy.

For three months after Fort Sumter, while others still hoped for a short war, Lincoln became interested in new types of weapons that might help to shorten a long war. He was aware that Jefferson Davis, President of the Confederacy, knew a great deal about military technology, since the 1855 volume of Annual of Scientific Discovery had given a detailed account of a report to Congress by then Secretary of War Davis about the latest European advances in weapons technology, emphasizing the "superiority of the grooved or rifle barrel and elongated ball" over the smooth-bore musket with its round ball and noting that the difficulties of loading rifles compared with smooth-bores was overcome by replacing the old muzzleloaders with breechloaders. The Annual also reported that in the following year, Davis's department found a practicable way to turn old musket barrels into rifled barrels: "it is not improbable that all now on hand at the Springfield [Massachusetts] Armory—some 255,000—will ultimately receive that improvement."[31]

Lincoln could assume that Davis was now applying his experience to the task of securing—under even more adverse conditions than Lincoln faced—the best weapons available for Confederate troops. Lincoln's problem was that, in fact, few of those old muskets had been converted to rifles, and Ordnance Chief Ripley was busy distributing existing weapons into the hands of the tens of thousands of fresh recruits. Governors and commanders who were contributing troops to the cause often demanded that their men receive the few superior weapons in the armories. New York state sent an agent to Britain to purchase nineteen thousand Enfield rifles, and General Ripley at first supported the idea of purchasing a hundred thousand arms in Europe, but the Secretary of War Simon Cameron opposed, mainly to avoid spending money abroad rather than at home.[32] This proved a great blunder, because the South, with fewer options, had no such qualms about foreign purchases.

If Ripley and Cameron had been less obstructive, Lincoln might not have interfered, but pressure came not only from recruits clamoring for modern rifles as a matter, literally, of life and death but also from a flood of letters and visits by inventors and manufacturers, both genuine and would-be, and all offering some new killing device that would save the union. Lincoln's private secretaries, who sifted the piles of post and passed to the president only those that could not be immediately discarded or redirected, allowed a disproportionate number of the letters from inventors through the screen, knowing Lincoln relished them.[33]

Lincoln was most interested in the designs for rifling both small arms and artillery, new breechloaders, "repeating" systems that allowed more rapid fire, and the corresponding new types of projectiles. Before the end of April, Lincoln endorsed a letter from the vice-president in favor of placing a large order for rifled cannon. On 16 May, Lincoln and Secretary of State William H. Seward inspected the Ordnance Office at Dahlgren's Navy Yard, and in the same month, Dahlgren hinted to Lincoln that if the war lasted any considerable time, there could be problems about maintaining supplies of niter (saltpeter) for gunpowder production. Early in June, Lincoln watched a demonstration of an early machine gun, which he dubbed "the coffee mill gun." He praised it to Dahlgren and recommended it to Ripley as "worth the attention of the Government." He was less impressed with a "centrifugal gun" meant to be powered by steam. The prototype Lincoln tested was hand cranked and so inaccurate that the target had to be quite close, causing the balls flying out of the machine to bounce back among the shins of the bystanders, which, according to his secretary John Hay sent Lincoln into "peals of Homeric laughter."[34]

The next day, Lincoln was introduced to some of that potential military technology Captain Edward B. Hunt had mentioned at the Newport AAAS meeting. The head of the Smithsonian, Joseph Henry, brought a young balloonist named Thaddeus Lowe to the White House. A few days later, Lowe was floating over it in the Enterprise and sending telegraph messages to demonstrate the balloon's usefulness for reconnaissance. Lincoln gave Lowe a letter of introduction to the highest officer in the Army, General Winfield Scott, who managed temporarily to sideline the project.[35]

Later in the month, Lincoln dragged Cameron and Ripley along to watch experiments with rifled cannon at the arsenal in Washington, and at least twice around this time, Lincoln went out to an empty field near the White House to test some weapons himself. He usually took along an ex-soldier and messenger named Mullikin from the Ordnance Office, but once when a clerk told him that Mullikin was unavailable, Lincoln made do with the clerk. Lincoln was keen that day to try out the new Spencer repeating rifles that Dahlgren had already tested to great satisfaction. Lincoln thought he had a better idea about the design of the gun sight and whittled one out of wood. The clerk placed a paper target on a large woodpile, and Lincoln fired seven rounds in rapid order, reloaded and fired another seven, hitting the target nearly every time.[36]

Lincoln carried out a similar test on two breech-loading rifles, and this time his shooting partner was his third secretary, William O. Stoddard, who fired a single-shot weapon while Lincoln tried out a new repeater. Stoddard proved a good shot, and Lincoln laughed, "I declare, you are beating me!" Some soldiers heard the unauthorized gunfire and came running up shouting, "Stop that firing!" They had not come very close before they recognized the tall marksman and beat a retreat. "Well," Lincoln remarked, "they might have stayed and seen the shooting."[37]

Lincoln had testing times not only with the weapons but also with their inventors, although, according to secretary Hay, they "were more a source of amusement than annoyance."[38] One brought a rocket to Lincoln's office and seemed surprised when as he struck a match, his president ducked behind a desk. "Mr. Lincoln," said the inventor, "you make a better President, I guess, than you would a soldier." Lincoln's sense of self-preservation was usually less attuned. "On my arrival at the White House," recalled another inventor, "I was ushered immediately into the reception room, with my repeating rifle in my hand, and there I found the President."[39] If Lincoln showed little fear that any of his inventive visitors were deliberately dangerous, he had less confidence in their devices. Bullet-proof steel vests to protect the troops were brought to Lincoln in such profusion that he sifted out the really hopeless ones by offering to let the inventor wear his own device in a test. One such vest was described by its inventor as a "cuirass," an archaism that moved Lincoln to pun: "Well, the inventor must be a queer ass to think a man could lug that thing on a march in a hot sun." One might have thought nothing could be more absurd than the gun with two diverging barrels to be used by cross-eyed men who, according to its cross-eyed inventor, "could march down the river and clear out both banks at once," but Lincoln only laughed, "There's about as much in it as there is in some of the other plans they want me to take."[40]

According to Hay, "Lincoln had a quick comprehension of mechanical principles, and often detected a flaw in an invention which the contriver had overlooked."[41] Nevertheless, General Ripley simply could not take Lincoln seriously and complained to the Secretary of War in June 1861 of "the great evil" of "the vast variety of the new inventions, each having, of course, its advocates, insisting on the superiority of his favorite arm over all others and urging its adoption by the Government." Ripley said all this was "very injurious to the efficiency of troops," and the solution was to refuse to purchase "new and untried arms" and to adhere to the "rule of uniformity of arms for all troops of the same kind."[42]

So far Lincoln had shown interest, curiosity and open-mindedness, but he had often bowed to the authority of military chiefs. After the Union defeat at Bull Run on 21 July 1861, Lincoln showed less deference and more insistence on the importance of new technology.

Darwin's best source of information about the American Civil War came from letters that American colleagues sent to him or to Lyell and Hooker. The colleagues were mainly New Englanders since Darwin had no regular contact with any southern scientists and might doubt their opinions anyway. The same applied to Agassiz, who otherwise might have made a useful observer, being a nonnative resident in New England but also very familiar with the south. Even Darwin's most frequent and admired correspondent, Gray, wrote at best only once every three weeks, the least time required for a letter sent across the Atlantic to fetch a reply. Darwin's daily dose of war news came from the Times of London.

Darwin was an avid reader of the Times, which proved aggravating since, after initially taking a position Darwin could approve, the newspaper was blatantly pro-South for most of the war. A contemporary wrote in 1865 that the Times's "errors were of a class which, besides the ordinary measure of human fallibility, implies a total misconception of the conditions of the struggle," while a more recent study concluded, "The Times made a fool of itself over the American Civil War."[43] President Lincoln showed considerable respect when William Howard Russell, the newspaper's star foreign correspondent, was first introduced to him.[44] "The London Times is one of the greatest powers in the world," said Lincoln. "In fact, I don't know anything which has much more power, except perhaps the Mississippi. I am glad to know you as its minister." Further cajoleries from the president left Russell "agreeably impressed with his shrewdness, humour, and natural sagacity," and the following day, he was invited to attend the first state dinner in Lincoln's White House, the other guests being cabinet members and their families.[45]

Shortly after this, Russell began touring the country, starting in the south. His reports were objective, sometimes complimentary, yet never disguised his hatred of slavery or his amazement at the way it warped southern society. Russell's dispatches took nearly a fortnight to reach Darwin's breakfast table and another to rebound across the Atlantic to the White House.[46] So Darwin and (some days later) Lincoln would both have memories stirred by Russell's description of a negro being auctioned in Alabama, which deeply affected Russell despite his declaration that he was "neither a sentimentalist nor Black Republican, nor negro worshipper." His closing line showed his contempt for polygenism: "There was no sophistry which could persuade me the man was not a man—he was, indeed, by no means my brother, but assuredly he was a fellow creature." Two weeks later, Russell wrote in his diary about southern "gentlemen . . . who indulge in ingenious hypotheses to comfort the consciences of the anthropo-proprietors. The negro skull won't hold as many ounces of shot as the white man. Potent proof that the white man has a right to sell and to own the creature!"[47]

Lincoln could only be pleased while Russell filed such reports for British readers, although Darwin possessed his "own foreign correspondent." Because Gray's letters were also greatly valued for their scientific content and were passed among Darwin, Hooker, Lyell, and Francis Boott, many went missing, and none have survived that Darwin saw between July 1860 and August 1861, during which time Darwin wrote at least seventeen letters to Gray.

Hooker's letters to Gray entirely lacked the sympathy normally expressed by Darwin, and Gray was often annoyed by reports in or reprinted from British newspapers.[48] Writing to Darwin on 6 May 1861, Gray must have expressed some displeasure about the lack of British support among other things, and Darwin's belated reply apparently responded point by point but also made clear what he considered the most vital issue.

> But I suppose you are all too overwhelmed with public affairs to care for science. I never knew the newspapers so profoundly interesting. N. America does not do England justice: I have not seen or heard of a soul who is not with the North. Some few, & I am one, even wish to God, though at the loss of millions of lives, that the North would proclaim a crusade against Slavery. In the long run, a million horrid deaths would be amply repaid in the cause of humanity. What wonderful times we live in. Massachusetts seems to show noble enthusiasm. Great God how I should like to see that greatest curse on Earth Slavery abolished.[49]

Five days after Darwin first raised the issue of slavery—before Gray even received that letter—Gray, too, mentioned slavery for the first time, in a touchy letter to Hooker: "I am no abolitionist, but if the rebels & scoundrels persevere, I go for carrying the war so far as to liberate every negro, tho' what we are to do with this population I see not." Hooker, perhaps unimpressed that Gray seemed to view emancipation as an expedient rather than a moral imperative, condescendingly sought to terminate the discussion: "I think the less said the sooner mended about the war & your slightly animated! description of John Bull's opinions & notions. A nation at war is no longer in its senses; however just the cause."[50]

To another fellow naturalist in America less pro-Union than himself, Gray wrote, "Peace is not worth having till the rebellion, based on a plot formed years ago, is put down. . . . If you think me belligerent, I am nothing to Agassiz."[51] Biographer Edward Lurie comments that Agassiz "advocated the Union cause with an uncompromising patriotism," citing his very public application for American citizenship and his letters to friends in England "chiding them for the policy of their country toward the United States"—very like Gray in that regard.[52] This was commendable considering Agassiz's previously close relations with southern colleagues, but he had more important ties with the influential, wealthy, and solidly pro-Union Bostonians who lavishly funded his museum. Moreover, Agassiz was part of a clique of leading scientists who jokingly nicknamed themselves the

"Lazzaroni" (lepers in Naples, i.e., outcasts) and included high-ranking government officials and military officers such as Alexander Dallas Bache of the Coastal Survey and Captain Charles Henry Davis of the Nautical Almanac office. Yet, Agassiz's patriotism dampened when it conflicted with his professional activities. After catching a student reading a newspaper in the museum, Agassiz threatened to ban such publications from the building, and another student recorded in his diary how cross Agassiz became when the same student joined the army: "If they knew in Boston how greedy Prof is of our time . . . and actually unpatriotic, it would kill the museum."[53] Obviously, Gray must not have known any of this when he praised Agassiz's support for the war.

Darwin wrote that he sympathized with Gray's insistence that the war was necessary: "After carefully reading Olmsted's last Book I never doubted the North would conquer the South." Yet, Darwin had other doubts: "But then what is to follow? From Olmsted & Russell's letters in Times, I cannot believe that the South would ever have fellow-feeling enough with the North to allow of government in common. Could the North endure a Southern President?"[54] Darwin could see that bitterness was an obstacle to re-union—without quite grasping the lesson of Lincoln's election: that the south had lost its controlling influence on presidential elections.

Correspondent Russell, although glad to condemn slavery, was also impressed by the growing evidence that the Confederacy was determined—and possibly able—to maintain its independence, while his editors back in London were increasingly confident about expressing their pro-Confederate opinion—infuriating Gray—that the divided United States could never be rejoined.[55] While Gray was willing, if the rebels "persevered," to see slaves freed, Darwin saw no point in the war if it did not end slavery. "The whole affair is a great misfortune in the progress of the World," Darwin told Gray, "but I should not regret it so much, if I could persuade myself that Slavery would be annihilated. But your president does not even mention the word in his Address." Clearly, Darwin had read carefully the reports of Lincoln's address to the special session of Congress on 4 July and was disappointed—as were American abolitionists—that Lincoln made no reference to slavery.[56] And yet, it was understandable that Lincoln, to avoid George III's mistakes, did not wish to broaden the conflict beyond the illegality of secession or undermine the Unionists of the Border States by taking any precipitous action against slavery.

Whether Darwin grasped this intellectually, on gut level he was dissatisfied. "I sometimes wish the contest to grow so desperate, that the north would be led to declare freedom as a diversion against the Enemy," he told Gray, anticipating events. Darwin was also correct that ending slavery might itself cause long-term trauma: "In 50 or 100 years your posterity would bless the act." Darwin could not know how prescient he was on both points. "But Heaven knows why I trouble you with my speculations; I ought to stick to Orchids."

Darwin wrote these speculations on the very day Lincoln's invasion force was defeated at Bull Run, extinguishing hope that the war would end quickly. Russell of the Times described the defeat in an unsparing report that, when it bounced back to America, angered Northerners intensely. As one historian expresses it, "Unhappily Russell's dispatches were unendurable mostly because they appeared in The Times."[57]

Lincoln had more to worry about than Russell's dispatches. As he now prepared for a long war, the potential military usefulness of new weapons grew in his estimation. The most useful innovations were exactly those that could only be developed on a large scale, in a reasonable time, at minimal cost, and with the expectation of inflicting the greatest damage on the enemy. The inventor in Lincoln now went back over some of the weapons projects that military "experts" had so far resisted. And he also began to consider a highly dangerous weapon that might easily backfire. Yet Lincoln was still eighteen months away from implementing the idea that already exercised the minds of most abolitionists, including one in England: to "declare freedom as a diversion against the enemy."

Inventions for a Long War

After the debacle at Bull Run in July 1861, Lincoln placed General George McClellan in charge of reorganizing the swelling army of volunteers, but he also pursued more vigorously the development of new weapons of war. Four days after Bull Run, Thaddeus Lowe, the balloonist recommended by Professor Joseph Henry, informed Lincoln that although he had just returned from making an important reconnaissance of rebel forces following the battle, the army still had not commissioned him to develop a useful balloon service. Lincoln wrote a note for Lowe on 25 July: “Will Lieut. Gen. Scott please see Professor Lowe once more about his balloon?” The president may even have escorted Lowe to see the general. Soon Lowe obtained a government contract to develop an “air corps” of seven balloons, which performed valuable service in several battles in 1862. By 1863, Lowe gave up the effort when the army failed to commission or fund him properly.[1]

To help Lincoln conquer not only the air but also the sea, in September 1861 Brutus de Villeroi, an immigrant inventor in Philadelphia, described in a long letter his experiments with a submarine whose crew could remain submerged for up to three hours while also sallying through an airlock to carry out reconnaissance or plant explosives on the keels of enemy ships. Lincoln personally endorsed the letter to the Navy Department, whose officials ordered a larger model for testing. Just over a year later and after numerous delays, one test of the Alligator took place in the presence of President Lincoln, Assistant Secretary of the Navy Gustavus V. Fox, General Benjamin F. Butler, and Professor Eben Horsford, the last of whom actually descended in the vessel and remained submerged for over an hour. All were described as being “perfectly satisfied.” Although Lincoln apparently recommended another submarine proposal to navy experts early in 1862, they decided the air supply was insufficient and the probable speed too slow. In April 1862, Villeroi grew so disgusted over the treatment of his project that he washed his hands of the whole business, and a year later, the Alligator sank in a heavy gale while under tow.[2]

Another tragedy connected with underwater technology was the death in October 1863 of one of the best scientists in the navy, Captain Edward B. Hunt, who had delivered many papers before the AAAS, including the one on future military technology read in the presence of Stephen A. Douglas. Hunt had argued for the development of numerous weapons, including asphyxiating shells, and while testing an artillery battery that could be fired underwater, Hunt was suffocated by escaping gases and killed by falling into the hold of the test vessel.[3] Hunt's brother was a former governor of New York, so Lincoln would certainly have heard of this loss to science, and another who probably mourned that loss was Charles Darwin. Two months before Hunt's death, Darwin had received from him a scientific paper arguing that Florida's coral reefs were at least 5.4 million years old.[4]

Hunt had also advocated the "steam gun," and early in September 1861, some politically influential Bostonians endorsed a design for one, which they sent first to General James W. Ripley and then, when he showed no interest, to the president. Impressed or not, Lincoln knew better than to offend the project's distinguished backers and asked the engineer in chief of the navy to examine the proposal. When he declared the concept unfeasible, Lincoln let the matter drop.[5]

Returning to more conventional weapons, Lincoln scrutinized a breechloading cannon in September 1861 and ordered twenty into service by November. On 5 September, Lincoln endorsed a deal belatedly arranged by Secretary of War Simon Cameron for the overseas purchase of a hundred thousand rifled muskets with percussion-cap firing: the guns were surplus weapons of European governments modernizing their arsenals with breechloaders. Two days later, Lincoln interviewed a Philadelphia merchant about arranging further European purchases.[6]

On the evening of 15 September, Captain John A. Dahlgren took Lincoln to watch tests of an "electro-mercury light" recently developed by a British chemist. Dahlgren was interested in its potential for signaling or illumination for night fighting.[7] Lincoln also made almost daily rounds of the military camps surrounding Washington to see how the equipping and training of the Army of the Potomac progressed. On 20 September, the New York Times reported that "the President, Secretaries Cameron and Seward, the Prince de Joinville and suite, Private Secretary Nicolay, Gen. McClellan and Staff, Gen. Mansfield and Staff, and a large number of ladies and gentlemen" attended a review of Colonel Hiram Berdan's regiment of sharpshooters: "Something like four hundred shots were fired at a distance of 630 yards."[8]

Berdan, a New York engineer whose avocation was rifle marksmanship, had recruited this specialist corps of skirmishers by advertising for men skilled with fine weapons and promising to outfit them with the single-shot Sharps rifle, a breechloader that had been on the market since the mid-1850s. Unfortunately, General Ripley refused to purchase the new weapons and instead issued old Springfield muskets. At the very least, Lincoln must have collaborated in arranging the high-profile visit by this prestigious delegation, which was a deliberate coup. Lincoln himself fired a few rounds, commenting, "Boys, this reminds me of old-time shooting!"—which brought a cheer from the troops. Lincoln told the colonel to come see him the following day so he could write out an order for the breechloaders. After various further delays and a near-mutiny by the troops themselves, eventually the unit was properly equipped and went on to kill more Confederates than any other regiment in the Union army.[9]

In the month of October alone, Lincoln observed the ascension of another balloonist on the fourth, personally inspected a new design for a gun carriage on the fifth (dropping it when other experts pointed out shortcomings), directed General Ripley to order twenty-five thousand Marsh breechloaders on the fourteenth, again walked out to Treasury Park with an inventor to test his new type of bullet on the twenty-fifth, and on the twenty-sixth invited General McClellan to join him and a group of military and scientific men for a demonstration of a battery of repeating guns on wheels—and when McClellan was unable to attend, Lincoln went without him and took the responsibility by the end of the day to order ten batteries at $1,300 apiece.[10]

In November, an inventor from New Hampshire, failing to interest General Ripley in his new breech-loading cannon, arranged an audience with Lincoln, who spent nearly an hour going over the plans. Promising to arrange a test if the inventor's state governor would endorse him, Lincoln soon received the letter and endorsed it with a request that the War Department send someone to New Hampshire to test the weapon. However, General Ripley found ways to delay the inspection and then bury the report, so nothing came of Lincoln's intervention. Shortly afterward, Lincoln managed to get McClellan to express a desire for more machine guns, so in December, Lincoln ordered Ripley to purchase fifty of them; and a week later, again by Lincoln's direct intervention, Ripley finally ordered ten thousand Spencer repeating rifles.[11]

Apart from whittling a temporary gun sight, Lincoln played no role in actually designing new weapons. However, the perception that he valued new technology encouraged inventors to bring forward their ideas despite General Ripley's obstructive reputation. Most new regiments were provided with better weapons than they would otherwise have had simply because Lincoln overruled objections to the purchases abroad.[12] Lincoln's personal attention to inventors and growing resistance to the opinions of his chief of ordnance and his secretary of war meant that by the end of 1861, thirty-seven thousand American-made breech-loading rifles, single-shot or repeating and using both paper and metallic cartridges, were on order. According to historian James M. McPherson, "These guns turned out to be the best shoulder weapons of the war. The carbines gave Union cavalry a significant advantage in the last fifteen months of the war. Infantry regiments armed with the Spencer rifles gained a fearsome reputation among enemy units." What Robert V. Bruce, the best authority on Lincoln's interest in weapons, says of the entire period of the war was actually true by the end of the first year: "During the Civil War, the nearest thing to a research and development agency was the President himself."[13]

Various people, whether inspired or appalled by Lincoln's efforts and Ripley's stubbornness, hoped to place research and development on a more professional level. At the end of 1861, Secretary of the Navy Gideon Welles wrote out instructions for a "Naval Examining Board" that would make recommendations about inventions on the basis that money could not "be applied to any experimental purpose but only for objects of undoubted utility." This board, though somewhat a failure in itself, marked an important preliminary step in the development of science in America.[14] Welles, already pressured by Congress about costs and corrupt contractors, was disturbed about the time Dahlgren spent dealing with increasingly hare-brained inventors. Also, the U.S. Navy seemed particularly backward at that moment because of two simultaneous and related crises, both involving a new technology in which Lincoln took a particular interest: ironclads.

Another of George III's blunders that Lincoln tried to avoid was allowing the colonial rebels to obtain vital supplies of arms from abroad. Both the North and the South knew that international trade was a crucial issue: Lincoln's navy must close or blockade Southern ports, and the South must prevent such an effort from succeeding. The Confederacy was fortunate that its Secretary of Navy, Stephen R. Mallory, a Floridian who previously chaired the Senate's naval affairs committee, recognized immediately that the South lacked the resources to challenge the Union navy in any conventional way.

Exactly when President Lincoln first learned that the Confederate navy was building an ironclad warship is unknown, but neither the technology nor the South's wish to build such a vessel was any surprise. Despite his patent for a device to aid navigation, Lincoln knew even less about naval armaments than he did about land armaments, which was still a great deal more than most people. Although Lincoln allegedly joked once, "I do think I knew the difference between the bow of a ship and her stern, and I don't believe Secretary Welles did," he admired the administrative ability of Welles, who had some prior experience of the Navy Department, if less than the Confederacy's Mallory.[15] Moreover, Welles was a Connecticut Yankee who had been a canny journalist—and soon he had an important scoop for Lincoln. On 8 May, only three weeks after Confederate forces seized the naval yard in Norfolk, Virginia, Mallory had written to the Confederate Congress urging the immediate construction of an ironclad that he believed could destroy the Union's wooden fleet. Somehow, this document came into Welles's possession.[16]

As a congressman, Lincoln had once sponsored a petition from a Baltimore inventor who since 1814 had been seeking support for a steam warship with sloping armored sides, but nothing came of it at the time.[17] Early in 1861, Scientific American regretted that "the Secretary of the Navy has not paid attention" to the fact that while the United States did not have "a single first class war steamer," the French and British were building "iron-cased war wolves."[18] A month later, Harper's Weekly offered an illustrated account of the first ocean-going ironclad warships built by the French and British in 1859 and 1860, respectively. In the same week, Captain Dahlgren urged the Senate Committee on Naval Affairs to order the "the construction of some armored Gun Boats" as well as "at least the one heavy frigate [which] may cost 1¾ to 2 millions which is the estimated expense of the English Plated-frigate [HMS] Warrior, just launched." Dahlgren urged haste: it would take at least two years "to get a ship ready for service."[19] Dahlgren probably expressed these views to Lincoln when, a few months later, he became the new president's favorite weapons adviser.

In the month following Mallory's letter, further information reached Welles regarding the Confederates' efforts to raise a ship, the USS Merrimack, which had been only half-destroyed when retreating federals abandoned Norfolk, Virginia, to the rebels. Eventually this ship (rechristened CSS Virginia but still known in most histories as the Merrimack) was to be rebuilt above the waterline with sloping sides covered with iron plates—a process slowed by the Confederates' relative lack of iron foundries.

Meanwhile, early in the summer of 1861, Lincoln had already met with James B. Eads, an engineer and inventor from St. Louis, Missouri, who had ideas for an ironclad vessel to help the Union campaign along the Mississippi River. Eads brought a model to the president, "and they sat down together and discussed Western steamboats and flatboats and gun-boats, and they turned the thing inside out," wrote Lincoln's secretary William O. Stoddard. "It is the first model of a 'tin-clad' gunboat, . . . and the President has had more to do than most men are aware of with the beginnings of the Mississippi flotilla."[20] Eads had previously met obstructions as Welles sought to shift responsibility for river operations to the War Department, but some time after showing Lincoln his model, Eads signed a contract with the navy to build eight ironclad gunboats for use in the river war in the west.[21] Two years later, Eads sent Lincoln a photograph of the USS St. Louis, which Eads's accompanying letter called "the first armored vessel against which the fire of a hostile battery was directed on this continent; and . . . the first iron clad that ever engaged a naval force in the world" (original emphasis). Eads presented the picture, "assured that your identification with the interesting incidents of her history would make it acceptable."[22]

Reacting to Mallory's effort to clad the Merrimack with iron, Welles and assistant secretary Fox consulted with various department heads about building ironclads. "All were skeptical," according to Welles's biographer, so Welles decided to wait until Congress met in July, when he drafted a bill to approve not only an "ironclad board" to examine designs but also appropriations for constructing three experimental vessels.[23] Both houses approved, and Lincoln signed the bill on 4 August 1861. It is inconceivable that Welles arranged all this without Lincoln's prior approval.

To lobby the bill through committee, Welles had employed an old Connecticut friend, businessman Cornelius S. Bushnell, who now submitted one of the seventeen design proposals examined by the Ironclad Board. After the board criticized it, Bushnell contacted naval engineer John Ericsson, who showed him a model of an iron-hulled vessel he had designed five years earlier. Bushnell perceived the design's great virtues and began promoting it instead of his own. Bushnell's lobbyist instincts drove him along an indirect route back to the Ironclad Board via Welles, two New York iron contractors, Secretary of State William H. Seward, and President Lincoln.[24] Ericsson also wrote to Lincoln, assuring him he could construct a "vessel for the destruction of the rebel fleet at Norfolk," although it is not certain Lincoln ever saw this letter.[25] Bushnell himself explained Ericsson's proposal to Lincoln, who "was at once greatly pleased with the simplicity of the plan" and probably learned also that Ericsson's differences in the past with the Navy Department might cause prejudice against him and his revolutionary design. Backed up by information from Ericsson and the iron manufacturers, Bushnell was confident the vessel could be built within ninety days, far less time than other designs required. Lincoln knew that time was becoming precious as intelligence filtered in regarding the Confederates' progress with converting the Merrimack. According to Bushnell, the president "agreed to accompany us to the Navy Department . . . the following day, and aid us as best he could."[26]

Lincoln was not competent to judge any technical issues but probably feared the experts' reluctance to take a reasonable risk on something so radical. Bushnell recalled that the president "was on hand promptly at 11 o'clock" at the meeting, where all present "were surprised at the novelty of the plan." Some advised trying it; others ridiculed it. The conference ended with Lincoln's remark, "All I have to say is what the girl said when she put her foot into the stocking, 'It strikes me there's something in it.'" Lincoln avoided any pretense of expertise or any sign of giving an order, but his evident interest meant Ericsson's design could not be easily dismissed.[27]

Eventually, approval was given, and the USS Monitor's delivery was contracted for no later than 12 January 1862, whereupon it was to head for Norfolk to sink what little there was of a Confederate fleet there and, in particular, to finish the job only half done before: the destruction of the Merrimack, which Northern experts assumed would still be in dry dock.[28] When the Confederates proved more efficient than expected, it was not only the rebel ironclad that demonstrated that the U.S. Navy was woefully behind times. Six weeks before the Monitor was scheduled for completion, a more severe threat arose—and not from the South but from Britain.

When Gray did not reply for over a month to his letter of 21 July, Darwin may have feared he had complained too stridently about Lincoln's inaction regarding slavery. The reply did finally arrive in mid-September, and Darwin was pleased not only by Gray's still friendly tone but even more by his reference to the respected head of the Smithsonian, Joseph Henry. In an earlier letter, Darwin had been unable to resist mentioning that John Stuart Mill had praised the inductive logic of The Origin, and Gray now responded, "What you say of Mill well accords with what Prof. Henry of Smithsonian Inst. says of your investigations, your method, &c, and he is the best judge of the logic of investigation I know of."[29]

Gray's letter, of which only one page survives, must have reflected on events following Bull Run. Darwin replied at length, addressing numerous points presumably brought up by Gray's "very long & interesting letter, political & scientific."

> I agree with much of what you say & I hope to God we English are utterly wrong in doubting (1) whether the N. can conquer the S. (2) whether the N. has many friends in the South & (3) whether your noble men of Massachusetts are right in transferring your own good feelings to the men of Washington. Again I say I hope to God we are wrong in doubting on these points. It is number (3) which alone causes England not to be enthusiastic with you. What it may be in Lancashire I know not, but in S. England cotton has nothing whatever to do with our doubts. If abolition does follow with your victory, the whole world will look brighter in my eyes & in many eyes. It would be a great gain even to stop the spread of Slavery into the Territories: if that be possible without abolition, which I should have doubted. You ought not to wonder so much at England's coldness, when you recollect at the commencement of the war how many propositions were made to get things back to the old state with the old line of Latitude. But enough of this: all I can say is that Massachusetts & the adjoining States have the full sympathy of every good man whom I see; & this sympathy would be extended to whole Federal states, if we could be persuaded that your feelings were at all common to them. But enough of this. It is out of my line, though I read every word of news & formerly well studied Olmsted.[30]

Hoping to God that "we English are utterly wrong," Darwin deferred to Gray's more direct understanding, while also expressing disagreement and the depth of his interest. Darwin was right that, were the war to end tomorrow, the Southern states could return to the Union with slavery still intact. Having thought about it seriously, Darwin wondered if a return to the status quo ante bellum would mean the Republicans could even achieve their narrower goal of preventing the extension of slavery.

Gray's letter apparently alluded to the notion widespread in America that Britain was likely to support Southern independence in order to gain unfettered access to the cotton crop so vital to the wealth of Lancashire mill owners. While Darwin admitted uncertainty about attitudes in Lancashire, he felt confident that England in general was not motivated by greed. Confederates certainly hoped the British would be driven by their hunger for cotton into recognizing their country and opening direct trade, with profits from cotton sales used to purchase arms for the rebel armies. Lincoln was probably as aware as most Southerners that during the American Revolution, the colonists' ability to purchase French arms had been crucial to the Revolution's success—and that Robert E. Lee's great-uncle Arthur Lee had been the colonies' first agent for negotiating arms deals with Pierre-Augustin Beaumarchais.[31]

Lincoln's method for interdicting Confederate trade has received much criticism, which originated during cabinet infighting over which policy to follow. Those whose advice Lincoln did not heed (especially Welles) later contended that Lincoln had made a grave mistake.[32] In fact, Lincoln's approach to the problem was calculating and subtle.

First, Lincoln collected data by asking Welles "what amount of Naval force you could at once place at the control of the Revenue service. And also, whether at some distance of time you could so place an additional force; and how much? and at what time."[33] Determining that there were far too few ships for any effective control in the near future, Lincoln saw that his two main options could not be differentiated solely on the basis of likely effectiveness. Congress could pass laws closing Southern ports, but the Confederates would not obey them, and Lincoln had too few ships to implement the laws. Alternatively, Lincoln as commander-in-chief could declare a blockade, but that was internationally recognized as act of war that would technically elevate to the status of "foreign enemy" the people Lincoln always maintained were U.S. citizens in rebellion—and he also lacked the force to effect an offshore blockade. Through Secretary of State Seward, Lincoln obtained the opinion of the British ambassador, Lord Lyons, that Britain was more likely to respect an international blockade than any domestic legislation (as required for a port closure) that failed to acknowledge that an actual war existed.[34]

"The President said we could not afford to have two wars on our hands at once," Welles recalled, but the navy secretary remained bitter about this decision for years, blaming Seward and arguing that the Proclamation of a Blockade on 19 April was the main cause for Britain's decision, three days after learning of the blockade, to issue a Proclamation of Neutrality that acknowledged the Confederacy as a "belligerent" and might be the first step toward full diplomatic recognition.[35] But Welles was wrong, and Lincoln and Seward were right: avoiding war with Britain outweighed all issues of trade, the status of the conflict as "war" or "insurrection," the legitimacy of the Confederacy, and even the risk of foreign recognition of the Confederacy.

Lincoln's carefully worded blockade proclamation "deemed it advisable to set on foot a blockade of the ports within the States aforesaid, in pursuance of the laws of the United States and of the law of nations in such case provided."[36] "To set on foot" was a quiet admission that the blockade could not immediately be “effective.” The cleverness of this move is that the proclamation gave the appearance of strong action but would not reduce the flow of cotton for a long time, thus postponing the moment when Britain would feel the stress of a cotton shortage. Lincoln was aware that as that stress grew, the British cabinet would feel more inclined to make some intervention, either to reopen trade with the South by force or at least demand a right to intervene as a mediator. Lincoln wanted neither and was buying crucial time.

Congressman Thaddeus Stevens chided Lincoln for issuing a proclamation under international law that in effect recognized the Confederacy. “I don’t know anything about the law of nations,” Lincoln replied. “I’m a good enough lawyer in a western law court, but we don’t practice the law of nations up there, and I supposed Seward knew all about it, and I left it to him. But it’s done now and can’t be helped, so we must get along as well as we can.”[37] This combination of self-deprecation, shifting blame or credit to Seward, avoiding a genuine explanation, and joking at the expense of the humorless Stevens, is pure Lincoln. What remains unknown is whether Lincoln’s intelligent analysis foresaw either of two actions by the Confederate government that followed closely upon the blockade decision. One was Jefferson Davis’s announcement that he would issue letters of marque so that the virtually nonexistent Confederate navy could be supplemented with privateers. Lincoln promptly responded that the so-called privateers would be considered pirates, liable to hanging. The news of the blockade, the privateers, and Lincoln’s promise to hang them reached London together and only shortly after the news of Fort Sumter arrived. The British government had to consider its position in view of what was now an actual war. The privateer issue alone was sufficient to force the decision that, as historian Stuart Anderson explains, “since only a belligerent could legally send privateers to sea, Great Britain either had to recognize the South as a belligerent or treat Southern privateers as pirates.”[38] Consequently, on 13 May, the British government was forced, more by Davis than Lincoln, to issue the Queen’s Proclamation of Neutrality acknowledging the belligerent status of both sides.

Many Americans—including Asa Gray—were offended that the British government had gone so far. What Lincoln and Seward feared and Davis hoped was that the British might take the next step and fully recognize the Confederate government, receiving its envoys publicly and according them diplomatic status. But the British had done what they had to do and went no further, for the moment.

The second action by the Confederates was intended to hasten the involvement of Britain and France. Grasping that Lincoln’s “set-on-foot” blockade would not in the short term impede cotton exportation, the Confederates decided to impede it themselves: the sooner the Europeans felt the pinch, the sooner they would take steps to break the blockade. By August, cotton merchants in the major Southern ports, prohibited from exporting their goods, were refusing to receive further consignments from the interior. Thus, it was the South rather than the North that created the shortage of cotton in the mills in Europe. The South had blundered into a step it would hugely regret and struggle to reverse a few months later.[39]

The men of Lancashire had little reason to blame Lincoln for the shortage of cotton when it finally occurred. And as Darwin had told Gray—before that shortage had yet developed—"cotton has nothing whatever to do with our doubts."

The Trent Affair: A Chemistry Problem

Asa Gray's letter dated 9 November 1861 dealt mainly with botanical matters but closed with optimistic hopes about Captain Samuel F. du Pont's naval expedition to capture Port Royal on the coast of South Carolina. At the time, Gray could not know that the expedition had already proved successful or that on the previous day an entirely separate naval action would have results that were potentially disastrous. Darwin's reply on 11 December began (after thanks for previous letters): "What a thing it is, that when you receive this we may be at war, & we two be bound, as good patriots, to hate each other, though I shall find this hating you very hard work."[1]

On 27 November, the day after Gray's letter had arrived, the London newspapers broke the news of "The Trent Affair"—which brought Britain and America closer to war than they had been since the Queen's Proclamation in May had recognized the South as a "belligerent."[2] Darwin could soon learn all the background in the Times. Following the Queen's Proclamation, the three Confederate envoys then in Europe hoped they would soon be accorded full diplomatic recognition and could begin coordinating plans with Britain for formal trade agreements and a speedy breaking of Lincoln's blockade. When none of that happened, the Confederate government replaced the failed envoys with two possessing greater status and experience, James M. Mason and John Slidell.

These were prestige appointments and well publicized. Word leaked—or was planted—that the new envoys would run the blockade from Charleston, South Carolina, aboard a Confederate warship, CSS Nashville, but for various reasons, they used other vessels. Eventually, the envoys reached Havana, where they planned to depart on the next British packet on 7 November.

While Mason and Slidell were privately entertained by the diplomatic corps in Cuba, a U.S. warship, the San Jacinto, arrived off the coast. Ordered to return from a station on the African coast in order to participate in the attack on Port Royal (about which Asa Gray had boasted to Darwin), the San Jacinto's captain, Charles Wilkes, on reaching Cuba, heard about the hunt for the envoys and eventually discovered not only the date of their planned departure but also which vessel they would use, the Trent. Gray and Darwin probably recognized Wilkes's name when it appeared in the newspapers, for he had formerly commanded an American version of the Beagle voyage, the United States Exploration Expedition.

Wilkes waylaid the Trent in international waters and sent a boarding party to search for Confederate dispatches (which, as "contraband," would give Wilkes legal justification, he hoped). No dispatches were found (though they were there), but the two envoys and their secretaries were removed from the Trent before it was allowed to continue its voyage to Britain. By 15 November, Wilkes had conveyed the captives to the United States, but the British government, although aware that the U.S. Navy had hoped to capture the envoys, did not learn of their seizure from a British vessel until 27 November.

"How curious it is," Darwin continued in his 11 December letter to Gray, "to see two countries, just like two angry & silly men, taking so opposite a view of the same transaction! So far as I can see we rest entirely on Wilkes' acting as Judge." Darwin had obviously read his Times carefully. One passenger from the Trent reported that the officer commanding the boarding party had been heard to say that Wilkes was not acting under any specific orders, but the British newspapers emphasized that, according to the British government, Wilkes had not followed the correct procedure: to make any seizures from a neutral ship, he should have taken the vessel as a "prize" to some port where a court could decide the fate of the ship, its crew, passengers, cargo, and mails. Wilkes had instead acted as his own judge, probably concluding that procedures mattered less than capturing Mason and Slidell with minimal inconvenience to the Trent's other passengers.

The news caused a storm in Britain. An emergency cabinet meeting determined that Wilkes had violated international law, and on 30 November, a letter was drafted and sent to the British ambassador in Washington for presentation to the American government. Up until 2 December, the Times had dismissed the report that Wilkes was not acting under orders and blamed the warmongering Secretary of State William H. Seward for causing this crisis. The contents of the official letter were not yet published, but judging from the reports that the British government had ordered ten thousand troops to be sent to Canada, Darwin guessed correctly that the letter was an ultimatum that the United States either release the envoys or accept war.

It would probably take a month before Britain would know the American response to the ultimatum, but there was naturally hope that Wilkes's superiors had by now recognized his blunder and released the envoys. Darwin held off replying to Gray's letter.

On 4 December, Darwin could read in the Times William Howard Russell's dispatch (written on 19 November) describing the jubilation that swept through America at the news of the envoys' capture.[3] In another dispatch printed on 10 December, Russell described the hysterical joy caused by this Union "victory" in the face of so many Union defeats. Two traitors had been captured, the British Lion's tail had been twisted, and Wilkes was the hero of the hour. Russell interviewed various foreign dignitaries and American officials who believed Wilkes's action violated international law, but he also saw "so much violence of spirit among the lower orders of the people . . . saturated with pride and vanity" that if Lincoln's government attempted "any honorable concession," such as releasing the prisoners, it "would prove fatal to its authors."

When young Henry Adams, the secretary and also son of the American ambassador in London, read Russell's dispatches, he wrote to his brother in America, exclaiming, "Good God, what's got into you all? What in Hell do you mean by deserting now the great principles of our fathers . . . ? You're mad, all of you."[4] Two days earlier, Darwin's similar distress caused a temporary loss of the sympathy:

> I fear there is no shadow of doubt we shall fight, if the two Southern rogues are not given up. And what a wretched thing it will be, if we fight on side of slavery. No doubt it will be said we fight to get cotton; but I fully believe that this has not entered into the motive in the least. Well, thank Heaven we private individuals, have nothing to do with so awful a responsibility. Again how curious it is that you seem to think that you can conquer the south; & I never meet a soul, even those who would most wish it, who thinks it possible, that is to conquer & retain it. I do not suppose the mass of people in your country will believe it; but I feel sure if we do go to war, it will be with the utmost reluctance by all classes, ministers of government & all. Time will show, & it is no use writing or thinking about it.[5]

Darwin could then put the matter aside and turn to the science that bonded himself and Gray, but Lincoln had no such option and had already spent nearly a month "thinking about it." When news of Wilkes's action reached Lincoln on 16 November, he made no snap decision about how to proceed. Congress was not in session, there was no sudden emergency cabinet meeting, and Russell of the Times recorded "reticence" at both the State Department and the British legation—while American lawyers rummaged for arguments to justify Wilkes.[6]

Sources of varying reliability reported that Lincoln immediately recognized that Wilkes was in the wrong and the envoys would have to be released.[7] That view, however, was opposed by a later and semi-official view largely accepted by historians: that Lincoln's cabinet had to talk a reluctant president into handing back the envoys.

Lincoln the lawyer probably soon discovered that international law on such matters was thoroughly muddled.[8] Considering this low degree of legal certainty and high degree of popular joy, Lincoln would have been foolish to release the envoys sooner rather than later, after the euphoria had begun to subside. Perhaps as lawyers began to quibble, the legality of Wilkes's move would become less widely assumed in America; or the British, remembering their own past sins, might not press a claim that, apart from upholding some dubious legal principle, would gain them nothing but two extra Confederate emissaries. Possibly, the British would appreciate Wilkes's sea-dog spirit, or his courtesy in letting the Trent finish her voyage, or that, prior to the incident, he had been patrolling the African coast alongside British squadrons trying to suppress the Atlantic slave trade. Lincoln's best course was to wait for the British response while saying nothing that might make it even more unpopular to hand over Mason and Slidell should that become necessary. If the worst happened and Britain made angry demands, Lincoln had to avoid the appearance of kowtowing while he weighed the risk of war.

Lincoln knew that the Royal Navy already possessed iron-hulled warships, such as HMS Warrior, while the U.S. Navy would not have even one until January, if Ericsson kept to schedule. The Royal Navy had the capability to bombard American ports more or less with impunity and to turn Lincoln's blockade of the South into Britain's blockade of the North. Yet, it seemed unlikely that Britain would resort to violence merely to maintain an uncertain maritime principle and liberate two unsavory slave owners. Lincoln soon discovered, however, that the British had other options.

Seven months earlier, Captain John A. Dahlgren had suggested to Lincoln that if the war was not brief, there could be a problem maintaining an adequate supply of niter.[9] In May 1861, Captain du Pont had learned from his cousin Henry du Pont that the family's gunpowder company—the largest supplier to the Union army—possessed only six months' supply of niter, imported from British India. Speculators in Boston and New York were buying up stocks hoping for large profits as prices rose. This information was passed along until the army, possessing 3.8 million pounds of niter accumulated during the Mexican-American War, decided there was no cause for alarm (even though that degradable material was a dozen years old), and the matter was dropped.[10]

Bull Run changed everything: the price of niter began increasing rapidly in October, and this time, Captain du Pont raised the issue with Assistant Secretary of the Navy Gustavus V. Fox, a close adviser of the president.[11] Fox conferred with Lincoln, and action was taken far above the level of ordnance chiefs. Henry du Pont was summoned for a meeting on 30 October with both Secretary of the War Simon Cameron and Seward. They decided to send Lammot du Pont, Henry's thirty-year-old nephew, to London urgently to purchase vast quantities of niter, avoiding suspicions (and higher prices) by pretending not to be purchasing for the U.S. government.[12] Seward now became Lammot's high-level minder and no doubt kept Lincoln fully informed. Within two days, Lammot had a passport, and he arrived in London on 17 November. This was ten days before London learned about the seizure of Mason and Slidell, by which time Americans had already been celebrating for twelve days.[13]

While Southerners joyfully assumed the "Trent Affair" would at last bring Britain into the war, Bostonians held a public banquet on 28 November to honor Captain Wilkes, and Lincoln could read the New York Times' paraphrase of Wilkes's speech asserting the legality of his action by declaring that "bearers of dispatches were the very embodiment of contraband."[14] Lincoln no doubt dismissed Wilkes's wishful thinking and felt appalled by Wilkes's naive description of the South as a "belligerent"—exactly what Lincoln's government formally denied. Lincoln probably enjoyed the rest of the article even less, for it quoted two prominent Massachusetts judges proclaiming that international law was on America's side—which Lincoln knew was doubtful at best. Later that day, Lincoln held a previously scheduled cabinet meeting, but what had not been scheduled were the two letters sent out the following day, 30 November, by Seward and Secretary of the Navy Gideon Welles.[15]

During the previous fortnight, while others wined and dined the heroic Wilkes, Lincoln had made no public comment, Welles had given no official reaction to Wilkes's behavior, and Seward had offered no explanation to the British government. Now, while Lincoln remained mute, Welles sent Wilkes a congratulatory letter (swiftly leaked to the press) praising the officer's "intelligence, ability, decision, and firmness" and declaring that his conduct "has the emphatic approval of this department" but adding a firm warning to Wilkes that his action "must not be permitted to constitute a precedent hereafter for [handling British] infraction of neutral obligations."[16]

The letter sounded nothing like an attempt to appease Britain, yet the British cabinet might note that "department" approval was not government approval and that the ambiguous "warning" at least implied there had been no prior authorization for Wilkes's action—the very point also conveyed to the British through a letter Seward now sent to his ambassador in London. When that official message reached London two weeks later, it caused great relief. But, of course, the day that Seward wrote his official letter, 30 November, was the same day the British government had dispatched to Washington its letter, expressing the hope that Wilkes had acted without authorization but nevertheless containing an ultimatum: whether or not Wilkes acted alone, if the envoys were not released now, it would mean war.

While those two letters were passing each other on the Atlantic, Lincoln faced the problem that Congress would reassemble on 2 December. He was obliged to submit a written address about current affairs, and senators and congressmen might exacerbate the situation in their rush to place their praise for Wilkes on the record, especially when they saw that the president's wide-ranging address made absolutely no reference to the Trent Affair. But instead of a free-for-all of representatives outdoing each other's panegyrics, with Democrats leading the way in order to flush out the mysteriously silent president, one Republican congressman immediately proposed a moderately worded joint resolution (which, avoiding any reference to "seizure," "envoys," "contraband," "belligerents," or "international law," might have been describing an arrest on some American street), and another Republican congressman immediately suggested an appalling amendment—giving Wilkes a gold medal and calling Mason and Slidell "ambassadors." This amendment became the sole focus of debate before it was cheerfully voted down and the original resolution swiftly approved. Lincoln's possible role is suggested by the fact that the original proposer was Owen Lovejoy, later described by Lincoln as "the best friend I had in Congress," while the ludicrous amendment was moved by Sidney Edgerton, subsequently appointed by Lincoln to a judgeship in Idaho and later the governorship of Montana Territory. In the senate two days later, Republican Senator John P. Hale moved that the proposal for the joint resolution be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, which he chaired. The resolution did not reemerge until February, when it was "postponed indefinitely."[17]

On the day Hale buried the resolution in committee, 13 December, American newspapers contained the first information from British newspapers about London's reaction to the seizure of Mason and Slidell, which was basically furious. But Seward and Lincoln would be particularly worried by a financial report reprinted from the London Times of 28 November: the news of the "aggression" produced "an indescribable effect" on the London Exchange, "the market for saltpetre had been singularly affected by some recent transactions" by buyers acting for the federal government, and it was "now assumed to be likely" that the British Government would immediately prohibit the export "of such contraband of war"—perhaps including the large quantities of rifles that hitherto had been shipped to the United States under the designation "hardware."[18]

Lincoln now knew that the incensed British, without threatening war, a diplomatic rupture, or recognition of the Confederacy, could exert enormous pressure on the United States by simply preventing the departure of all that niter that Lammot du Pont had been sent to purchase.[19] It was unpleasant to contemplate the political damage to Lincoln if he was forced to release Mason and Slidell simply because the British had such control over the world's supply of niter. The hope that Lammot du Pont had already shipped his purchases before the embargo was implemented was soon dashed: immediately after the prohibition began on 30 November, Lammot must have sent a message to his uncle Henry du Pont, who informed Seward on 13 December.[20]

Lincoln and Seward recognized that unless the British lifted the prohibition, the Union could not defeat the South, let alone fight the British. They would have to comply with almost any demand the British made regarding Mason and Slidell. The hope remained that the British cabinet might swiftly lift the embargo when—any day now—it learned officially via Ambassador Adams that Wilkes's action had been unauthorized. But within two more days, further press reports made clear that the British had sent some sort of ultimatum and also that they had been further enraged when they received the reports of the celebrations for Wilkes. The New York Times reported on England's preparations for war: a large vessel being loaded with Armstrong guns, eighty thousand Enfield rifles and ammunition, and ten thousand troops to be sent to Canada. The same newspaper also carried a British press report: "The export of saltpetre and warlike stores was formally prohibited. It was stated that one ship with a cargo of saltpetre for America has been stopped, and that the relanding of warlike stores, already shipped, had been required."[21]

The challenge now was how to make the best of this dire situation and avoid the appearance that Lincoln's government lacked courage and unity of purpose—never easy with the touchy and ambitious egos in the administration. Cabinet members, the newspapers, and the people all needed time to be acclimated to an eventual decision without being entirely informed about its necessity. Fortunately, the month-old ecstasy about Wilkes was subsiding, while the stark threat of war with Britain was sobering.

Lincoln's old friend Senator Orville Hickman Browning was visiting him on 15 December when "Mr. Seward came in with dispatches stating that the British cabinet had decided that the arrest of Mason and Slidell was a violation of international law, and that we must apologize and restore them to the protections of the British flag." These "dispatches" were not yet official, and Browning believed the British would not do "so foolish a thing," yet he told Lincoln and Seward that if Britain "is determined to force a war upon us why so be it. We will fight her to the death."[22] Lincoln or Seward were not likely to say anything about the niter situation in front of Browning, who made no mention of it in his diary. Indeed, far from rebuking Browning's rash talk, Seward echoed it the next evening at a social event to which the London Times correspondent had been invited. Russell found Seward "in very good humour," pointing out to "all who were inclined to listen how terrible the effects of a war would be if Great Britain forced it on the United States. 'We will wrap the whole world in flames!' he exclaimed. 'No power so remote that she will not feel the fire of our battle and be burned by our conflagration.'" Russell was naturally alarmed—until someone told him, "That's all bugaboo talk. When Seward talks that way he means to break down. He is most dangerous and obstinate when he pretends to agree a good deal with you." The following evening, Seward found some excuse to invite Russell to dinner, where "Mr. Seward was in the best spirits, and told one or two rather long, but very pleasant, stories"—a contrast Russell considered "not intelligible."[23]

Seward was good humored because the month-long uncertainty was now over. He and Lincoln knew they had no options, and, ironically, Britain's serious threat of war made everything easier than it would have been if the British had simply trumpeted the niter prohibition. Caving in to the British so they might lift the prohibition would give the administration's opponents reason to denounce not only its incompetence in not securing adequate niter supplies in advance but also its vulnerability should Britain yank this particular leash again in the future. But the actual threat of war—which could be depicted as British opportunism during America's national crisis—simply made the British appear unreasonably belligerent and Lincoln's appeasement seem serenely sensible. Besides, a war with Britain would kill any chance of defeating the Southern rebels—and all for the sake of keeping one pair of them behind bars.

Those who at first reacted like Browning, blustering defiantly while thinking the British were bluffing, calmed down as it became clear that the British seemed prepared to resort to arms to uphold a principle. Of course, Lincoln and Seward knew that Britain had no need either to bluff or to resort to arms. By 19 December, Seward learned from Britain's ambassador, Lord Lyons, that the newspaper reports were largely accurate about his government's demands, that the government wished to avoid conflict and to believe Wilkes had acted without instructions and against traditional U.S. policy, and that he, Lyons, was privately instructed to divulge the ultimatum's contents a few days before giving official notification, allowing Seward more time to respond than the official seven-day deadline.[24]

Seward's phony blustering in front of Russell on 16 December was the beginning of a campaign to shape the public impression of the administration's decision making in order to minimize the potentially disastrous political effects of the inevitable release of the two envoys.

On 18 December, Lincoln and Seward visited the Navy Yard, whose commandant, Dahlgren, having "never seen the President or Mr. Seward more quiet or grave," understood the cause: "The British affair seems to weigh on them." While Dahlgren's visitors were tight-lipped, their message was being spread by others. On the same day, John W. Forney, a journalist close to Lincoln and called "Lincoln's dog" by the president's opponents, editorialized in his Philadelphia Press that war with Britain would be a disaster and that Mason and Slidell should be released. "We must yield every feeling of pride to maintain our existence."[25] The following day, the New York Times reported that at the previous day's cabinet meeting, it was agreed that the government "has no right to give new life to the rebellion by entering upon another and vaster quarrel, which at the same time would increase tenfold the burden upon the people of the North," while the New York Evening Post (whose editor, William Cullen Bryant, was a staunch supporter of Lincoln) ran an item mentioning casually that the nation's stocks of niter were "sufficient for all emergencies."[26] Seward and Lincoln, who probably supplied that information, knew otherwise. At some point, Seward must have asked Captain Dahlgren whether niter could be obtained from non-British sources, though he probably knew what the reply would be and had perhaps even received it long before 26 December when Dahlgren put the discouraging information in a letter.[27] Meanwhile, Lincoln and Seward exploited Lord Lyons's willingness to delay the formal presentation of the ultimatum so they could prepare the ground. It was probably no accident that the announcement of the envoys' release eventually fell in the week between Christmas and New Year.

On 21 December, Russell of the Times recorded in his diary a story related by "an old Treasury official the other day." Lincoln reportedly exclaimed, "I would sooner die than give them up!" The reply was, "Mr. President, your death would be a great loss, but the destruction of the United States would be a still more deplorable event."[28] Thus, with no reference to the facts that Wilkes acted improperly and that the niter embargo tied their hands, Lincoln and Seward were presenting the problem as a stark choice between permanent destruction of the old Union and temporary humiliation for a proud president reluctant to cave in.

On the same day, Senator Browning recorded a conversation with Lincoln, who said that "he feared trouble" with the British.[29] Lincoln told Browning he had already drafted a reply to the British demand for a swift apology and surrender of Mason and Slidell. He then read to Browning a draft letter to Lord Lyons proposing some third-party arbitration—which may at one time have made sense as a delaying tactic but no longer.[30] Nevertheless, Browning could now tell anyone who asked that the situation was grim but the president was dealing with it rationally: no rash defiance but also no backing down. Again, there was no mention of niter.

The idea of arbitration may have been proposed to Lincoln by Charles Sumner, chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, who had seen the president "almost daily and most intimately ever since the 'Trent' question has been under discussion." Sumner's own views on the Trent Affair were undergoing change. According to an early biographer, "sympathizing strongly with the American feeling that Captain Wilkes had won a great triumph . . . , [Sumner] was at first desirous of upholding him; but whether through the influence of Seward and Lincoln, or by reason of his own research . . . he speedily saw that this position was untenable."[31]

The day after showing the arbitration proposal to Browning, Lincoln told Sumner, "There will be no war unless England is bent upon having one." Before the crisis was resolved, Sumner wrote privately to a friend, "The President himself will apply his own mind carefully to every word of the answer, so that it will be essentially his; and he hopes for peace," and that although Sumner had earlier proposed arbitration to Lincoln, "in her present mood England will not arbitrate. . . . Seward is tranquil and confident." But after the crisis, Sumner explained to his British friend, the opposition politician John Bright, that "it was necessary that the case be decided at once. Its pendency caused a paralysis upon all our naval and military movements against the rebellion, which gave us a foretaste of the certain effect of a British war." Sumner's term "paralysis" may reflect some understanding that gunpowder could not be wasted until the British reopened the niter supply line—which would certainly not happen if war actually broke out with Britain. Whatever Lincoln told him, Sumner had—by his own account written on 24 December—already discussed with Lincoln the fact that a war with England would have the Royal Navy "sponging" American ships off the ocean and blockading Northern ports and the British government recognizing, trading with, and soon allying with the South.[32]

Meanwhile, Lincoln and Seward finally stopped stalling Lyons and accepted the formal presentation of the British government's demands on 23 December—probably a week since the two men had been fully apprised of them. Lyons's immediate report to his superiors included some remarkable perceptions:

> You will perhaps be surprised to find Mr. Seward on the side of peace. . . . He sees himself in a very painful dilemma. But he knows his countrymen[:] . . . if he can convince them that there is a real danger of war, they may forgive him for the humiliation of yielding to England, while it would be fatal to him to be the author of a disastrous foreign war.

Lyons added that while he could not predict how Seward would eventually act, Seward wished to avoid letting "the President and Cabinet throw the whole burden on his shoulders."[33]

Many members of Congress were now dispersing for the Christmas holiday, and whatever Lincoln decided upon during their absence would become slightly old news by the time they reassembled. The problem was that no cabinet member wished to be isolated from the rest or to bear "the whole burden"—including Lincoln. He especially did not wish to give the ambitious Secretary of Treasury Salmon P. Chase an opportunity later to accuse him of ill judgment, or ignoring cabinet advice, or simply ignoring Chase's advice. It was entirely in Lincoln's interest, therefore, to continue the charade that he himself was being forced by others—almost against his will and certainly against his inclination—to hand over Mason and Slidell.

Also on 23 December, Lincoln held various conferences with Seward, Welles, Chase, and Sumner. Seward could show a letter received two days earlier from Ambassador Adams, indicating that Britain was fully prepared, however reluctantly, to go to war, which was confirmed by Sumner's letters from two sympathetic British politicians. The following day, a letter from the American ambassador in Paris emphasized French support for the British position.[34]

On Christmas Day, Lincoln convened a cabinet meeting that lasted four hours. At the end, it was decided to meet again the following day. This holdover gave the appearance that Lincoln was undecided, which is not credible. Seward led the discussion, and there is no reason to think he differed with Lincoln on essentials. Neither appears to have brought up the subjects of arbitration or niter.

Little credence should be given to an account written half a century later by Seward's son and secretary, Frederick Seward, who was not present at the two conversations between Lincoln and Seward that he recounted. Both conversations occurred after the other cabinet members had left the room and, as Seward must have described them to his son, depicted Lincoln still hoping to find a way to avoid surrendering the envoys and Seward still laboring to convince him there was no alternative.[35] Whether Seward misled his son or his son simply remembered the tale Seward was spinning for everyone, it is inconceivable that either Lincoln or Seward doubted the necessity of surrendering Mason and Slidell. It is more likely that Seward and Lincoln thought they could more easily bring the other cabinet members on board if they were allowed to believe their support was necessary to move the president in the right direction.

Welles wrote a decade later that Seward started out by taking "high and untenable ground" but then inexplicably "lost heart and courage, and [became] provokingly submissive to British exactions." Welles also suggested that Seward then joined Lincoln and Postmaster General Montgomery Blair in wishing to release the two envoys. Attorney General Edward Bates, whose diary provides the best firsthand account of the 25–26 December cabinet meetings, summarized Seward's argument that surrendering Mason and Slidell was the only way to avoid war. At some point, Sumner was invited in to read out letters recently received from two British members of Parliament, urging the release of Mason and Slidell.[36] No source indicates who invited Sumner, but Lincoln, who often conferred with Sumner, is more likely than Seward, who saw Sumner as something of a rival. Still, since everyone feared Congress's eventual reaction, having the Foreign Relations Committee chairman on board made sense; and his letters from British friends served Seward's purposes.[37]

Sumner left the 25 December meeting confident that "the immediate pending question will be settled," and that evening Lincoln told Browning that the cabinet had agreed not to divulge anything—"and there would be no war with England."[38] If Sumner and Lincoln were both expressing confidence that war would be avoided, then they, like Seward and Blair and probably Bates, accepted that the prisoners would have to be released. Why, then, was there any need for another meeting on 26 December? Perhaps further effort was needed to bring Chase on board so he could not later claim to have stood by the people and justice and so on while the rest of the cabinet trembled when the British Lion growled.

Seward's daughter Fanny recorded in her diary on 26 December that "this morning Father read his wise & beautiful dispatch to England." Whether this was the final twenty-six-page version delivered the following day to Lord Lyons is unknown, but the scene suggests Seward was confident of Lincoln's approval. Fanny's next sentence reads: "sec. Chase called & he read it to him."[39] Perhaps this helped to enlist Chase's assistance in overcoming any argument for delay, knowing the dire effect the crisis was having on Chase's ability to raise loans to fund the war. Possibly, Seward mentioned to Chase, ingenuously or not, the subject of Lincoln's earlier thoughts on arbitration or promoted the view (which he certainly promoted later) that Lincoln was still trying to avoid releasing Mason and Slidell. Seward's best approach would be to appeal to Chase's ego, as if only Chase's voice could change stubborn minds in the cabinet to support the necessary step—with Lincoln depicted as the main recalcitrant.

Whether his private meeting with Seward made the difference, Chase wrote a long passage into his diary, ostensibly after the first cabinet meeting on Christmas Day but probably after the final meeting the next day. It was a justification for the step he may have refused to take at the previous session. The entry supposedly recorded his "remarks" to the cabinet, yet it had the tone of a pronouncement.

> But we cannot afford delays. While the matter hangs in uncertainty the public mind will remain disquieted, our commerce will suffer serious harm, our action against the rebels must be greatly hindered, and the restoration of our prosperity . . . must be delayed. Better, then, to make now the sacrifice of feeling involved in the surrender of these rebels than even avoid it by the delays which explanations must occasion. I give my adhesion, therefore to the conclusion at which the secretary of state has arrived.[40]

At the cabinet meeting on 26 December, unanimous agreement was reached. Bates recorded in his diary no individual's arguments but an apparent summing up: "the necessity of the case," war with England meant abandoning all hope of suppressing the rebellion, Britain's maritime superiority "would sweep us from all the southern waters," trade will be ruined, the treasury will be bankrupt. It was probably Chase who raised those last two points. Bates concluded his record, "There was great reluctance on the part of some of the members of the cabinet—and even the President himself—to acknowledge these obvious truths; but all yielded to the necessity, and unanimously concurred in Mr. Seward's letter."[41]

Missing from every account of the cabinet discussions is the subject that must have weighed heavily with Lincoln and Seward: the niter embargo. Historian Arthur D. Chandler made a fascinating argument over fifty years ago that the niter shortage played some role in these deliberations, and more-recent works support this view.[42]

After his niter-purchasing mission had been halted by the British prohibition, young Lammot du Pont caught a ship for America on 7 December. Evidence suggests he spent Christmas Day at his home in Delaware, but the next day he was certainly in Washington writing a letter addressed to Seward, presumably at Seward's request. The letter summarized Lammot's activities of the past few weeks and was endorsed as received by the State Department the same day, 26 December.[43]

Chandler argued that since Seward himself already knew the details, the letter was written "in order to give the Cabinet first hand information on the nitre purchases and the embargo" and to give Seward "an effective means of bringing Lincoln and most of the Cabinet to his more pacific way of thinking." But this is unlikely since no one recorded any cabinet discussion of niter, and more recent studies have suggested that Lammot met with Seward during some interval between sessions of that day's decisive cabinet meeting and may not have written the letter until after the decision had already been agreed in cabinet.[44] Moreover, since Lammot sailed from England on 7 December, he should have reached America long before Christmas. A confidential agent on a vital government mission would not head home, even for Christmas, without first reporting to the man who sent him, Secretary Seward. There is indirect evidence that at whatever point Lammot met with Seward, Lammot also met with Lincoln, for Lammot's aunt later recounted that her nephew "never saw two more worn down, haggard, worried-looking men."[45] Having probably reported to Washington some days earlier, when Lammot came to the capital on 26 December, it was not to provide new information but to receive fresh instructions.

Cabinet unity had been achieved, but the niter problem remained. Perhaps it was in order to maintain the fiction that Lammot's purchases were not for the government that his 26 December letter included a request that the secretary of state instruct Ambassador Adams in London to do what he could toward having the embargo lifted. Before that day ended, Seward not only handed Lord Lyons his formal twenty-six-page reply to the British demands but also gave Lammot a letter to carry to Ambassador Adams, instructing him to take action "for the relief of E. I. du Pont de Nemours and Co." regarding the niter shipment.[46]

The news of the cabinet decision hit the newspapers, and instead of uproar, there was a general sigh of relief from press, people, and even Congress. Mason and Slidell were quietly put on board a ship on New Year's Day—the same day that Lammot du Pont began another voyage to London. On 13 January 1862, Lammot wrote back that the niter embargo would probably be lifted within a week, and indeed it was on the eighteenth. The first of the reloaded ships sailed on 2 February, arriving a fortnight later. So few people were informed of the operation that even Chief of Ordnance General James W. Ripley said he knew no more about the shipments than what he read in the newspapers.[47]

The resolution of the Trent Affair was played out on a very public stage but far behind the scenes only a handful of people—Lincoln, Seward, the du Ponts, Dahlgren, and, perhaps, the British cabinet—knew that the outcome was largely determined by niter. Although the supply had been resumed, Lincoln understood that until some alternative source was found, the United States remained vulnerable. On the same day that Seward gave the formal letter to Lord Lyons, Lincoln delivered an order (rather than his accustomed request) to General Ripley to purchase ten thousand Spencer repeating rifles—which might yet be needed for a war on two fronts unless a solution was found for Lincoln's chemical problem.[48]

Less than a month after the Trent Affair seemed to be over, Lincoln was arranging congressional approval for a reorganization that placed Dahlgren in complete charge of research and development at the Navy Yard, with an assistant to handle administrative duties.[49] Dahlgren realized that the supply of niter was still a major concern. The spring and summer campaigns in 1862 brought the Union more defeats than victories and used up much of the niter brought from England in February. Most of what remained was under the army's control, while the navy needed more as blockade duties increased and a new threat developed from Confederate warships built in British shipyards—which might yet lead to war with Britain. Dahlgren made new arrangements: Henry du Pont was to make further indirect purchases in London and Calcutta; Welles was asked to approve the construction of storage facilities; a U.S. naval officer was sent to Yokohama in July to send back samples of possible Japanese sources of niter; and on 27 July, advertisements appeared in newspapers requesting bids from companies for domestic sources of niter.[50]

On 7 August, Seward and Secretary of War Edwin M. Stanton accompanied Lincoln to the Navy Yard to observe Dahlgren's tests of a new "Rafael" machine gun that, despite using standard paper cartridges, could fire forty shots in twenty seconds, and it would be surprising if the event did not stimulate a discussion of the long-term problem of the supply of niter.[51] About a week later, a possible solution arose when Lincoln received a visit from an old acquaintance from Springfield.[52] Isaac R. Diller had briefly served as consul in Germany where he met chemist Heinrich Hochstätter, who had developed a gunpowder that relied on a chlorate instead of niter. Now acting as an agent, Diller wanted the secret formula to be tested in a way that would not negate future patent rights. Lincoln understood the motivation and sent Diller—carrying notes from the president—to Dahlgren and also to David P. Holloway, the commissioner at the Patent Office, who was asked to allow Dr. Charles M. Wetherill, the only chemist employed by the federal government, to work with Diller.[53] On 21 August, the day after contacting Holloway, Lincoln vaguely requested that Welles "afford all facilities" to Diller and Wetherill "for some chemical experiments which they desire to make privately under my direction."[54]

Preliminary tests showed promising results.[55] A detailed contract drafted in December included a long list of questions, apparently Lincoln's, that had to be satisfactorily answered through full-scale testing before Lincoln would "advise" (having no authority to promise) the payment of the huge sum of $150,000. A week later, when Dahlgren was summoned to the White House to discuss something else, the president showed him yet another letter from an inventor of some new gunpowder. Lincoln said he had already burned a bit of the sample that had been sent and thought it left too much residue. "Now, I'll show you," said Lincoln, conducting a mini-experiment by placing some powder on a sheet of paper and touching it with a live coal picked from the fireplace with tongs. After the flash and smoke, Lincoln glanced at the paper and said, "There is too much left there."[56]

Eventually, Welles learned "something . . . in regard to the great secret of this man Dillon." If unclear about Diller's name, Welles was precise about the $150,000 that figured in "a written promise" from the president, about which he was informed after he apparently cornered Dahlgren on the subject on 22 February. In his diary, Welles ranted, as he no doubt had to Dahlgren, that "the President had no authority for it," "no appropriation," and he "could not divert sums." Welles blamed Dahlgren as an example of "subordinates, flattered by [Lincoln's] notice" who should not be "encouraging the President in these well-intentioned but irregular proceedings." In self-defense, Dahlgren suggested his efforts to restrain the president were "impotent" since Lincoln "has a propensity to engage in matter of this kind, and is liable to be constantly imposed upon by sharpers and adventurers." Welles noted, "Finding the heads of Departments opposed to these schemes, the President goes often behind them," and Dahlgren apparently provided his own "written promise" that neither he nor Welles was responsible for this deal with "Dillon."[57]

After various delays, Lincoln arranged in April that Dr. Wetherill (who in the meantime had become an employee of the Department of Agriculture) should be seconded for a month along with an assistant to do unspecified work in Philadelphia. In May, Lincoln called for Dahlgren and Ripley to share the costs of the experiments, and in July, he wrote directly to their chiefs to pay further bills "as former ones have been paid."[58] The new powder passed an important trial in mid-June, though a question remained whether the powder "preserves its properties after graining"—converting the powder into a more stable form for transport and controlled rate of burn.[59] But by October, it was found that the powder could only be grained if its formula was altered, which then made it too unstable for safe storage.

When Diller implored Lincoln for additional funding, Lincoln returned his calling card with a note, "I am sorry, but I fear I shall have to drop this powder business."[60] The project was partly superseded by Dahlgren's success, in cooperation with Henry du Pont, in finding by the end of 1862 some domestic manufacturers who could produce a substitute for niter made out of sodium nitrate (available in America but most easily mined in Chile) and potash. Initially, the price seemed prohibitive, but Dahlgren was determined to end dependence on British sources, and the prices eventually equalized as production of the substitute increased, and the price of niter from India rose. Chile then, and until World War I, replaced India as the primary source of saltpeter.[61]

Although Lincoln's pet project had failed, his unstinting support for Dahlgren had paid off, and one major result was that by the beginning of 1863, it was impossible for Britain to threaten the United States with a chemistry problem of which few were aware but which Lincoln had understood and helped to solve.

Delegation and Control

"Will the evidence that this mail carries satisfy the English that we want to live in peace with them?" Asa Gray wrote to Darwin on New Year's Eve 1861, knowing that the ship conveying his letter would also carry the news that James Mason and John Slidell were to be released. Gray acknowledged that some intemperate remarks in Darwin's last letter were "very natural" but also defended American actions, asserting that the Lincoln administration had "promptly conceded" and was "cheerfully" releasing the envoys: Gray was not one of the very few who knew the actual explanation, which was left out of William H. Seward's letter to the British foreign minister. Gray declared that America "must be strong to be secure and respected—Natural selection quickly crushes out weak nations" and was prescient on the issue dearest to Darwin. "As to slavery, the course of things is getting to meet your views. . . . [I]f the [Southerners] give up now they may save their institution in their own States to have the chance of abolishing it themselves in the only safe and easy way, with time and the gradual competition of white labor. But obstinate resistance will surely bring on wide sweeping manumission." Closing with New Year's greetings, Gray urged Darwin, "Keep up your lively sympathies with those who have very severe trials to undergo and sacrifices to make for what they deem the cause of right, honor, & future safety."[1]

Darwin had been disappointed for months that Lincoln had apparently done nothing to strike at slavery and then failed to disavow immediately the actions of Captain Charles Wilkes. He was miffed that Gray's letter, written the moment the crisis passed, still blamed the British for being too sympathetic to the South and "peremptory" in issuing demands to the North. Gray's letter arrived at a bad time, while the Darwin household was plagued by influenza: "What misery there is in this life," Darwin wrote to Joseph Dalton Hooker. Out of sorts, Darwin did not reply immediately but sent Gray's letter to Hooker with the extraordinarily sour comment: "Asa Gray is evidently sore about England: he does not say much; nor do I; but I have hitherto been able to write with some sympathy; now I must be silent; for I look at the people as a nation of unmitigated blackguards."[2]

Although that was Hooker's standard view, he was surprised by Darwin's fit of anti-Americanism. Eventually, Darwin felt able to send Gray a letter that mixed cordiality with grit. After various pleasantries and botanical business, Darwin grasped the nettle. "Now for a few words on politics; but they shall be few, for we shall no longer agree." After detailing his disgust over the Trent Affair—especially the Boston dinner in Wilkes's honor, which "quite turned my stomach"—Darwin concluded, "It is well to make a clean breast of it at once; & I have begun to think whether it would not be well for the peace of the world, if you were split up into two or three nations." With that off his chest, Darwin added that he could not "bear the thought of the Slave-holders being triumphant" or of a permanent frontier between North and South "with armies, fortifications, & custom-houses without end with your retrograde tariff. Bad man, as you will think me, I shall always think of you with affection. Here is an insult! I shall always think of you as an Englishman."[3]

It was a frank letter, tempered so as not to kill a friendship if charm could save it. Darwin must have felt relief at Gray's genial reply: "As I have not given you up notwithstanding your very shocking principles and prejudices against design in nature, so we shall try to abide your longitudinarian defection"—an in-joke about different attitudes resulting from different geographical origins. Gray agreed that the Boston banquet was all "bosh" but said it was odd that Darwin of all people should "fail to appreciate that it is simply a struggle for existence on our part, and that men will persist in thinking their existence of some consequence to themselves." Darwin's next letter showed his own feelings were still raw: "It is really almost a pleasure to receive stabs from so smooth, polished & sharp a dagger as your pen. . . . The Millennium must come before nations love each other, but try & do not hate me." Gray responded cheerfully, "Yes, I will promise not to hate you: quite the contrary!" and signed himself "Your cordial friend and true Yankee."[4]

As Darwin entered one of his worst phases of ill health, his research seemed to have lost direction. The two decades of preparation for a vast work on natural selection had been followed by two years of intense effort to produce and promote On the Origin of Species. After that, Darwin at first planned to write up his vast collection of notes on natural selection in a three-part project: a volume on variation among the relatively knowable domesticated animals and plants, followed by a study of the harder-to-measure variations among wild animals and plants, and concluding with the application of these analogies to the examination of the more difficult and controversial question of how only slight variations and modifications could have separated man from the rest of the animal world.

Although Darwin planned to demonstrate his theory's validity before applying it to man, most of his admirers and critics had prematurely connected the dots. But Darwin tried to stick to his original plan, expecting the subject of man's origins to be dealt with soon by other sympathetic colleagues. He was pleased that Thomas Huxley, Charles Lyell, and John Lubbock, a young biologist and Darwin's neighbor, were all investigating human origins or development and presumably applying natural selection to the subject. Darwin was content to let them bear the brunt of any new controversy while further experiments and data collection sidetracked his own larger study.

After barnacles and seed experiments, it was pigeons, primulas, and orchids: all useful studies, testing ideas about sexual selection and resulting in several papers and another book. At the start of 1862, Darwin was delighted when his publisher said his volume on orchids would probably appear about the same time as Lyell's study of human antiquity.[5] But the orchid book came out in four months, leaving the anxious Darwin to wait nearly a year before Lyell went to press.

As he waited, Darwin enjoyed Huxley's long-running scrape with Richard Owen, who argued that the human brain is utterly distinguishable from those of even the closest primates because it possessed a structure called a hippocampus minor, while Huxley insisted that this was simply another feature that, in fact, men shared with apes. Huxley also gave a series of lectures called "The Relation of Man to the Rest of the Animal Kingdom" to an attentive audience of largely working-class men. After one particularly full house, Huxley told his wife, "By next Friday evening they will all be convinced that they are monkeys."[6] Owen also gave a lecture, printed in the Athenaeum and entitled "The Gorilla and the Negro." Since his main purpose was to draw a rigid line between animals and men, Owen might have simply compared "Gorilla and Man," but Owen held that although the negro is indeed a man (being blessed with a hippocampus minor), he is also the "lowest variety of human race," inferior anatomically and mentally when compared with "Europeans." So, Owen's disparaging point was that even a negro is different from a gorilla! Huxley responded with a brief letter to the Athenaeum—printed under the title "Man and the Apes"—asserting simply that gorillas also have the hippocampus minor and never mentioning negroes. Owen sought to continue the debate, but Huxley protested, "Life is too short to occupy oneself with the slaying of the slain more than once."[7] Darwin told Huxley that his letter was "very well done, but almost too civil" and praised it to Hooker in a letter that also expressed admiration for Lyell's "capital work" investigating the flint tools fashioned by early men and found in preglacial geological levels in France: "The case gets more & more complicated. All, however, tends to greater & greater antiquity of man."[8]

Meanwhile, Huxley grew more assertive about man's origins, informing Darwin that during a lecture in Edinburgh, he made a "distinct statement that I believe Man & the apes to have come from one stock." Darwin was delighted that Huxley planned to publish his lectures soon. Between them, Huxley and Lyell might now apply evidence from geology, archeology, paleontology, and comparative anatomy to show that the races of man had a common origin, pushed back in time in a manner that would allow for that origin and later variations (races) to be explained by natural selection. While Lyell and Huxley worked on the problem from new directions, Darwin continued to seek less controversial evidence—from primulas and orchids—to demonstrate the viability of his theory, but he praised Gray for perceiving that the orchid book "was a 'flank movement' on the enemy."[9]

Flanking actions did not distract Darwin from the developing battle regarding human origins and unity. Corresponding with Charles Kingsley on the "grand & awful question of the genealogy of man," Darwin declared that compared with his initial reaction on first seeing the natives of Tierra del Fuego, he had no difficulty with his "present belief that an incomparably more remote ancestor was a hairy beast." And looking at it from the other side, Darwin added, "Monkeys have downright good hearts, at least sometimes, as I could show, if I had space. I have long attended to this subject, & have materials for a curious essay on Human expression, & a little on the relation in mind of man to the lower animals." Yet, though continually gathering materials, Darwin held back from publishing. "How I should be abused if I were to publish such an essay!" he told Kingsley. He was still hoping Lyell would soon produce something "on the relations of men & other animals; but I do not know what his recent intentions are."[10]

Huxley, meanwhile, lectured "On Fossil Remains of Man," arguing that it was necessary to "extend by long epochs the most liberal estimate that has yet been made of the antiquity of Man." Darwin doled out more praise and was delighted when Huxley told him the lecture would be written up "as a chapter of my forthcoming Evidence as to Man's Place in Nature."[11] Hooker, seeing an early draft, told Darwin the book was "an amusing as well as clever book on Monkey Man. It will be a great success," and Darwin replied that he heartily hoped "Huxley's book will be very successful. . . . he will be well abused." Darwin also told Lyell that he "heartily hoped" Lyell's book would be out in October, though "I fancy Huxley will be out sooner."[12] Unfortunately for the eager Darwin, neither book appeared until early in 1863.

In the meantime, Darwin's anxiety about the bloodletting in America had been temporarily eased in April 1862. "The North seems going on grandly victorious," he wrote Gray, "& thank God there is distinct ground broken on the Slavery question; but we stupid English cannot yet believe that you will ever be a single Union again."[13]

The Northern victories to which Darwin alluded were mainly in the west, though there was also the success in March at Hampton Roads, Virginia, when the Confederate ironclad, the former USS Merrimack, now renamed the CSS Virginia, was forced to halt its attack on the Union's wooden fleet after destroying two ships and damaging several others. It was stopped by the arrival of the USS Monitor, with its entirely metal hull of a revolutionary design by John Ericsson. The ships fought each other to a standstill, but the Merrimack retreated to its haven, never to fight again while ships of the Monitor design would soon be produced in large numbers, helping to capture Confederate coastal positions and tighten the blockade. Without Lincoln's personal involvement, the Monitor might never have been built. He also played a role—less subtle and perhaps less effective—in the land victories that had taken place between January and April.

Especially after the Trent affair, Lincoln was mindful that the threat of some foreign intervention increased as time passed without clear indications that the North was capable of victory. Although Lincoln cultivated the image of a delegator who left affairs in the hands of those more capable, over the winter he lost patience with his generals. He had previously commanded nothing larger than a company of Illinois militia, yet all his life, Lincoln had accomplished what he was not supposed to be able to achieve, and now, having survived for the moment the threat of an additional war with Britain, Lincoln wanted victories that would allay that threat and crush the rebellion. He moved beyond testing weapons to reading military science, giving "himself, night and day, to the study of the military situation," according to his secretaries and later biographers John G. Nicolay and John Hay. "He read a large number of strategical works, . . . held long conferences with eminent generals and admirals, and astonished them by the extent of his special knowledge and the keen intelligence of his questions."[14]

Early in 1862, Lincoln borrowed from the Library of Congress a copy of Elements of Military Art and Science (1846) by Henry W. Halleck. Later nicknamed (not always kindly) "Old Brains," Halleck was currently Lincoln's fourth-highest-ranking general. Six months later, Lincoln made him general-in-chief of all the armies, at which point Halleck proved he was good with administration and offering advice but not with decision making. From Halleck's Elements, Lincoln may have learned a fair amount of military science—or that military science did not amount to much.[15]

At present, Halleck was one of several army and naval officers passing the buck rather than arranging for the speedy delivery of a flotilla of craft specially designed to carry mortars so huge they could not really be transported by land, though they proved decisive in reducing Confederate strongholds along rivers and estuaries. On 10 January, Lincoln began firing telegrams in several directions, and when no one acted, he went to the Navy Bureau of Ordnance and told Lieutenant Henry Wise to "put it through. . . . Now I am going to devote a part of every day to these mortars and I won't leave off until it fairly rains bombs." By the end of the month, Wise wrote that the president "is evidently a practical man, understands precisely what he wants, and is not turned aside when he has his work before him."[16]

In January, while promoting Captain John A. Dahlgren at the Navy's Ordnance Office, Lincoln decided he must get rid of General James W. Ripley, the army's chief of ordnance (which proved difficult), but he did succeed in replacing

Simon Cameron as secretary of war with Edwin M. Stanton—a man who six years earlier had grievously insulted Lincoln during a patent trial in Cincinnati, Ohio, but also a man Lincoln believed, rightly as it turned out, could do the job. By the end of January, Lincoln and Stanton composed the "President's General War Order No 1," calling for "a general movement" of all the land and naval forces of the Union "against the insurgent forces," to commence on 22 February, George Washington's birthday. Although this has been characterized as "little more than high-flown persiflage" and "less an order . . . than a distress signal," it indicated, according to historian James M. McPherson, that "Lincoln grasped sooner than many of his generals the strategic concept of 'concentration in time.'"[17] To two of his doubtful generals, Don C. Buell and Halleck, Lincoln tried to explain his > general idea of this war to be that we have the greater numbers, and the enemy has the greater facility of concentrating forces upon points of collision; that we must fail, unless we can find some way of making our advantage an overmatch for his; and that this can only be done by menacing him with superior forces at different points, at the same time; so that we can safely attack, one, or both, if he makes no change; and if he weakens one to strengthen the other, forbear to attack the strengthened one, but seize, and hold the weakened one, gaining so much.[18]

Probably realizing that that particular order was unlikely to accomplish much, Lincoln soon issued "Special War Order No. 1" on 1 February. This was a specific plan for attacking a Confederate army at Manassas Junction, Virginia. General George McClellan, commander of the Army of the Potomac, argued in favor of his own plan: to send a Union army down Chesapeake Bay to land on the coast fifty miles east of Richmond, Virginia, in order to attack the Confederate capital from an "undefended" approach. Lincoln tried to build a case, sending McClellan specific questions, comparing the two plans' expenditures of time and money, the certainty and value of any victory, the likelihood of breaking the line of the enemy's communications or exposing Washington, D.C., to danger, and the provision of a line of retreat, if needed. McClellan never provided answers but only excuses about the conditions of roads and the size of the enemy's force between Washington and Richmond—estimates McClellan constantly exaggerated.[19]

Lincoln now made a desperate effort to outflank his own general by putting both plans to a council of McClellan's senior divisional commanders—a poor idea because most knew their careers depended more on their senior commander than on a likely one-term president. When his plan was voted down, Lincoln pressed McClellan at least to plan an operation to push the Confederates farther away from Washington before setting off on his Peninsula Campaign. McClellan ordered the construction of special boats to be floated up the Potomac River for a crossing near Harpers Ferry, Virginia. After much delay and cost, the operation was launched on 27 February but was "a damned fizzle," in Stanton's words, for the boats proved to be a few inches too wide to get through the locks on the river. "I am no engineer," a furious Lincoln told McClellan's chief of staff, "but it seems to me that if I wished to know whether a boat would go through a hole or a lock, common sense would teach me to go and measure it!"[20]

As March arrived and McClellan still showed no sign of movement, Lincoln took advice from other generals, read up on the Napoleonic "corps system," and then informed McClellan that he was going to reorganize the army into five corps and personally select their commanders. McClellan was incensed but still would not move. Lincoln made desperate efforts to replace McClellan, but the only candidate possibly acceptable to McClellan's staff, General Ethan Allen Hitchcock, refused to command the army in the field.

In April, McClellan finally began his Peninsula Campaign, proceeding with extreme caution. Lincoln was frustrated that McClellan did not take the opportunity once the army was in the vicinity of the naval base at Norfolk to capture the city and destroy the Merrimack. Lincoln decided to get closer to the action and took Chase and Stanton with him on a naval vessel. Stationed outside Norfolk in case the Merrimack attempted another foray was the Monitor. Lincoln paid an emotional visit to the vessel he had done so much to bring into existence. He then summoned several officers to help formulate a plan for capturing Norfolk. In some accounts, Lincoln actually walked along a moonlit beach in Confederate territory to see if it was suitable for an amphibious landing. The next day, Lincoln's plan was implemented, and he soon heard the satisfying explosion as the Merrimack was blown up.[21]

McClellan's slow advance toward Richmond ended badly as he was forced to retreat to Harrison's Landing near the end of June. Lincoln now had to determine whether McClellan should continue his ill-conceived Peninsula Campaign or withdraw the army to protect Washington from threats by Stonewall Jackson.

"It is surprising to me that you should have strength of mind to care for science, amidst the awful events daily occurring in your country," Darwin wrote gloomily to Gray in mid-June, assuming the failure in the peninsula was sapping Gray's optimism as it had Darwin's. "I daily look at the Times with almost as much interest as an American could do. When will peace come: it is dreadful to think of the desolation of large parts of your magnificent country; & all the speechless misery suffered by many."[22]

Gray admitted that prospects were "looking badly enough" and that "McClellan has clearly been over matched." Darwin avoided the subject in his next few letters, but Gray recurred to the martial topic at the end of July: "The South force us at length to do what it would have been more humane to have done from the first,—i.e. to act with vigor,—not to say rigor." Three more letters crossed before Darwin responded briefly in August: "Affairs seem to be getting with you more

& more terrible. What will the end be? It seems to us here far more fearful, than it apparently does to you."[23]

It would have interested Darwin that when Lincoln visited McClellan's peninsula headquarters early in August to consider the next course of action, his decision turned partly on an issue of natural science. Of McClellan's five corps commanders, three agreed with McClellan that the campaign should continue, but Lincoln was more convinced by another general who argued that the defeated army's morale was worsened by the area's malarial swamps causing illness that could soon reduce the army's manpower—he estimated by 20 percent. He recommended withdrawal, at least while summer lasted. Lincoln recognized that this West Point graduate, former member of General Winfield Scott's staff, and recently a successful corps commander, probably knew something about disease because his father was a prominent Massachusetts physician—who had named his son after a famous English doctor. General Erasmus Darwin Keyes's diagnosis of Lincoln was also perceptive: "There was not one of his most trusted warlike counsellors in the beginning of the war that equaled him in military sagacity."[24]

Lincoln ordered McClellan to return most of his force to the Washington area, where Lincoln casually arranged to place the troops under the command of General John Pope.

In April 1862, when Darwin thanked God "there is distinct ground broken on the Slavery question," he was reacting to several developments.[25] Between 6 March and 10 April, Congress passed legislation forbidding the military to return fugitive slaves forcibly to their rebel masters, abolished slavery within Washington, D.C., and approved a resolution supporting compensated emancipation (although it was a diluted version of what Lincoln had requested).

If Darwin thanked God rather than Abraham Lincoln, he was not alone because many Americans considered Lincoln too conservative with regard to slavery. Lincoln himself had to consider the majority, who still opposed any abolitionist action that might make it more difficult for the Southern states to return to the Union or more likely that blacks would move into Northern states. Most historians agree Lincoln walked this tightrope well, taking rational steps forward when it was politically possible and militarily useful to do so. But one of Lincoln's major policies regarding blacks has divided historians, many considering the rational Lincoln to have acted somewhat irrationally. The policy was colonization of blacks, either back to Africa or to the Caribbean or out west—basically out of the way of white people.

The British colony of Sierra Leone, which was begun in 1787 as a place to send blacks liberated during the American War of Independence (who otherwise might have remained in Canada or London), had also become a refuge for slaves liberated from slave ships by the Royal Navy. Darwin's Wedgwood relatives donated more than £70 in 1824 to support the colony, and his later professors in Cambridge, Henslow, and Whewell, made subscriptions of a guinea each.[26] Britain made no concerted effort to return to Africa the blacks emancipated in the British West Indies, four thousand miles from London. Even Britons as sensitized as Darwin could only imagine how twenty-six million white Americans felt about living in a country alongside four and a half million present or former slaves. Whether a white man can consider a black to be "a man and a brother" while also believing he must live elsewhere is a dilemma Darwin never had to confront.

The Rationality of Colonization

The literature on Lincoln and colonization is vast because the subject is peculiarly emotive. Scholars debate how far Lincoln raised himself above the average racism of his time and how early he took particular steps to fight slavery, but most agree that Lincoln was generally on the right side, moved in the right direction, and was ahead of the public opinion he helped to shape. But the policy of black colonization, even apart from Lincoln's involvement, is today viewed as "bad" practically and morally. Since it did not work, many conclude it could not work and that intelligent people should have recognized this at the time. As a moral issue, black colonization is glibly linked to the twentieth-century horrors of eugenics, "final solutions," Lebensraum, and "ethnic cleansing." To suggest colonization was anything but bad seems (however illogically) to imply that millions of African Americans today somehow have less right to be United States citizens than their white compatriots and that we might have avoided the racial integration to which we now aspire. Historians believing colonization to be doubly wrong—unable to achieve what it should not have attempted—struggle to explain why such an intelligent and good man as Abraham Lincoln supported it.

Historian Michael Vorenberg concisely states the logical extremes of possible explanations: "Those who tend to see Lincoln as a racist usually assume that he never gave up the idea of deporting all free blacks, while those who believe in Lincoln as a racial egalitarian typically assert that his racial views matured as he realized that colonization could not work and that he came to believe that blacks had a legitimate claim to remaining in the United States." Leaning toward the second view, Vorenberg argues that Lincoln never demonstrated real devotion to colonization for its own sake but found it politically useful, discarding it when it no longer served. Historian Gabor Boritt largely agrees, emphasizing "the contradiction and ambivalence [that] were the hallmarks of Lincoln's support for colonization." However, neither view—that Lincoln supported colonization as an ad hoc "political calculation" or as a "defense mechanism that psychologists call avoidance"—allows that he might have considered it a good idea per se.[1] Both historians perceived intellectual faltering, with Vorenberg suggesting Lincoln fused emancipation and colonization "even more tightly together in his mind, making it nearly impossible for him to believe that one could exist without the other" and with Gabor Boritt using a range of phrases suggesting Lincoln acted irrationally.[2] David Herbert Donald writes that colonization "was entirely rational—and wholly impracticable" yet emphasizes Lincoln's pursuit of a "fantasy."[3]

Colonization becomes a test of whether Lincoln based his policy choices on evidence and logic or genuinely failed to see the faults in colonization until he later "matured." I support the less-popular view that colonization in the middle of the nineteenth century had far more about it that was "good" than "bad" and that intelligent people like Lincoln were rational to support it as a feasible way to fight slavery and give justice to freedmen—and to reject it when circumstances radically changed.[4] Indeed, Lincoln may have hoped at one stage that increasing tolerance of blacks by the white majority might make colonization unnecessary, but ultimately his perception of the scale of white prejudice kept the policy alive.

One could construct long lists of prominent nineteenth-century Americans—white and black, North and South—who believed colonization offered justice to the Africans being returned homeward and would hasten the end of slavery or who denounced colonization as inhumane, impractical, and effectively proslavery. Several prominent abolitionists moved from the first view to the second. Some members of the new Republican Party opposed colonization, while many others considered it part of the party platform even before Lincoln gained the White House.[5]

Modern immigration patterns have created many multiracial societies, but in the early nineteenth century, most immigration involved Europeans going to the Americas, South Africa, New Zealand, and Australia, where, as Darwin witnessed during the Beagle voyage, they preferred some form of extermination of indigenous populations to any version of integration. Native Americans found themselves sharing their regions with immigrating Europeans and enslaved Africans. Whites constantly pushed the Indians aside, and there was no reason to imagine that the blacks, if ever freed, would be treated any better. Indeed, the very "success" of the U.S. government's "Indian removals" made moving blacks back to Africa seem feasible. Europeans came to America from racially homogeneous societies, and their descendants saw that nearly all countries comprised a single race. Removing Indians and blacks was a way toward greater homogeneity for Anglo-Americans—who had enough difficulty coping with Germans and Catholics.

Opponents of slavery could salve their consciences that colonization somehow addressed the problem when constitutional and economic factors barred other action. They could imagine Christianized blacks being returned to convert the Dark Continent or—more absurdly—that black colonists would spread whatever blessings of democracy they had come to admire while laboring in America.

Some Republicans promoted schemes to colonize freed slaves into tropical areas in the Western Hemisphere, reducing transport costs, providing access to new resources (perhaps cotton grown by paid labor), extending American influence, perhaps countering British influence in the isthmus where someday a canal might be built. Opponents of colonization dismissed all this but rarely on the grounds that colonization itself was not feasible.

The most obvious reason for supporting colonization then is rarely mentioned today: simple justice. Blacks had been brought to America against their will, transported in the worst conceivable conditions, with millions dying along the way from disease or desperate suicide. Such crimes could have no redress, but at least the surviving remnant could, in theory, be restored to their homeland. Of course, the practical difficulty increased over time as the "remnant" steadily increased, despite the slave trade's abolition in 1808.

Most whites assumed black slaves wanted to leave America. The colonization movement began shortly after the slave trade ceased, when most blacks were considered "Africans" even though more and more were American born with no direct memory, or even a parent's stories, of African life. Only slave owners defending their treatment of blacks ever argued that conditions in Africa could be worse than being enslaved in the south or subjected to gross indignities and civil disabilities throughout the north. Finally, polygenists such as Louis Agassiz had recently pronounced that blacks were separately created in Africa by God, designed for some "tropical" environment that was only approximated in a few southern states, and were otherwise doomed to ultimate extinction according to natural laws. Science seemed to confirm what recent history indicated globally: that differing races simply could not live together, and one must be destroyed, enslaved, or removed by the other.

No white person, north or south, would trade places with a black, and most dismissed those articulate blacks who denounced colonization, such as Frederick Douglass, as a tiny, untypical faction—which in many respects they were. The slaves' contribution to America's great prosperity was acknowledged less than as the contribution of dumb cattle, and few whites perceived that a growing number of blacks were unwilling to leave the homeland they had helped create. (Later, most whites were amazed when thousands of African Americans showed themselves willing to stay among their oppressors and even to don uniforms and fight for the freedom that America was meant to represent.)

Some whites who recognized that blacks might not willingly depart argued for forced deportation. There were many such within the Republican Party and even inside Lincoln's cabinet, but Lincoln himself always maintained that colonization must be voluntary. Forced deportation would involve a larger bureaucracy and targets more difficult to meet, as well as personal anguish, while a voluntary program allowed for a more flexible system that might take on a life of its own. Opponents of colonization might prove unable to dissuade those wishing to leave, while those arguing for forced deportation might feel differently later about neighbors who made a conscious choice to remain. In terms of improving race relations, different "benefits" might come from achieving complete colonization or merely advocating a partial colonization.

Ethical issues aside, large-scale colonization was never going to be easy and grew more difficult over time. Changing circumstances could make it seem less worth the costs, and during certain phases in his presidency, Lincoln curtailed his promotion of the policy. None of that makes his long-standing support for colonization an irrational act.

Scholars, including those quoted earlier, tend to suggest that Lincoln's interest in colonization was first evident in 1852, when he delivered the eulogy for Henry Clay and praised the concept of "restoring a captive people to their long-lost father-land."[6] But Clay had supported the American Colonization Society (ACS) from its founding in 1816, and it is not surprising that Lincoln and many colleagues showed an interest long before 1852. Charles R. Matheny (whose son was later Lincoln's "best man") and John T. Stuart (whose law practice Lincoln joined in 1837) were, respectively, president and vice-president of the Sangamon County Colonization Society, organized in August 1833 in Springfield as an auxiliary to the Illinois State Colonization Society (ISCS). Stuart and Dan Stone (the state legislator who cosigned Lincoln's 1837 protest against slavery) participated in a lyceum debate in 1833 on whether the national government should "appropriate funds from the treasury in aid of the Colonization society." In 1839, Porter Clay, Henry's brother and an ACS agent, delivered a lecture in Springfield, and Reverend Charles Dresser (who later performed the service at Lincoln's wedding) presided over a first annual meeting of the revived local organization. Stuart, Dr. John Todd (Mary's uncle), and other Whig supporters were on the governing committee. By then, the ISCS had about 150 members, twenty of whom paid an annual donation of $10 each to help fund the transport and settlement in Africa of twelve emancipated slaves.[7]

Lincoln possibly numbered among those 150 members and was presumably among the four hundred guests who attended a 3 January 1845 party at the home of his brother-in-law Ninian Edwards, apparently following a meeting held in the state house to re-form the ISCS. Lincoln's friend Orville Browning was elected vice-president of the new board of managers arranged for copies of the ACS journal, The African Repository, to be "sent gratuitously to every Clergyman in the State, who is willing to receive it."[8]

The first annual report of the ISCS included a statement that was later quoted by an ACS leader during a visit to London in 1849 when he gave testimony before a select committee of the House of Lords. It included statistics comparing the costs of purchasing four thousand miles of the West African coastline (an ACS aspiration to close down the illegal slave trade) with the costs of maintaining naval squadrons from the United States and the United Kingdom.[9] Although there is no evidence Lincoln helped to produce these statistics, one can imagine his interest in learning how large sums appropriated for military purposes might have been better used more imaginatively to combat slavery—a point he would later make during the Civil War.

Congressman Lincoln presumably attended on 18 January 1848 the annual ACS meeting held in the House of Representatives and addressed by Henry Clay.[10] In April, while Lincoln was in Washington, a thirty-five-year-old African American in Springfield named Samuel S. Ball temporarily left his barbershop and his wife and six children in order to investigate conditions in the ACS's colony in Liberia. Upon returning, he made a favorable report to the Colored Baptist Association, and probably only the heavy expense prevented him from taking his family to Liberia. In 1851, Ball actually drafted a bill for the Illinois legislature proposing financial support for free blacks wishing to migrate to Liberia, but it never got out of committee. Ball died the following year of typhoid fever.[11]

Although Lincoln used Springfield's other black barber, he must have known Ball, probably read his report, and may have hoped his attitude was typical. However, Lincoln must also have known that other black neighbors opposed colonization, perhaps increasingly as time passed. He must have been moved in 1858 by the newspaper report of a statement produced by Springfield blacks who declared, "We have been unable to ascertain that any intelligent man of color either desires to remove to Africa, or requires aid for such an enterprise." Although obviously aimed against those still sharing Ball's views, this statement firmly asserted, "We have no desire to exchange the broad prairies, fertile soil, healthful climate and Christian civilization of Illinois, for the dangerous navigation of the wide ocean, the tangled forests, savage beasts, heathen people and miasmatic shores of Africa." Lincoln could hardly contest the peroration: "We take [the] Declaration as the Gospel of freedom; we believe in its great truth, 'that all men are created equal.'"[12]

Five years earlier, in 1853, it was advertised that Lincoln was going to talk on "Colonization" at the First Presbyterian Church, which Mary had recently joined and whose preacher, Reverend James Smith, was on the board of the ISCS. Five months later, Lincoln and Browning were scheduled to speak at the ISCS's annual meeting, but illness in the family prevented Lincoln.[13] But in October 1854, Lincoln made an important statement about colonization in his famous Peoria speech as he campaigned against Douglas's Kansas-Nebraska Act.

> If all earthly power were given me, I should not know what to do, as to the existing institution [of slavery]. My first impulse would be to free all the slaves, and send them to Liberia,—to their own native land. But a moment's reflection would convince me, that whatever of high hope, (as I think there is) there may be in this, in the long run, its sudden execution is impossible. If they were all landed there in a day, they would all perish in the next ten days; and there are > not surplus shipping and surplus money enough in the world to carry them there in many times ten days.[14]

This was Lincoln's courtroom style, conceding numerous points in order to win one, admitting short-term difficulties but allowing the "high hope" for colonization in some "long run." His rejection of less-likely alternatives ("keeping them among us as underlings?" or "make them politically and socially, our equals?") simply recognized his audience's feelings, which may or may not accord "with justice and sound judgement." He concluded with vague support for an equally long-run strategy, "gradual emancipation."

Lincoln was able to address the next ISCS meeting in January 1855, and fortunately notes survive, filling both sides of one page, that Lincoln probably wrote while planning this speech.[15] First, he listed eight dates, beginning with 1434 (when a Portuguese captain "seizes a few African lads"—the event he later linked to "the invention of negroes") and ending with 1776, which for Lincoln marked the close of the approved development of slavery. Before tracing the story of the disapproval of slavery, Lincoln paused to make the point that in 1776, "there were about 600,000 slaves in the colonies; and there are now in the U.S. about 3¼ millions"—highlighting that delay only made colonization more difficult.[16] Lincoln might have pointed out that the ACS's early plans had included colonizing high proportions of women of childbearing age to slow the growth of the problem.[17] Lincoln's notes then listed seven antislavery landmarks, from a protest by a Catholic priest in 1543, through those by Quakers before the Revolution and Congress's subsequent actions prohibiting slavery in the Northwest and outlawing the slave trade. He added, "1776–1800: Slavery abolished in all the northern states."

Next, Lincoln jotted down with emphasis: "All the while—Individual conscience at work." Moving from the individual to the collective, he noted, "1816—Colonization Society is organized." Then Lincoln divided the discussion into "direct objects" and "collateral objects," apparently distinguishing between actually attaining colonization and the possible benefits of simply working toward it. Of three "collateral" benefits, the first was the "suppression of the Slave trade," which continued despite being outlawed in 1808. Since then, an average of thirteen thousand to fifteen thousand Africans were smuggled into the United States annually, when the colonizationists' concept of buying up African coastline might have reduced that figure. The other two collateral benefits were "commerce" and "civilization and religion": broad canvases on which Lincoln might have painted pleasant images appealing to his audience's self-interest, sense of superiority, and religious zeal.[18]

Under "present prospects of success," Lincoln was likely to stress that if the federal government helped cover the costs of colonization, these could be spread over a century, not straining a budget that had shown annual surpluses in the 1850s as high as $15 million. Moreover, the government merely needed to get the ball rolling until enough blacks had become really successful in Liberia, experiencing genuine rights and prosperity, so that they might, like German and Irish immigrants, financially assist relatives to enjoy the same opportunity. Lincoln might have mentioned those Germans and Irish as being among the 600,000 immigrants to the United States in the decade before 1840 and 1.7 million in the decade during which he was speaking: all migrations involving no costs to a government that, on the other hand, had willingly spent close to $100 million in the 1830s to move 46,000 Indians west of the Mississippi River.[19]

For many historians, the starting and ending point in judging the viability of colonization is the single and oft-repeated fact that between 1820 and 1860, the ACS managed to send fewer than twelve thousand blacks to Liberia, as if no more blacks were willing to go. But the figure ignores colonists aided by separate state societies and the thirty thousand blacks who escaped to Canada in the antebellum period.[20] Hundreds of thousands of blacks had been brought to America in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, and large numbers had also left, many with British help during the Revolutionary War and the War of 1812.[21]

A large proportion of the ACS's limited funds went toward purchasing land in Africa, hiring vessels, and providing supplies, but between 1830 and 1850, Brazilian and Cuban slaveholders imported forty thousand new slaves every year, at an annual cost of $4 million, a sum the U.S. government could easily have supplied annually to transport forty thousand freedmen from America to Africa.[22] Even after the slave trade to America was outlawed, some Americans paid large sums to smuggle Africans across the Atlantic Ocean, and when they advocated reopening the slave trade, they did not worry—and their opponents had no fond hopes—that the costs or availability of transport would impede traffic in that direction.

Lincoln probably acknowledged that the ACS had made no headway against the sheer growth of the slave population, but he could also point out that the ACS, after seriously faltering in the mid-1830s under withering attacks from radical abolitionists, had become more active since 1850, as blacks felt increasing pressure from the Fugitive Slave Act and from the deepening intolerance fostered by scientific racism.By January 1857, Lincoln was elected one of the ISCS's eleven managers.[23] Five months later, while campaigning for Douglas's Senate seat, Lincoln used colonization to deflect Douglas's charge that by asserting that blacks were equally human, he was somehow encouraging amalgamation. At the end of a long speech, Lincoln stressed that "the separation of the races is the only perfect preventive of amalgamation." He admitted that colonization did not appear in the Republican Party platform but asserted that "a very large proportion" of Republicans were for it (though he knew many were dead against it) and that the party's opposition to the extension of slavery was also "favorable to that separation."

> Such separation, if ever effected at all, must be effected by colonization; and no political party, as such, is now doing anything directly for colonization. . . . The enterprise is a difficult one; but "when there is a will there is a way;" and what colonization needs most is a hearty will. Will springs from the two elements of moral sense and self-interest. Let us be brought to believe it is morally right, and, at the same time, favorable to, or, at least, not against, our interest, to transfer the African to his native clime, and we shall find a way to do it, however great the task may be.[24]

There were sufficient qualifications here to avoid offending any Republicans who opposed colonization, whether they believed blacks should be accorded civil rights instead or simply thought colonization impractical. Lincoln obviously considered colonization more plausible than the idea that whites would grant blacks civil rights.

In the 1858 Lincoln-Douglas debates, Lincoln did no more than quote from that section of his earlier Peoria Speech, for he found better ways to parry Douglas's "amalgamation" swipe: besides, colonization had more vocal opponents among Republicans than among Democrats. Later, when Lincoln sought support outside of Illinois, there was little to be gained from mentioning colonization, and the issue was sidelined as Lincoln maneuvered to win the White House, becoming the first occupant who had deeply considered and favored colonization.

Lincoln's first presidential effort to promote colonization was the Chiriqui Project, although for a long time, this scheme had nothing to do with colonization. Ambrose W. Thompson owned a vast tract of land in Central America that he had nearly, but not quite, been able to sell to the Buchanan administration. According to Thompson, the land offered the perfect route for a new transisthmian railroad or even a canal, the perfect location for naval stations, and a perfect source of coal supplies for the navy. Thompson first wrote to Lincoln shortly after his inauguration, giving advice about saving the Union but not mentioning the Chiriqui land. It was a month later and to Secretary Gideon Welles that Thompson first mentioned his scheme, presumably emphasizing naval stations and coal.[25] Welles dismissed Thompson as a pure speculator, and there is no sign that Lincoln took any interest at this time, concentrating instead on defeating the rebel forces.

As the war lengthened, the problem of dealing with the vast number of slaves fleeing to Union lines gave Thompson a new angle to exploit. Sometime before August, he printed a pamphlet that added to the list of potential uses of the Chiriqui land "a home for the Negro Race, now in the United States, and the only true place for their colonization."[26] It was no coincidence that Congress had been debating, and on 6 August 1861 passed, the first Confiscation Act, which declared that masters who used slaves in the service of the Confederacy thereby forfeited their property rights in the slaves, thus legalizing what General Benjamin F. Butler and others had already done by refusing to return fugitives to owners they decided were rebels. Lincoln was not pleased with Congress's handling of this delicate topic and made known to Butler his ambiguous desire to be guided by this law in disloyal states while respecting all existing rights in all states.[27]

Lincoln asked his bother-in-law, Ninian Edwards, to investigate Thompson's Chiriqui proposals. The choice of Edwards probably had less to do with his former involvement in the ISCS than with the fact that he was unemployed and would presumably carry out this task diligently to earn a more permanent position.[28] However, Edwards's eventual eight-page report was too uncritical generally, and its single sentence about colonization added nothing to what was in the printed proposals.[29]

The day before Edwards submitted his report to Lincoln, Thompson tried to buy Welles's support by offering to supply coal at half the current price.[30] In like manner, Edwards's report emphasized the value of Chiriqui's coal by referring to an earlier report by government geologist Dr. John Evans "that the coal is inexhaustible in quantity, while the analysis of it by Dr. Charles T. Jackson—a well known geologist of Boston, proves its quality to be of the best kind, and highly desirable for steam purposes." This was based on Evans's final report to Congress (before Lincoln took office): his preliminary report had been doubtful enough to cause him to send a coal sample for analysis to Jackson, a suspiciously poor choice because Jackson was notoriously unstable and went mad a few years later.[31]

Thompson's pamphlet had boasted that according to "Dr. Evans, the Geologist, . . . the best Coal for Steam Navigation, exists at and near the Atlantic harbors of the Chiriqui Lagoon." Lincoln, knowing a good deal about geology, may have wondered whether it was "the best Coal" of all possible types or only in this region and whether the Chiriqui's other coal measures were far worse. Edwards had suggested the "immense saving" to the government if it utilized this new source for coal, but Lincoln probably knew that Thompson was not above bribing the impecunious Edwards.

At some point, the Chiriqui file included a two-page "Memorandum" criticizing both pamphlet and report and giving figures indicating Chiriqui coal would be more than twice as expensive as current sources, adding, "The anaylasis [sic] of a small portion of coal by a chemist for practical purposes is not sufficient. Its usefulness depends upon its being generally free from impurities. Has the quantity or quality of this coal been spoken of other than in general terms [?]"[32] Who requested or composed this memorandum is unknown. It may have been added to the file before Welles returned it to Lincoln with a frosty comment about not having "the time necessary to investigate the subject of the proposed Chiriqui contract." After a two-month gap in the documentary evidence, Lincoln sent Welles's letter to Interior Secretary Caleb Smith, asking whether the draft contract was legal "and ought to be made."[33]

The file expanded with various materials from Frank Blair Sr., a founder of the Republican Party, magnate in the Border State of Missouri, and father of Lincoln's postmaster general, Montgomery Blair. The elder Blair, who strongly believed in colonization, pushed Lincoln to close the deal. Blair suggested an associate with mining experience who could investigate the geological claims, adding that he could be accompanied to the Chiriqui lands by Thompson's son, an army officer who was willing "to open the mines immediately and provide coal for the Navy, at a dollar less per ton than the existing price now paid. This is certainly the best earnest that can be given in regard to this most essential matter."[34]

The senior Blair also sent to Lincoln a printed "Memorandum of Proposals" presumably produced by Thompson, incorporating suggestions from Blair.[35] Of nine items listed as benefits for the government, only one related to colonization, clarifying that five hundred thousand acres would be set aside for colonization "by free negroes who have been residents of the United States"; the Chiriqui Company would not charge for those acres as it would be grateful for the labor supply. However, three more items were handwritten in: the tenth ensuring that the company could not overcharge for transportation and subsistence costs of colonists; the eleventh giving the government an option to buy another five hundred thousand acres at $1.25 per acre; and the twelfth clarifying that the colonists would be paid "fair wages" while working first on railroad construction and then in mining and in erecting works useful for convenience or protection. These additions were farsighted, but the handwriting is not Lincoln's, and the ideas probably originated with the Blairs, who also prepared three draft letters for Lincoln to send out over his own name.[36] The first, addressed to Caleb Smith, made the politically astute suggestion that funds allocated in an 1819 law to send to Liberia Africans freed by the navy in anti-slave-trade operations be reapplied to pay for "some of the unoccupied lands of Central America" and "the removal of negroes from this country." The second was to order Welles to transport the mining expert and the younger Thompson to Chiriqui, and the third asked the secretary of war to expedite the younger Thompson's temporary secondment.[37] There is no evidence that Lincoln sent any such letters.

Lincoln passed the Chiriqui file to the secretary of the treasury. Although Salmon P. Chase's support would be helpful because he had strong links with radical Republicans who opposed colonization, Lincoln had good reasons other than colonization to ask the treasury head to review the file. Chase avoided taking a position and suggested waiting until Congress resumed in three weeks' time.[38]

At this point, the Chiriqui contract was on hold. Lincoln had given no sign of any interest in Chiriqui's alleged colonization potential: all the links to colonization were in the writings of the Blairs or of Thompson, who probably planted Ninian Edwards's slight reference to colonization. The Blairs were genuinely keen, but their effort to expedite matters and Chase's to stall both point to likely opposition in Congress when it resumed in early December. In the end, Lincoln may have agreed with Chase that it was better to involve Congress. And, of course, all through December, Lincoln was dealing with the Trent affair.

Lincoln's first public statement as president in favor of colonization came in his first annual message to Congress on 3 December 1861. To deal with the influx of refugee slaves, Lincoln suggested Congress appropriate funds for colonizing these people but also suggested these funds could also be used for blacks who were already free. Lincoln used the idea apparently suggested by the Blairs about reapplying the 1819 appropriation more broadly, and he argued that there was no constitutional obstacle to purchasing territory for colonies. Opposing forced deportation, Lincoln declared that "colored people already in the United States" might be eligible "so far as individuals may desire." Also, while many assumed blacks would emigrate to the established independent black republics, Liberia or Haiti, Lincoln broadened this to "some place, or places, in a climate congenial to them."[39]

As Congress got under way, Republicans more radical than Lincoln almost immediately proposed bills to abolish slavery outright—which had no chance of passage—while Lincoln expended great effort trying to convince Border State representatives to start the process of voluntary and gradual emancipation on a state level, offering compensation from federal funds for citizens who thus surrendered their "property." If just one state took the first step, other slave states still in the Union might do the same. Lincoln argued that federal compensation did not undermine any state's control over the decision whether or how to emancipate and that "gradual" systems need not be complete for thirty years—permitting slavery to exist into the 1890s, which sounds more incredible to us than it did to Americans who had doubted they would live to see slavery ended.

As mentioned in the last chapter, in March Congress passed a resolution offering federal compensation for voluntary emancipation of slaves, abolished slavery in Washington, D.C., and appropriated $1 million to compensate owners. Lincoln was bothered that this act lacked the element of local consent, and he would have preferred a Border State to take the lead on emancipation rather than the federal government. However, the act also appropriated $100,000 for the president to spend "to aid in the colonization" of "free persons of African descent now residing in said District." The maximum expenditure of $100 per colonist was sufficient for transport costs and some initial support. The law mentioned "Hayti or Liberia" but also any "other country beyond the limits of the United States." So Chiriqui was not ruled out.

Signing the bill into law, Lincoln informed Congress that despite other misgivings, he was "gratified that the two principles of compensation and colonization are both recognized and practically applied in the act."[40] He was also pleased that a new treaty with Britain committed the United States to give full support for the final suppression of the Atlantic slave trade, thus terminating the source of supply.[41] At the same time, Congress authorized diplomatic relations with Haiti and Liberia, a useful step for advancing colonization, although even colonization's opponents supported this sign of treating black nations as equals.

All this energized colonization efforts by Lincoln's administration. Various proposals to accept some colonists came in from foreign governments other than Haiti and Liberia, especially some Central American states. The Chiriqui project was resurrected, and on 22 April, Secretary Chase sent a solicitor's report Lincoln had requested on the Chiriqui contract's validity; the report was favorable and said the region was well suited for black colonists. Interior Secretary Smith wrote a few days later to Thompson asking the terms under which the Chiriqui Company would take on the job of colonizing freed blacks, and some effort was made to link the company with the New York Colonization Society.[42]

In May 1862, Smith responded to some presidential query by reporting that the Chiriqui contract offered "good coal at a cheap rate" and a chance to begin colonization, which in turn would give the United States "an influence as would most probably secure to us the absolute control of the country."[43] Smith also recommended that Lincoln appoint the Reverend James Mitchell to run the colonization program. Lincoln already knew and trusted Mitchell as a former colonization agent in Indiana. By 18 May, Mitchell sent Lincoln a copy of a twenty-eight-page circular about the need for colonization, printed at the Government Printing Office.[44]

Secretary of State William H. Seward also sent information to Lincoln, though it is unclear whether he was carrying out instructions or trying to convince Lincoln to abandon the Chiriqui plan. One note from Seward's office mentioned that Marcelino Hurtado, commissioner from New Grenada (the site of Chiriqui), was pleased to accept an invitation to dinner at the White House, and in a second note, dated the following day and presumably carried by Hurtado, Seward himself wrote that Hurtado "visits you for the purpose of imparting information which it is understood you desire, in regard to a certain region of that country."[45] Also, sometime prior to 28 May, someone—probably Seward and presumably with Lincoln's approval—gave to Lincoln's erstwhile scientific adviser Joseph Henry of the Smithsonian what Henry described as "an elaborated paper on the subject [of Chiriqui coal] from . . . the Interior Department in which all this testimony in favor of the existence of good coal was convincingly set forth." On 28 May, Henry wrote to Philadelphia geologist J. Peter Lesley, a coal expert, asking "on behalf of the President and the secretary of state" for a confidential opinion about the coal "in which Mr Thompson of your city is so much interested." Henry explained that the proposed Chiriqui contract involved coal "for the use of the navy in connection with a plan of establishing a colony of negroes." He added that he was "somewhat suspicious" and "must be true to myself and the government."[46]

Within two days, Lesley promised to look into the matter, but his eventual report apparently arrived after Henry himself wrote a preliminary one. Thompson learned about the consultation with Henry, who soon received "a direct offer from St. Ambrose of a share in the speculation if I would make a favorable report." Henry did no such thing, and his preliminary report "stated that from the age of the geological formation of the rocks of the Isthmus, of which there was sufficient evidence in the Smith[sonian] Inst[itute], there could be no real coal in that locality."[47] That report is not extant, and perhaps the attempted bribery caused Henry to wish it kept confidential. It is not clear whether the report reached Lincoln. If Seward was the recipient, he had no reason not to show it to Lincoln, and Henry might as easily have conveyed his opinions in one of his occasional meetings with Lincoln.

Meanwhile in July, Congress's Second Confiscation Act quintupled the appropriation for colonizing freedmen to $500,000. Although Lincoln was disturbed by aspects of the act—such as a tendency to assert federal power to emancipate slaves, which Lincoln feared would make rebel states even less likely to surrender—the law helpfully gave the president the authority to > make provision for the transportation, colonization, and settlement, in some tropical country beyond the limits of the United States, of such persons of the African race, made free by the provisions of this act, as may be willing to emigrate, having first obtained the consent of the government of said country to their protection and settlement within the same, with all the rights and privileges of freemen.[48]

Shortly before signing this act, Lincoln revealed to Seward and Welles on 13 July that he was considering an executive action on emancipation, and a week later, he raised the matter with the whole cabinet. This was apparently the first time the whole cabinet discussed colonization, but the issue was sidelined by the more important topic of Lincoln's first draft of the Emancipation Proclamation.

In August, a new draft contract drawn up by the Interior Department proposed that the Chiriqui Company handle colonization but that no money be laid out for coal until a further inspection determined "the productiveness of the mines, and the value of the same for steam purposes."[49] This suggests Lincoln was indeed aware of Joseph Henry's negative stance in his preliminary report and did not ignore it as Henry later suggested.

On 14 August 1862, Lincoln held two meetings in the White House that both related to colonization, but the second of them has a wider importance that requires close inspection before continuing the story of Lincoln's colonization policy.

Colonization and Emancipation

On 14 August 1862, Lincoln met with William McLain, the ACS treasurer, and Joseph J. Roberts, the visiting president of Liberia. Both men gave Lincoln a glowing report about Liberia's condition and prospects. But transportation costs were probably inclining Lincoln toward a location where commercial shipping was expanding, as was the case with the Caribbean and Central America but not with Africa, a view expressed already in Caleb Smith's report of 9 May. Apparently, McLain and Roberts were both annoyed that Lincoln praised Liberia to their faces but then an hour later promoted Central America rather than Liberia in a landmark address on colonization.[1]

The address was historic partly because the audience was a small deputation of free African Americans brought to Lincoln by the Reverend James Mitchell: the first time a group of blacks were in the White House to meet with a president rather than to cook and clean for him. Knowing the event would cause some stir, Lincoln took care to avoid having falsehoods spread about how he treated and addressed his guests. No official text was preserved or released, but Lincoln's comments were hardly off-the-cuff, and it appears that the event was covered by a single Associated Press reporter—who no doubt behaved in order to obtain similar exclusives in future. His version is what appeared in all the newspapers and has come down to us.[2]

The reporter mentioned first that the "Committee of colored men" was introduced by Mitchell and that its chairman "remarked that they were there by invitation to hear what the Executive had to say to them"—so, not petitioners seeking favors. Lincoln began by mentioning Congress's appropriations to aid colonization to some country by "the people, or a portion of them, of African descent." The word "portion" accorded with Lincoln's notion of a voluntary colonization and caused Lincoln to raise the obvious question: why should any of them "leave this country?" His answer was aimed also at that larger audience for whom the reporter's pencil was scratching.

"You and we are different races. We have between us a broader difference than exists between almost any other two races," Lincoln said, expressing a common view of human races with which both Louis Agassiz and Charles Darwin could agree, if for different reasons. Far from ranking races according to abilities, Lincoln spoke only of the "difference" causing "disadvantages" that applied to both races: "Whether it is right or wrong I need not discuss, but this physical difference is a great disadvantage to us both, as I think your race suffer very greatly, many of them by living among us, while ours suffer from your presence." Discussing mutual "disadvantages" suggested a balance; explaining their real cause—racial intolerance by the white majority—would upset that balance. "In a word we suffer on each side. If this is admitted, it affords a reason at least why we should be separated," Lincoln said. The ethical, as well as practical, issue was not about race but about slavery:

> Your race are suffering, in my judgment, the greatest wrong inflicted on any people. But even when you cease to be slaves, you are yet far removed from being placed on an equality with the white race. You are cut off from many of the advantages which the other race enjoy. The aspiration of men is to enjoy equality with the best when free, but on this broad continent, not a single man of your race is made the equal of a single man of ours. Go where you are treated the best, and the ban is still upon you.
> I do not propose to discuss this, but to present it as a fact with which we have to deal. I cannot alter it if I would. It is a fact, about which we all think and feel alike, I and you.

Lincoln went on to note that the present war was one of the evils caused by having two races on one continent. He acknowledged that free blacks like themselves were not inclined "to go out of the country," but he suggested that actual slaves would hardly hesitate if colonization were the condition for obtaining freedom. In view of that connection between colonization and future emancipation, Lincoln argued that for the men before him to maintain they "have nothing to do with the idea of going to a foreign country . . . is (I speak in no unkind sense) an extremely selfish view of the case." He now urged his guests to "give a start" that "would open a wide door for many to be made free."[3]

Patronizing as much of this sounds to modern ears, in fact Lincoln avoided any expression of actual denigration on racial grounds. In arguing why free blacks should start the process, Lincoln stated that unfree blacks "whose intellects are clouded by Slavery" would provide "very poor materials to start with." No suggestion that blacks are naturally less intelligent; indeed, Lincoln said that the men before him were "intelligent colored men" as "capable of thinking" as any white man, unlike slaves "who have been systematically oppressed."[4]

Lincoln spoke of certain hardships as he mentioned Liberia and his recent chat with its president, but after explaining away some of Liberia's perceived disadvantages, Lincoln suggested blacks might prefer to colonize somewhere "within reach of the country of your nativity"—avoiding the phrase he dared not use: "your country." Lincoln revealed that he was thinking about Central America, which was nearer, "on a great line of travel," possessed natural resources, and was advantageous "especially because of the similarity of climate with your native land—thus being suited to your physical condition." That last phrase was superbly ambiguous. Most readers would probably infer that Lincoln was referring to Africa, though he never said so; in fact only once does a cognate word appear in the address, in an introductory phrase about people "of African descent." Most of the delegation before Lincoln were presumably "native" to the United States and indeed to southern states whose climate was at least more like that of Central America than that of New England or Illinois. But, again, Lincoln avoided direct reference to the fact that the members of the delegation were Americans. And his reference to being physiologically suited to a particular climate was vaguely acceptable to both polygenists and monogenists, whether they explained that harmony as resulting from God's design for creation, some degradation following creation, or some undesigned modification through natural selection.[5]

Lincoln continued his description of a potential colony: "The particular place I have in view is to be a great highway from the Atlantic or Caribbean Sea to the Pacific Ocean," which could certainly refer to the Chiriqui lands, not named. There was "evidence of very rich coal mines," Lincoln added, lawyer-like, not mentioning the counterevidence he knew about. "A certain amount of coal is valuable in any country," he continued, "and there may be more than enough for the wants of the country"—meaning the area being colonized (though perhaps Joseph Henry subsequently misinterpreted "the country" to mean the United States). "Why I attach so much importance to coal is, it will afford an opportunity to the inhabitants for immediate employment till they get ready to settle permanently in their homes." Lincoln said nothing about providing the navy with cheap coal, presumably because he understood the Chiriqui coal might only be good enough for the "wants" of the colony itself by creating some immediate, if short-term, employment. Lincoln repeated the point: "if something is started so that you can get your daily bread as soon as you reach there, it is a great advantage. Coal land is the best thing I know of with which to commence an enterprise."[6]

Knowing these men were aware of the Chiriqui scheme, Lincoln sought to allay understandable concerns. "We have been mistaken all our lives if we do not know whites as well as blacks look to their self-interest. . . . I shall, if I get a sufficient number of you engaged, have provisions made that you shall not be wronged." Lincoln was reassuringly frank: "I am not sure you will succeed. The Government may lose the money, but we cannot succeed unless we try; but we think, with care, we can succeed." Lincoln optimistically suggested that Central Americans "have no objections" to "your colored race" but also spoke vaguely of "protection"—causing some Central American diplomats, reading the next day's newspapers, to wonder how invasive U.S. "protection" might prove to be.[7]

Lincoln ended his address with a call to action, even if only on a small scale. "Could I get a hundred tolerably intelligent men, with their wives and children, to 'cut their own fodder,' so to speak? Can I have fifty? If I could find twenty-five able-bodied men, with a mixture of women and children, good things in the family relation, I think I could make a successful commencement." Lincoln was emphasizing that the delegation members need not feel overwhelmed by the task he was setting them.[8] "I want you to let me know whether this can be done or not. This is the practical part of my wish to see you." The AP reporter finished with, "The above is merely given as the substance of the President's remarks"—a disclaimer less important to the reporter than to Lincoln, who might deny any particular statement.[9]

Whether the men Lincoln addressed were able to arouse much interest for colonization among free blacks—and the evidence is mixed—Mitchell and Ambrose W. Thompson were having success with recruitment, and the latter soon informed Lincoln that he had enough would-be colonists to make a start as soon as a vessel could be made ready.[10] A week after Lincoln addressed the black deputation, Joseph Henry wrote to fellow scientist Alexander Dallas Bache, expressing his surprise that Lincoln "believed in the humbug coal mines of the Isthmus" and explaining the background to the preliminary report he had made earlier. He told Bache that he "afterwards"—sometime between early June and mid-August—"received a letter from Peter Lesley condemning the whole affair as a swindling speculation, and asserting that the general character of the material found in that region was an inferior kind of lignite." Henry then added, somewhat confusingly, "After having communicated these facts cautiously but clearly in my report, and much more fully to Mr. Seward privately I was much surprised to learn from a speech of the President that he still believed in the phantom."[11] Lincoln apparently did not see Lesley's report until after speaking to the black delegation, but he probably had seen Henry's preliminary report and at least heard more about Henry's final report through William H. Seward, which is why Lincoln's references to the coal were restrained—though so subtly that Henry missed the point.

Around this time, Lincoln appointed Kansas Senator Samuel C. Pomeroy as a higher-level colonization agent. Despite unsavory aspects in Pomeroy's personal history, he had some experience as a "colonizer" (in Kansas in 1854) and, more important, he was an associate of Salmon P. Chase, whose opposition to colonization might thus be partly neutralized. Pomeroy was to travel to Chiriqui with Thompson to ensure all was well before authorizing the allocation of certain funds to Thompson. Before 25 August, Pomeroy had printed up a pamphlet, publicized in some newspapers, urging free blacks to apply for the colonization adventure.[12]

At this point, Joseph Henry was approached again. On 5 September, he addressed a letter to Seward's son and secretary, Frederick, enclosing an extract of Lesley's report on the Chiriqui coal. The extract carries no date, and Henry's letter merely describes the author as a “gentleman who has been extensively engaged in geological surveys and has published a work of much merit on coal,” adding that “the letter was received after I had written and presented my Report,” which had been written “before I had time to fortify my opinion by reference to authorities and hence I spoke very cautiously.” Further enquiry had “confirmed my assertion that the geological formation of the District is not that of the true coal measures but that of the tertiary deposit in which only lignite is found.” He hoped no contract would be signed to purchase the Chiriqui land “until it has been thoroughly examined by persons of known capacity and integrity.” He accepted that further examination might alter the situation, but previous reports had so far “failed to convince me.”[13]

Henry’s letter accompanying the extract was sent to Frederick Seward (signed “very truly your friend & servant”), which suggests his father, the secretary of state, was gathering ammunition to kill off the Chiriqui plan. While a senator, the elder Seward had participated in earlier debates about the contract, which perhaps made him doubt the earlier coal reports and Thompson’s integrity. Now Seward was concerned that by late August the Chiriqui project was upsetting U.S. relations with Latin America.

Historian Michael Vorenberg suggests that Lincoln “seemed to be making some hasty and short-sighted decisions,” as when “he touted the rich coal deposits of Chiriqui, but then chose to ignore Henry’s dismal report.” But Lincoln knew the coal’s quality was controversial, and he was not going to be tied down either by Thompson’s favorable reports or by negative ones brought in by Frederick Seward. Lincoln now ensured that Thompson would receive no money until Pomeroy took the responsibility to say the coal deposits were suitable. Thompson later said that Lincoln, who signed the contract on 11 September, wrote portions of it himself. The following day, Lincoln instructed Interior Secretary Smith to oversee the project and pay for it out of the funds Congress had appropriated two months earlier. Soon five hundred colonists were reported ready to embark, and on 15 September, Lincoln approved Pomeroy’s request to be allowed to advance Thompson limited sums to cover immediate costs.[14]

Then the Chiriqui project once again stalled as Robert E. Lee caused a crisis by deciding to invade the North.

From the moment on 12 September when Lincoln learned that Lee had crossed the Potomac River into Maryland, he was eager for General George McClellan to trap and crush the Confederate forces.[15] McClellan managed to win the bloody Battle of Antietam on 17 September, but Lincoln ached for further news that Lee’s army had been destroyed before it could recross the Potomac. The president was bitterly disappointed when McClellan failed in this, but Lincoln decided Antietam was enough of a victory to justify issuing the preliminary Emancipation Proclamation on 22 September.

Lincoln had discussed the concept with his cabinet in July, after several developments convinced Lincoln that he could and must take this step. The collapse of the Peninsula Campaign at the beginning of July renewed the risk of European intervention, recognizing the Confederacy. The passage of the Second Confiscation Act later in July suggested emancipation would receive more support than opposition in Congress. Lincoln was bitterly disappointed by the Border States' failure to create momentum for the most constitutional approach: gradual emancipation initiated by state governments, with compensation supplied by the federal government. And people who had never been abolitionists were calling for measures that would weaken the Confederates' grip on that enslaved labor force, whose exploitation helped sustain the South's military operations.[16]

The majority of the cabinet had supported the president's proposal, but Lincoln heeded Seward's advice that if the plan were announced then, just after McClellan had been out-generalled in the Peninsula Campaign, the emancipation of slaves might seem an act of desperation. Lincoln agreed to delay an announcement, which in any case risked driving some Border States into the Confederacy and some Union soldiers into dropping the weapons they had willingly carried for defending the Union but not for ending slavery. Now, in September, Lee's invasion raised the possibility that the war could suddenly end with a great Northern victory, removing the military justification for the Emancipation Proclamation and casting a different light on all issues connected with colonization. But Lee's eventual escape meant the war would continue, along with the problems of financing it, recruiting more troops, and somehow preventing foreign intervention. It was necessary to announce the proclamation, which would emancipate slaves only in rebel-held territory and would not go into effect until 1 January 1863, thus giving rebellious states three months to return to the Union if they wished to preserve slavery.

As Lincoln probably expected, no rebel politicians dared propose the destruction of the Confederacy in order to save slavery. But as the hundred days passed until the actual promulgation of the emancipation, Lincoln turned his attention back to colonization. In cabinet meetings on 24–26 September, some members were lukewarm in general while others called for forced deportations—which Lincoln always rejected. No doubt, many cabinet members doubted Thompson's claims about the quality of the coal, although Joseph Henry's recent report was not specifically mentioned in the accounts. A central concern was whether the colonization should be protected through specific treaties with the countries concerned or whether the colonists should simply emigrate as individuals. Gideon Welles pushed the latter approach and thought he had support from Secretary Seward, who expressed concern about the negative reactions from Latin American governments. Lincoln still considered treaties necessary, even though this would bring the issue before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, whose chairman, Senator Charles Sumner, disliked colonization.[17]

On 27 September, Pomeroy addressed a meeting of blacks in Washington, but his language—like that in his 25 August pamphlet and, indeed, like Lincoln's address to the delegation of blacks in the White House—added to the uneasiness of Latin American diplomats. The U.S. government naturally desired to reassure colonists that they were not simply being dumped into some new form of slavery, yet Latin American governments, which had earlier welcomed the idea of colonists aiding agricultural development, increasingly protested against any notion of further land sales to or ongoing interference by their expansive northern neighbor. Seward sent out a circular on 30 September to representatives of various European powers—less likely than vulnerable Latin American states to feel threatened—to see if any of their colonies in the Western Hemisphere might welcome freed blacks, under terms protecting the colonists.[18]

Meanwhile, the government found a vessel to transport the first set of colonists ready to depart for Chiriqui, but on 7 October, according to Welles, the cabinet was reluctant "to press the subject of negro emigration to Chiriqui . . . against the wishes and remonstrances of the States of Central America." Later that day, Pomeroy was informed through the Department of the Interior that the operation was "temporarily suspended" by presidential order. Pomeroy was angry, later telling Lincoln's friend Orville Browning that over thirteen thousand free blacks had already formally applied for colonization—an assertion neither doubted at the time nor since disproved.[19]

The cabinet's unease was about Chiriqui and not about colonization itself, and Lincoln felt able to address the topic a few weeks later in his second annual message to Congress on 1 December. After noting the expressions of interest received from "many free Americans of African descent" as well as "other parties, at home and abroad—some from interested motives, others upon patriotic considerations, and still others influenced by philanthropic sentiments," Lincoln admitted that "several of the Spanish-American republics have protested against the sending of such colonies to their respective territories." Lincoln stressed that he still hoped to attain international agreements agreeable to the Senate, but at present, "Liberia and Hayti are, as yet, the only countries to which colonists of African descent from here, could go with certainty of being received and adopted as citizens." He regretted that blacks "contemplating colonization, do not seem so willing to migrate to those countries, as to some others, nor so willing as I think their interest demands. I believe, however, opinion among them, in this respect, is improving; and that, ere long, there will be an augmented, and considerable migration to both these countries, from the United States."[20]

While Lincoln still advocated a protected, financed, and voluntary form of colonization, he was preoccupied as the final signing of the Emancipation Proclamation approached. Near the end of his December message to Congress, Lincoln proposed three constitutional amendments: first, that states should receive compensation if they abolished slavery any time between the present and the year 1900; second, that all slaveholders who had not been disloyal but had lost slaves "by the chances of war" should receive compensation and that their slaves be declared forever free; and, third, that "Congress may appropriate money, and otherwise provide, for colonizing free colored persons, with their own consent, at any place or places without the United States." Such amendments, if ratified, would be harder to reverse than similar legislation, and they could add incentive for rebel states to surrender and for slave owners to accept emancipation, while also safeguarding freed blacks against forced deportation. Lincoln was planning for the time when he could no longer direct these policies, either because victory ended his use of "war powers" or because he failed to win reelection. He was trying to bind Congress to certain options.[21]

In discussing his third proposed amendment, Lincoln embarked on a curious argument. "I cannot make it better known than it already is, that I strongly favor colonization. And yet I wish to say there is an objection urged against free colored persons remaining in the country, which is largely imaginary, if not sometimes malicious." Lincoln argued that emancipating blacks did not make them more likely to take jobs away from whites or lower the value of labor, so these were not valid objections to letting freedmen remain in the United States, while any degree of colonization "even to a limited extent" made it "mathematically certain" that the wages of white labor would be "enhanced." Lincoln was acquainting the public with the idea that colonization need not be all or nothing: the country would benefit from any departures yet not suffer from any refusals to emigrate. There was no reason, Lincoln argued, to believe emancipated blacks would "swarm forth" and cover the north as well as the south; and, even if they did, Lincoln offered statistics showing that the average proportions of free blacks to whites that might result already existed in some areas without causing serious difficulties for either race.[22]

Lincoln's primary goal remained the restoration of the Union, but he now recognized that the most economic and least-bloody way to achieve that goal was through emancipation, achieved through constitutional means, allowing for individual state consent, offering a gradual rather than a sudden alteration in the condition of blacks, providing the lubrication of financial compensation, and offering colonization to any blacks desiring it. To those whites who strongly favored or opposed black colonization, he offered a funded program that was nevertheless voluntary as well as reassurances that no disasters would follow if colonization were only partial. Lincoln finished his recommendation by eloquently declaring:

> In giving freedom to the slave, we assure freedom to the free—honorable alike in what we give, and what we preserve. We shall nobly save, or meanly lose, the last best, hope of earth. Other means may succeed; this could not fail. The way is plain, peaceful, generous, just—a way which, if followed, the world will forever applaud, and God must forever bless.[23]

Lincoln had no delusions about the practicability of colonization, but its political value had been greater when abolition had seemed a more-remote possibility and intolerance of blacks had seemed to be growing. If Lincoln's sole interest in colonization had been political, now was the time—four weeks before he signed a document to free several million blacks in the South—to offer colonization as a panacea for racist America's worst fears. Yet, even while proposing that colonization be protected constitutionally for blacks who chose it, Lincoln was preparing white Americans for a future that could include black Americans. Also, Lincoln was planning but had not yet announced a development that could do more to make whites accept that blacks were their fellow human beings than any of his own arguments or statistics, or any pleas from radical abolitionists, or any religious doctrine that everyone was descended from Adam, or any scientific theories about mankind's common evolutionary heritage. Lincoln understood that the attitudes of white Americans—including himself—were about to be affected radically by the scarcely imaginable sight of blacks serving in uniform.

Lincoln had made no mention of it in the preliminary Emancipation Proclamation in September or in his message to Congress in December. Yet, in the final proclamation of 1 January, Lincoln declared that freed slaves "of suitable condition, will be received into the armed service of the United States to garrison forts, positions, stations, and other places, and to man vessels of all sorts in said service."[24] When Lincoln reached this important decision is unknown. Genuine difficulties with recruitment of white Northerners for the ongoing slaughter played a major role, as did the urgings of various idealists wishing to prove that blacks could and would fight for the freedom of their race.

Lincoln had previously had good reason to ignore calls for the arming of African Americans, which smacked of John Brown's 1859 attempt to foment a slave insurrection, alarming not only rebels but also Border State slaveholders. In July 1862, Congress had authorized the president to employ "as many persons of African descent as he may deem necessary and proper," specifying that they may be used for "any military or naval service for which they may be found competent," but Lincoln was used to Congress moving too precipitously on such delicate matters. However, Lincoln began to adapt his own thinking. Near the beginning August, Lincoln turned down an offer of "two colored regiments" from a deputation from Indiana, reportedly saying that "he was not prepared to go the length of enlisting negroes as soldiers" and "that to arm the negroes would turn 50,000 bayonets from the loyal Border States against us that were for us." However, by the end of August, Lincoln allowed Secretary of War Edwin M. Stanton to authorize a Union commander operating in the Carolinas to "arm, uniform, equip, and receive into the service" as many local volunteers "of African descent" as he saw fit.[25]

Lincoln was waiting for popular feeling to catch up with the lead offered by Congress's act in July. In September, he reportedly said, "If we were to arm [blacks], I fear that in a few weeks the arms would be in the hands of the rebels," which suggested lack of confidence in the suitability of former slaves for military service. Ten days before announcing the preliminary Emancipation Proclamation, Lincoln again mentioned his concern that fifty thousand white soldiers from the Border States might abandon the army (whether or not he armed blacks), yet he also expressed his hope that opinions were changing and that of those fifty thousand white soldiers: "I do not think they all would [leave the army]—not so many indeed as a year ago, or as six months ago—not so many to-day as yesterday. Every day increases their Union feeling."[26]

In November, Senator Sumner had given the president a pamphlet by George Livermore entitled An Historical Research: Opinions of the Founders of the Republic on Negroes as Slaves, as Citizens, and as Soldiers, which, Sumner reported, "interested President Lincoln much." Spurred by Congress's action, by positive reactions to the preliminary proclamation, or by Livermore's pamphlet, sometime between September and the last day of 1862 Lincoln added to the final Emancipation Proclamation his provision for black recruitment. When Lincoln signed the final draft of the Emancipation Proclamation, he sent the pen to Livermore. A North Carolina editor sneered that the circus owner P. T. Barnum, should have received the pen "which was employed to affix the name of Gorilla to the most infamous document that ever emanated from any civilized government." Browning recorded in his diary various opinions he heard at that time, including the view that the recruitment of blacks would cause a hundred thousand whites or more to leave the army. But Lincoln became increasingly assertive about the rightness of his decision. In March 1863, he wrote to the governor of Tennessee, "The colored population is the great available and yet unavailed of, force for restoring the Union. The bare sight of fifty thousand armed, and drilled black soldiers on the banks of the Mississippi, would end the rebellion at once."[27]

Lincoln soon felt encouraged—and hoped others would as well—by reports of large numbers of blacks enlisting and performing well. In April, he wrote to General David Hunter, glad "to see the accounts of your colored force" and that "the enemy are driving at them fiercely, as is to be expected. It is important to the enemy that such a force shall not take shape, and grow, and thrive, in the South; and in precisely the same proportion, it is important to us that it shall."[28] Black troops distinguished themselves in engagements in May in Louisiana, in June near Vicksburg, Mississippi, and in July near Charleston, South Carolina. By August, Lincoln trumpeted the black troops' patriotism in a letter he asked his long-time Republican colleague James C. Conkling to read to an important meeting in Springfield, addressing in particular those who opposed his policies. He stressed that some of the military commanders felt that using colored troops inflicted "the heaviest blow yet dealt to the rebellion" and that at least one victory could not have been achieved "but for the aid of black soldiers." His tone became more severe:

> You say you will not fight to free negroes. Some of them seem willing to fight for you. . . . [When the war is over], there will be some black men who can remember that, with silent tongue, and clenched teeth, and steady eye, and well-poised bayonet, they have helped mankind on to this great consummation; while, I fear, there will be some white ones, unable to forget that, with malignant heart, and deceitful speech, they have strove to hinder it.[29]

With that single vivid image of a determined black soldier, Lincoln broke completely with over a century of tradition, going back to Linnaeus, of classifying "negroes" as "indolent," "negligent," and "docile."

After closing down the Chiriqui scheme in October 1862, Lincoln had backed another project early in 1863 that actually sent some colonists to an island near Haiti, Ile á Vache, but this was so mismanaged by private contractors that the scheme had to be abandoned and the colonists rescued.[30] Although this was not the end of Lincoln's interest in colonization, its political use to promote emancipation was becoming obsolete, and there was hope that white intolerance of blacks would be lessened by the latter's splendid service in the army. Nearly a year after Lincoln praised that service in his Springfield letter, Congress voted on 2 July 1864 to rescind all the appropriations for colonization, and Lincoln made no objection. His secretary John Hay with that vote in mind wrote in his diary, "The President has sloughed of that idea of colonization"—though that may have been wishful thinking on Hay's part.[31]

In August 1863, one year after receiving a delegation of relatively unknown black leaders in the White House, Lincoln received the most famous black leader in America, Frederick Douglass. "There was not the slightest shadow of embarrassment from the first moment," Douglass later wrote. The president received him "just as you have seen one gentleman receive another. . . . In his company I was never in any way reminded of my humble origin, or of my unpopular color."[32] If blacks were to remain in the country, then they could only enjoy their new freedom if whites treated them as equals. For a century and a half, Lincoln has set millions of Americans an example they have found difficult to follow.

Late in the summer of 1862, as Lincoln awaited the opportune moment to announce the preliminary Emancipation Proclamation, Darwin followed the war news in the London Times while also waiting expectantly for Thomas Huxley and Charles Lyell to publish their respective researches about man.[1] Darwin was growing impatient with the Times's pro-Southern slant, but he could always find the Yankee view in Asa Gray's letters. On the very day the Emancipation Proclamation was first announced, 22 September, Gray was writing to Darwin about the war's slow progress: "We find it a far tougher job than we supposed. But we have no more notion of giving it up than—the English nation would have, under a similar case. For my part, I would fight till ⅘ of our property and half our men were destroyed before I would give up!—and I think that is the general opinion."[2]

Darwin first mentioned the preliminary proclamation in his next letter and was clearly not impressed. "If I could believe that your President's proclamation would have any effect, it would make a great alteration in my wishes. . . . But slavery seems to me to grow a more hopeless curse." Darwin also complained about the Times's American correspondent (no longer William Howard Russell) who "has not a shade of feeling against slavery" while telling Gray it was incredible "that you all seem to believe that you can annex the South; whilst on this side of the Atlantic, it is the almost universal opinion that this is utterly impossible."[3]

In a subsequent letter, Gray said, "The President's Emancipation proclamation [was] working well on the whole. Our Courage does not fail, and I think will not. . . . You don't see, as you would if here—the total impossibility of coming to any terms of peace with the South, based on their independence. Before that can be they or we must be thoroughly beaten." At least they agreed about Lincoln's decision to dismiss General McClellan: Gray "rejoiced," and Darwin called it "great news."[4] Although saving his harshest remarks about "the Yankees" for Joseph Dalton Hooker, who was bound to agree, Darwin always saw the central issue as slavery, which "draws me one day one way & another day another way."

Responding to Hooker's attempt to use natural selection to explain why the Americans had so far failed "to develop any settled Govt. at all," Darwin said, "What a new idea of Struggle for existence being necessary to try & purge a government! I daresay it is very true." The huge casualties in the North's defeat at Fredericksburg, Virginia, on 13 December upset Darwin, and the day after the Emancipation Proclamation had been signed by Lincoln, Darwin commented to Gray, "When will peace come! But then Slavery, I know not what to wish." A few days later, Darwin passed one of Gray's letters to Hooker, commented with a note, "It is marvellous to see Asa Gray so cock-sure about the doom of Slavery."[5]

Darwin recognized that the proclamation only emancipated slaves in rebel-held territory and was not a constitutional amendment or even a law. "Well, your President has issued his fiat against Slavery—God grant it may have some effect," he wrote Gray. "I fear it is true that very many English do not now really care about Slavery; I heard some old sensible people saying here the same thing; & they accounted for it (& such a contrast it is to what I remember in my Boyhood) by the present generation never having seen or heard much about Slavery. . . . [The war] is a cruel evil to the whole world; I hope that you may prove right & good come out of it."[6]

Meanwhile, what seemed like good news soon turned sour for Darwin. "Hurrah," he said to Huxley, "the Monkey Book has come." This was Huxley's Evidence as to Man's Place in Nature, which Hooker decided was a "coarse-looking little book[:] not fit, as somebody said to me, for a gentleman's table." Darwin, however, told Huxley, "I have just finished with very great interest 'Man's Place.'" After further praise, Darwin asserted that he had "no criticisms; nor is it likely that I could have." Yet he did: Huxley "could have added some interesting matter on the character or disposition of the young Ourangs . . . [and] might have enlarged a little on the later embryological changes in man & on his rudimentary structure—tail as compared with tail of higher monkeys intermaxillary bone, false ribs & I daresay other points—such as muscles of ears &c &c." After tempering this with more praise, Darwin made reference to the recent publication of Lyell's long-awaited Geological Evidences of the Antiquity of Man: "I am fearfully disappointed at Lyell's excessive caution in expressing any judgment on Species or origin of man."[7]

Although Darwin had swiftly informed Gray that "Lyell's Book on Man . . . quotes you at end with gusto," Darwin was upset that although Lyell accepted "almost fully the modification of species by variation & selection," he seemed "afraid to say so. . . . The public may well say, if such a man dare not or will not speak out his mind, how can we who are ignorant, form even a guess on [the] subject." To Hooker, Darwin complained of Lyell's "timidity. . . . I wish to Heaven he had said not a word on [the] subject."[8]

The problem was not only that Lyell would not commit himself fully on natural selection but especially, as Adrian Desmond and James Moore suggest, that Lyell persisted in maintaining that divine intervention may be necessary to explain the "leap" to the higher forms of human intellect. "To say that such leaps constitute no interruption to the ordinary course of nature is more than we are warranted in affirming," said Lyell, before compounding the error (in Darwin's eyes) by implying that these "leaps" could become transmissible by inheritance, and therefore "we may possibly discern in such leaps the origin of the superiority of certain races of mankind."[9] That sentence, Darwin told Lyell frankly, "makes me groan. . . . [A]nyone might argue . . . that you were far from believing that man was descended from any animal." Lyell's views seemed to throw a lifeline to the devotees of Agassiz. A few days later, Darwin wrote to Lyell that he wished "that your state of belief could have permitted you to say boldly & distinctly out that species were not separately created."[10]

According to biographer Janet Browne, "Despite all their friendly connections, Darwin never really forgave [Lyell] for betraying his hopes." While Darwin found fault with Huxley's and Lyell's work, their reception by critics showed there were still dangers for those who appeared to undermine Genesis. The Athenaeum took aim: "Lyell's object is to make man old, Huxley's to degrade him."[11] Whether Darwin felt relief at not being the target or frustration that others had not done the subject justice, he did not rush in to place his own views before the public, yet his fascination continued.

In 1862, Dr. James Hunt, honorary secretary of the Ethnological Society of London (ESL), offered a paper "On Ethno-Climatology; or the Acclimatization of Man," presenting statistics to demonstrate that the various races of man were so distinct that they could not long survive outside the geographical zone where they had originated. Although Hunt did not cite Agassiz, who held a similar view, he did quote Dr. Josiah Nott of Mobile, Alabama. Criticized for being cavalier in his use of statistics, Hunt seceded from the ESL along with some others who had various grievances and formed the Anthropological Society of London (ASL). Hunt issued honorary memberships to many prominent researchers, including Darwin and Huxley, and began publishing the Anthropological Review. Although initially many supporters of Darwin contributed articles, they were unlikely to admire Hunt's introductory essay for the first volume. "Whether [Man] has risen from an ape or descended from a perfect man, . . . the Races of Europe have now much in their mental and moral nature which the races of Africa have not got." Hunt said it was ". . . a gross calumny . . . against the American School of Anthropology" to suggest "their interest in keeping up slavery induced the scientific men of that country to advocate a distinct origin for the African race."[12]

While Hunt made Nott an honorary foreign member of the new ASL, the Anthropological Review became a vehicle for polygenist writings, including a review attacking Lyell's Antiquity of Man for dealing with "theories of progression and development . . . [which have] nothing to do with the antiquity of man" and condemning Lyell for not referencing that "great national American work The Types of Mankind."[13] That review was written by "a jackal of Owen's by the name of C. Carter Blake," as Huxley described him after Blake also attacked Huxley's work. Huxley returned his "Diploma of Honorary Fellowship" and called Hunt's ASL a "nest of imposters." Other "Darwinians," like Edward B. Tylor, resigned their honorary memberships; George Rolleston called Hunt an "ignorant charlatan"; Alfred Russel Wallace referred to the ASL as "that bête noire." Hunt in turn described the ESL as "a sort of Darwinian club." To a foreign colleague, Darwin described himself as "not an active, only a honorary member of the [ASL]," but he often found articles in the Review worth reading.[14]

While some maintained joint memberships, generally the "Ethnologicals" were more inclined toward monogenism, the unity of man, and were leaning toward species-change through natural selection. The "Anthropologicals" tended toward polygenism and were, if not overtly proslavery, at least pro-Confederacy. Of course, many other Englishmen favored Southern independence, and any Southerners reading ASL publications would likely approve. The ASL was not bankrolled by the Confederacy, but Richmond did directly fund two members of its council, one of whom made occasional payments to two more members. That leader was a young man who had become the Confederacy's best propagandist in Europe, Henry Hotze.[15]

Born in Zürich in 1834, Hotze, while still a boy, immigrated to America—not many years after his fellow countryman Louis Agassiz.[16] Although their meeting is not recorded, it probably occurred when Agassiz visited Mobile, Alabama, in the spring of 1853. Dr. Josiah Nott then persuaded Agassiz to write his prefatory essay for Types of Mankind and in the following year persuaded young Hotze, then tutoring on a plantation near Mobile, to assist with another publication supporting scientific racism. Because, like Agassiz, Hotze had developed an affinity for the Southern states and a strong sense of the inferiority of blacks, he was willing to translate Arthur de Gobineau's recently published Essai sur l'inégalité des Races Humaines. Hotze (or Nott) reduced Gobineau's four volumes to one, omitting portions considered counterproductive for an American audience but adding a hundred-page "Analytical Introduction." The volume began with a dedication "to the Statesmen of America" and ended with an appendix by Nott on "the questions of unity or plurality of species." There is no sign that Lincoln, let alone Darwin, ever read the book. Nevertheless, Nott had managed, as he had with Agassiz's earlier preface, to give his racist doctrines a gloss of European support that impressed some reviewers.[17]

Hotze subsequently used his linguistic skills as secretary to the U.S. Minister to Brussels and later gained valuable experience working for the Mobile Register. When war broke out, Hotze served briefly in an Alabama regiment before coming to the attention of officials in Richmond, Virginia, who sent him to Europe to assist with funding Confederate agents and purchasing arms. Hotze then proposed a plan for improving the Confederacy's image in Europe and obtained a commission and a small budget. With ability, charm, and ample supplies of bourbon and cigars, Hotze placed pro-Southern articles in various London journals before starting his own weekly, The Index.[18]

Another Confederate agent in London who served on the Anthropological Society's council was Albert Taylor Bledsoe. Many members of the Anthropological Society knew Darwin personally, but Bledsoe was the only one who could say he had once been an intimate friend of Abraham Lincoln. Earlier (in chapter 4), we noted Bledsoe's disillusionment when he decided in 1873 that Lincoln had never been honest with him about his religious opinions when they had been friends in Springfield. But already, when Lincoln became president in 1861, Bledsoe had decided his old friend was criminally deluded to think he had any right to declare the secession a rebellion. When the war broke out, Bledsoe left the faculty of the University of Virginia and accepted from his old West Point colleague Jefferson Davis a commission in the Confederate army. Soon Davis made him an assistant secretary of war before sending him on a special mission to London late in 1862. Here Bledsoe did research for a two-volume work justifying the secession while also doing his best to promote the Southern cause by collaborating with Hotze, who developed a stable of journalists who wrote for The Index as well as other journals. Hotze made sure that important opinion-makers in London saw their work.[19]

The London Times needed little encouragement in becoming more pro-South, suggesting shortly after the Emancipation Proclamation that there was some validity to the biblical arguments for slavery, a common view in America but rarely expressed in England. It caused a storm in Darwin's house. "The Times is getting more detestable,—but that is too weak a word,—than ever," he moaned to Gray. "My good wife wishes to give it up; but I tell her that is a pitch of heroism, to which only a woman is equal." Hotze also played the religious card, printing an "Address of the Confederate Clergy to the World" in The Index and arranging for it to be stitched into a quarter of a million copies of popular British quarterlies. However, a backlash caused Hotze to shift from revelation to anthropology. In August 1863, Hotze reported his success to Richmond:

> A new scientific society composed of prominent names has been formed in London which has set itself the task of exposing the heresies that have gained currency in science and politics—of the equality of the races of men. The society is an offshoot or secession from the celebrated Ethnological Society. The president, in writing to offer me a seat in the council, said: "You should and must take a strong interest in our objects, for in us is your only hope that the negro's plan in nature will ever be scientifically ascertained and fearlessly explained."[20]

Hunt's phrase "the negro's plan in nature" echoed Huxley's Evidence as to Man's Place in Nature, and in August, Hunt delivered a paper to the British Association for the Advancement of Science on "The Negro's Place in Nature." Hunt subsequently boasted that "my statement of the simple facts was received with . . . loud hisses," but Hotze—on the ASL's governing council since July—soon printed it in The Index. Simulating fairness, Hotze also reprinted exchanges between Hunt and Huxley that had appeared in another new journal in which Huxley chastised Hunt for quoting the "nonsense" written by American Dr. John H. Van Evrie. Darwin must have been aware of all this and probably shared a colleague's view of Hunt: "I dare say the brute is paid by Confederates to lie as he does."[21]

During his feuds with the "Ethnologicals," Hunt occasionally invoked the name of Agassiz, but at that time, Agassiz was occupied with his own feuds in America, about which Darwin learned snippets from Agassiz's main opponent, Asa Gray.[22]

Above a marble fireplace in the National Academy of Sciences (NAS) in Washington, D.C., hangs a painting that depicts Abraham Lincoln signing the academy's charter on 3 March 1863. Lincoln is in the center among a group of scientists including Alexander Dallas Bache (head of the U.S. Coastal Survey and the academy's first president), Joseph Henry (Lincoln's friend and head of the Smithsonian), Admiral Charles Henry Davis (the highest-ranking scientist in the military forces), and Benjamin Apthorp Gould and Benjamin Peirce (both mathematicians at the Harvard Observatory and working for the Coastal Survey). Immediately to Lincoln's left is Senator Henry Wilson of Massachusetts, who secured Congress's approval for the charter, and in the privileged position on Lincoln's right is Louis Agassiz. It was not until 1924 that the artist Albert Herter was commissioned to depict the scene, which never actually took place.

By 1863, Lincoln was personally acquainted with half of these figures, but he had probably not yet met Agassiz, although in March 1862, Agassiz addressed a letter to him requesting federal support for Albert Bierstadt, a young artist planning an expedition to the far west. Agassiz sent the artist to his friend Senator Charles Sumner, along with a note asking Sumner to read the "few lines" Agassiz had written for Bierstadt to take to the president. "If you approve of it," Agassiz wrote, "please tell him how and when he can best present himself at the White House." The "few lines" are:

> Dear Sir,
> In these days of trial of the nation, every thing which manifests intellectual activity and life is important, especially in reference to the estimation in which we are to be held abroad. A party of artists and scientific men, headed by W. A. Bierstadt, prepare to go among the Rocky Mtns this summer, to paint and collect specimens. It has occurred to me that it would not be > improper to make an appeal to you, in their behalf, asking the patronage of the country for an expedition which is altogether intended to advance our knowledge of a region thus far little visited.

> With highest regard, Yours very truly, Louis Agassiz

The evidence suggests that Agassiz's letter never got beyond Sumner.[23] However, Agassiz employed the same argument—that in perilous times, it was good for the country to display its intellectual vitality—in February 1863 when he wrote to Wilson, Massachusetts's other senator, seeking his support for the creation of a National Academy of Sciences "as an evidence to go before the civilized world at large of the intellectual activity displayed even in these days of our public troubles . . . [which] would tell strongly in our favor, wherever learning is duly appreciated."[24]

A letter Agassiz wrote on the same day to Joseph Henry of the Smithsonian did not mention this lobbying with Wilson. Agassiz knew well that Henry opposed any effort to create such an academy at this time since Henry had discussed the issue a month earlier with Bache and Davis (who, along with Henry and some Harvard professors such as Agassiz, were members of the scientific clique called the "Lazzaroni," mentioned earlier). Henry, Bache, and Davis were all eager to see a more coordinated effort by scientists to help the war effort, but Henry's experience with the political establishment made him argue that Congress would neither support a body that might appear elitist nor adequately fund conferences and publications, that bitterness might arise between those scientists enrolled and those not, and that there was "great danger" that such a body's purposes of might be "perverted to the advancement of personal interest or to the support of the partizan politics."[25]

It was widely known that Agassiz longed to supplant the older American Association for the Advancement of Science (AAAS), which he considered too decentralized and unprofessional, with a European-style academy: setting the agenda for scientific research and education nationally, chartered and funded by the national government, with membership deemed a high honor.[26] True, the AAAS provided no scientific support for the war effort while President Lincoln dealt with inventors and tested weapons; nevertheless, three of the scientists depicted in the 1924 painting, Henry, Bache, and Davis, provided increasingly valuable service to the government. Henry had already offered advice on such matters as the balloon trials and the Chiriqui coal deposits, Bache headed a committee providing technical advice for the blockade system, and Davis had served on that committee as well as the Ironclad Board. Henry, believing Bache and Davis had accepted his arguments against pushing for an academy right now, worked with both men to propose a simpler commission to advise the government on scientific matters. The navy was more open to the proposal than the army, and by 11 February 1863, Secretary Gideon Welles had approved the Permanent Commission of the Navy Department, comprising Henry, Bache, and Davis.[27]

The commission first met on 20 February and over the next two and a half years evaluated three hundred proposals for inventions and devices. The commission did no research but provided far better expertise on technological matters than could be offered by the harried president—who in the previous month alone had involved himself with Diller's gunpowder, the gauge for the transcontinental railroad, an electric detonating system, and what John Dahlgren called "some inflammable humbug." Shortly before the commission's first meeting, Lincoln was still pushing the army and navy to cooperate more, requesting that Edwin M. Stanton and Welles "appoint an officer from each of your Departments, for the purpose of testing the incendiary shell, & incendiary fluid, of A. Berney, and reporting to me whether it would be proper to introduce the shell, or the fluid, in some other form, one or both, into the Military or Naval service." Meanwhile on 19 February, Lincoln arranged to raise Davis as well as Dahlgren to the rank of rear admiral.[28]

To Lincoln, the Permanent Commission may have seemed impressive; to Agassiz, it was a distraction. The day before Henry joined Davis and Bache for the first commission meeting, Agassiz met with Davis and Bache at the latter's house, without Henry but with two other Lazzaroni, Peirce and Gould, and with Agassiz's friend, Senator Wilson. Wilson had recently obtained for Agassiz a seat on the Smithsonian Board of Regents, Agassiz's ostensible reason for being in Washington at this time. The group meeting at Bache's house not only wrote a charter for the National Academy of Sciences but also drew up a list of the fifty "founding" members. Someone may have argued that this would avoid delay, and Agassiz was happy to pontificate on who would be on the list.[29]

By the following day, when Henry first heard about this meeting, Senator Wilson was already introducing the charter as a bill for Congress's approval. Henry later told Agassiz he had made no immediate fuss because he never believed the bill would be approved.[30] However, a certain amount of lobbying may even have targeted Lincoln, though the evidence, in a letter Davis wrote, is frustratingly ambiguous: "I am looking for Agassiz to come here and be introduced to Admiral Foote, and then to go with me to the Capitol to see Mr. Grimes about the Academy bill. I go to the President's once more, and I hope for the last time, this morning."[31] With or without Lincoln's support, Wilson arranged for the bill to reach its final vote on the session's last day, 3 March 1863, avoiding debate by saying the list of fifty names need not detain Congress and no appropriations were involved. Lincoln, busily signing last-minute bills until 11 P.M., made the National Academy of Sciences a legal entity before the day ended. Whether Lincoln was then aware of how the bill originated, he might easily have learned the background later from Dahlgren or even Henry himself.

Naturally, Henry and Gray found themselves listed among the fifty "incorporators." Henry magnanimously declared support for the new organization, while Gray wrote to him that the "list on the whole is good . . . my being in is the only thing that troubles me." Captain Dahlgren was the first to resign his membership for reasons unknown, and it was a blow to lose a technician so important in the military and so close to the president. When the American Academy of Arts and Sciences met in Boston in May and elected Gray president, Peirce claimed this was done by "opponents . . . to show their hatred" of the NAS.[32]

Gray's letters to Darwin and Hooker did not mention the NAS fuss directly but contained amusing phrases about hoping "to torment Agassiz delightfully" at some meeting in Boston, doubting Agassiz "will ever be of any more direct use in nat. history," mentioning that "Agassiz and his small clique" were working against Gray, and saying he would "tease Agassiz, if I could see him, only he is of late so cross and sore. He has been digging various pits for me, but has fallen himself into [them] . . . However, I am good-natured; and only laugh at him." Agassiz was also digging holes for Darwin by frenetically accumulating samples for his museum, even enlisting the services of the federal government through Davis, Bache, and Henry. His purpose was partly revealed to a friend with contacts in Europe: "Spain alone might give us the materials to solve the question of transmutation versus creation."[33]

When Gray felt Darwin needed distraction from his illness, he entertained him with tales of Agassiz's increasing isolation. "It is amusing to see how worried Agassiz is. . . . By the way, now that you are in for 'reading of the very lightest sort' let some one read to you Agassiz on Glaciers in the Atlantic Mag. for November. It will not strain your brain." Gray also thought little of Agassiz's latest book, Methods of Study in Natural History, which stated that one of his purposes was to record his "earnest protest against the transmutation theory." There was little to discuss when Agassiz presented a lightweight paper "On Individuality among Animals, with Reference to the Question of Varieties and Species" at the new NAS's first proper session in Washington in January 1864.[34]

Just over half of the fifty "incorporators" attended, fewer presented papers, and of the four papers concerning natural science, three were by Agassiz. Few natural scientists were then interested in the NAS, and Gray had yet to attend a meeting.[35] Secretary Salmon P. Chase hosted a reception for the academicians, outdone two nights later by Secretary William H. Seward's soirée on 7 January, which was also attended, according to Welles's diary, by "the Cabinet, heads of foreign missions, the learned gentlemen and the committees on foreign relations of the two houses" as well as "a goodly number of ladies, Agassiz, Silliman, Professors Story and Caswell, etc., etc." Welles would have noted if Lincoln had been present. The next day, 8 January, Seward sent a formal letter to assure the members of the academy "that, with the authority of the President, I shall be happy to avail myself of the assistance" offered by the academy.[36] The NAS members also received that day an invitation, at rather short notice, to a one o'clock White House reception of which there is no record except that it happened.[37] Assuming Agassiz was among the twenty-two members who answered that day's roll call and attended the brief reception, it is unlikely that Lincoln used the occasion to converse individually with him.

Another ambiguous report of a possible encounter between Lincoln and Agassiz comes from an acerbic entry in Count Adam von Gurowski's diary for 13 January 1864, the day after the final session of the NAS:

> The President, the Cabinet, and the dignitaries run after the lectures on the Glacial Period. That is the fashion. Oh! those men have already enough of a glacial period in their brains. What innocent sheep to listen to this old rehash, which an academician serves to them as being the latest and newest dish. How one class of dignitaries is humbugged by that other class, the dignitaries of a sham academy![38]

According to Henry, Agassiz had lingered in Washington after the NAS conference ended to give "a very interesting course of three lectures on the subject of glaciers" in the institute's lecture room, "crowded to overflowing every night."[39] Gurowski's splenetic reference to politicians chasing after a particular "academician" is not solid evidence that the president actually attended any particular lecture by Agassiz. Gurowski himself attended few, if any, and may have merely assumed (if his diary is to be taken literally) Lincoln's presence. When Lincoln undoubtedly held a conversation with Agassiz a year later, the president reportedly said that he had never met the scientist before. If true, it was not for want of opportunities.

Mill Workers and Freedmen

The American Civil War affected the global economy and the lives of the thousands of Britons with some connection to the economic, political, or social development of the United States. Few had more concerns and personal contacts than Darwin. Letters from Americans such as Asa Gray occasionally mentioned relatives or students wounded or killed in the war, and Darwin presumably knew that Thomas Huxley's sister had moved to Nashville, Tennessee, where her surgeon husband worked in Confederate hospitals, assisted by their fifteen-year-old son, a nephew Huxley had never seen. Darwin no doubt agreed with the view Huxley expressed to his sister in 1864 that "slavery means, for the white man, bad political economy; bad social morality; bad internal political organisation, and a bad influence upon free labour and freedom all over the world." However, Darwin could never have written, as Huxley did, that "I have not the smallest sentimental sympathy with the negro; don't believe in him at all, in short. . . . [It is] for the sake of the white man, therefore, for your children and grand-children, directly, and for mine, indirectly, I wish to see [slavery] ended."[1] Darwin possessed ample sympathy for "the negro," and his concerns about the war went beyond second-hand contact with combatants. In Britain, there were also casualties, many of them fatal: the victims of the Lancashire "Cotton Famine." Any newspaper reader knew of their deepening plight as the Union blockade of Southern ports became effective, but Darwin also had a personal link to a former mill owner, William Rathbone Greg.

In their student days in Edinburgh, Greg had been a notable freethinker in the Plinian Society, later gaining renown for an unorthodox book, The Creed of Christendom (1851), positively reviewed by George Eliot, admired by the "Westminster set," and purchased for the shelves of the Lincoln-Herndon law office. Greg's father had pioneered the cotton textile industry, founding a mill in 1784 that was one of the first to import large amounts of American cotton. W. R. Greg himself gave up direct interest in running the mills a decade before the American Civil War wrought havoc in the industry. Greg's son Percy Greg was one of the London journalists that Henry Hotze paid out of his Confederate funds to write pro-South propaganda for The Index. Shortly after the war, W. R. Greg wrote an article criticizing bourgeois civilization for social measures that allowed weaker members of society to survive and overpopulate, and later still, in The Descent of Man, Darwin cited some of Greg's ideas without actually embracing them.[2] But back in 1862, Darwin on at least three occasions donated to a relief fund for the Lancashire cotton workers who were being crushed in a "struggle for survival" not of their own making, and, considering the attitudes W. R. Greg displayed then and later, it is unlikely that he felt as keenly as Darwin did about the victims of the Lancashire "cotton famine."[3]

"We are sorry that you suffer in England," Gray told Darwin, "but you must blame the rebels for it, not us, and your Manchester people should have looked earlier to India for cotton." Darwin was pleased to reply: "We in north England seem tiding over our difficulty far better than anyone ever ventured to hope. The subscriptions have been gigantic."[4] Darwin wrote that on the day after Lincoln signed the final draft of the Emancipation Proclamation. At the same time, America's ambassador in London sent to Washington a document received from the mayor of Manchester. A great crowd had assembled in the city's Free-Trade Hall on 31 December to welcome the New Year and also the new era that Lincoln's Emancipation Proclamation heralded. The lengthy "Address to the President," which the mayor forwarded, had been "agreed upon at a public meeting of the working men and others of this city" and includes the following heartfelt expressions:

> Since we have discerned . . . that the victory of the free North, in the war which has so sorely distressed us as well as afflicted you, will strike off the fetters of the slave, you have attracted our warm and earnest sympathy. We joyfully honor you, as the President, and the Congress with you, for many decisive steps toward practically exemplifying your belief in the words of your great founders: "All men are created free and equal."[5]

Lincoln was moved to make a formal yet emotional reply "To the workingmen of Manchester," part of which reads:

> I know and deeply deplore the sufferings which the workingmen at Manchester and in all Europe are called to endure in this crisis. . . . Under these circumstances, I cannot but regard your decisive utterance upon the question as an instance of sublime Christian heroism which has not been surpassed in any age or in any country. . . . I hail this interchange of sentiment, therefore, as an augury that, whatever else may happen, whatever misfortune may befall your country or my own, the peace and friendship which now exist between the two nations will be, as it shall be my desire to make them, perpetual.[6]

Today, not far from Manchester's Free-Trade Hall stands a remarkable statue of Abraham Lincoln sculpted by Pennsylvanian George Grey Barnard, whose depiction of Lincoln's rough-hewn features and slouching stance caused much controversy. A later casting, commissioned as a gift to Britain during the First World War, ended up not in Parliament Square, London, as originally intended but in Manchester. On the plinth is inscribed a large excerpt from Lincoln's finely hewn letter to his working-class friends in Manchester, who suffered uncomplainingly to see slave labor ended.

Lincoln's decision to recruit blacks for military service led to investigations into the condition and capabilities of blacks that resulted in the accumulation of an exceptional body of anthropological data. Although Lincoln was not closely involved, Darwin certainly made use of some of this material, which had a long-lasting influence on anthropologists and sociologists. Three different bodies were involved in these investigations—the U.S. Sanitary Commission, the Provost-Marshal General's Bureau, and the American Freedmen's Inquiry Commission (AFIC)—all technically under the authority of the executive branch and overseen by Secretary Edwin M. Stanton, although the Sanitary Commission was actually a body of private citizens, and the AFIC worked closely with congressional committees.

Shortly after Fort Sumter, Lincoln received a proposal for the creation of a Sanitary Commission to offer medical and hygiene aid to troops beyond that provided by army medical services. On 13 June 1861, Lincoln signed into existence the commission whose membership included one of the nation's leading scientists, Alexander Dallas Bache of the Coastal Survey; Samuel Gridley Howe, a renowned Boston philanthropist and reformer; and Frederick Law Olmsted, whose books about the South had been so admired by Darwin and Herndon. As general secretary for the organization, Olmsted often liaised with the president.

Olmsted, who "had always been fascinated by statistics," instituted within the Sanitary Commission a Bureau of Vital Statistics to tabulate reports from the sanitary inspectors regarding mortality and sickness of volunteers. However, in September 1863, Olmsted resigned from the commission for several reasons, one possibly being a change in policy on the collection of statistics.[7]

According to a commission member, "early in 1863 a new class of examinations was undertaken . . . [to create] the most important contribution of observations ever made in furtherance of 'anthropology'" because the statistics could be used to compare white soldiers and the large number of "persons of African descent" now being enlisted in the army. This could provide far better data about human variation than Dr. Samuel G. Morton's six hundred mislabeled and mismeasured skulls gathering dust in Philadelphia. After Olmsted's departure, data collection was directed by Harvard astronomer and mathematician Benjamin Apthorp Gould, who initially reported—almost contemptuously—"No examinations of negro troops seem to have been made yet, and the importance of such inspections needs no comment."[8]

Gould, who had helped Louis Agassiz create the NAS a few months earlier, later reported that because he was working outside his field, he consulted with "friends whose pursuits are of an anthropological or physiological nature," listing Agassiz first among those who "aided with useful counsel."[9] Agassiz's influence can be seen throughout Gould's published report, but that report did not appear until 1869, so we will first examine another important wartime investigation of black people on which Agassiz also left a mark.

On 16 March 1863, Secretary of War Stanton commissioned a study that was not primarily anthropological but intended "to investigate the condition of the colored population" recently emancipated and to recommend "what measures will best contribute to their protection and improvement, so that they may defend and support themselves; and also, how they can be most usefully employed in the service of the Government for the suppression of the rebellion."[10] The American Freedman's Inquiry Commission comprised Robert Dale Owen of Indiana, Colonel James McKaye of New York, and Samuel Gridley Howe of Massachusetts. All were active abolitionists and may have been suggested to Stanton by Senator Charles Sumner, who had especially close links with fellow Bostonian Howe, a founder of the Republican Party, who also served with the Sanitary Commission.[11] Lincoln knew all three as well, and one historian has described McKaye as "Lincoln's eyes and ears concerning the Negro in the South."[12]

The three commissioners worked expeditiously, consulting widely and visiting the Carolinas, Florida, Louisiana, and even Canada for evidence about freedmen's conditions. Military men were interviewed about the loyalty, abilities, and needs of this transformed population. A preliminary report was issued within three months, and a final report eleven months later. These encouraged Stanton to proceed with black recruitment and also made recommendations that, according to historian John G. Sproat, later served as a "blueprint" for radical reconstruction.

After the preliminary report was published, Howe decided to consult with his friend Agassiz since the AFIC investigation "requires consideration of political, physiological, & ethnological principles" about which "I feel my own incompetency." Howe asked directly whether blacks and mulattoes, with no further additions from Africa, "will be a persistent race in this country," whether amalgamation was likely to become "more general" after abolition, and whether "the mulatto is unfertile [sic], bearing but few children, & those mainly lymphatic & scrofulous." If the black race was likely to grow, Howe suggested it would be futile to "resist it"; but if the "natural tendencies are to the diffusion, & final disappearance" of blacks, "then our policy should be modified accordingly."[13]

Agassiz replied in four letters dated 9, 10, 11, and 15 August, and his main themes were the gulf between the white and black races, the dire effects of amalgamation, and the policies needed to control both. He began with the declaration that if the black race was in decline, "a wise policy" would be to accelerate emigration and assist the decay. He mentioned both "the prevalent theory of the Unity of Mankind" and "the theory of a multiple origin of mankind," saying that whichever was true, some "races" are limited in their geographic range. However, he readily admitted that both Africans and Europeans had demonstrated they could flourish in America, and although blacks in the northern states would die out, those moving to "the warmer parts of our States" would flourish.[14]

With black numbers likely to increase, "the welfare of our own race" required that we avoid "the combination in one social organisation of two races more widely different from one another than all the other races." Agassiz felt blacks should be allowed "legal equality," but "social equality" was "a natural impossibility," according to evidence from antiquity as well as more recent European contacts with blacks in Africa. Agassiz conditionally prophesied, "With a free black population enjoying identical rights with the whites, [the Southern] States will sooner or later become Negro States with a comparatively small white population. This is inevitable . . . [under] the laws of nature." Rather than allow a black majority effectively to "extend the area of Africa," we should "do for the blacks all that humanity, the most active charity & the most disinterested Christian devotion may require of us . . . [without allowing] them to become an insuperable obstacle to our own progress." The principle underlying policy should be: "No man has a right to what he is unfit to use"—almost a quotation from Stephen A. Douglas's speeches.[15]

Agassiz referred dismissively to "contemporaries . . . who in their youth advocated the wildest plans for social reform. . . . All one-sided doctrines are doomed to disappointment . . . [and] there is no more one-sided doctrine concerning human nature, than the idea that all men are equal, in the sense of being equally capable of fostering human progeny & advancing civilization generally." Whether Agassiz had Lincoln in mind, he effectively reversed a famous statement Lincoln made eight months earlier: "But unless we are prudent now, we run simply the risk of losing our own liberties in the effort of securing to another race more than what it is now capable of maintaining."[16]

When later publishing these letters, Mrs. Agassiz omitted some of her husband's statements about amalgamation that might have offended Southern friends. For example, referring to the "production of half-breeds," Agassiz suggested that "the sense of abhorrence against slavery which has led to the agitation culminating in our civil war, has been chiefly and unconsciously fostered by the recognition of our own type in the offspring of Southern gentlemen, moving among us as negroes, which they are not." Agassiz argued that there should be different policies regarding "half-breeds" and "the pure black," aiding the latter toward "the fullest development of all its capabilities" while sparing no efforts "to check that [amalgamation] which is abhorrent to our better nature." Mrs. Agassiz also omitted her husband's rather prurient explanation for why this amalgamation—"abhorrent . . . unnatural . . . [and] most repugnant to my feelings"—nevertheless abounded in the South: he blamed "the family negress" for seeking the "advantages" gained by gratifying the "sexual desires . . . in the young men of the South," who then "gradually . . . seek more 'spicy partners,' as I have heard the full blacks called by fast young men."[17]

In his reply of 18 August, Howe asserted that he was no advocate of amalgamation but declared that it was slavery itself that had "impaired the purity and lowered the equality of the national blood." He accepted the distinction between "a vigorous black race" and "a feeble mulatto breed" and that some of both groups "have drifted northward, right in the teeth of thermal laws," so that they now dwell "where they would never live by natural election [sic]." With slavery's termination and thanks to "natural laws, . . . the colored population will disappear from the Northern and Middle States, if not from the Continent." In accepting the points pronounced by Agassiz, "it will be the duty of the statesman to favor by wise measures the operation of these laws, and the purification and elevation of the national blood."[18]

Although Howe agreed that "mulattoism is hybridism, . . . unnatural and undesirable," he added that "we should grant to every human being all the rights we claim for ourselves, and bear in mind the cases of individual excellence of colored people." In a postscript omitted by Mrs. Agassiz, Howe added rather optimistically, "Whatever may be the conclusion with regard to mulattoes, you will agree with me I trust in regard to the excellent qualities inherent in the ~~Afric~~ [sic] negroes."[19]

The final AFIC report quoted numerous witnesses by name but not Agassiz, even though several points made in the final chapter, "The Future in the United States of the African Race," were paraphrased from Agassiz's letters to Howe.[20] However, while repeating Agassiz's view that amalgamation was "a physical evil injurious to both" races and "ought to be discouraged by public opinion," the commission believed "it is beyond the legitimate reach of legislation." And while Agassiz's views were unchanged since 1850, the final report stressed, "The whites have changed, and are still rapidly changing, their opinion of the negro. And the negro, in his new condition as freedman, is himself, to some extent, a changed being. No one circumstance has tended so much to these results as the display of manhood in negro soldiers." The report ignored Agassiz's distinctions between legal and social rights and instead recommended strongly that the rebel states should be allowed back into the union after they changed their constitutions to secure "equal rights" for freedmen. It also went beyond the operation of the "natural laws" by urging the government to support the process of leasing to blacks in the insurrectionary districts properties that had been abandoned by rebels.[21]

Lincoln must have read the AFIC reports with great interest. He had already indicated a desire to see some confiscated lands made available to former slaves under Union protection in the Carolinas and Louisiana, and he personally wrote to Owen and McKaye a letter of introduction for an army chaplain who later became a leader in the Bureau of Refugees, Freedmen, and Abandoned Lands.[22] Lincoln also sent McKaye to Louisiana in February 1864 to investigate whether blacks might be granted the vote when Louisiana produced its new constitution before rejoining the Union. McKaye reportedly assured an assembly of blacks that the president was concerned for their welfare and had sent him "to inquire into their condition and to ascertain their wishes."[23] McKaye may have caused the military governor, General Nathaniel P. Banks, to express his new view in favor of "such extension of suffrage as will meet the demands of the age," and Lincoln suggested to Michael Hahn, the new governor-elect, that Louisiana might let "some of the colored people" have the vote, "for instance, the very intelligent and those who have fought valiantly in our ranks." McKaye also urged Sumner to treat the disposition of freedmen and of the abandoned lands together, a topic McKaye may have discussed with Lincoln after returning from the Carolinas in the summer of 1863.[24]

McKaye recounted a meeting during which he related to Lincoln (in dialect, which he thought would amuse Lincoln) a discussion he overheard among some recently liberated Carolina slaves who were concerned whether "Massa Linkum" knew of their plight and could guarantee their freedom. One elderly "praise leader" dismissed their fears:

> "Brederin," said he, "you don't know nosen' what you'se talkin' 'bout. Now, you just listen to me. Massa Linkum, he ebery whar. He know ebery ting." Then, solemnly looking up, he added: "He walk de earf like de Lord!" . . . Mr. Lincoln was very much affected by this account. He did not smile, as another might have done, but got up from his chair and walked in silence two or three times across the floor. As he resumed his seat, he said, very impressively, "It is a momentous thing to be the instrument, under Providence, of the liberation of a race!"[25]

The Emancipator, six months after signing the proclamation, was pleased that European governments were now less inclined to aid the South, abolitionists had modified their criticisms, no slave insurrections or mutinies by white soldiers had occurred, and the Union army was swelling with black recruits. The AFIC's final report was hopeful that attitudes of both blacks and whites were changing, and evidence of a change in whites' attitude—but also of the need for much more—was provided at the end of that year when Lincoln became the first president in over thirty years to be reelected in what proved to be the most racist election in American history.

Testing Hopes and Hoaxes

Some time after learning that a black man had equated him with Jesus, Lincoln also learned of General Robert E. Lee's second coming—a second invasion of the North. It was a further desperate gamble by Lee, still hoping for some sort of "Saratoga," the colonial victory in 1777 that helped convince the French to support the Americans' War of Independence. But Lee failed at Gettysburg, Pennsylvania, in July 1863, and at the same moment Vicksburg, Mississippi, fell to General Ulysses S. Grant, finally opening the Mississippi River and splitting the Confederacy. The South should have surrendered soon after these major defeats; however, once again, Lee's army was allowed to escape back into Virginia, infuriating Lincoln even more than the similar blunder after Antietam. Lincoln wrote an angry letter to General George G. Meade and then wisely decided not to send it, but the next day, he apparently told a secretary, "If I had gone up there, I could have whipped them myself."[1]

Military strategy might be another science that Lincoln felt he could master, but he also recognized the unique complexity of war and had a government to run. A defeated general could be replaced; a defeated president would lose all authority. So Lincoln tested further generals, searching for a victor, until he decided, eight months after Vicksburg, to make Grant lieutenant general in charge of the entire war. Grant later passed the test by securing total victory.

The Union army itself tested and gradually disproved the Southern hypothesis that one rebel was worth two Yankees, and now African Americans—no longer born on some other continent—were being tested to see if they would enlist in sufficient numbers, fight as well as white men, and demoralize the South into submission while inspiring the North into tolerance.

Lincoln himself would soon face the test of reelection. He had not yielded to secession, or despaired after numerous military setbacks, or let financial or constitutional obstacles impede the struggle, or allowed the Confederacy to gain the foreign recognition that would have ensured its independence, but he had also failed after three years to crush the rebellion.

Lincoln knew there was a larger test than all of these and made it the central point of his Gettysburg Address. Lincoln concisely described how a great civil war was testing a nation that, unlike other nations, was itself an experiment. A government based on the principle that "all men are created equal" had been brought into existence, but could it "long endure"? Few nations had even tried the experiment: Britain had achieved a mixed constitution and equality before the law, but only a tiny fraction of Britons possessed the right to vote, while the French had more than once proclaimed egalité but were again ruled by an emperor. The American "proposition" of equality was a promise it had yet to keep while slavery stood in denial. Yet, the promise was there and was now in the process of being fulfilled—if the whole experiment was not ruined by disunion. Elites in Europe hoped the United States would fail, lest the experiment be extended. Lincoln knew it would be the world's loss, and not just America's, if government "of the people"—not of kings, nobles, or a dominant race—perished from the Earth.

Gettysburg and Vicksburg indicated that the hypothesis had not been disproven, yet. But democracy would undergo further tests and still does.

"You in London were daily awaiting & expecting the capture of Washington . . . [with] a good-deal of little-concealed joy," wrote Gray with unconcealed joy after events disproved the pessimistic prophecies that had appeared in British newspapers when Lee began his bold invasion. "Oh foolish people! When will you see that there is only one end to all this:—and that the North never dreams of any other,—the complete putting down of the rebellion . . . attended with the annihilation of slavery."[2] Darwin replied promptly:

> How profoundly interesting American news is. . . . Do not hate poor old England too much. Anyhow she is the mother of fine children all over the world. I declare no man could have tried to wish more sincerely for the north than I have done. My reason tells me that perhaps it would be best,—of course best if it would end Slavery, but I cannot pump up enthusiasm. The boasting of your newspapers & of your little men, & the abuse of England, and the treatment of the free coloured population, and the not freeing Maryland slaves stops all my enthusiasm. If all the States were like New England the case would be different. I find a man cannot hope by intention. You will think me a wretched outcast. Farewell & do not hate me much.[3]

Gray volleyed back, blaming the press on both sides of the Atlantic for stirring up ill feeling, before addressing Darwin's prime interest: "[S]ome day . . . you will see that I was a fairly good prophet.—that the South might have delayed the abolition of slavery by giving up early in the conflict, but that every month of continued resistance hastened and ensured the downfall of slavery. That is now doomed, and sure near to rapid death, quick in some places—slower in others, but sure." Acknowledging Darwin's concern not only for freedmen in the South but also for those still enslaved in the Border States and still abused elsewhere in the North, Gray responded with a less than brilliant prophecy: "Ill usage of negroes—who make such good soldiers—will soon be unheard of"—wishful thinking that may have been shared by Lincoln.[4]

"Homely, honest, ungainly Lincoln is the representative man of the country." Like Gray, growing numbers of Americans increasingly valued the determination and intelligence of the president, despite his supposed lack of certain graces.[5] Lincoln might be reelected in nine months—easily if the war could be won by then, less so if not. However, his Democratic opponents attacked Lincoln not only for his failure to win the war but also for the Emancipation Proclamation, which, according to the scaremongers, would lead to widespread amalgamation. With abolition nearly a dead issue, the Democrats ranted instead about "racial purity." And as if the word "amalgamation" had been devalued by overuse, a new word was coined and doled out freely by Democratic politicians and newspapers.

Miscegenation: The Theory of the Blending of the Races, Applied to the American White Man and Negro was the title of a pamphlet that appeared in New York shortly before Christmas 1863. The anonymous but skillful author appeared to be an abolitionist—though that term was becoming obsolete, and the author took for granted that slavery was doomed. He concentrated on arguing against the fear of amalgamation. While the AFIC reports assured readers that "thermal lines" would prevent freed blacks from moving northward and cause those in the North to move southward, Miscegenation provided a freshly coined word and an opposite spin for amalgamation: race mixing should not be feared but embraced.

Miscegenation declared that both science and religion proved that "all the tribes which inhabit the earth were originally derived from one type," extensively quoted such monogenist authorities as "Dr. John W. Draper of New York University" (a well-known Darwinian), and proclaimed the "physiological equality of the white and colored races." The anonymous author asserted that "mixed races are much superior, mentally, physically, and morally, to those pure or unmixed," so the admixture of the blood of blacks would actually improve American blood. A natural attraction between whites and blacks explained rape on plantations and why radical abolitionists tended to have fair hair. It was now, said the author, the Republican Party's duty to promote miscegenation.[6]

Gift copies of Miscegenation were posted—along with a respectful letter inviting their opinions—to prominent antislavery speakers and writers such as sisters Sarah Grimké and Angelina Grimké, Lucretia Mott, Wendell Phillips, Theodore D. Weld, and possibly New York Tribune editor Horace Greeley. Prominent Republicans such as William H. Seward and Charles Sumner also reportedly received complimentary copies.[7]

Some of the antislavery press favorably reviewed the pamphlet, and on 8 February, Darwin might have read a dispatch by the London Times's New York correspondent that "the advanced spirits" of the Republican Party were promoting a new doctrine that the black was "in many important respects the superior of the whites," and if whites do not "amalgamate," they will die out in America. The correspondent dismissed Miscegenation as something "for the study of such Yankee girls as have exhausted the sensational novels," yet he perceptively suggested that the author's unctuous style "might almost make one suspect him of being a mauvais farceur."[8]

The Democratic press naturally used Miscegenation as a stick for beating Republicans. Samuel S. Cox, a rabid Democratic congressman, not unreasonably questioned the science behind Miscegenation but then went beyond the worst polygenist to assert that the "mulatto does not live; he does not recreate his kind; he is a monster," adding, contradictorily, that mulattoes "scarcely survive beyond one generation." Curiously, Cox also quoted from two or three letters that had been written by the antislavery recipients of gratis copies of Miscegenation. These letters—offering qualified praise and written in all innocence—had been sent, as recommended, to "The author of Miscegenation" at the publisher's address. Cox's access to them casts doubt on his denials of any knowledge of the authorship of the pamphlet. Shortly afterward, Dr. John H. Van Evrie attacked Cox for condemning "miscegenation" but not emancipation: "the mixing of blood follows the mixing of 'freedom.'"[9]

Journalists David Goodman Croly and George Wakeman of the Democratic organ the New York World are the actual authors of Miscegenation, a fact not revealed for decades.[10] The World cleverly delayed commenting until there was a bandwagon to board. Greeley's pro-Republican Tribune defensively suggested the discussion merited a more seriously scientific approach and two days later set an example by publishing a report from London about Thomas Huxley's recent lecture that had lacerated James Hunt's paper "On the Negro's Place in Nature" for its utter lack of scientific credibility.[11]

Having apparently read the Times's account of Miscegenation, Huxley first dismissed "the fanatical abolitionists [who] do not scruple to affirm that the negro is the equal of the white man—nay, some go so far as to tell us that the American stock would be the better for the infusion of a little black blood." Hunt's paper, of course, took the entirely opposite view, and Huxley stormed, "Nothing, indeed, can surpass its scandalous absurdity, except the reasoning by which it is supported." After reading several quotations, Huxley concluded, "And this is put before the unsuspecting public, without comment or qualification, as the verdict of science touching 'The Negro's Place in Nature!'"[12]

Count Adam von Gurowski, the Washington insider and diarist, was evidently familiar with the scientific controversies. His Diary not only discusses "the newly-invented sacramental word . . . miscegenation . . . [that] agitates the press and some would-be savants in Congress" but also echoed Huxley by asserting that if the slaveholders' brains were "dissected, their cerebella would be found to have less convolutions than those of the negro." The count's little rant noted that "the newly made Academicians come not to the rescue of science! Poor souls, still entangled in Blumenbach, and under the leadership of an Agassiz, wailing against Darwin." Whether Darwin ever read Miscegenation, he would know all about it from numerous reviews, including a scathing one in Hunt's *Anthropological Review a*nd from the attention the subject received in the weekly journal that Huxley edited, the Reader.[13]

Back in New York, Van Evrie seized the moment to turn Hunt's Negro's Place in Nature into a pamphlet and also to publish a book, Subgenation: The Theory of the Normal Relation of the Races; an Answer to "Miscegenation." Supposedly anonymous, this was actually just a new edition of Van Evrie's 1861 diatribe, Negroes and Negro "Slavery": The First an Inferior Race; the Latter Its Normal Condition, updated with topical references to Lincoln's "Miscegenation Proclamation" and a quotation in which Agassiz supposedly demolished the "great luminary of the single race theory" James C. Prichard. Van Evrie, literally capitalizing on the debate while promoting a Democratic victory in the upcoming election, advertised the sale of printed cartoons such as "Miscegenation, or the Millennium of Abolitionism" and campaign pamphlets such as "The Miscegenation Record of the Republican Party." Another pamphlet, possibly unconnected to Van Evrie, appeared in September entitled "Miscegenation and the Republican Party" and includes excerpts from some of the letters that Croly and Wakeman, the authors of Miscegenation, had harvested from unsuspecting antislavery leaders.[14]

Lincoln had also received a copy of Miscegenation along with a polite letter asking permission to dedicate a new work, Melaleukation, to the president.[15] Other Republican officials who received copies of Miscegenation had made no response, and Senator Sumner reportedly suspected a hoax from the start. Lincoln was too canny to take the bait, and his only reported comment on the affair came months later when someone asked if he was in favor of miscegenation. Punning in several directions, Lincoln quipped, "That's a democratic mode of producing good Union men, & I don't propose to infringe on the patent."[16]

A well-informed New York correspondent for the London Morning Herald sent a dispatch late in October—when its information could not possibly bounce back to America before the election—exposing Miscegenation as a hoax. That he was probably in league with the authors is suggested by his respect for their anonymity and knowledge that a free copy had been sent to Lincoln who had so far proved himself "shrewd enough to say nothing on the unsavoury subject."[17]

The Democrats, shifting from defending slavery to advocating white supremacy, caricatured Lincoln as "Abraham Africanus I" and (with a nod to the evolution debate) "the original ourang-outang," while Lincoln's swarthy complexion was attributed to some African blood in his genealogy.[18] The political effect of all this was small. Lincoln picked up only a third of the votes cast in New York City but won the state overall and would still have been reelected without it.[19] The hoax merely indicated that ignorance about the nature of species and hybridity did not prevent anyone from hanging his preexisting views on whatever supposedly scientific evidence was at hand. Allegedly scientific discourse was still reflecting rather than supplanting prejudice. This demonstration of ignorance and racism failed to remove Lincoln from office, yet it may have dampened his hope that white Americans were steadily becoming more tolerant of black Americans.

On 12 April 1864, Darwin wrote to Agassiz for the first time since publishing On the Origin of Species nearly five years earlier. The present letter thanked Agassiz for sending his Methods of Study in Natural History "with some other publications," as Darwin vaguely expressed it. He found something positive to say, though not about the publication itself: "I thank you sincerely for the above present. I know well how strongly you are opposed to nearly everything I have written & it gratifies me deeply that you have not for this cause taken . . . a personal dislike to me." To the distinguished entomologist B. D. Walsh, Darwin confessed that he "only skimmed" Agassiz's Methods and "thought it a very poor Book." Darwin also told Walsh, who had written a paper calling Agassiz's review of The Origin an "absurdity," that he was "delighted at the manner in which you have bearded this lion in his den."[20]

When Asa Gray urged Darwin to "set [Alfred Russel] Wallace upon . . . Methods of Study (forsooth)," Darwin passed the comment verbatim to Wallace, adding, "So Asa Gray seems to think much of your powers of reviewing & I mention this as it assuredly is laudari a laudato." Darwin was always keen to praise Wallace, who was so modest about his own abilities, which Darwin rated highly. Their mutually respectful relationship had grown warmer since Wallace's return from Malaysia in 1862. To Darwin's invitation, Wallace immediately responded that Agassiz "seems so utterly wrong . . . that it would be a very long & wearisome task to answer him." Wallace mentioned being lately stimulated by reading Herbert Spencer, who "appears to me as far ahead of John Stuart Mill as J. S. M. is of the rest of the world, and I may add as Darwin is of Agassiz."[21]

Spencer's influence possibly contributed to Wallace's sudden interest in the topic so dear to Darwin and, more recently, to Charles Lyell and Huxley: the origins of man. In May 1864, while the miscegenation controversy flared on both sides of the Atlantic, Wallace sent to Darwin a paper on "The Origin of Human Races and the Antiquity of Man Deduced from the Theory of 'Natural Selection.'" He told Darwin that he wanted to explain "the vast mental & cranial differences between man & the apes combined with such small structural differences in other parts of the body" and "the diversity of human races combined with man's almost perfect stability of form during all historical epochs." Along the way, Wallace also developed the point made earlier by Gray: that monogenism and polygenism could be combined "by means of Mr. Darwin's celebrated theory of 'Natural Selection.'"[22] Wallace argued that the existing human races originated from a "single homogeneous race" inhabiting some tropical region and still lacking the faculty of speech or higher reason: yet, man had enough "reason" to give him advantages over other species, allowing him to multiply and spread to different environments. Through the process of "natural selection," those different environments caused infinitesimally small changes (over not thousands but millions of years) resulting in the "specific modifications which still distinguish the chief races of mankind." Those racial characteristics became fixed because then these races all developed that "higher reason" that allowed them to control their environment, which in turn prevented natural selection from causing any further changes in man's physical forms. However, natural selection did continue to act—and differentially—on the brain because a "hardier . . . more social race" developed in temperate zones while regions with a more "perennial supply of vegetable food"—thus reducing the need to "prepare for the rigours of winter"—prevented the development of "an indigenous inter-tropical civilisation."

Invoking the subtitle of On the Origin of Species, Wallace argued that the "great law of 'the preservation of favoured races in the struggle for life'" leads to the "inevitable extinction of all those low and mentally underdeveloped populations with which Europeans come in contact." Wallace listed Red Indians, Tasmanians, Australians and New Zealanders, who will eventually "die out"—not mentioning Africans even though the logic of his argument would include them. The difference between polygenists and monogenists, Wallace concluded, rested solely in the fact that polygenists defined man by his possession of "higher faculties," while monogenists emphasized "form and structure." Wallace implied that agreeing on some criteria might resolve some disputes and also looked forward to a time when the species of man would once again become a "homogeneous race" as the continuing effects of natural selection on intellect meant that eventually "no individual . . . will be inferior to the noblest specimens of existing humanity."[23] Wallace did not speculate whether this new homogeneity would result from making love or making war, that is, through miscegenation or extermination. Darwin was impressed. "The great leading idea is quite new to me, viz that during late ages the mind will have been modified more than the body; yet I had got as far as to see with you that the struggle between the races of man depended entirely on intellectual & moral qualities." However, "I am not sure that I go with you on all minor points. . . . I rather differ on the rank under classificatory point of view which you assign to man: I do not think any character simply in excess ought ever to be used for the higher divisions." Darwin felt that difference in intellect even between man and ape was one of degree rather than kind, and the degree was far less between races of man. Darwin preferred to look at non-mental variables: "With respect to the differences of race, a conjecture has occurred to me that much may be due to the correlation of complexion (& consequently Hair) with constitution. Assume that a dusky individual best escaped miasma & you will readily see what I mean." Darwin mentioned that he had persuaded the British army's medical department to send a survey to surgeons in the tropics to collect information on correlations between racial characteristics and resistance to disease—at the very time when the Sanitary Commission and military doctors in the United States were collecting anthropometric data from soldiers in the Union army. "I dare say I shall never get any returns," Darwin predicted correctly. Returning to the question of how human variations became long-lasting (though perhaps not permanent) races, Darwin thought intellect and morality less important than another factor. "I suspect that a sort of sexual selection has been the most powerful means of changing the races of man. I can shew that the different races have a widely different standard of beauty. Among savages the most powerful men will have the pick of the women & they will generally leave the most descendants."[24]

Sexual selection was extremely important to Darwin but too complex to describe in a letter. Just recovering from a prolonged period of illness, Darwin may have doubted he would ever have the energy and time to pursue this important work. And Wallace's approach, however faulty at present, was far closer to his own than Lyell's or Huxley's. Darwin suddenly tried to pass his work onto Wallace's shoulders: "I have collected a few notes on man but I do not suppose I shall ever use them. Do you intend to follow out your views, & if so would you like at some future time to have my few references & notes?"[25]

Wallace replied immediately, grateful for Darwin's "flattering remarks" and "critical observations" but skeptical about sexual selection and politely evading Darwin's offer: "I may possibly some day go a little more into this subject, & if I do will accept the kind offer of your notes." Wallace added that another writing project would occupy him for "a long time." After a fortnight, Darwin replied briefly, "merely to thank you & just to say that probably you are right on all the points you touch on except as I think about sexual selection which I will not give up." His offer was quietly shelved: "I doubt whether my notes would be of any use to you, & as far as I remember they are chiefly on sexual selection."[26]

Wallace and Darwin continued their stimulating correspondence and debated "sexual selection" for years, but after that summer of 1864, there was no further suggestion of direct collaboration. While Darwin could believe Wallace would do a better job than Huxley or Lyell in applying natural selection to man, another self-professed "Darwinian" felt he was doing exactly that. Karl Vogt was a distinguished botanist whose Vorlesungen über den Menschen (1863) had so enthusiastically espoused natural selection that he became known as the Darwin of Germany. However, the real Darwin was alarmed that Vogt's "Darwinism" seemed to support a form of polygenism by theorizing that at least three different types of ape evolved into as many types of man. Darwin did not, and did not wish to, believe this. The English translation of Vogt's work, Lectures on Man, was published in 1864 by the odious James Hunt of the ASL, and Darwin noted in the margin of his copy: "gives Agassiz blunders on first coming in of various classes."[27]

By the end of 1864, Darwin could see that Vogt, Huxley, and Lyell were far behind Wallace, but any lingering hope that Wallace would adopt his ideas more fully was dispelled when Wallace began to embrace a view that was simply anathema to Darwin—and also rejected as irrational by Lincoln. Wallace was about to become a believer in spiritualism, only three or four years after Mary Lincoln began holding séances in the White House.

Spiritual Forces

The belief in unseen forces controlling changes in the environment is the essence of primitive religion. The slow development of rationalism eroded its edges, replacing magic with logic. The pace of change accelerated: gravity was explained, and magnetism harnessed into electricity and eventually telegraphy. This, along with the Atlantic steam packets and improvements in printing processes, allowed any interesting development among one civilized people to become quickly known to all the rest. Mesmerism and hypnotism—still parlor games or lyceum demonstrations—seemed the next mysteries to be explained. By the mid-nineteenth century, these trends advanced a movement that was partly an extension of and partly a reaction against modern science. "Modern spiritualism" either negated science or represented its next step. The gullible were exploited, while the skeptical scrutinized "mediums" just as they would self-styled magicians, assuming any powers at work were natural and explicable. Lincoln and Darwin are alleged to have joined other skeptics investigating that quintessential spiritualist manifestation, the séance; however, the evidence that they fully participated is (appropriately) lacking in substance.

Modern spiritualism has no agreed starting point, though many say it began in upstate New York in 1848. One evangelist called this region "the burned over district" after concluding that the fires of Methodism, passing through earlier, left too few nonconverts to provide further "fuel." Actually, the "burning-over" cleared space for all sorts of new growths during the decades preceding the Civil War, including Shakers, Millerites, Mormons, Charles Grandison Finney's revivalism, and the first women's rights convention, held in Seneca Falls in 1848. Also in that year, two young daughters of John Fox of Hydesville, Margaret, thirteen, and Kate, eleven, began their association with a sort of "spiritual telegraph": the "knocks" and "raps" supposedly produced by departed spirits seeking to communicate with this world. News of the phenomena spread rapidly among neighbors and reached an older, married sister living in Rochester, who now came to help turn her siblings' gift into a career.[1]

From the start, the Fox sisters' noisy manifestations from the spirit world differed from the inspirations or revelations bestowed on palm readers and crystal-ball gazers. The rappings, knockings, and inexplicably moving objects brought about through the medium of the sisters were more open to public investigation and objective measurement than, say, the phrenological relationship between bumps on one's head and one's intellectual and moral qualities. The more open activities of the sisters allowed supporters to emphasize natural law rather than the supernatural, external facts rather than a state of mind, and an expanding knowledge rather than some revelation.[2] In any case, the sisters ignited a flame of interest in spiritualism and soon had many imitators, some bringing comfort to many who were bereaved but found little solace in orthodoxy, and others—more obviously charlatans—requiring payment in advance and working in darkened parlors.

The Fox sisters were repeatedly investigated. The "Rochester Rappers" gave demonstrations in New York City that won over Horace Greeley's New York Tribune, yet three distinguished doctors at the University of Buffalo reported in February 1851 that the knocks and raps were caused by toe-joint cracking. Other mediums were investigated in Pennsylvania when a prominent university chemist, Dr. Robert Hare, set out in 1853 to discredit them but ended up a convert. He published his results in 1855 but failed to convince his state legislature to fund further research and was howled down at a meeting of the AAAS in 1854. In that year, thirteen thousand citizens asked Congress to institute serious investigations, but the legislators generally laughed before tabling their petition.[3]

To promote such investigations—or to sell newspapers—the Boston Courier in 1857 offered a $500 reward to any medium who could satisfy a panel of Harvard scientists, including Louis Agassiz. Kate Fox, by then nineteen years old, was one of those investigated, but the manifestations were poor, and Agassiz was uncooperative: refusing to sit in the circle, moving about, making desultory remarks, and, when some knocks were heard, saying he would soon explain their cause, which he never did. Instead of a promised written report, the panel issued a verdict more moralistic than scientific: "That any connection with spiritualistic circles, so called, corrupts the morals and degrades the intellect. [The panel members] therefore deem it their solemn duty to warn the community against this contaminating influence, which surely tends to lessen the truth of man and the purity of women."[4]

Most mainstream clergymen, feeling usurped, adopted the same tone of disapproval but, like most politicians and scientists, were simply ignored as the number of believers swelled into the millions. Other mediums quickly rivaled the Fox sisters, of whom the most prominent, Kate, was hardly seen between 1861 and 1866 when she served as the private medium for a recently bereaved New York banker who managed to have many reunions with his late wife during four hundred séances with Kate. He was later instrumental in sending Kate to England where her impact was significant.

Abraham Lincoln could hardly escape the spiritualist phenomenon so long as he read newspapers and reviews.[5] There were frequent reports in his admired Annual of Scientific Discovery, whose editor, David Ames Wells, once signed a statement attesting the mediumship of D. D. Home, a young man who often appeared with Kate Fox both in America and later in England.[6] The senator who introduced the spiritualist petition to an amused Congress in 1854 was Lincoln's old political rival James Shields, who made it clear he thought spiritualism a "delusion." Lincoln's friend Orville Browning went to a spiritualist in Illinois in 1855, finding her talk "intolerable twaddle," and a clairvoyant apparently operated in Springfield in the 1850s.[7] William H. Herndon, whose interest in the metaphysical extended to the paranormal, had purchased for his library several books that related to spiritualism and had been published before Lincoln left for Washington. These included detailed accounts of the Fox sisters; three volumes by "the seer of Poughkeepsie," Andrew Jackson Davis; a British compendium on Occult Sciences; and an influential study by skeptic-turned-believer Robert Dale Owen—the Indiana politician later appointed to the American Freedmen's Inquiry Commission.[8] When Lincoln became president, spiritualists showered him with dozens of books and hundreds of letters.[9] He presided over a war that created hundreds of thousands of grieving relatives, an obvious market for clairvoyants who openly advertised in Washington newspapers. Among colleagues who may have embraced spiritualism were his commissioner of agriculture Isaac Newton, General Daniel Sickles, and Gideon Welles. Mrs. Welles, one of Mary Lincoln's few close friends, may have consulted a clairvoyant after her son died, perhaps influencing Mary to do the same after the death of eleven-year-old Willie in February 1862. Mary's black seamstress, Elizabeth Keckley, who sought out Washington's spiritualists after her only son was killed in the war, could also put Mary into contact with them.[10]

Mary certainly attended numerous séances during and after her Washington years, at least one and perhaps more occurring in the White House itself or in the Soldiers' Home where the Lincolns spent summer evenings. The most frequently cited source for Lincoln's own participation in a séance is unreliable, published by the medium Nettie Colburn (later Maynard) in 1891, after most who might have refuted her had died and a year before her own death.[11]

Lincoln almost certainly met Nettie herself, but the best evidence of this contradicts her account. Lincoln's friend Joshua Speed visited Washington and became acquainted with Nettie and her landlady, Mrs. Cosby, who prevailed on him to write them an introduction to the president. Speed wrote in a sly-dog tone, suggesting that "it will I am sure be some relief from the tedious round of office seekers to see two such agreeable ladies . . . both mediums & believers in spirits and . . . I am quite sure very choice spirits themselves. . . . Mrs Cosby says she is not a medium though I am quite sure she is or should be."[12] Whatever Speed expected Lincoln to read between these lines, they were written several months after Nettie, by her later account, had already performed in front of Lincoln at a séance in Georgetown in December 1862.

Mrs. Lincoln attended a séance at that place and period, according to Orville Browning: "Mrs. Lincoln told me she had been, the night before, with Old Isaac Newton, out to Georgetown, to see a Mrs. Laury, a spiritualist and she had made wonderful revelations to her about her little son Willy who died last winter, and also about things on the earth." The medium revealed that the cabinet "were all enemies of the President" and "would have to be dismissed."[13] Nettie Colburn is not mentioned, and if Mary had said that her husband had come along, Browning would have recorded it.

Whether Lincoln ever attended one of his wife's séances, he apparently took an interest in one of her mediums. Charles Colchester styled himself "Lord Colchester," being, he said, the illegitimate son of an English nobleman. He is mentioned in Nettie's book, but two sources more objective than Nettie's fail to sustain the conclusion that Lincoln was actually present at a Colchester séance.[14]

According to Lincoln's friend journalist Noah Brooks, Colchester came to Mary's notice while she was grieving over Willie. Mary told Brooks about Colchester's manifestations during one or more séances held at the Soldiers' Home, but Brooks declined her invitation to attend an "exhibition" of Colchester's powers at the White House. "Meanwhile," according to Brooks, he attended a Colchester séance at a private home in Washington, taking the opportunity to expose Colchester as a "swindler and a humbug" and threatening him with prison if he did not leave Washington immediately. How Brooks's account relates to two others written by astronomer Simon Newcomb is unclear since neither man specified dates, and only Brooks actually names Colchester.[15] Newcomb worked at Washington's Naval Observatory and was a colleague of the Smithsonian's director, Joseph Henry, about whom Newcomb later wrote a memoir. It was Henry's visceral dislike of spiritualism that had prevented Robert Hare from bringing the topic before the AAAS in 1854. Whenever spiritualists asked permission to use the Smithsonian's lecture room, Henry told them they must first "cause a table in my room, in open day, to rise into the air by a spiritual volition, without physical contact. . . . But in no case was this feat attempted in my presence." Newcomb's first anecdote stated that Henry "frequently" told the story about a spiritualist who "had held several séances with the President himself," while the later account only implied that Lincoln himself attended séances: "President Lincoln, . . . though not a believer in spiritualism, was from time to time deeply impressed by the extraordinary feats of spiritualistic performers, and naturally looked to Professor Henry for his views and advice on the subject. Quite early in his administration one of these men showed his wonderful powers to the President, who asked him to show Professor Henry his feats." Henry agreed to meet the spiritualist at the Smithsonian although Henry "generally avoided all contact with such men." When aural manifestations occurred, supposedly in different parts of the room, Henry declared that he did not know how the sounds were made but was certain they came not from the room but from the spiritualist's person. According to Newcomb's second anecdote, during a later train journey, Henry found himself conversing with an electrical instruments maker who, discovering he was addressing an expert, boasted of making for "spiritual mediums" the apparatus necessary for their "manifestations" and had, in fact, supplied the very man (still unnamed) that Henry had met at the Smithsonian.[16]

One assumes, though Newcomb did not say, that Henry reported this to Lincoln. Whether such information led to Brooks's confrontation with Colchester, both Brooks and Lincoln naturally aimed to protect Mary from charlatans, yet Lincoln probably did not wish to deprive his wife of any consolation she could find after Willie's death. As grief piled on grief, Mary continued to consult spiritualists, and the last photograph of Mary Lincoln was taken in 1872 by an exploitive "spirit photographer" in Boston who falsified a ghostly image of Lincoln resting his hands on her shoulders.[17] Lincoln, while still alive, sought no consolation in spiritualism but found distraction in the tremendous burden of his work. As a young man, Lincoln reportedly said he doubted there was any afterlife, and according to Dr. Phineas D. Gurley, whose church both he and Professor Henry attended in Washington, Lincoln expressed annoyance that people thought him interested in spiritualism: "A simple faith in God is good enough for me, and beyond that I do not concern myself very much."[18]

Lincoln's simple faith, which did not include dead people spiritually telegraphing the living, barely encompassed any communications between man and God. He invoked God's name in speeches and led the nation in a form of national prayer through proclamations—usually based on resolutions passed by earnest members of Congress. Lincoln sometimes requested prayers but also questioned their logic, especially since "the rebel soldiers are praying with a great deal more earnestness, I fear, than our own troops, and expecting God to favor their side," as Lincoln wrote in September 1862 in reply to a memorial from "Chicago Christians of all denominations" calling for the immediate emancipation of the slaves. Lincoln rather pointedly added that he received "opposite opinions and advice" from "religious men, who are equally certain that they represent the Divine will." He told these Chicago Christians—whose advice was no more helpful than that he constantly received from spiritualists—that he hoped "it will not be irreverent for me to say that if it is probable that God would reveal his will to others, on a point so connected with my duty, it might be supposed he would reveal it directly to me." Irreverent or not, Lincoln said, "It is my earnest desire to know the will of Providence in this matter. And if I can learn what it is I will do it!" (original emphasis). Then, Lincoln the empiricist described the only way forward: "I must study the plain physical facts of the case, ascertain what is possible and learn what appears to be wise and right."[19]

Lincoln showed no personal interest in spiritualism even though his own wife brought into the house what had become a national pastime. Spiritualism also became, like cotton and wheat, one of America's exports to Britain. Even the original "Rochester Rappers," the Fox sisters, made their way to London, to be investigated by scientists well known to Darwin. Indeed, spiritualism became a sore point between Darwin and a colleague he greatly admired.

During his twelve years in the tropics collecting specimens until 1862, Alfred Russel Wallace "heard occasionally of the strange phenomena said to be occurring in America and Europe under the general names of 'table-turning' and 'spirit-rapping.'" Having dabbled with mesmerism in his youth and now hearing of these new mysteries "which modern science ignored because it could not explain, I determined to seize the first opportunity on my return home to examine into these matters." Wallace later wrote that it was in July 1865 that he first witnessed "the phenomena of what is called Spiritualism, in the house of a friend—a sceptic, a man of science, and a lawyer, with none but members of his own family present."[20] Wallace began a serious and life-long study.

Darwin's first inkling probably came from Joseph Dalton Hooker in November: "Wallace has turned table turner I am told." Darwin wrote no reply as he was about to see Hooker in London, where he might also quiz Charles Lyell or Thomas Huxley about the rumor. In his next letter to Wallace, Darwin made no allusions and included more than his usual quota of praise for Wallace's latest scientific papers that not only "interested me, as everything that you write does" but also "will make many more converts among naturalists than long-winded books such as I shall write if I have strength." When Wallace next sent a letter five months later, he argued that Darwin should employ Spencer's phrase "survival of the fittest" in place of "natural selection," which implied too much "thought and direction" and was thus too easily misunderstood as "personifying Nature." Impressed by the argument, Darwin agreed to use Spencer's terminology in his next book. "Whether it will be rejected," Darwin joked, "must now depend on the 'survival of the fittest.'"[21]

Just weeks later, Wallace began publishing a series of articles entitled "The Scientific Aspect of the Supernatural" in an obscure journal. He also had a pamphlet printed for private distribution. One recipient, Huxley, responded, "I am neither shocked nor disposed to issue a commission of lunacy against you. It may be all true, for anything that I know to the contrary, but really I cannot get up interest in the subject." Darwin must have had difficulty believing that Wallace, having so recently and rationally warned against "personifying Nature," could be dabbling with spiritualism. The subject did not appear in their letters or, so it seems, in conversations over the next two years.[22]

Then in April 1869, Wallace forced the issue while reviewing new editions of two of Lyell's works. Wallace asserted that natural selection could explain most other developments but not that of human consciousness. The brain of "the lowest savages, such as Australians or the Andaman Islanders," was barely smaller or less complex than "that of the average members of our learned societies," yet the savages' actual "mental requirements" for their way of life "are very little above those of many animals." Natural selection should have provided the savage with a brain only slightly larger than an ape's, so why "was an organ developed far beyond the needs of its possessor?" Wallace concluded that "in the development of the human race, a Higher Intelligence has guided the same laws for nobler ends."[23]

Darwin could not abide such teleological arguments, whether Gray's insistence on "design" or Wallace's reliance on "a Higher Intelligence." He considered both essentially supernatural explanations that obstructed the search for genuine explanations. Forewarned by Wallace before the review appeared, Darwin worried, "I hope you have not murdered too completely your own and my child." After reading the review (and writing "No!" underlined three times in the margin beside the remarks on man), Darwin spluttered, "If you had not told me I should have thought that they had been added by someone else. As you expected, I differ grievously from you, and I am very sorry for it."[24]

Regarding "my 'unscientific' opinions as to Man," Wallace replied, "a few years back I should myself have looked at them as equally wild and uncalled for," but his views had been altered by the evidence he had seen of "forces and influences not yet recognised by science." Wallace listed three other men of science "who have all investigated the subject for years" and reached similar conclusions. He asked that Darwin suspend "judgment for a time till we exhibit some corroborative symptoms of insanity."[25]

It was bad enough that one of these three allies was Robert Chambers, the suspected author of Vestiges, but Darwin was annoyed further when Lyell, after receiving Darwin's lament about Wallace, blithely replied, "I rather hail Wallace's suggestion that there may be a Supreme Will and Power which may not abdicate its function of interference but may guide the forces and laws of Nature."[26]

"Modern spiritualism" had revolted Darwin ever since it crossed the Atlantic in the early 1850s. He once dismissed some hypothesis, saying it "makes me sick—it is like 'magnetism' turning a table."[27] Yet, while most of Darwin's colleagues shared his view, others, like Wallace, were showing interest. Dr. James M. Gully, Darwin's hydrotherapist, joined the Spiritual Athenaeum, a society founded in 1866 by the American medium D. D. Home, who had come to London a decade earlier. Francis Galton, anthropologist, later eugenicist, and Darwin's cousin, was by 1872 attending séances during which investigations of Home and Kate Fox were conducted by the eminent chemist and physicist William Crookes, with whom Wallace worked closely.[28]

Galton sent Darwin descriptions, assurances that Crookes was making a careful study, and even suggestions that his cousin take part in a séance himself: Darwin pleaded ill health.[29] When Lady Derby was "staggered" by an article by Crookes and insisted on an opinion, Darwin admitted being "much perplexed; . . . I cannot disbelieve Mr. Crooke's statement, nor can I believe in his result." Finding "consolation" in possible explanations of "nerve-force," Darwin hoped "that a number of men, such as Professor Stokes, will be induced to witness Mr. Crooke's experiments."[30]

Darwin's cousin and brother-in-law Hensleigh Wedgwood had recently begun attending séances with Wallace and later became vice president of the Society for Psychical Research. Eventually, he and Darwin's brother Erasmus coaxed Darwin to attend his first and last séance in January 1874 at "Ras's" house, next door to Wedgwood's London home. Erasmus, the arch skeptic Darwin had always respected, was either genuinely interested or simply playing host. He knew Charles was more likely to attend if Emma did, and both would be interested in meeting at least two of his guests, G. H. Lewes and George Eliot. Lewes dabbled in science and was a known critic of spiritualism, and the Darwins greatly admired Eliot's novels. Most of the other guests were close relatives, and Erasmus hired a medium and "spirit guide" for the occasion.[31]

Lewes refused to take seriously a medium who insisted on total darkness and, with George Eliot, left early, missing "the grand fun," as Darwin described it later to Hooker: "a medium . . . made the chairs, a flute, a bell, and candlestick, and fiery points jump about in my brother's dining room, in a manner that astounded every one, and took away all their breaths." Lewes and Eliot were not the only ones who missed all this: so did Darwin. He had found the room "so hot and tiring," he told Hooker, "that I went away before all these astounding miracles, or jugglery, took place." After escaping for some rest upstairs, "I came downstairs and saw all the chairs, etc., on the table, which had been lifted over the heads of those sitting round it." Admitting that it "passes my understanding . . . how the man could possibly do what was done," he clung to his own skepticism—despite a momentary lapse: "The Lord have mercy on us all, if we have to believe in such rubbish."[32]

Fortunately for Darwin, his wife, unlike Lincoln's, showed no enthusiasm for spiritualism beyond her orthodox belief in an afterlife. Emma spoke dismissively of her brother Hensleigh's "life among the spirits" but kept an open mind, unlike her husband who "quite made up his mind he won't believe it, he dislikes the thought of it so much." When asked if this was not a flaw in her husband's scientific method, Emma replied, "Yes, but he does not act up to his principles," adding, tongue in cheek, "Oh yes, he is a regular bigot."[33]

A few weeks later, another séance took place with the same medium, this time at Hensleigh's house and with Huxley present. Whatever happened did not undermine Hensleigh's conviction or weaken Huxley's disdain. Huxley sent Darwin a lengthy report more notable for sardonic humor than verifiable results, concluding, "Mr. Williams is a cheat and impostor." Darwin sighed, "Now to my mind an enormous weight of evidence would be requisite to make one believe in anything beyond mere trickery. . . . I am pleased to think that I declared to all my family, the day before yesterday, that the more I thought of all that I had heard happened . . . the more convinced I was it was all imposture."[34]

On this issue, Darwin was content to ignore some colleagues' serious investigations so long as other colleagues supported his view. He had not been so hidebound when studying transmutation, yet the common factor is that in order to overcome prejudice against species change, Darwin had to oppose all explanations not grounded on material or natural causes. He lacked incentive to investigate what he deemed trivial nonmaterialism: no spiritual force planned human racial diversity.

Wallace's supernatural explanation of human development had dismayed but also stimulated Darwin, who was "now writing and thinking much about Man." Wallace was delighted Darwin was "really going to bring out your book on Man." In 1858, Wallace had caused Darwin to start writing On the Origin of Species, mainly to establish his precedence. Now, eleven years later, Wallace's invocation of a "Higher Intelligence" was a kind of last straw for Darwin. Lyell's and Huxley's recent work on man was disappointing, while Vogt's and Wallace's seemed to hand victory to the special creationists of Agassiz's ilk. If Lyell could "hail" Wallace for allowing some "Supreme Will" to interfere with natural selection, then it might still be argued that God created men unequal.[35]

In January 1870, Wallace sent Darwin a volume of his collected essays including a revised version of "The Limits of Natural Selection as Applied to Man." Darwin heaped praise on most of the volume, "But I groan over Man—you write like a metamorphosed (in retrograde direction) naturalist, and you the author of the best paper that ever appeared in the Anthropological Review!"[36] Darwin now realized that the public might never see natural selection applied properly (as "sexual selection") to the issue of human races unless he did it himself.

Both Lincoln and Darwin instinctively turned to scientists (Joseph Henry and Thomas Huxley) to expose fraudulent mediums, even though they knew that other highly rational men—such as Robert Dale Owen and Alfred Russel Wallace—believed one could bring spiritualism under the umbrella of science. Lincoln and Darwin saw spiritualism as religious superstition having nothing to do with science and reason.

Wallace's argument that some "Higher Intelligence" influenced human evolution left Darwin unmoved, but Lincoln seemed to accept that God might play some role in the world, however remote and inscrutable. Lincoln once reportedly said, "Doesn't it strike you as queer that I, who couldn't cut the head off of a chicken, and who was sick at the sight of blood, should be cast into the middle of a great war, with blood flowing all about me . . . Doesn't it seem strange to you that I should be here?" Calling something "strange" and "queer" barely evokes divine influence, and yet at times, Lincoln seemed to accept even that: "It is a momentous thing to be the instrument, under Providence, of the liberation of a race!"[37]

Excellent scholars disagree about whether Lincoln's religious views changed during the Civil War. Lincoln's religious references were meant to rally people to a cause, while contemporaries' testimonies usually had some axe to grind, leaving scholars to take their pick. One source that at least can be said to have above-average value is Joshua Speed, Lincoln's intimate friend and a fellow skeptic from the 1830s. Speed saw Lincoln many times during the Civil War, and his brother was in the cabinet. Regarding Lincoln's possible religious transformation, Speed said in a lecture in the 1880s, "The only evidence I have of any change, was in the summer before he died." Speed entered a room and found Lincoln by a window reading the Bible. Speed said, "I am glad to see you so profitably engaged." "Yes," said Lincoln, "I am profitably engaged." "Well," said Speed, "If you have recovered from your skepticism, I am sorry to say I have not." Lincoln looked him in the face and, placing a hand on Speed's shoulder, said, "You are wrong Speed, take all of this book upon reason that you can, and the balance on faith, and you will live and die a happier and better man." Elsewhere in his lecture, Speed provided context for this "evidence." The same tension between "reason" and "faith" was present when, according to Speed, Lincoln "often said that the most ambitious man might live to see every hope fail; but no Christian could live to see his fail, because fulfillment could only come when life ended." And Speed said frankly that Lincoln "was cautious about expressing himself against public opinion when it did no good" and "very cautious never to give expression to any thought or sentiment that would grate harshly upon a Christian's ear."[38]

The horrendous strain of the war, which engraved itself on Lincoln's face, might indeed have influenced his religious views. Not referring specifically to religion, Lincoln's secretary John Hay wrote in 1890 that "it would be impossible to say when the change began; but he was in mind, body and nerves a very different man at the second inauguration from the one who had taken the oath in 1861."[39] In that brief but powerful Second Inaugural Address, Lincoln attempted, as the long war neared its end, to begin the healing by diminishing any sense of victory or defeat, dispelling self-righteousness and partisan blame, and, unexpectedly, undermining the view so prevalent around him: that God had obviously backed the North.

> Neither party expected for the war, the magnitude, or the duration, which it has already attained. Neither anticipated that the cause of the conflict [i.e., slavery] might cease with, or even before, the conflict itself should cease. Each > looked for an easier triumph, and a result less fundamental and astounding. Both read the same Bible, and pray to the same God; and each invokes His aid against the other. It may seem strange that any men should dare to ask a just God's assistance in wringing their bread from the sweat of other men's faces; but let us judge not that we be not judged.

That last sentence, echoing a line often used during his debates with Stephen A. Douglas, also delivered a moral judgment—just before Lincoln quoted scripture to say we should do no such thing. He continued, "The prayers of both could not be answered; that of neither has been answered fully. The Almighty has His own purposes." Thus, Lincoln again emphasized God's inscrutability—before scrutinizing God's will and offering this interpretation:

> If we shall suppose that American Slavery is one of those offences which, in the providence of God, must needs come, but which, having continued through His appointed time, He now wills to remove, and that He gives to both North and South, this terrible war, as the woe due to those by whom the offence came, shall we discern therein any departure from those divine attributes which the believers in a Living God always ascribe to Him?

The numerous qualifications—"if we shall suppose" that events might accord with the nature of God as "always" described by "believers"—suggest Lincoln had not suddenly joining the latter. After doubting God had responded to either side's prayers, he went on to equate prayers with something he could at least feel: hope. The fact that the war still continued was better ascribed to divine will than presidential incompetence.

> Fondly do we hope—fervently do we pray—that this mighty scourge of war may speedily pass away. Yet, if God wills that it continue, until all the wealth piled by the bond-man's two hundred and fifty years of unrequited toil shall be sunk, and until every drop of blood drawn with the lash, shall be paid by another drawn with the sword, as was said three thousand years ago, so still it must be said "the judgments of the Lord, are true and righteous altogether."

That God might be the source of justice does not remove the difficulty of discerning his will. Lincoln had his own view of what was "right" to do and encouraged his audience to hope this might be the same as God's view.

> With malice toward none; with charity for all; with firmness in the right, as God gives us to see the right, let us strive on to finish the work we are in; to bind up the nation's wounds; to care for him who shall have borne the battle, and for his widow, and his orphan—to do all which may achieve and cherish a just, and a lasting peace, among ourselves, and with all nations.[40]

Lincoln was addressing a shattered nation and trying to give meaning to recent horrific events and purpose to an uncertain future; Darwin was merely corresponding with thoughtful men, many of whom, like Gray, Lyell, and Wallace, still believed that God had some immanent role in nature. Lincoln made no pretense of certainty ("as God gives us to see"), and, conversely, Darwin avoided pure atheism by likewise confessing ignorance and relying, as Lincoln did, on hope. "I feel most deeply that the whole subject is too profound for the human intellect," Darwin told Gray in one of their exchanges about design. "A dog might as well speculate on the mind of Newton. Let each man hope & believe what he can."[41]

Meeting Agassiz

In January 1865, reelected but still drafting his Second Inaugural Address, Lincoln had what was apparently his first and last face-to-face conversation with America's most famous scientist, Louis Agassiz.[1] Noah Brooks, the president's journalist friend, was one of two witnesses to the interview in the White House and the only one to describe it, in three slightly different accounts.[2] When the nation's chief executive met the nation's foremost scientist, Lincoln was in a good mood, with imminent military victory making the burdens of office more bearable. The normally ebullient Agassiz, however, bore the signs of recent depression and physical illness caused, indirectly, by Darwin.

Agassiz maniacally added specimens to his Museum of Comparative Zoology, as if possessing more than any other institution in the world would give his scientific views greater authority. He spoke of soon-to-be-acquired evidence that would prove natural selection false and separate creation true, yet the piles of specimens catalogued by assistants were hardly utilized by their master, and the few works he published contained nothing new.[3] He rejected natural selection but without offering rigorous argument in peer-reviewed journals, while the rehashed content of his popular lectures was rehashed again for Atlantic Monthly.

In July 1864, Atlantic Monthly published Agassiz's recent lecture "The Ice-Period in America," in which he asserted, "The glacier was God's great plough; and when the ice vanished from the face of the land, it left it prepared for the hand of the husbandman." When others pointed to evidence that rich vegetation also preceded the Ice Age, Agassiz declared, "The soil we have now over the temperate zone is a grain-growing soil" intended for man, as part of God's "purpose." The entomologist, B. D. Walsh, asked Darwin, "Do any European authorities uphold him in these views?" Darwin replied, "All the younger good naturalists, whom I know think of Agassiz as you do . . . & no geologist now agrees with Agassiz."[4]

In America, Agassiz's standing remained high with the public, but the scientific community was steadily abandoning him. More and more of his students rebelled, and in August 1864, Agassiz suffered a particular humiliation at the second biennial National Academy of Sciences (NAS) session—the first that Asa Gray attended—when a new member was elected that Agassiz had specifically opposed. Agassiz was furious; the heated debate was later expunged from the minutes; and on the train back from New Haven, Agassiz spoke so offensively to Gray that he formally broke relations. When Agassiz attacked Joseph Henry for supporting Gray, Henry calmly tried to show Agassiz how he was wrong and also urged him "to first take care of your health. . . . It is lamentable . . . how much time, mental activity, and bodily strength have been expended among us . . . in personal altercations, which might have been devoted to the discovery of new truths."[5]

Agassiz remained unwell and irritable through the fall and winter, but when he attended the next NAS session in Washington on 3–7 January 1865, he seemed chastened by the memory of the previous meeting, and all went smoothly. Agassiz stayed on for a meeting of Smithsonian regents on 9 January, when a new chancellor was elected: Salmon P. Chase, who was no longer secretary of the treasury. To Chase's surprise, Lincoln accepted his fourth offer to resign in June 1864 but then secured Chase's appointment as chief justice of the Supreme Court, replacing the deceased Roger B. Taney—who had also preceded Chase as chancellor of the Smithsonian.[6]

While lingering in Washington, Agassiz may have begun planning his next project, a trip to Brazil. In a letter dated 22 March, he wrote that "a few weeks ago"—so, perhaps in January—he was pondering how best to recover "after all the fatigue of the two last years. . . . I felt that I must have new scenes to give me new life." Agassiz's "attention was turned to the natural history" of Brazil, whose emperor, Dom Pedro II, had already shown him "many marks of kindness," such as ordering his subjects to gather rare fish for the great scientist, who, at the outset of his career, had done pioneering work on Brazil's fishes. Agassiz's recent public lectures had theorized that South America should offer evidence of a worldwide glacial destruction of organic life that, as he later told students in a lecture during the voyage to Rio, would demonstrate that the transmutation theory was "wholly without foundation in facts" for such a destruction would sever any evolutionary link and require a special creation of new life forms.[7]

By coincidence, Washington was just then buzzing with news that the U.S. Navy, while capturing a Confederate raider, had violated Brazilian neutrality. "Every one says we must make rightful amende to Brazil," Gray wrote Darwin about this miniature "Trent affair." Agassiz's old friend Senator Charles Sumner later appealed to him, "You are a naturalist; but you are a patriot also; . . . plead for our country, to the end that its rights may be understood," which Agassiz eventually did.[8]

Agassiz had visited Washington many times and perhaps even attended a White House reception but apparently had never before met the president individually. But now, he was brought to the White House by Samuel Hooper, a wealthy Boston businessman, a trustee for Agassiz's museum, and a Republican

Congressman then under consideration for Chase's vacated post. Perhaps, Hooper hoped Agassiz's fame and charm would somehow improve Hooper's chance of joining the cabinet, but Brooks's account implies that it was Lincoln's idea that he should meet Agassiz. With the war going well, the president may have felt he could indulge himself in other interests. In a recent statement to Scientific American, Lincoln promised to support the more practical aspects of science by doing "all in his power to encourage and to promote the progress of these arts by sanctioning all wise legislation in behalf of inventors."[9]

Agassiz's only "inventions," according to detractors, were his theories. What Lincoln knew about Agassiz or his detractors is impossible to gauge. Agassiz's widely known views on the human races had to be distasteful to Lincoln, who may have shared the disdain expressed by William H. Herndon in 1867 (quoted earlier): "We had no need of Agassiz out here to tell us what things meant."[10] Herndon was then referring to geology but certainly felt likewise about supernatural notions of special creation. Any of the three American Freedmen's Inquiry Commission (AFIC) commissioners could have told Lincoln about Agassiz's correspondence with Howe, and since, according to Gray, Henry admired Darwin's work, he may have explained to Lincoln the controversies dividing Darwin and Agassiz. Lincoln could also have learned from Henry about Agassiz's role in the sudden creation of the NAS, and the matter probably came up whenever Admiral John A. Dahlgren explained the reason (otherwise lost to history) why he was the first of the original fifty "incorporators" to resign from the academy back in May 1863.

Whoever instigated this meeting, the fourth person who was present, Noah Brooks, prefaced his earliest account with a revealing context:

> In his eagerness to acquire knowledge of common things [Lincoln] sometimes surprised his distinguished visitors by inquiries about matters that they were supposed to be acquainted with, and those who came to scrutinize went away with a vague sense of having been unconsciously pumped by the man whom they expected to pump. One Sunday evening last winter, while sitting alone with the President, the cards of Professor Agassiz and a friend were sent in.[11]

That preface hints at Lincoln's slyness as an interrogator, but another memory caused Brooks to preface his two later accounts of the interview differently—with an anecdote about Lincoln's reaction to the news just received that Edward Everett had died. Lincoln was somewhat acerbic about the man who had shared the platform at Gettysburg, mentioning his overrated oratorical style and fondness for "props." Of course, the news of Everett's death and the arrival of Agassiz were unconnected, and yet, Agassiz's style of lecturing was one of the conversation's topics that stuck in Brooks's memory.

Also in the later accounts, Brooks named Agassiz's friend and described the moment when the visitors' cards were brought to Lincoln: "'Agassiz!' exclaimed the president with great delight, 'I never met him yet, and Hooper promised to bring him up to-night.' I rose to go, when he said, 'Don't go, don't go. Sit down, and let us see what we can pick up that's new from this great man.'"[12] (Lincoln was perhaps being as ironic as Darwin when he, too, had described Agassiz as a "great man.") In Brooks's earliest account, not only was he told to stay and, as it were, join in but he was also "unconsciously pumped" (to use his own phrase) regarding his opinion of Agassiz:

> The President had never met Agassiz at that time, I believe, and said, "I would like to talk with that man; he is a good man, I do believe; don't you think so?" But one answer could be returned to the query, and soon after the visitors were shown in, the President first whispering, "Now sit still and see what we can pick up that's new."[13]

Whether "Honest Abe" believed Agassiz was entirely "a good man," it is likely he was fishing for Brooks's opinion or predisposing Brooks so he would not be aware of what Lincoln had in mind for this interview. In any case, Brooks seemed amazed by the conversation's blandness, as if he had expected conflict. "To my surprise, however, no questions were asked about the Old Silurian, the Glacial Theory, or the Great Snow-storm." In the later accounts, Brooks replaced that line with this: "The conversation, however, was not very learned. The President and the savant seemed like two boys who wanted to ask questions which appeared commonplace, but were not quite sure of each other. Each man was simplicity itself." Brooks found the mutual wariness puzzling. His earliest account gives a more detailed description of the way the conversation apparently opened:

> [I]ntroductions being over, the President said: "I never knew how to properly pronounce your name; won't you give me a little lesson at that, please?" Then he asked if it were of French or Swiss derivation, to which the Professor replied that it was partly of each. That led to a discussion of different languages, the President speaking of several words in different languages which had the same root as similar words in our own tongue; then he illustrated that by one or two anecdotes, one of which he borrowed from [Thomas] Hood's "Up the Rhine."[14]

While showing an innocent interest in his visitor and offering some humorous entertainment, Lincoln was also demonstrating a powerful memory and surprising interest in foreign languages. He was probably aware, even if Brooks was not, that philological evidence had been used by those wishing to demonstrate a common origin for mankind. Darwin knew the subject well: his cousin Hensleigh Wedgwood had written a book on it. And Agassiz had defended separate creation by attacking "The Reliability of Philological Evidence," the title of his essay for Nott and Gliddon's Indigenous Races of the Earth in 1857. Agassiz's philological views were often attacked in reviews Lincoln might have read.

Brooks recollected that the next subject discussed was lecturing. After quoting some humorous verse, the president "soon returned to his gentle cross-examination of Agassiz, and found out how the Professor studied, how he composed, and how he delivered his lectures; how he found different tastes in his audiences in different portions of the country." Although Brooks recognized this as "cross-examination," Lincoln was so indirect—perhaps to lull Agassiz's suspicions—that he lost Brooks's interest: the journalist dropped the last sentence in his later accounts. Yet, Lincoln possibly wished to hear from Agassiz's lips how his theories—especially those touching on the matter of race—had elicited different reactions in the North and in the South.

This point led to the only other topic that Brooks thought worth recording: Lincoln's allusion to his own brief career as a lecturer. Once again, the earliest account is the fullest.

> In passing, the President said that many years ago, when the custom of lecture-going was more common than since, he was induced to try his hand at composing a literary lecture—something which he thought entirely out of his line. The subject, he said, was not defined, but his purpose was to analyze inventions and discoveries—"to get at the bottom of things"—and to show when, where, how, and why such things were invented or discovered; and, so far as possible, to find where the first mention is made of some of our common things. The Bible, he said, he found to be the richest store-house for such knowledge; and he then gave one or two illustrations, which were new to his hearers.

Again, Lincoln demonstrated his amazing memory as well as his seemingly pious ability to quote the Bible at will, but he also revealed that he had thought deeply on the origins of things: whether mankind's origin slipped into the conversation is not recorded. While Brooks's earliest account concluded with the words, "The lecture was never finished, and was left among his loose papers at Springfield when he came to Washington," his second account added some pleasantry from the professor: "Agassiz begged that Lincoln would finish the lecture, sometime. Lincoln replied that he had the manuscript somewhere in his papers, 'and,' said he, 'when I get out of this place, I'll finish it up, perhaps, and get my friend B— to print it somewhere.'" For Brooks, more interested in Lincoln than in Agassiz, this reference to Lincoln's single lecture was fascinating news, but, again, Lincoln may have offered this tidbit mainly to encourage Agassiz to say more about his own lecturing or the concept of origins.[15]

Brooks gave two different versions of the interview's end. The first was written only weeks after Lincoln's death: "When afterward asked why he put such questions to his learned visitor he said, 'Why, what we got from him isn't printed in the books; the other things are.'" This was amplified in the 1878 version:

> When these two visitors had departed, Agassiz and Lincoln shaking hands with great warmth, the latter turned to me with a quizzical smile and said, "Well, I wasn't so badly scared, after all! were you?" He had evidently expected > to be very much oppressed by the great man's learning. He admitted that he had cross-examined him on "things not in the books."

Even after revising it, Brooks did not consider this point—that Lincoln was not overly impressed by Agassiz's learning—worth keeping in any form in the last account written in 1895. To give Brooks his due, he did seem conscious of his own bewilderment but did not appreciate how fully Lincoln was familiar with writings by or about Agassiz, or why Lincoln wished to learn more than those works could tell, or why Agassiz may have been wary of being completely frank with the author of the Emancipation Proclamation. It was Lincoln at his most charming and disarming, no doubt raising many insignificant points to disguise the odd one of consequence. The two protagonists were no doubt more aware of what was happening during this conversation than the friendly journalist.[16]

Brooks did not mention Brazil, and perhaps Agassiz had not yet begun serious planning. However, within a few weeks, Agassiz made up his mind, and the semi-holiday turned into the major expedition Agassiz had always longed to conduct, especially after a philanthropist donated funds and a steamship company put a vessel at Agassiz's disposal. Secretary Gideon Welles provided a letter instructing naval officers to offer every assistance, and Secretary William H. Seward sent a similar message to the American consul in Rio de Janeiro.[17]

Agassiz's expedition left New York on 1 April 1865 and returned in August 1866, just in time for Agassiz to attend another NAS meeting and read a paper on "Traces of Glaciers under the Tropics." This and a new series of lectures promoted Agassiz's supposed discovery of evidence of a glaciation so severe that animals and plants that lived before could have no genetic link to those that came after: evidence that the transmutationists were mistaken.[18] Agassiz dismissed the fact that other researchers had already spent years in the Amazon without seeing any sign of former glaciation. A young geologist who accompanied the expedition, Charles F. Hartt, was troubled by Agassiz's interpretations but waited several years before admitting that the geological finds had never indicated glaciation.[19]

While Agassiz was still planning his journey to slave-ridden Brazil, Lincoln was busy trying to extirpate slavery forever in the United States. Knowing that the Emancipation Proclamation was only partial and, as a wartime measure, might easily be challenged in the courts after the war, Lincoln supported the congressional effort to abolish slavery constitutionally through the Thirteenth Amendment. When Congress approved the amendment on 31 January 1865, Lincoln insisted on signing the document, which required no signature.[20] The subsequent process of state ratification was complicated by controversies over whether states in rebellion could or should be part of the process and, if so, whether ratification would become a condition for their readmission to the Union or whether a speedy "reconstruction" of the Union would make it easier to achieve that ratification. Lincoln did not wish to coerce states, but he did try vaguely to link reconstruction and ratification in the hope they might accelerate each other—in order to end the war more quickly and destroy anyone's hope to preserve slavery. In a month's time, eighteen of the twenty-seven states needed for final ratification (if Southern states were counted) had approved. However, in March, only Vermont added itself to the list. It appeared that the remaining eight ratifications might not occur until the war itself was over.

On their second day out of New York, steaming toward Brazil, members of Agassiz's expedition were glancing westward and saw "a cloud of smoke, in the direction of Petersburg."[21] It was Ulysses S. Grant's final assault on Richmond, Virginia: a week later, Robert E. Lee surrendered at Appomattox. As soon as Darwin read the news, he dashed off a letter to Gray: "I have not written for a long time . . . [and] I have nothing particular to say now, but the grand news of Richmond has stirred me up to write. I congratulate you, & I can do this honestly, as my reason has always urged & ordered me to be a hearty good wisher for the north, though I could not do so enthusiastically, as I felt we were so hated by you." He was glad he and others "who thought that you could not entirely subdue the South" had been proved wrong. Although Darwin had "always thought that the destruction of Slavery would be well worth a dozen years war," he also feared that "it will take many years before your country will shake down to its old routine."[22]

President Lincoln was endeavoring to hasten the time when the country could "shake down to its old routine." The war's end raised new opportunities as well as previously submerged problems. Losing the commander-in-chief's war powers would narrow Lincoln's options, and Congress was keen to assert authority over the process of "reconstruction."

Lincoln favored the most rapid reconstruction possible, on the basis of a plan he announced in December 1863. If the rebel states ended resistance, formed new governments that accepted emancipation, and elected new representatives to Congress, then other issues (punishment of Confederate officials, repudiation of Confederate debts, suffrage for blacks, and whether former rebel states should take part in ratifying the Thirteenth Amendment) could be sorted out later, through collaboration among Lincoln, Congress, and the restored state governments. However, many leading Republicans felt the new "reconstructed" governments must first grant at least some of the emancipated blacks the protection afforded by the right to vote before those states could be included in the ratification process or allowed back into the Union.At the time of Lee's surrender, it appeared that those wishing to exclude the rebel states from the ratification process would fail, but those insisting on black suffrage before any particular state was reconstructed were prevailing. A crucial moment had occurred in March, shortly before Lee's surrender, when Congress debated whether to accept Louisiana's new state constitution and to seat her newly elected representatives in Congress.

Louisiana had followed Lincoln's reconstruction plan and had even ratified the Thirteenth Amendment but had not granted voting rights to its black citizens, even though an exceptional proportion of them had been born free, owned property, and served in the Union armies. Lincoln had long urged that some Louisianan blacks, "the very intelligent and those who have fought valiantly in our ranks," ought to be considered for the suffrage, but he was not discouraged or greatly surprised by Louisiana's reluctance: most Northern states had never granted blacks the vote and remained unwilling to do so. However, many influential Republicans in Congress, eager to promote blacks' rights and Congress's control of Reconstruction, made a stand regarding Louisiana's failure. Key senators managed to "talk out" the time allotted for debating a bill for Louisiana's readmission to the Union so that it would have to be reintroduced later, and Congress meanwhile prevented Louisiana's elected representatives from taking their seats in Congress. This naturally cast doubt on the validity of Louisiana's ratification of the Thirteenth Amendment (and likewise on ratifications by Virginia and Arkansas). The whole matter would have to wait until the next session in December 1865. Thus, as of March, the various rebel states could not know for another seven months whether Congress would admit their representatives into the national legislature even if the citizens of those states ceased fighting, took the necessary oaths, and went so far as to approve the Thirteenth Amendment.

Lincoln could not know either, but during those seven months, he could try to move matters forward. In a speech on 11 April, only two days after Lee's surrender, Lincoln forcefully argued why it would be better to accept Louisiana into the Union without first compelling the state to approve black suffrage, and in his conclusion, he said, "What has been said of Louisiana will apply generally to other States."[23] Lincoln hoped to advance his plan for a swift reconstruction, prevent the emergence of guerilla warfare, clear the path for the Thirteenth Amendment, and provide both whites and blacks with ways to work out their problematic relations within the same country. To improve the situation, Lincoln had recently renewed his proposals regarding compensation, and there is even evidence—albeit controversial—that Lincoln also sought to revive interest in colonization.

Proposals for compensation to slave owners had previously faced opposition from both Northerners and Southerners, but Lincoln may have believed the war's end would change that. Allegedly, Lincoln made an offer of compensation for slave owners when he met with Confederate leaders (received only as private individuals) during the Hampton Roads conference in February, but when Lincoln then brought the subject before his cabinet, the idea of broad compensation was promptly rejected. Lincoln dropped the matter but might have brought it up again at a later date.

That Lincoln had "sloughed off" the policy of colonization eight months earlier was something expressed by his secretary John Hay, not by Lincoln himself. Back then, Lincoln had good reasons to ignore a potentially divisive issue during the run-up to his reelection. The earlier colonizing efforts—the Chiriqui project and the Ile à Vache experiment—had, by February 1864, come to naught for reasons that did not necessarily invalidate Lincoln's original purposes. Opponents of colonization felt that the Emancipation Proclamation and blacks' service in the military made colonization even more pointless. When Congress repealed the funds for colonization in July 1864, Hay saw that his boss raised no objection.

Lee's surrender changed the situation. The excellent service rendered by 180,000 black soldiers was about to end, but it was clear that white attitudes toward blacks were still extremely negative. The evidence was in the July 1863 Draft Riots in New York City, which resulted in the savage killing of an unknown number of blacks, in the vicious "miscegenation" campaign during the 1864 election, in the failure of numerous states—south and north—to approve black suffrage, and in the stalled effort to ratify the Thirteenth Amendment. If radical Republicans continued to obstruct reconstruction unless the former rebel states granted black suffrage and if those states refused to be blackmailed into doing so after already being defeated in war, then hope of swiftly restoring good relations between the states—and improving those between the races—was indeed faint.

Lincoln's reelection and the end of the war made it possible—and in some ways more pressing—to revive the plans for colonization. The huge blockade fleet could now provide the massive shipping that might be required. With or without the Thirteenth Amendment, emancipation was becoming a practical fact, shifting attention to the underlying problem of how the two races—and especially the defeated former masters and the energized former slaves—were to live together. Lincoln probably felt they would make a better job of it with the "safety valve" of colonization in place, so that blacks who found the continuing prejudice too oppressive could have a means to escape, while those who wished to stay could do so, knowing it was a choice they had made and that some whites might come to respect.

After the Chiriqui project was derailed (largely by opposition from Latin American countries) and even as the Ile à Vache venture was failing through speculators' corruption, Lincoln tried another approach. In June 1863, he discussed with a British official a project to facilitate black colonization to British Honduras, and the planning certainly remained active into 1864 and was perhaps halted only when Congress terminated funds in July. Lincoln asked his attorney general's opinion whether, despite Congress's action, the executive still had authority to pay the Reverend James Mitchell as colonization agent.[24]

The only other direct (but controversial) evidence that Lincoln persisted in contemplating colonization is the testimony of General Benjamin F. Butler, who many years later published two accounts of an interview he had with Lincoln in April 1865.[25] Inconsistencies and contradictions within Butler's two accounts have made historians wary, yet if one accepts that the accounts are not deliberate falsifications and that some interview of this type occurred, then Butler provides possible insights into Lincoln's thinking.

Returned from a visit to captured Richmond and under the spell of victory, Lincoln planned for a postwar future. He worried that rebel troops might carry on guerrilla warfare and also that over a hundred thousand blacks, many only recently freed, now possessed arms and had proved that they knew how to use them: if bitter, defeated, Southern whites tried to enforce their will, these freedmen might demonstrate further that their race was far from "indolent."[26]

Butler's accounts suggest both men saw some value in colonization, although Butler suggested Lincoln had impractical notions that Butler investigated at Lincoln's request, returning with "statistics and calculations" proving it was utterly impossible "to export all of the negroes" because "negro children will be born faster than your whole naval and merchant vessels . . . can carry them from the country."[27] It seems unlikely that Lincoln ever expected to colonize "all of the negroes," knowing well that many had no desire to leave. Perhaps, he gave Butler an improbable plan to mull over so the general could better it with some plan of his own, which was certainly Butler's response. The general's plan concentrated on one group of blacks: soldiers still under Lincoln's command while their enlistments lasted and capable of looking after themselves in a harsh foreign environment. They could even be given something useful to do: dig a canal through the Isthmus of Panama—an idea Lincoln had actually hinted at when he mentioned to the delegation of blacks in 1862 that the location he had in mind "is to be a great highway from the Atlantic or Caribbean Sea to the Pacific Ocean."[28]

Butler's credentials as an abolitionist and a friend to blacks—many of whom he had commanded during the war—made him a good choice politically to fend off opposition to any particular scheme, and the only plan that Butler was not likely to criticize was one he originated himself (or thought he had). Regarding Butler's hastily produced plan, Lincoln made no firmer commitment than to utter a homely phrase: "There is meat in that, General Butler, there is meat in that." He also told Butler to work on the matter further.[29]

For Lincoln, colonization still made some sense. That long history of racial oppression was unlikely to change into one of racial harmony anytime soon. Likewise, it was difficult to imagine how Congress could ever force any states to grant blacks suffrage except through some compulsion that would leave deep scars, especially in those recently vanquished. How blacks could be protected without that right to vote was impossible to foresee. Lincoln probably did not believe that blacks were likely soon to "become extinct" as a race or to drift naturally toward the more tropical states, and although he had spoken up for the humanity of blacks and more recently for their possible political rights, he knew that most of his fellow citizens did not share his views. Considering the history of race relations in America in the century that followed, we cannot say that Lincoln's pessimism about the situation was unfounded. The option of a partial colonization, although repulsive to many at the time and to most people today, may have seemed a less harmful course of action than many others then being advocated and later resulting in yet another century of intense suffering for African Americans.

On reading of the Confederacy's surrender, Darwin had written his hearty congratulations to Asa Gray on 19 April 1865, not knowing that Abraham Lincoln had been assassinated five days earlier. The tragic news did not reach London until 26 April. The following day, the London Times carried details of the murder, of Britain's shocked reactions, and of the House of Commons' address of sympathy to the American ambassador. Gray, probably in some shock himself, for he had come to adore Lincoln, possibly waited before replying to Darwin's letter until he had received information about the general reaction in Britain.

> I am too much distracted with work at this season to write letters on our affairs, and if I once begin, I should not know where to stop. You have always been sympathising and just, and I appreciate your hearty congratulations on the success of our just endeavors. You have since had much more to rejoice over, as well as to sorrow with us. But the noble manner in which our country has borne itself should give you real satisfaction. We appreciate too the good feeling of England in its hearty grief at the murder of Lincoln.[30]

Darwin apparently did not write again until early July, and that letter has not survived. His health had gone into another slump just about the time that Lincoln was killed. Less than a week after learning of Lincoln's death, Darwin received another shock: news that his old commander on the Beagle, Robert FitzRoy, who had subsequently denounced Darwin's scientific work as heretical, had slit his own throat. Darwin was "astounded . . . but I ought not to have been," he told Hooker, "for I remember once thinking it likely; poor fellow his mind was quite out of balance once during our voyage. . . . Twice he quarrelled bitterly with me, without any just provocation on my part."[31]

Darwin remembered, though three decades had passed, that the worst of those quarrels had concerned Darwin's antislavery views and had flared up shortly after the Beagle carried Darwin to the first slave territory he ever visited, Brazil. Darwin may have recently read in the Times some notice picked up from the American press announcing that Brazil was just now enjoying a visit by America's most famous scientist. Searching the interior jungles for nonexisting evidence of glacier action, Louis Agassiz was probably one of the last people from the civilized world to learn of the death of the man who had interrogated him so strangely four months earlier.[32]

The Descent of Man

While Lincoln had few health concerns and should have worried more about other threats to his life, Darwin's ill health caused him, when still in his thirties, to make provisions for an early demise. Yet Darwin died peacefully in his bed seventeen years after Lincoln's violent end at the age of fifty-six. It was six years after Lincoln's death that Darwin finally published the results of his thirty years' investigation into man's origins.

Before his death, Lincoln had given clear indications—albeit in a radically changing environment—of how he would tackle the complex problems of reconstructing the Union politically and working out the new status of freed African Americans, but he died before he could bring his plans to fruition. Lincoln certainly faced massive congressional opposition to his ideas, but he could hardly have botched reconstruction and future race relations as badly as those who took over those difficult challenges.

Lincoln's death probably damaged the effort to improve relations between whites and blacks, and inadvertently and to a lesser degree Darwin's work did the same—not because The Descent of Man altered the likely course of racial policies in post–Civil War America but because some of the vocabulary used in arguments about those policies came from On the Origin of Species, albeit in a mangled form. Many people extrapolated from The Origin what they thought were Darwin's views about the human races and never discovered their error by reading The Descent carefully. Throughout the seventeen years separating Lincoln's and Darwin's deaths, the United States developed Reconstruction policies that veered from the former's obvious intentions and ignored the latter's scientific evidence, with results harmful to that cause of mankind's unity and equality that both men had promoted. They would have been appalled that such harm could ever be part of their legacy.

"You see, slavery is dead, dead,—an absolute unanimity as to this," Asa Gray wrote to Darwin three months after the Civil War ended. "The Revolted States will behave as badly as they can, but they are so thoroughly whipped that they can't stir, hand or foot." Darwin responded, "We continue to be deeply interested on American affairs; indeed I care for nothing else in the Times. . . . How well I remember thinking that Slavery would flourish for centuries in your Southern States!"[1]

However much relief was expressed about slavery's end, it actually sharpened the debate about racial differences. In a short article in May 1865, Thomas Huxley summarized the new situation offhandedly—and insensitively to modern tastes. Employing a slang term for a black slave, Huxley asserted, "Quashie's plaintive inquiry, 'Am I not a man and a brother?' seems at last to have received its final reply." Yet, Huxley argued that the reply—emancipation—still left unanswered the question of racial equality. "It may be quite true that some negroes are better than some white men; but no rational man, cognisant of the facts, believes that the average negro is the equal, still less the superior, of the average white man." Now that the "disability" of slavery was removed and blacks could compete freely, Huxley considered it "incredible" to think "our dusky cousins" would be able "to compete successfully with [their] "bigger-brained" white rivals for "the highest places in the hierarchy of civilisation." While Huxley believed abolition helped both blacks and whites, the "doctrine of equal natural rights may be an illogical delusion; emancipation may convert the slave from a well-fed animal into a pauperised man."[2]

Although Huxley did not seriously think emancipation changed an animal into a man, he did still consider that black man to be a "dusky cousin" rather than a "brother." Huxley was much more willing than Darwin to assume that natural selection led to variations among human races that were not just superficial differences but also, in some vague sense, amounted to serious inequalities in ability. Yet, in a lecture he gave two weeks later, the only specific difference between blacks and whites that Huxley noted was blacks' greater immunity to yellow fever: "the differences between men are . . . so small" that mankind must have arisen from one primitive "stock," the term Huxley used here in preference to species, noting the limits of existing evidence and the fluidity of species under natural selection. However, these "stocks" were also variants that might eventually become separate species. Like Gray and Alfred Russel Wallace before him, Huxley argued that natural selection reconciled and combined "all that is good in the Monogenistic and Polygenistic schools." He rejected the view that hybrids between present-day races were infertile, while accepting that logically that barrier could arise in the future.[3]

Gray, Wallace, and now Huxley had all recognized that the terms of the monogenist-polygenist debate had been made obsolete by natural selection: there was not one creation of mankind or many separate creations of difference races but an ongoing process of change.[4] But for Darwin, the issue was not just about terminology but about purpose. It is somewhat ironic that Darwin, who could see no designing role for a creator in natural selection, probably was unable to recognize his own purposeful role in creating the theory of natural selection. However much he merely allowed the evidence to lead him toward the truth, the fact is that it led him where he had always wished to go. Darwin's purpose was still the same as that of the monogenists of his youth: to argue in favor of the unity of man but a unity derived not from God's action in the Garden of Eden but from competition for resources. In that competition, one primate, man, developed a modification toward greater intelligence, which allowed him to outlast less intelligent competitors.

Although Huxley had invoked "Darwinism" in those two 1865 articles, his views did not always represent Darwin's. Frequently corresponding with Huxley at this time, Darwin habitually commented on Huxley's publications, yet found nothing to praise in the first of these two articles, and told Huxley in a postscript that he had read the second "with much interest," adding circumspectly that he could "quite agree on all the points on which I could judge."[5]

The essential problem is that while Gray, Wallace, and now Huxley all suggested that natural selection ended the struggle between monogenism and polygenism, no victor was declared. Polygenists in Britain and America saw no reason to abandon all of their positions. In 1866—five years before Darwin published The Descent of Man—the pioneer of American polygenism, Dr. Josiah Nott, declared, "Lamarck, Geoffroy Saint-Hilaire, Darwin and other naturalists, have contended for the gradual change or development of organic forms from physical causes, yet even this school requires millions of years for their theory, and would not controvert the facts and deductions I have laid down." Nott lacked Huxley's satisfaction at slavery's demise but agreed it meant the black and white races might "be left alone face to face" and "soon learn to understand each other, and come to proper terms under the law of necessity." Nott argued against federal interference in those relations, asserting that the two races each had their own "moral and physical laws" and that "all the power of the Freedmen's Bureau or 'gates of hell' cannot prevail against them" because "forms that have been permanent for several thousand years, must remain so at least during the lifetime of a nation." Three years earlier, the American Freedmen's Inquiry Commission, like Huxley and Nott, had decided that once the manmade disabilities were removed, the Negro "will somewhere find, and will maintain, his own appropriate social position."[6]

Although slavery was dead in the United States, Darwin could still become aroused by racial injustice, such as a summary execution approved by the British governor of Jamaica, Edward Eyre, during agitations late in 1865. Huxley, declaring that "English law does not permit good persons, as such, to strangle bad persons, as such," joined the Jamaica Committee created by John Stuart Mill to bring Eyre to justice. Darwin donated £10 to the committee's fighting fund—just as he formerly contributed to abolition societies and cotton famine relief.[7]

Darwin did not need the incident of Governor Eyre to remind him that racism remained a poisonous issue, and he still intended to publish his evidence showing how natural selection applied to the origin of man and human races. However, further experiments, collection of data, revisions of earlier editions of the Origins, and especially ill health, caused continual delays. The fact that close colleagues fell short of properly explaining human origins was somewhat irrelevant: Darwin probably always knew he would have to explain the subtle application of sexual selection himself. Of course, The Origin did "say a few words" about sexual selection: it "depends, not on a struggle for existence, but on a struggle between the males for possession of the females; the result is not death to the unsuccessful competitor, but few or no offspring" and "that some little light can apparently be thrown on the origin of these [human racial] differences chiefly through sexual selection of a particular kind."[8]

A further, if relatively minor, goad for Darwin to press ahead with his explanation of racial differences was provided by the odious James Hunt. In August 1866, the Times reported on a paper delivered by Hunt to the British Association meeting in Nottingham that later appeared in Hunt's Anthropological Review. "At present," wrote the defender of Agassiz and more recently of Governor Eyre, " . . . we are quite unable to show the causes which produce the formation of the different races of which the different species of man is composed." Fighting a rearguard action against the surge in favor of the unity of man engendered by Darwinian thinking, Hunt expressed a "wish that, in consideration of the conflicting views held on this subject, Mr. Darwin himself may be induced to come forward, and tell us if the application of this theory leads to unity of origin as contended for by Professor Huxley."[9]

In early 1867, Darwin apologized to his publisher for the delays and the enormous size of the manuscript for what became The Variation of Animals and Plants under Domestication, adding that he was writing a concluding chapter on man but was unsure whether to include it. In the end, he decided against, so man did not appear in the two-volume work published in January 1868. However, Darwin mentioned in a footnote on the second page that Georges Pouchet in The Plurality of the Human Race (published by Hunt's Anthropological Society in 1864) had "insisted that variation under domestication throws no light on the natural modification of species" and had thus declared impossible what Darwin himself had not yet discussed with regard to man. "I cannot perceive the force of his arguments," Darwin commented, "or, to speak more accurately, of his assertions to this effect."[10]

While correcting the proof sheets of Variation of Animals and Plants, Darwin actively pursued another line of inquiry—first conceived nearly thirty years earlier—to argue in favor of the unity of human races. This new effort to support natural selection partly involved obtaining evidence from the same place where Agassiz had just spent over a year seeking evidence against natural selection, Brazil. As usual, Asa Gray kept Darwin informed of some of Agassiz's wilder claims, and Darwin agreed with Lyell "in thinking Agassiz glacier-mad."[11] But Darwin had a different issue in mind as he asked his own Brazilian contact, the brilliant naturalist Fritz Müller, to "make a few observations for me, in the course of some months, on Negroes, or possibly on native South Americans, though I care most about Negroes." He enclosed some specific questions, adding, "I am thinking of writing a little essay on the Origin of Mankind, as I have been taunted with concealing my opinions."[12] Darwin's hypothesis was that most expressions of emotion in humans were similar to those found in the higher primates and also common among all human races. Although Darwin did not publish The Expression of the Emotions in Man and Animals until 1872, he long believed that this line of research might provide better evidence for the common origin of man than much-disputed fossil skulls or philological ancestry.[13] In 1867, Darwin sent lists of questions about expressions to far-flung contacts in India, China, Borneo, Australia, Africa, South America, and, of course, the United States.

While Agassiz's colleague Benjamin Apthorp Gould was still collating the statistics on the physical measurements of white and black soldiers in America, Darwin was careful to exclude from his study "information in regard to the [former] negro slaves in America" that "would have been comparatively easy to have obtained" but "would have possessed little value" because "they have long associated with white men."[14]

Darwin was laboring over his "little essay on the Origin of Mankind" in 1868 when Agassiz published a book—written mostly by his wife, Elizabeth Cary Agassiz—about their travels in Brazil. Gray referred Darwin to a review that "laughs at [Agassiz] for his iterative refutations of Darwinism," but Darwin was not laughing when he told Hooker that anyone could observe "in Prof. & Mrs. Agassiz's Book on Brazil how excessively anxious he is to destroy me."[15]

However little Darwin found to admire in Agassiz's book, it was more than he would have found had he read another book published that year by an admirer of Agassiz. Dr. John Van Evrie's publishing house reissued for the third time his polygenist diatribe—now retitled White Supremacy and Negro Subordination. Van Evrie was tapping into a reaction by white Americans against the Radical Republicans' latest step: the Fourteenth Amendment, granting blacks civil rights in all states. This angered even Northerners in ways abolition had not, and the Democrats now assailed Republicans for failing to recognize the blacks' inherent inferiority. Without the "protection" of slavery, Van Evrie wrote, the freedmen's moral and physical deficiencies made it "absolutely certain that, as a class, they will become extinct . . . [in a century] no such social monstrosity as a 'free negro' will be found in America."[16] "Amalgamation," or more recently "miscegenation," remained as central to debates about racial policies as "hybridism" was to controversies over species change, and Darwin had just devoted a long section to it in Variation of Animals and Plants.[17] But in the following year, evidence was published supposedly proving that human “hybrids” were in fact so physically weakened (even if not made sterile) by their cross-breeding that perhaps they might become extinct at some future date. And the publisher was not the hate-mongering Van Evrie but the U.S. Sanitary Commission.

In 1869, the commission finally published Gould’s 613-page Investigations in the Military and Anthropological Statistics of American Soldiers. Appointed in June 1864 to complete the task initiated by Frederick Law Olmsted, Gould had been deeply influenced by his Harvard colleague Louis Agassiz, whose well-known views on the “natural divisions of mankind” had already been pressed on the American Freedmen’s Inquiry Commission.[18] Gould believed this was a unique opportunity to determine statistically “the [average or standard] type of humanity as well as the types of the several classes and races of man”—which made him eager to add as many blacks to the study as possible before they dispersed at the end of the war.[19] Haste added to the difficulty of conducting a study under wartime conditions while using new equipment and new techniques of measurement for which the inspectors had received only written instructions. Agassiz’s ethnological interests probably influenced Gould’s instruction to his inspectors to “state the race, unless Caucasian, (as African, Malay, etc.); or if of mixed races, and what [races]”—as if they would find any “Malays” in the Union army! The inspectors were also to estimate the soldiers’ “proportion of black blood, such as Full Black, Mulatto, Quadroon, Octroon,” and somehow assess their levels of intelligence as compared with “the ordinary white private soldier.” Gould regretted that eventually it proved impractical to distinguish between the “three or more distinct races of negroes . . . found in the Southern States”—distinctions about which most Northern whites knew nothing. Perhaps it was that arch taxonomist Agassiz who had asked Gould to collect data on blacks so detailed as to distinguish them not only by the eighth part of their blood but also by their origins in different regions of Africa. Nevertheless, Gould still assisted the debate about hybridization by tabulating the data in three categories, “whites,” “full blacks,” and “mixed race” (otherwise ignoring proportions).[20]

Gould had limited access to army records giving rank, nationality, and place and date of birth for over a million soldiers, and he had complete access to Olmsted’s eight thousand records offering physical measurements that were more complex. He now added to the questionnaire six new measurements more likely than hair type and skin color to indicate structural differences between the races and managed to apply the full range of measurements to another 10,876 white soldiers, 1,146 white sailors, 2,020 “full blacks,” and 863 “mixed race” (as well as 517 Indians, 291 “students,” 3 dwarves, and 2 “Australian children”).[21]

Gould clearly hoped to substantiate the polygenists’ view that blacks are inferior to whites and that mixed race “hybrids” were not intermediate but inferior to both. “The curious and important fact that the mulattoes, or men of mixed race, occupy so frequently in the scale of progression a place outside, rather than intermediate between, those races from the combination of which they have sprung, cannot fail to attract attention. The well-known phenomenon of their inferior vitality may stand, possibly, in some connection with the fact thus brought to light." In practice, whenever the statistics did not support this "well-known phenomenon," Gould either stated them without analysis, fudged them, or simply dumped them as flawed by some bias in the examiners.[22]

Although differences in black and white lung capacities were minute, Gould said they could not "fail to attract attention at first glance" but offered no explanation, minimized any "effect of climate and soil upon the blacks," and did not even consider that a background in slavery might play some role. Only one of the six new measurements showed significant differences between the races, the measure of the distance between fingertip and kneecap, employed "to expose, if possible, any ethnological difference or peculiarities in the relative proportions of arms, legs, and body, which might, in their combined influence, be more conspicuous than when severally considered; and the results seem to show its aptitude for this purpose." Gould stressed that this measurement "is, as would be anticipated by ethnologists, one which manifests the most striking contrast with the white race" and interpreted it as showing that the black was closer to "the anthropoid" in development. Because the "mixed races" measurement was intermediate and therefore did not support the notion of mulatto inferiority, Gould simply obfuscated: "for the mixed races the results . . . are variant and contradictory."[23]

Gould's high standing in the scientific community and the delayed publication of an even larger (and more unwieldy) report by the Provost Marshal-General's Bureau meant that Gould's findings became entrenched, influencing more than a generation of anthropologists, especially in the United States.[24] Gould's results would have become reference points whether or not Darwin gave them a wider publicity in his Descent of Man, which would be read by far more people than would ever see Gould's work.[25] Naturally, Darwin could not ignore this important study, but in fact he was extremely cautious about employing Gould's results.

Darwin's "Man book" was finally published in February 1871 as a two-volume work entitled The Descent of Man and Selection in Relation to Sex. The second part, on sexual selection, actually dealt mostly with animals and was larger than the first part that applied natural selection to man. Darwin chose to publish even though his important research on the expression of emotions was incomplete and therefore relegated to a later volume. The Descent of Man required a full discussion of sexual selection because, as he had told Wallace in 1864, it was "the most powerful means of changing the races of man."[26] Darwin now boldly stated, "We have thus far been baffled in all our attempts to account for the differences between the races of man; but there remains one important agency, namely Sexual Selection, which appears to have acted as powerfully on man, as on many other animals."[27]

Darwin narrowed the assumed gulf between men and animals, showing that "there is no fundamental difference between man and the higher mammals in their mental facilities."[28] After discussing more primitive links between men and animals—rudimentary forms and homologous structures—Darwin sought animal origins for abilities generally considered practically unique to man: memory, imagination, tools, language, sense of beauty, and even spirituality. The final chapter in the first part of Descent was "On the Races of Man."

Throughout the entire first edition, Darwin mentioned Gould's Investigations seven times (and only twice in the chapter on races). On three occasions, Darwin used Gould's data comparing leg length and arm length of soldiers and sailors to support his own view that the human species is "subject to much variability"—which had nothing to do with race but "proved that local influences of some kind act directly on stature." Darwin noted that Gould "endeavoured" to explain these variations in stature but reached only "negative results, namely, that they did not relate to climate, the elevation of the land, soil, nor even 'in any controlling degree' to the abundance or need of the comforts of life." Darwin thereupon cited four scholars whose studies did show that stature was controlled by the abundance or lack of those "comforts." Darwin's next four references did relate to race. Early in his chapter on race, Darwin asserted, "Even the most distinct races of man are much more like each other in form than would at first be supposed," but then conceded, "There is, however, no doubt that the various races, when carefully compared and measured, differ much from each other,—as in the texture of the hair, the relative proportions of all parts of the body, the capacity of the lungs, the form and capacity of the skull, and even in the convolutions of the brain."[29] Regarding "proportions" and "lungs," Darwin cited Gould's "vast number of measurements of Whites, Blacks, and Indians and particularly his chapter 'On the capacity of the lungs.'"

Darwin then raised the important topics of hybrids and the traditional definition of species while addressing Gould's polygenism. "The inferior vitality of mulattoes is spoken of in a trustworthy work [Gould] as a well-known phenomenon; but this is a different consideration from their lessened fertility; and can hardly be advanced as a proof of the specific distinctness of the parent races." Just before this reference, Darwin had already demolished the view that mulattoes were infertile, and right after it Darwin attacked the issue from the other end, pointing out that mules were true hybrids and sterile, yet were "notorious for long life and vigour."[30] Taken out of context, Darwin seemed to accept the "trustworthy" report that people of mixed race were "well-known" to have "inferiority vitality"; read in context, he did no such thing.

The final two references to Gould are in the second part of Darwin's work, on sexual selection, both relating to the variable of hairiness. After citing two

European sources supporting the view that "with negroes the beard is scanty or absent, and they have no whiskers; in both sexes the body is almost destitute of fine down," Darwin cited with surprise Gould's finding that "the pure negroes and their crossed offspring seem to have bodies almost as hairy as Europeans." Darwin used this as a possible example of a principle of reversion, "the truth of which," he asserted in a footnote, "I have elsewhere proved, [that] crossed races would be eminently liable to revert to the primordial hairy character of their early ape-like progenitors." Of course, "eminently liable" is far from a certainty, which is why Darwin expressed frustration that Gould's data did not distinguish between "pure blacks and mulattoes" in this particular measure of "pilosity."[31]

Since Gould was dealing with live soldiers and not dead men's skulls, he did not employ cranial measurements. Darwin raised the issue in chapter 2, accepting there was evidence for "the belief that there exists in man some close relation between the size of the brain and the development of the intellectual faculties." But Darwin deliberately circumscribed that "belief" by asserting in the preceding paragraph that "no one supposes that the intellect of any two animals or of any two men can be accurately gauged by the cubic contents of their skulls."[32] Rather than refer to Dr. Samuel G. Morton's famous collection, Darwin instead cited a very recent study by J. Barnard Davis, who dismissed Morton's work as unreliable, yet still arrived at figures showing that "Europeans" had the largest brains.[33] Davis drew no harsh conclusions about other races' inherent lack of intelligence, but Darwin must have read Davis's brief note in the Anthropological Review, pointing out that "Hindostanees" were said to have achieved a high civilization and rational religion despite being "a people who are distinguished among human races for the remarkable smallness of their brains."[34] Although Darwin quoted Davis's "careful measurements" of "mean internal capacity" in cubic inches for the skulls of Europeans (92.3), [Native] Americans (87.5), Asiatics (87.1), and [aboriginal] Australians (81.9), it is noteworthy that Davis had in fact also listed "African races" (86), but Darwin himself chose not to mention that.[35]

Darwin made use of Gould's and Davis's information without endorsing any racialist bias contained in it, and he was unconvinced by all those extra measurements of blacks added to Gould's study and expected (by consultants such as Agassiz) to prove the primordial and permanent distinctiveness of blacks and the "inferior vitality" supposedly inherited by mulattoes. Naturally, The Descent of Man challenged the views of Agassiz himself, though here Darwin's approach took an unexpected turn.

On the first page of Descent, Darwin managed to place Agassiz on an endangered-species list without even naming him. Instead, he quoted a recent statement—in French—by Karl Vogt that no one, at least in Europe, maintained any longer that special creation explained species development. Darwin added, "Of the older and honoured chiefs in natural science, many unfortunately are still opposed to evolution in every form."[36] Thus, Darwin used one European to undermine a former European and now famous "American." Quoting "the Darwin of Germany," who had long been a bitter enemy of Agassiz's, was bound to annoy.[37]

Despite such an opening, all of Darwin's further references to Agassiz were positively gentle. He began by citing the work in which Agassiz most recently, if not very prominently, published his arguments against natural selection by inserting them into an 1869 French translation of his earlier Essay on Classification.[38] However, Darwin did not then discuss Agassiz's arguments but wrote, "I agree with Agassiz that dogs possess something very like a conscience," while also quoting a passage regarding "les amours des limaçons" and "le double embrassement de ces hermaphrodites"—which may have added some allure to snail reproduction but was hardly controversial. Similarly, there were three pleasant references to Professor and Mrs. Agassiz's Journey in Brazil (1868), in one of which Darwin suggested that even Agassiz did not always place Caucasians and Negroes on the extreme ends of the racial hierarchy.[39]

Darwin's chapter on race mentioned Agassiz three times. First, in what seemed to be a concession, Darwin suggested that a hypothetical "naturalist . . . would be deeply impressed with the fact, first noticed by Agassiz, that the different races of man are distributed over the world in the same zoological provinces, as those inhabited by undoubtedly distinct species and genera of mammals." Darwin then gave numerous examples that undermined the very notion of zoological provinces. Next, he countered the polygenist view on hybridity by citing the naturalist John Bachman of South Carolina who "positively asserts that he has known mulatto families which have intermarried for several generations, and have continued on an average as fertile as either pure whites or pure blacks." And, of course, Darwin listed Agassiz among thirteen other naturalists who had individual notions of how many "species or races" mankind could be divided into: for Agassiz it was eight. Darwin also included two innocuous references to sexual selection among fish, Agassiz's specialty, sprinkled with phrases such as: "Professor Agassiz adds," "as I hear from Professor Agassiz," and "as I am informed by the kindness of Professor Agassiz."[40]

Clearly, something had changed in Darwin's view of Agassiz. The latter was mellowing after his return from Brazil where his discoveries, despite the trumpeting, failed to refute natural selection and simply added to his museum more barrels of specimens he would never properly study. The arguments Agassiz expressed in public lectures, popular journals, and a French translation of an older work, seemed increasingly old hat. In October 1866, Agassiz had ended the feud with Asa Gray by formally apologizing for using ungentlemanly language two years earlier.[41] While this did not stop Gray from sending uncomplimentary reports about Agassiz, it did mean that Darwin felt he could again submit technical questions to Agassiz through Gray (as he had done earlier through others).

Darwin must have been surprised in August 1868 when a letter arrived directly from Agassiz, who wrote that although "it is true that I am and have been from the beginning an uncompromising opponent of your views," this was no reason for Darwin to send scientific enquiries to him via Gray. He also acknowledged that he found Darwin's views "mischievous because they lead to a looseness of argumentation which it has been the aim of science to avoid," but he added, "There is nothing in these feelings against yourself, as you have done original researches" of great value. He hoped never to be guilty of "allowing my feeling to be the master of my judgement" and claimed never to have "expressed an unkind word concerning yourself." Whereupon, he provided Darwin with information about fish that Darwin happily included in The Descent of Man. In reply, Darwin explained that he had not approached him directly because he thought Agassiz "had formed so low an opinion" of his work. That Agassiz had now sent him valuable information directly was a pleasing sign of regard. "I have never for a moment doubted your kindness and generosity, and I hope you will not think it presumptuous in me to say that when we met many years ago I felt for you the warmest admiration."[42]

Darwin did not write to Asa Gray about this curious exchange because Gray and his wife were just then sailing to Europe for a yearlong tour. No doubt, the two men discussed Agassiz among a million other things when the Grays visited Down for a week in October 1868. Sometime before November 1869, when the Grays sailed for America, they or Darwin received the news that in mid-September Louis Agassiz had suffered a stroke that left him paralyzed and unable to speak.[43] Before departing, Gray mentioned in a brief note to Darwin, "I will hand the slip with question to Agassiz."[44] This "slip," probably combining some professional question with sympathetic sentiment, is not extant, but Darwin apparently asked Gray to use discretion about delivering the slip, depending on Agassiz's condition.

Gray also mentioned to Darwin that Agassiz's son, Alexander, had recently arrived in Europe with his family and was soon to be in London. Before December, Alexander visited Down House, handing Darwin a note of introduction written by his father the previous June: "You will find Alex more ready to accept your views than I shall ever be."[45] Darwin was no doubt moved: before him stood an admirable young naturalist, at odds with his father over Darwin's views, delivering the note from a man who, since writing it, had suffered a paralyzing stroke.

Darwin thought highly of Alexander and his wife and invited them to Down House more than once. Alexander probably passed along news of his father's slow recovery, and Darwin, at Gray's suggestion, subsequently sent questions to Alexander that might otherwise have gone to his father. Gray shared Darwin's high regard: "I knew you would be pleased with young Agassiz and his Yankee wife."[46]

In March 1870, Gray sent Darwin a message from Louis Agassiz's wife, whose ailing husband had dictated an answer to Darwin's query. Gray commented, "Agassiz evidently regrets having abused you in former times." Darwin responded, "Whenever you have any communication with Agassiz, pray give him my cordial thanks for his kind message & for his information. . . . I wish with all my heart that I could feel that I deserved what Alex. A. says of me."[47] The nature of that praise is unknown, but Darwin's emotional response suggests it was some judgment by Alexander, perhaps comparing his father's harsh attacks on Darwin over the years with Darwin's apparent avoidance of any bitter feelings. If such was Alexander's praise, Darwin knew it fell short of the truth.

In any case, Darwin did not attack Louis Agassiz in The Descent of Man since harshness had never been his style, let alone sniping at a man so gravely ill. Moreover, Darwin probably felt that, whatever reception the critics gave to his "man-essay," he had already won the war: even the enemy's son had come over to his side. Repeating the theme played already by Gray, Wallace, and Huxley, Darwin wrote confidently "that when the principles of evolution are generally accepted, as they surely will be before long, the dispute between the monogenists and the polygenists will die a silent and unobserved death."[48]

While Darwin's daughter Henrietta was editing Descent, her mother wrote to her that the book "will be very interesting, but that I shall dislike it very much as again putting God further off."[49] Darwin could not be surprised by his wife's reaction but may not have anticipated the mildness of the theological attacks on his latest work. Yet, in the last decade of his life, the issue of religion remained a major topic for Darwin—and for people interested in Darwin. It was simultaneously the cause of angry discussions about Lincoln, who was no longer present to control the debate.

An End to Religion

In February 1870, William H. Herndon wrote a long letter to The Index—not Henry Hotze's Confederate-funded journal, which had frequently mentioned Lincoln and sometimes Darwin as well—but to a journal of the same name newly launched in Ohio as the organ of the recently formed Free Religious Association. Like other association founders, The Index's editor, Francis Ellingwood Abbot, was a Bostonian and a former Unitarian who had found even that liberal creed too restrictive, especially in its views on the latest scientific advances, such as natural selection. His search for a sufficiently open-minded Unitarian congregation led him to Ohio, where he founded The Index. When his dwindling congregation stopped paying his salary in 1872, Abbot moved the journal back to Boston.

Herndon's letter to Abbot concerned Lincoln's religious beliefs and subsequently appeared in The Index, in a pamphlet, and in an early biography of Lincoln.[1] His explanation for writing pointed back to an occurrence shortly after Lincoln's assassination. Josiah Holland, a Massachusetts newspaper editor and sometime novelist and lecturer, had delivered a well-received eulogy in his community emphasizing Lincoln's "simple, honest, Christian heart." Urged to write a full biography, Holland had swiftly traveled to Illinois, where he found Lincoln's old law partner extremely helpful. "I freely told him what he asked, and much more," Herndon told Abbot. "He then asked me what I thought about Mr. Lincoln's religion, meaning his views of Christianity. I replied, 'The less said, the better.'" A version of that very phrase appeared as an anonymous quotation in Holland's book a few months later, but Herndon was disgusted that his opinion was buried under a load of hagiography. The book's conclusion reprised the main theme: that "the almost immeasurably great results which [Lincoln] had the privilege of achieving, were due to the fact that he was a Christian President." Holland's final prayer-like sentence ended, "[W]e receive thy life and its immeasurably great results, as the choicest gifts that a mortal has ever bestowed upon us; grateful . . . to God . . . [who] bestowed thee upon the nation and mankind."[2]

To Herndon, this was all "bosh," especially as Holland based much of his account of Lincoln's piety on a single anecdote told by Newton Bateman, Illinois superintendent of public education. Bateman's office was in the State House, and for a few months in 1860, Lincoln used an adjoining office as election headquarters. Bateman wrote for Holland an eight-page account of a conversation that Bateman said "made a vivid impression upon me." Shortly before the election, Lincoln entered Bateman's office, as he did occasionally to escape callers, but this time he locked the door. Referring to results of a recent canvass of Springfield citizens' electoral intentions, Lincoln was exasperated that twenty of the town's twenty-three ministers or church elders intended to vote against him. "Mr. Bateman, I am not a Christian—God knows I would be one—but I have carefully read the Bible, and I do not so understand this book." Lincoln took out a pocket New Testament. "These men well know that I am for freedom . . . and that my opponents are for slavery . . . and yet, with this book in their hands, in the light of which human bondage cannot live a moment, they are going to vote against me. I do not understand it at all." Much verbiage followed—"features surcharged with emotion," "trembling voice," "cheeks wet with tears"—all as untypical as Lincoln's outburst:

> I know there is a God, and that He hates injustice and slavery. . . . I know I am right because I know that liberty is right, for Christ teaches it, and Christ is God. I have told them that a house divided against itself cannot stand, and Christ and reason say the same; and they will find it so. Douglas don't care whether slavery is voted up or voted down, but God cares, and humanity cares, and I care; and with God's help I shall not fail. I may not see the end; but it will come, and I shall be vindicated; and these men will find that they have not read their Bibles aright.[3]

Denying one's Christianity while affirming Christ's divinity is one of many contradictions making Bateman's account dubious, although Allen C. Guelzo has suggested that the conversation may well have "revolved around Lincoln's perceived incongruity between Christian teaching and the reluctance of ministers to criticize slavery."[4] One might add that Lincoln chose his man well: though thirteen years Lincoln's junior, Bateman was an old acquaintance and respected in the community as a strong Christian who had risen from schoolteacher to officeholder. Bateman was clearly surprised by Lincoln's expressions of religious devotion, and he could do more to spread the word to fellow churchmen (hopefully before polling day) than could any of Lincoln's closer associates, who would appear more partisan—and were also less likely to swallow what Lincoln fed Bateman. According to Holland's version of his account, Bateman said to Lincoln, "Certainly your friends are ignorant of the sentiments you have expressed to me." "I know they are," Lincoln replied. "I am obliged to appear different to them; but I think more on these subjects than on all others, and I have done so for years; and I am willing that you should know."[5]

This passage, with its echoes of a secretive messiahship, outraged Herndon because it made Lincoln appear duplicitous and somewhat cowardly. After reading Holland's book, Herndon confronted Bateman in his office: "In order to make Lincoln a technical Christian—you have made him a hypocrite!" But Bateman, while admitting he had written his account only after Lincoln's death, presumably at Holland's request, backed down only partially.[6]

Whatever the value of Bateman's anecdote, Herndon was alarmed that Holland was making a plaster saint out of Lincoln: the higher Lincoln was raised toward heaven, the farther he would fall whenever the real facts emerged. Herndon decided to forestall Lincoln's "bitter enemies" by writing a biography himself.[7] He began collecting materials and trying them out in some lectures. His investigations led to the surprising conclusion that his former law partner, the cautious politician and rationalist, had not just been aloof from orthodox Christianity in his younger days but openly critical. The story of young Lincoln's "infidel book"—which Sam Hill threw into a stove—came as a shock because Herndon had always perceived Lincoln as far less radical than himself.

Herndon's draft for a December 1865 lecture observed that Lincoln did not believe in miracles, supernatural revelations, or the divinity of Jesus, but he crossed out these passages, saving them for a proper biography. Herndon did tell his audience that Lincoln had been a deeply religious man but added delphically, "If this people—this audience—can make of Mr. Lincoln a technical Christian man as the world—the Christian world—understands it, then this can be done by what is the so-called Christian people."[8]

Herndon neglected his law practice while pursuing his investigations without actually making a start on writing the biography. After 1867, he seemed to give up on the project as well as the law, tried his hand at farming, and failed miserably. In 1869, Herndon sold his notes to another would-be biographer, Ward Hill Lamon, an old acquaintance from the circuit-riding days who had served Lincoln during the White House years as marshal in Washington, D.C., and a sort of personal bodyguard. Herndon told him to "be bold. Tell the truth—that Lincoln was an infidel—a Deist. . . . He held in contempt the Idea of God's Special interferences &c &c." A few months later, Herndon sent the long letter that Abbot printed in The Index in April 1870 and then issued as a pamphlet for $3.50 per hundred. And when Lamon, or rather his ghostwriter, Chauncey Black, finally produced a biography, five of the eighteen pages devoted to Lincoln's lack of orthodoxy were filled by "the Abbot letter."[9] The letter ranged widely, but the centerpiece was Herndon's assertion that Lincoln "believed that all things, both matter and mind, were governed by laws, universal, absolute, and eternal." The list of specific doctrines Lincoln did not believe in included the Bible as revelation, miracles, and the divinity of Jesus, but top of the list was "special creation, [Lincoln's] idea being that all creation was an evolution under law."[10]

The Free Religious Association, which Abbot helped to found in 1867, included many figures who had admired Lincoln and were in turn admired by Herndon, such as Robert Dale Owen, Ralph Waldo Emerson, Thomas Wentworth Higginson, Charles Eliot Norton, and Lucretia Mott. Many of these also knew and admired Darwin. Higginson, who had commanded black troops during the Civil War, later corresponded with Darwin and even visited him at Down House, as did Norton. The Free Religious Association generally took an evolutionary view of religion, finding unity amid adaptive theological variation, and Abbot wrote articles for Norton's North American Review in praise of Darwin.[11]

Abbot enclosed copies of some of his articles and lectures when he first wrote to Darwin in May 1871 to assure him that, contrary to impressions he might receive otherwise, natural selection was widely accepted by educated Americans. Darwin wrote back immediately, pleased by this news and expressing admiration for Abbot's writings. A few days later he wrote again, praising a particular article by Abbot in The Index and enclosing money for a subscription.[12] Abbot was thrilled and sent Darwin a bound edition of the first volume of The Index, which included Herndon's letter on Lincoln's religion. Abbot also requested "a little note . . . setting forth your own view of the influence of your theory on religion" that he might quote during an upcoming lecture.[13] After hesitating, Darwin allowed the use of his earlier line of praise for Abbot's work "Truths for the Times": "I admire them from my inmost heart; and I agree to almost every word."[14] When Abbot pleaded that Darwin become a regular contributor, Darwin respectfully declined, citing ill health and asserting disingenuously that he had "never systematically thought much on religion in relation to science, or on morals in relation to society."[15]

In November 1872, Darwin published his most readable and popular book On the Expression of the Emotions in Man and Animals, which completed his exposition of natural selection and demonstrated again his commitment to the unity of man. "The theory of expression confirms to a certain limited extent the conclusion that man is derived from some lower animal form, and supports the belief of the specific or subspecific unity of the several races," he wrote on the book's last page, "but as far as my judgment serves, such confirmation was hardly needed." Darwin could even argue magisterially that "blushing" could not have been "specially designed by the Creator" because that concept "is opposed to the general theory of evolution, which is now so largely accepted."[16]

Asa Gray's debates with Darwin about design had stalemated when Darwin came up with the analogy of a house built designedly out of stones shaped by pure chance. "I found your stone-house argument unanswerable in substance," admitted Gray, also agreeing with Darwin that one can believe but not know.

Gray also sent Darwin a copy of Gray's review demolishing a book that had equated Darwinism with atheism, saying in the accompanying letter, "You see what uphill work I [have] in making a theist of you." Darwin praised the review and then dodged, "The more I reflect on the subject, the more perplexed I grow."[17]

Of those who wrote to Darwin about his religious opinions, Gray and Abbot were among the few who received much response, however indistinct. In 1873, Darwin advised his son George not to publish an essay he had written on religion: "The evils are giving pain to others, & injuring your own power & usefulness."[18] To a young botanist, Darwin commented, "Many years ago when I was collecting facts for The Origin, my belief in what is called a personal God was as firm as that of Dr Pusey himself, & as to the eternity of matter I have never troubled myself about such insoluble questions."[19] Although he accepted that one reason to believe in God's existence was "the impossibility of conceiving that this grand and wondrous universe . . . arose through chance," he repeatedly stressed that "the mind still craves to know" how even a "first cause" arose and why there is such an "immense amount of suffering through the world." "The safest conclusion," Darwin suggested to another petitioner, "seems to be that the whole subject is beyond the scope of man's intellect, but man can do his duty."[20] When a German student wrote more than once, Darwin testily declared that science had nothing to do with Christ, and "for myself, I do not believe that there has ever been any revelation. As for a future life, every man must judge for himself between conflicting vague probabilities."[21] To a letter from a law student expressing a desire to read Darwin's books but worried lest they cause him to lose "my faith in the New Testament," Darwin answered, "I am sorry to have to inform you that I do not believe in the Bible as a divine revelation, & therefore not in Jesus Christ as the son of God." As usual, though rarely so ironically, Darwin signed himself, "Yours faithfully."[22]

Darwin dealt extensively with his own religious views in the autobiographical sketch written in 1876 with a few additions made over the next five years. Although writing ostensibly to explain himself posthumously to his own family, he may have assumed eventual publication. In any case, there was a diffidence, even tension, in the presentation. Many of his points have been quoted earlier or echo statements given in the above letters. While expanding on one of the arguments for the existence of God that had "much more weight" than others, Darwin ended one paragraph, "When thus reflecting I feel compelled to look to a First Cause having an intelligent mind in some degree analogous to that of man; and I deserve to be called a Theist." But the next paragraph ended, "The mystery of the beginning of all things is insoluble by us; and I for one must be content to remain an Agnostic." Eventually seeing the awkwardness of claiming to be theistic in one paragraph and agnostic in the next, Darwin later wedged in a clarifying sentence: "This conclusion was strong in my mind about the time, as far as I can remember, when I wrote the Origin of Species; and it is since that time that it has very gradually with many fluctuations become weaker."[23] Darwin was reluctant to record that he had entirely lost the status of a "theist," leaving his wife the grain of hope that he had retained a fragment of faith. Darwin told another inquirer in 1879 that "in my most extreme fluctuations I have never been an atheist in the sense of denying the existence of a God."[24] He was conscious, as he wrote in another letter in 1880, of "the pain which it would give some members of my family, if I aided in any way direct attacks on religion."[25]

Avoiding such direct attacks had also become an article of faith for Lincoln the politician, but after his death, his religious views became a political football for Republicans seeking to exalt the martyr and Democrats trying to block this. After Herndon's letter was published, Republican journals led the backlash, and the cause was taken up by the Reverend James A. Reed, who was now pastor at the Springfield church where Lincoln had formerly rented a pew. Reed had not known Lincoln, but he now energetically gathered up testimony from men who had, such as John T. Stuart and James H. Matheny, two of Herndon's best informants, who gave rather different stories to Reed. This material was eventually published in Scribner's Monthly, edited by Josiah Holland, the hagiographer who had stirred up Herndon in the first place.[26] Herndon unleashed an aggressive lecture on "Lincoln's Religion," laying into all who disagreed with him, especially those suggesting Lincoln had at some point during his presidency become a true Christian. "He died an unbeliever," Herndon thundered while Republican newspapers condemned, and Democrats made the most of it.[27]

Financial troubles overwhelmed Herndon for a few years, but in 1883, he submitted further articles on Lincoln's lack of religion to the Free Thought tabloid, the Truth Seeker.[28] He then read in Isaac N. Arnold's 1884 biography of Lincoln, which otherwise made great use of Herndon's material, that Lincoln was the most "reverent Christian [that] ever sat in the executive chair, not excepting Washington." While not claiming Lincoln was orthodox, Arnold declared, "Belief in the existence of God; in the immortality of the soul; in the Bible as the revelation of God to man; in the efficacy and duty of prayer; in reverence toward the Almighty and in love and charity to man, was the basis of his religion."[29]

Herndon finally produced, with the help of Jesse Weik, his own biography of Lincoln, which appeared in 1889. Weik took the rough edges off some of Herndon's assertions, but the biography retracted nothing significant and provided strong evidence from some of Herndon's best informants. Regarding Lincoln's religious views after he went to Washington and out of Herndon's presence, Herndon offered a letter from Lincoln's secretary John Nicolay, declaring there were no indications that Lincoln's beliefs changed—though Nicolay added, "I do not know just what they were, never having heard him explain them in detail."[30] Herndon relished that letter, having guessed correctly that Lincoln's son Robert had prevented Nicolay and Lincoln's other secretary, John Hay, from discussing

Lincoln's religion in their ten-volume life of Lincoln, which had been serialized in the Century Magazine starting in 1886: "they are afraid of Bob; he gives them material and they in turn play hush."[31]

Two years after publishing his biography, Herndon died, but the controversy over Lincoln's religion had a life of its own. The subject Lincoln learned to control so carefully causes continual debate and has even turned on itself. The skeptic has become the object of near-idolatrous veneration, as any visitor to various Lincoln pilgrimage sites will notice. In the centenary of his birth, Lincoln's profile replaced that of an American Indian—an earlier symbol for America—on the one-cent coin: the first president to be so honored, with no other U.S. coin series continuing so long. The stirring Battle Hymn of the Republic—with verses composed by Julia Ward Howe (Samuel Gridley Howe's wife) to invoke the Messiah's blessing on the North's crusade against slavery—has become the theme tune for every film portrait of Lincoln, who would have been amazed and amused.

By the time Darwin died in 1882, his status as a national institution was so formidable that his plan for a burial in Downe's churchyard was gently swept aside as influential associates arranged for Darwin's remains to be laid in Westminster Abbey beside those of England's greatest leaders and intellects.[32] Yet, before the year ended, a reformist newspaper published two letters Darwin had written about his religious views, causing a Catholic journal to declare him a heretic. This was mentioned the following year in an eight-page pamphlet on Darwin's religion by Edward B. Aveling, a physician, freethinker, socialist, and Karl Marx's son-in-law. Aveling had a brief correspondence with Darwin, and his pamphlet recounts his single visit to Down House, emphasizing a discussion of the terms "atheism" and "agnosticism." Darwin said (in words sounding more Marxian than Darwinian): "It is all very well for educated, cultured, thoughtful people; but are the masses yet ripe for it?"[33]

Just as Robert Todd Lincoln tried to protect his father's reputation by blue-penciling Nicolay and Hay's draft biography (even excising some references to Robert's paternal grandfather's religion), Darwin's heirs also took steps to disassociate his name from radical atheism.[34] When Darwin's son Francis produced the usual Life and Letters volume, including Darwin's autobiographical sketch, Emma requested that five passages about religion be omitted "to avoid," she said, "giving pain to your father's religious friends who are deeply attached to him, . . . and even the old servants."[35] And just as Herndon had felt compelled to deny that Lincoln had been religiously transformed while president, the Darwin family had to deal with ludicrous claims that Darwin underwent some "death-bed conversion."[36] Such stories have persisted because people who wish to believe them require no evidence. However, Darwin's personal beliefs have had less consequence than the issue that always divided Darwin and Gray: Paley's old argument from design. Unlike Paley, Agassiz, and modern creationists, Gray had never used design in order to demonstrate God's existence but simply suggested that there was more design in nature than "natural selection" could account for, reserving a possible role for God. But both Gray and Darwin, unlike modern creationists, understood that the Prime Mover's existence and the natural selection hypothesis could not prove or disprove each other.

The continuing contest between design and natural selection has a quaint air of futility about it, but far more tragic consequences have attended the continued controversy over the degree of difference among the races of man.

The Dream of Equality

In 1872, On the Expression of the Emotions in Man and Animals completed Darwin's work on man. Later works made important contributions to science and sold surprisingly well but related to subjects like "insectivorous plants," "climbing plants," and "the actions of worms." The abolition of slavery in the United States at first seemed to decrease the importance of the issue of mankind's unity, and the growing acceptance of natural selection made the old monogenist-polygenist debate seem obsolete. Also, Darwin felt no further need to counter the influence of Louis Agassiz.

Less than a year after his paralyzing stroke, Agassiz had made a fine recovery, and in early 1870, Asa Gray wrote that Agassiz seemed to have mellowed toward Darwin. But a year later, Agassiz's lectures (according to one student's notes) included references to "the English . . . propensity for fanciful theories."[1] Sometime before June 1871, Darwin must have heard from Alexander Agassiz that his father was not only well but feeling adventurous. "Pray give my most sincere respects to your father," wrote Darwin. "What a wonderful man he is to think of going round Cape Horn; if he does go, I wish he could go through the Strait of Magellan."[2]

During the Hassler expedition, named after the ship provided by his friend Benjamin Peirce of the Coastal Survey, Agassiz set out to dredge up seabed specimens along thousands of miles of North and South American coastline. Just before departing, he sent a letter to Darwin through Gray, for which Darwin thanked the latter, not mentioning its contents nor apparently attempting to get a reply to the voyager.[3] Yet Darwin was certainly on Agassiz's mind. "I had a special purpose in this journey," he wrote to a German colleague from aboard ship, " . . . to study the whole Darwinian theory free from all external influences and former prejudices. It was on a similar voyage that Darwin himself came to formulate his theories!" Agassiz mentioned changes in the subject of natural history that "I have pondered over," but (unlike his son) "I have not made any great progress in my conversion to the growing doctrine of evolution." Agassiz now hoped to find "sufficient material to allow thorough comparisons between related living types" that would enable him to test natural selection better than Darwin ever had.[4]

Returning from his journey in October 1872, Agassiz gave a lecture that convinced Gray that he was anything but reformed. "Hasty generalising of observation is Darwin all over," said Agassiz, before offering the bizarre conclusion "The weak may and do survive as well as the strong" based on his observation that large trees appear at the foot of a mountain while at the summit one finds "mere shrubs." Too appalled to write a calm correction, Gray instead wrote a satirical "squib" and sent it to Darwin, explaining that he dare not publish it in America even anonymously: Darwin could either burn it or arrange publication without Gray's name. The piece appeared a month later in Nature under the title "Survival of the Fittest."[5]

Agassiz, typically, produced no written report on the Hassler expedition, but Mrs. Agassiz produced three popular articles for the Atlantic Monthly about the trip. In "A Cruise through the Galapagos," she mentioned, "Here some of the best work of [Darwin's] youth was done; and now, at the close of his life, these very islands connect themselves, by an odd coincidence, with his theory of the origin of species." Clearly reflecting her husband's belief that Darwin's theory lacked substantial evidence, Mrs. Agassiz suggested that these volcanic islands offered too little geologic time for the evolution of "fauna specifically distinct from that of the mainland" and that although "transition types . . . should not elude . . . the watchful spirit of the age," none had yet been found.[6]

Agassiz began a serious effort to write up for the Atlantic Monthly the ideas featured in his current lectures. He rewrote it three times, having "too much at stake in this Article," he told the editor, "to be willing to allow it to appear without the severest criticism."[7] When it finally appeared in January 1874, the nine-page article, promised as the first of a series, proved that Agassiz had lost neither his dislike for transmutation nor his affection for special creation. Darwin's work was praised up to a point: "Indeed it might be said that he treated his subject according to the best scientific methods, had he not frequently overstepped the boundaries of actual knowledge and allowed his imagination to supply the links which science does not furnish."[8]

Although Mrs. Agassiz's earlier article had lugubriously referred to Darwin as "now, at the close of his life," in fact, one month before her husband's article appeared, Louis Agassiz died of a cerebral hemorrhage on 14 December 1873. In January, Darwin wrote to Joseph Dalton Hooker, "Many thanks for sending me Gray's interesting letter. What a terrible thing it is about Mrs. Agassiz, & how lost he will be."[9] The "Mrs. Agassiz" referred to was not Louis Agassiz's widow but his daughter-in-law, the wife of Alexander. She had died suddenly only a few days after her father-in-law, and both Gray and Darwin had found her delightful and could well imagine her young husband's grief.[10] Darwin left no record of any reaction to the death of Louis Agassiz himself.

Bostonian Thomas Wentworth Higginson (who mentioned both his friends Agassiz and Francis E. Abbot in other correspondence with Darwin) received in 1873 a letter from Darwin praising his book Life with a Black Regiment: "You must allow me to thank you heartily for the very great pleasure which it has in many ways given us. I always thought well of the negroes, from the little which I have seen of them; and I have been delighted to have my vague impressions confirmed, and their character and mental powers so ably discussed."[11] A decade earlier, Higginson had testified to the American Freedmen's Inquiry Commission about his experience commanding the first black regiment in the Union army, and his memoir gave Darwin additional anecdotal evidence not available when Darwin had been writing about blacks in Descent of Man and cautiously using of Benjamin Apthorp Gould's tainted statistical evidence.[12] Darwin was currently busy producing a second edition of Descent, making many corrections and additions. One of particular relevance is in a section headed "Natural Selection as affecting Civilised Nations."

In Descent, Darwin never used the terms "superior race" or "inferior race."[13] He usually characterized human groups as being in a "savage," "barbarian," or "civilised" condition (often qualified as "more civilised," "less civilised," or "semi-civilised"). One addition to the second edition emphasized that whether civilized or not, a group could experience competition within itself as well as with other groups: "Nevertheless the more intelligent members within the same community will succeed better in the long run than the inferior, and leave a more numerous progeny, and this is a form of natural selection." A group's level of "intelligence" was not an inherited condition but a social development: "The more efficient causes of progress seem to consist of a good education during youth whilst the brain is impressible, and of a high standard of excellence, inculcated by the ablest and best men, embodied in the laws, customs and traditions of the nation, and enforced by public opinion." This brought Darwin back to the type of "social instinct" that he felt arose early in man's development and was, therefore, common to all races: "The enforcement of public opinion depends on our appreciation of the approbation and disapprobation of others; and this appreciation is founded on our sympathy, which it can hardly be doubted was originally developed through natural selection as one of the most important elements of the social instincts."[14]

Natural selection has less effect on "highly civilised nations" because they "do not supplant and exterminate one another as do savage tribes"; nevertheless, a "civilised" condition, being an attainment rather than an inherited trait, can also be reversed: "we see, for instance, in parts of S. America, that a people which may be called civilised, such as the Spanish settlers, is liable to become indolent and to retrograde, when the conditions of life are very easy."[15]

In 1876, a two-volume report, Statistics, Medical and Anthropological, of the Provost Marshal-General's Bureau, was sent to Darwin by the author, Jedediah Hyde Baxter, an army surgeon during the Civil War. Baxter's remit when organizing examinations of black (as well as white) recruits had been merely to certify the men fit for service. He had a much larger statistical sample than Gould but was not doing an anthropological study for the likes of Louis Agassiz. Baxter felt that the term "Colored Men" ought not to "be admitted in scientific terminology on account of its obvious lack of precision," and his basic questionnaires made no attempt to distinguish "full black" and "mixed race," simply asking examiners to report on "the physical qualifications of the colored race for military service." While some army doctors submitted no reports because they had no black recruits or were too busy, many others offered a wide range of judgments reflecting their own biases. Unlike Gould, Baxter did not find racial differences in chest dimensions and, if anything, found proportionally fewer cases of pulmonary diseases among blacks than whites. Overall, according to one recent study, "Whereas Gould's statistics erased the humanity of the people being measured, the army surgeons cast black recruits as human beings who could participate as active agents in their struggle for freedom."[16]

Had Baxter's evidence of racial similarity been published before 1870, Darwin undoubtedly would have used it to counter Gould's half-baked evidence of racial difference. But Darwin was now sixty-seven years old, preferred dabbling with experiments in which he controlled the sampling procedures, and could have safely predicted that most "observers" would find what they wished to find in Gould's and Baxter's studies. "No longer would attitudes of racial inferiority have to employ those pre-war measurements and conclusions which had been tainted with proslavery arguments," comments historian John S. Haller, referring to the works of Dr. Samuel G. Morton, George Robins Gliddon, Dr. Josiah Nott, and Louis Agassiz. The first two died before outbreak of the Civil War that destroyed slavery, and the latter two within a decade of the war's end. But scientific racism survived. "Perhaps the greatest irony of the Civil War," concludes Haller, "was that its anthropometric investigations [particularly Gould's] were used in the late nineteenth century to support institutional racism."[17]

Darwin wrote about the nature of man for the last time a few months before his death. To his detriment, Darwin's critics have quoted only brief excerpts of the 1881 letter, such as:

> I could show fight on natural selection having done and doing more for the progress of civilisation than you seem inclined to admit. Remember what risk the nations of Europe ran, not so many centuries ago of being overwhelmed by the Turks, and how ridiculous such an idea now is! The more civilised so-called Caucasian races have beaten the Turkish hollow in the struggle for existence.

> Looking to the world at no very distant date, what an endless number of the lower races will have been eliminated by the higher civilised races throughout the world.[18]

Gertrude Himmelfarb prefaced her quotation of this passage by declaring "proponents of the doctrine 'might is right' could find ample justification in his theory" and followed it immediately with references to "social Darwinism," "the hero, superman, or Führer," and a quotation from a German general.[19] But we should not ignore the original context of this private letter written to William Graham, a Belfast professor of law and political economy, who had sent Darwin his book The Creed of Science: Religious, Moral, and Social. With his usual courtesy, Darwin at first praised the work heartily but then proceeded to argue against some points "which I cannot digest." Graham asserted that "the development of the human species, the civilizations of humanity, have not been accomplished by natural selection, [but] . . . through great individuals, men of higher, deeper, finer, nobler natures, in mind, or soul, or moral purpose."[20] Darwin wished to "make somewhat of a case against the enormous importance which you attribute to our greatest men," for Darwin had never cared for Thomas Carlyle's "great men" theories. Darwin's "case" consisted of two points, the first a personal impression: "I have been accustomed to think, second, third, and fourth rate men of very high importance, at least in the case of Science." His second point—the much quoted passage—suggested Graham had attributed too much to "great individuals" and too little to natural selection as an agent "for the progress of civilization."[21]

Darwin's example of a conflict "not so many centuries ago" between "the nations of Europe" and "the Turks" was probably influenced by the recent Russo-Turkish War. Appalled by Turkish atrocities, Darwin had contributed £50 to a relief fund, but his argument to Graham referred to an earlier period when Europe was threatened by Suleiman the Magnificent—the only "great individual" most people could probably name from that conflict—who hardly represented progress and whose side lost. For Darwin, a higher level of "civilisation"—not great individuals or racial superiority—caused the "so-called Caucasian races" to gain advantage over the Turks (also a nonracial term).

Graham asserted, rather sarcastically, that the "universal medicine of 'natural selection' . . . , applied to human societies, virtually recommends that the present state of things should continue."[22] This provoked Darwin's seemingly harsh response about "an endless number of the lower races" likely "at no very distant date" to be "eliminated by the higher civilized races." This did not endorse the destruction of nonwhite races but pointed out that societies do change through causes broader than "great individuals" and that natural selection "recommends" neither change nor continuity. Having witnessed atrocities in South America and Australia, Darwin acknowledged that "civilised" societies possessed the means to destroy less organized peoples, but he never suggested this advantage bestowed any right, let alone any obligation to destroy the weak. "Civilised" is a relative term: if the "higher civilised races" were even more "civilised," they would not develop deliberate policies to "eliminate" lower (i.e., less civilized) races, and if the latter became more civilized, they might yet avoid the more likely types of "elimination."

A more recent critic, Richard Weikart, followed Himmelfarb in blaming Darwin for later social ills, quoting—in even more abbreviated form—the same passage from the letter to Graham.[23] However, Weikart also showed that a decade before that letter, Darwin had used a similar phrase in a passage in Descent of Man: "At some future period, not very distant as measured by centuries, the civilised races of man will almost certainly exterminate and replace throughout the world the savage races."[24] Again, the context shows that Darwin was not endorsing such a development but was explaining how "breaks" or "gaps" between related varieties and species had been created in the past (and would be in the future) as "co-descendants of the same species" developed at different rates and gained advantages over one another.[25] Darwin gave two examples, the first (quoted above) being that "the civilised races of man will almost certainly exterminate and replace throughout the world the savage races." Again, far from endorsing this development, Darwin had personally witnessed and condemned "civilised" people who perpetrated such actions; yet, having no reason to believe they would soon stop, it was a viable example of an action that could widen the "breaks" between co-descendants by causing the extinction of some human groups that happen to have developed less civilized organization. Darwin's second example was that "anthropomorphous apes, as Professor Herman Schaaffhausen has remarked, will no doubt be exterminated" by man but perhaps as much by the "savage races" as by the "civilised" ones.[26] The extinctions would destroy the evidence not only of man's most immediate ancestor but also of various anthropomorphous cousins that had descended alongside man (though with fewer modifications).

"The break will then be rendered wider," Darwin projected, "for it will intervene between man in a more civilised state, as we may hope, than the Caucasian, and some ape as low as a baboon, instead of as at present between the negro or Australian and the gorilla" (emphasis added). Darwin accepted that the species of man include various races (e.g., Caucasians, Negroes, Aborigines) and does not include gorillas; and none of the nonwhite races are "intermediate" between apes and white men. Darwin linked blacks, Aborigines, and gorillas only by a single factor: their vulnerability in any competition with groups (such as most Caucasians) who possessed a "more civilised" social organization. But, crucially, Darwin actually declared Caucasians themselves to be vulnerable to competition with some "more civilised" group still to develop. In some distant future, none of the existing human races may survive, any more than the doomed gorillas, and on either side of a widened gap will be the more civilized humans of the future and their nearest, still-existing "co-descendants," some sort of baboon. None of this amounted to an endorsement for any deliberate policy of exterminating "less civilised" races (which could eventually include the present "Caucasian" race).[27]

The letter to Graham was not actually published until 1909. And long before that time, the idea of "the survival of the fittest"—coined by Herbert Spencer before The Origin was published—was already being misused to justify European acts of imperialism, a revival of laissez-faire economic policies, and the continuing oppression of blacks in the United States.

The Civil War had allowed Lincoln to free blacks from slavery (partly so they could help fight the war) and to take early steps to accord them political equality. Natural selection allowed Darwin to free blacks from the slur that they were not fully human by showing that all humans as a group were related to animals while the only advantageous differences within the group were derived from social developments. However, long before Lincoln and Darwin were born, their race—the white race—had generally developed social organizations that were more complex than those of other races and was also successful in appropriating other races' resources. To many whites, those two facts indicated that it was God's design and therefore "natural." And yet, Lincoln and Darwin both dissented from this prevailing attitude because of that combination of rationality and compassion that was so well blended in both men, enabling them also to recognize the unfortunate depth of their societies' prejudices. This is why Darwin predicted that less "civilised" races would remain under threat and why Lincoln thought the tremendous expense and pain involved in returning at least some blacks to Africa could perhaps be less than the suffering that free blacks might endure if they remained in America. A glance at the history of Spanish, Dutch, French, British, Belgian, and American rule over native populations indicates that Lincoln's and Darwin's worst anticipations were all too realistic and nearly came true.

In America, the Civil War resulted in a victory for the North's political principles but also, paradoxically, for the South's racial ideology. This is partly because plenty of Southerners had always agreed it was better to be in the Union than out of it, and plenty of Northerners shared the view that blacks were inherently inferior. Racism had existed before receiving any veneer of scientific justification and continued after scientific racism shed simple polygenism and donned a misshapen version of natural selection. Polygenists such as Nott (who died in 1873) had already realized that they could employ "Darwinism" by declaring that even if blacks and whites had common origins, they were effectively permanent "variants" of some kind. The phrase "struggle for survival" preceded Darwin's adoption of it, but the concept was also readily accepted by former polygenists forced to abandon separate creations and yet eager to stress the inferiority of nonwhites. There had long been those who predicted blacks in America were destined to decline. Louis Agassiz had told Samuel Gridley Howe that both the black and white races would be weakened by amalgamation and that blacks who had previously fled to the North would have to retreat to more tropical areas. Others concluded that slavery had "protected" blacks from the "struggle for survival": as Van Evrie wrote in 1868, the black's tendency to race extinction "accelerated or diminished in exact proportion as 'impartial freedom' [was] thrust upon him." Gould's data was manipulated to reinforce the notion that weaknesses made blacks less "fit" to compete. For those who wished to believe it, the new solution to the "black problem" did not require slavery, or granting the blacks the protection of equal rights, or attempting colonization: given time and no new black immigration, the existing group would simply disappear.[28]

Two years after Gould's report, the 1870 U.S. census supposedly showed that the population growth among blacks since 1860 was not only less than that of whites but also far below the blacks' growth averages between 1790 and 1850, which, according to one southern journal, proved that blacks had been better off under slavery and that the slowing growth rate would soon become a net fall in black population.[29]

The 1880 census, however, indicated that since 1870, despite substantial white immigration and hardly any black immigration, the black population increased by nearly 35 percent while the white population increased by 29 percent.[30] Rather than reaching the correct conclusion—that undercounting blacks in 1870 had skewed growth rates in both censuses—some people panicked, like the author of an article in Popular Science Monthly who now projected that in a century, blacks would number 190 million. Suddenly, instead of seeing blacks as probable losers in some race between races, many whites now blamed the blacks for their "remarkable fecundity."[31]

The situation reverted after the 1890 census showed black population growth of 14 percent compared with 25 percent for whites. This coincided with the period, nearly a decade after Darwin's death, when "Darwinism" was being misapplied as "Social Darwinism" in order to argue that all forms of competition—whether social, political, or economic and whether among individuals, classes, nations, or races—were necessary and beneficial overall and that it was "unnatural" to try to prevent it and positively harmful to society to help the "losers."[32]

A Darwin quotation occasionally cited as providing a basis for Social Darwinism was, again, excerpted by Himmelfarb, this time from Descent of Man:

> With savages, the weak in body or mind are soon eliminated; and those that survive commonly exhibit a vigorous state of health. We civilised men, on the other hand, do our utmost to check the process of elimination; we build asylums for the imbecile, the maimed, and the sick; we institute poor-laws; and our medical men exert their utmost skill to save the life of every one to the last moment. There is reason to believe that vaccination has preserved thousands, who from a weak constitution would formerly have succumbed to > small-pox. Thus the weak members of civilised societies propagate their kind. No one who has attended to the breeding of domestic animals will doubt that this must be highly injurious to the race of man.[33]

Himmelfarb prefaced this by asserting that Darwin's view represented a return to "laissez-faire—the free, unrestrained competition of individuals," reversing a more recent trend in which "social legislation" had begun to ameliorate factory conditions: a serious misinterpretation by Himmelfarb. Darwin himself had preceded the passage with references to three authorities who took a far harsher stance than he did, and Himmelfarb curtailed Darwin's argument before it reached a three-way comparison among how "savages" deal with weaker members of their societies, how "civilised men" deal with weakness when breeding animals, and how "civilised men" should deal with weakness among their fellow men. Darwin pointed out that > the aid which we feel impelled to give to the helpless [results from] the instinct of sympathy, which was originally acquired as part of the social instincts, but subsequently rendered, in the manner previously indicated, more tender and more widely diffused. Nor could we check our sympathy, if so urged by hard reason, without deterioration in the noblest part of our nature. . . . [I]f we were intentionally to neglect the weak and helpless, it could only be for a contingent benefit, with a certain and great present evil [emphasis added].[34]

Darwin can hardly be blamed because Americans (not to mention Germans) misapplied his ideas to nonbiological subjects and by doing so gave support to entirely different views. In America in the 1890s, diverse writers produced influential works all reaching the conclusion that the black race would fairly rapidly become extinct in America. They described no real mechanism for this view, which was based on poor statistics, a misapplication of Darwinian concepts, and, above all, desire. Those believing blacks would soon disappear saw no reason to prepare them to be citizens or to bestow any social rights upon them. "The new prognosis," as historian George M. Fredrickson explains, "pointed rather to the need to segregate or quarantine a race liable to be a source of contamination and social danger to the white community."[35] This attitude sustained the segregation laws that were not only tolerated by the rest of the nation but upheld by the Supreme Court in Plessy v. Ferguson in 1896.

Had Lincoln lived to witness such developments or learned for how many more decades blacks would suffer harsh discrimination, he would have been saddened but unsurprised, and he might have concluded that much misery and hypocrisy could have been avoided if white America had either adopted a plan for colonization or made up its collective mind to treat blacks as equals. Legalized segregation was simply a more cruel form of "internal" colonization.

In 1909, the centenaries of Lincoln and Darwin were commemorated on both sides of the Atlantic Ocean, and a century later, numerous well-organized committees prepared larger celebrations for the 2009 bicentenaries. Lincoln and Darwin would have been pleased at being remembered after their deaths, the only immortality they could possibly anticipate, and more pleased by the general success of their viewpoints. Centenaries often foster reassessments, which seem superfluous for two lives that have undergone continuous scrutiny. The now customary attacks will continue—that Lincoln was a racist forced into the role of emancipator and that Darwin's ideas led the world straight to Auschwitz—but their reputations will easily survive such taunts.[36] Both men would be appalled if idolaters prevented intelligent discussion of their lives or, more important, of the complex issues each man had wrestled with. Neither man would accept that any issues have been finally settled.

Abraham Lincoln and Charles Darwin, justly revered for their willingness to challenge existing beliefs through a rational pursuit of truth and justice, have been celebrated in two centenaries. A third centenary may not take place, however, unless leaders with similar qualities—especially a serious regard for science and a concern that human beings cooperate rather than compete—attain influence and the political power that can effect necessary changes in the way their fellow human beings meet the new and dangerous challenges facing mankind.

Karl Marx and Abraham Lincoln: An Unfinished Revolution

In photographs Karl Marx and Abraham Lincoln both look the part of the respectable Victorian gentleman. But they were almost diametrically opposed in their attitude toward what was called at the time the social question. Lincoln happily represented railroad corporations as a lawyer. As a politician he was a champion of free wage labor. Karl Marx, on the other hand, was a declared foe of capitalism who insisted that wage labor was in fact wage slavery, since the worker was compelled by economic necessity to sell his defining human attribute—his labor power—because if he did not, his family would soon face hunger and homelessness.

Of course Marx's critique of capitalism did not deny that it had progressive features, and Lincoln's championing of the world of business did not extend to those whose profits stemmed directly from slaveholding. Each man placed a concept of unrewarded labor at the center of his political philosophy, and both opposed slavery on the grounds that it was intensively exploitative. Lincoln believed it to be his duty to defend the Union, which he saw as the momentous American experiment in representative democracy, by whatever means should prove necessary. Marx saw the democratic republic as the political form that would allow the working class to develop its capacity to lead society as a whole. He regarded US political institutions as a flawed early version of the republican ideal. With their "corruption" and "humbug," US political institutions did not offer a faithful representation of US society. Indeed, too often they supplied a popular veneer to the rule of the wealthy—with a bonus for slaveholders. But Marx's conclusion was that they should become more democratic, broadening the scope of freedom of association, removing all forms of privilege, and extending free public education.[1]

As a young man Marx had seriously considered moving to the United States, perhaps to Texas. He went so far as to write to the mayor of Trier, the town where he had been born, to request an Auswanderungschein, or emigration certificate. In the following year he wrote an article considering the ideas of the "American National Reformers," whose comparatively modest original aims—the distribution of 160 acres of public land to anyone willing to cultivate it—he recognized as justified and promising: "We know that this movement strives for a result that, to be sure, would further the industrialism of modern bourgeois society, but that … as an attack on land ownership … especially under the existing conditions … must drive it towards communism."[2] (The idea of distributing public land in this way did indeed have explosive implications, as we will see, and the new smallholders did often lack the resources needed to flourish, as Marx predicted, but his idea that they would therefore embrace "communism" was more than a stretch.) In 1849, writing as editor of Germany's leading revolutionary democratic journal, the Neue Rheinische Zeitung, Marx praised the frugal budget and republican institutions of the United States in comparison with the bloated bureaucracy and unaccountability of the Prussian monarchy. [3]

Subsequently Marx remained fascinated by events in the US, and for ten years—1852 to 1861—he became the London correspondent of one of its leading newspapers, the New York Daily Tribune. The invitation to write for the Tribune came from Charles Dana, its editor, who had met Marx in Cologne in 1848 when Marx was in charge of the Neue Rheinische Zeitung. Marx accepted Dana's invitation, and for a decade this was his only paid employment. He contributed over 400 articles, 84 of which were published without a byline, as editorials. Although initially happy with the arrangement, Marx complained of the pay ($5 an article, later raised to $10), of the fact that he was not paid for pieces that were not published, and of the editorial mangling of what he had written. In one moment of particular vexation—he had received no fees for months—he confided to his friend Frederick Engels that the whole arrangement was one of pure exploitation:

> It is truly nauseating that one should be condemned to count it a blessing when taken aboard a blotting paper vendor such as this. To crush up bones, grind them and make them into a soup like [that given] to paupers in a workhouse—that is the political work to which one is constrained in such large measure in a concern like this ...[4]

On other occasions Marx expressed himself as pleased to find an outlet for his views and the results of his research into British social conditions. He wrote about the everyday problems of British workers, about the Indian mutiny, the Crimean War, Italian unification, French financial scandals, and Britain's disgraceful Opium Wars.[5]

For obvious reasons, the one topic Marx did not cover was events in the United States. In February 1861 the Tribune responded to the crisis by dropping all its foreign correspondents except Marx. However, the paper, finding room for few of his dispatches, soon ceased paying him. He accordingly found another outlet for his journalism, the Viennese paper Die Presse, which, unlike the Tribune, expected him to write about the extraordinary conflict unfolding in North America; most of the longer articles reprinted in this book first appeared in Die Presse.

Abraham Lincoln had a rather more unalloyed experience of exploitation as a young man, since he worked for no pay on his father's farm until the age of twenty-one. Indeed, the elder Lincoln would hire out Abraham's services to other farmers, without handing over any payment to his son. In later life his relations with his father were cool and distant.[6] Marx obtained a doctorate from one of Germany's leading universities; Lincoln had only one year of formal education. Acquiring a license to practice law required no academic credential, but simply a judge willing to swear in the candidate and vouch that he was of good character. Working for a law firm was itself an education, one that evidently allowed Lincoln to hone his skills as a reasoner and advocate. His legal business prospered, and he came to embody the social mobility that was linked to the celebration of "free labor." As he was first a Whig and later a Republican, it is likely that he read quite a few of the articles Marx wrote for the Tribune, signed or otherwise, since this paper was favored by those interested in reform and the fate of the Republican Party. Marx was probably unaware of Lincoln, a one-term representative from Illinois, until the later 1850s, when Lincoln shot to prominence because of his debates with Stephen Douglas, as the two men contended to become senator for Illinois. Lincoln was nine years older than Marx; even so, it is still a little strange to read Marx's affectionate references to him as the "old man" in the mid-1860s.

Marx and Lincoln both saw slavery as a menace to the spirit of republican institutions. But Lincoln believed that the genius of the Constitution could cage and contain the unfortunate slaveholders until such time as it might be possible to wind up slavery in some gradual and compensated manner. Marx saw the progressive potential of the republic in a different light. Its institutions, however flawed, as least allowed the partisans of revolutionary change openly to canvass the need for organization against capitalism and expropriation of the slaveholders.

In this introduction I explore why two men who occupied very different worlds and held contrary views nevertheless coincided on an issue of historic importance and even brought those worlds into fleeting contact with one another, and how the Civil War and Reconstruction—which Eric Foner has called America's unfinished revolution[7]—offered great opportunities and challenges to Marx and to the supporters of the International in the United States. Furthermore, I will urge that the Civil War and its sequel had a larger impact on Marx than is often realized—and, likewise, that the ideas of Marx and Engels had a greater impact on the United States, a country famous for its imperviousness to socialism, than is usually allowed.

It is, of course, well known that Karl Marx was an enthusiastic supporter of the Union in the US Civil War and that on behalf of the International Workingmen's Association he drafted an address to Abraham Lincoln congratulating the president on his reelection in 1864. The US ambassador in London conveyed a friendly but brief response from the president. However, the antecedents and implications of this little exchange are rarely considered.

By the close of 1864 many European liberals and radicals were coming round to supporting the North, but Marx had done so from the outset. To begin with, the cause of the South had a definite appeal to liberals and radicals, partly because many of them distrusted strong states and championed the right of small nations to self-determination. Lincoln himself insisted in 1861 that the North was fighting to defend the Union, not to free the slaves. Many European liberals were impressed by the fact that the secessions had been carried out by reasonably representative assemblies. The slaves had had no say in the matter, but then very few blacks in the loyal states had a vote, either, and hundreds of thousands remained slaves.

If the Civil War was not about the defense of slavery, as many claimed, then the pure argument for Unionism was a weak one. Progressive opinion in Europe was supportive of a right to self-determination and in 1830 had not been at all disturbed when

For further discussion of whether these events amounted to a revolution, finished or otherwise, see Philip Shaw Paludan, "What Did the Winners Win?" in Writing the Civil War: the Quest to Understand, James McPherson and William Cooper, eds., Columbia, SC, 1998, pp. 174–200. However, Foner's conclusions concerning the winners seem to me closer to the mark than Paludan's, as I will explain below.

Belgium separated from the Netherlands, nor would it be in 1905 when Norway split from Sweden. Had the Netherlands or Sweden resorted to war to defend these unions, they would have been widely condemned. Consider, also, that Garibaldi began his career as a freedom fighter in the late 1830s as a partisan of the Republic of Rio Grande do Sul, a breakaway from the Empire of Brazil. Marx himself denounced Britain's dominion over Ireland. In December 1860, Horace Greeley, who had just replaced Dana as editor of the New York Tribune, wrote an editorial arguing that though the Secession was very wrong, it should not be resisted by military means. There were also minority currents in the European labor and socialist movement who preferred Southern agrarianism to the commercial society of the North.

The attitude toward the war of many outside North America greatly depended on whether or not slavery was seen as a crucial stake in the conflict. Some members of the British government were inclined to recognize the Confederacy, and if they had done so this would have been a major boost to the South. But ever since 1807, when Britain abolished its Atlantic slave trade, the British government had made suppression of Atlantic slave trafficking central to the Pax Britannica. When Lord Palmerston, as foreign secretary, negotiated a free trade agreement with an Atlantic state, he invariably accompanied it with a treaty banning slave trading. During the Opium Wars, British war ships were sent by Palmerston to demand that China should allow the drug traffic to continue in the name of free trade and pay compensation to British merchants whose stock they had seized.[8] Marx found the hypocrisy of "Pam" and the British breathtaking:

> Their first main grievance is that the present American war is "not one for the abolition of slavery' and that, therefore, the high-minded Britisher, used to undertake wars of his own and interest himself in other people's wars only on the basis of 'broad humanitarian principles," cannot be expected to feel any sympathy for his Northern cousins.[9]

[9] Karl Marx, "The American Question in England," New York Daily Tribune, October 11, 1861.

Withering as he was about the British government's humbug, he was well aware that large sections of the British people, including much of the working class, were genuinely hostile to slavery. The slaves in the British colonies had been emancipated during 1834–8, following a slave uprising in Jamaica and sustained, large-scale popular mobilizations in Britain itself. Public opinion was sensitized to the issue and uncomfortably aware of the country's dependence on slave-grown cotton. If it became apparent that the secessionists really were fighting simply to defend slavery, it would be extraordinarily difficult for the London government to recognize the Confederacy.

MARX REJECTS ECONOMIC EXPLANATIONS OF THE WAR

From the beginning, Marx was intensely scornful of those who supported what he saw as basically a slaveholders' revolt. He insisted that it was quite erroneous to claim, as some did, that this was a quarrel about economic policy. Summarizing what he saw as the wrongheaded view espoused by influential British voices, he wrote:

> The war between North and South [they claim] is a mere tariff war, a war between a tariff system and a free trade system, and England naturally stands on the side of free trade. It was reserved to the Times [of London] to make this brilliant discovery…The Economist expounded the theme further…Yes [they argued] it would be different if the war was waged for the abolition of slavery! The question of slavery, however, [they claim] has absolutely nothing to do with this war. Then as now, the Economist was a tireless advocate of the "free market."

Marx's unhesitating support for the North did not mean that he was unaware of its grave defects as a champion of free labor. He openly attacked the timidity of its generals and the venality of many of its public servants. Nevertheless he saw the Civil War as a decisive turning point in nineteenth-century history. A victory for the North would set the scene for slave emancipation and be a great step forward for the workers' cause on both sides of the Atlantic. Support for the North was a touchstone issue, he believed, and it became central to his efforts to build the International Workingmen's Association.

Marx's political choice stemmed from an early analysis of the roots of the war in which he refused to define the struggle in the terms first adopted by the belligerents themselves. Marx's well-known conviction that politics is rooted in antagonistic social relations led him to focus on the structural features of the two sections, and the emergence therein of contradictory interests and forms of social life. Marx and Engels were quite well informed about US developments. Many of their friends and comrades had emigrated to the United States during the years of reaction that followed the failure of the European revolutions of 1848. With few exceptions those émigrés had gone to the North, especially the Northwest, rather than to the South. Marx and Engels corresponded with the émigrés and wrote for, and read, their newspapers.

Marx and Engels were well aware of the privileged position of slaveholders in the structure of the American state, but believed that this privilege was menaced by the growth of the North and Northwest. Lincoln's election was a threat to the Southern stranglehold on the republic's central institutions, as embodied in Supreme Court rulings, cross-sectional party alignments, and fugitive slave legislations. In July 1861 Marx writes to Engels:

> I have come to the conclusion that the conflict between the South and the North—for 50 years the latter has been climbing down, making one concession after another—has at last been brought to a head…by the weight which the extraordinary development of the Northwestern states has thrown into the scales. The population there, with its rich admixture of newly arrived Germans and Englishmen and, moreover, largely made up self-working farmers, did not, of course, lend itself so readily to intimidation as the gentlemen of Wall Street and the Quakers of Boston.[10]

One might wish this expressed a little more delicately and appreciatively—the Quakers had played a courageous role in resisting the slaveholders—but it is quite true that many of the Germans and English who sought refuge in the United States after 1848 brought with them a secular radicalism that changed and strengthened the antislavery cause in the United States by broadening its base of support. Before considering the nature of what might be called the German corrective it will be helpful to look at the evolution of Marx's analysis.

[10] Marx to Engels, July 1, 1861, from Karl Marx and Frederick Engels's Collected Works, Volume 41, Marx and Engels 1860–64, London 1985, p. 114.

The clear premise of Marx's argument is that the North was expanding at a faster pace than the South—as indeed it was. But Marx contends that it is the South that is consumed by the need to expand territorially. The expansion of the North and Northwest, as Marx well knew, was even more rapid, a reflection of a momentous industrial growth and far-reaching commercialization of farming. The North and the Northwest, with a combined population of 20 million, were now linked by an extensive network of railroads and canals. The South might talk about King Cotton, but the truth was that economic growth in the South was not at all as broadly based as that in the North. Cotton exports were growing, but little else. In 1800 the South had the same population as the North; by 1860, it was only a little more than half as large, 11 million persons, about 7.5 million being Southern whites and 3.5 million slaves.

In Marx's view, the South had three motives for territorial expansion. First, its agriculture exhausted the soil, and so planters were constantly in quest of new land. Second, the slave states needed to maintain their veto power in the Senate, and for this purpose needed to mint new slave states just as fast as new "free" states were recognized. Third, there was in the South a numerous class of restive young white men anxious to make their fortune, and the leaders of Southern society were persuaded that an external outlet must be found for them if they were not to become disruptive domestically.[11]

By itself the argument that there was a shortage of land in the

However there is no space here to print all Marx's writings on the United States and the Civil War. These are to be found either in the Collected Works, or in the already-cited collection edited by Saul Padover, or in Karl Marx and Frederick Engels, The Civil War in the United States, third ed., New York 1961, pp. 57–71.

South has limited validity. Expansion of the railroads could have brought more lands into cultivation. Additionally, the planters could have made better use of fertilizers, as did planters in Cuba. If there was a shortage, it was a shortage of slaves, relative to the boom in the cotton plantation economy of the 1850s.

Combined with the third point—the mass of restless filibusters[12]—the shortage argument gained more purchase. There was no absolute shortage of land and slaves, but planters could offer only so much support to their children. Southern whites had large families, and there was a surplus of younger sons who wished to make their way in the world. In the 1850s these young men—with what Marx called their "turbulent longings"—had been attracted to "filibustering" expeditions aimed at Cuba and Nicaragua—just as similar adventurers had sought glory and fortune in Texas and Mexico. Their parents might not always approve of freelance methods, but did see the attraction of acquiring new lands.

Undoubtedly Marx's clinching argument was that which referred to political factors:

> In order to maintain its influence in the Senate, and through the Senate its hegemony over the United States, the South therefore requires a continual formation of new slave states. This, however, was only possible through conquest of foreign lands, as in the case of Texas, and through the transformation of the territories belonging to the United States first into slave territories and then into slave states.[13]

---

[12] During this period the term filibuster meant an irregular military adventurer, particularly one from the United States who hoped to seize land abroad, especially in Latin America.

[13] Marx, "The North American Civil War." Marx's stress on the centrality of political issues can be compared with the brilliant analysis offered by Barrington Moore Jr., in The Social Origins of Dictatorship and Democracy (New York 1969, pp. 111–58). Moore writes: "The fundamental issue became more and more whether the machinery of the Federal government should be used to support one society or the other" (p. 136). Although Moore's analysis stands up very well, it does not sufficiently register three vital aspects to which I will be paying particular attention: the rise of nationalism, the role of African American resistance, and the awakening of the working classes. Directly or indirectly, Marx's articles and letters do address these issues. For other accounts that were influenced by Marx, see Eric Foner, "The Causes of the American

He concluded:

> The whole movement was and is based, as one sees, on the slave question. Not in the sense of whether the slaves in the existing slave states should be emancipated or not, but whether twenty million free men of the North should subordinate themselves any longer to an oligarchy of three hundred thousand slaveholders.[14]

As social science and as journalism this was impressive, but it did not bring Marx to the political conclusion at which he aimed. The political subordination of Northerners—scarcely the equivalent of slavery—would be ended by Southern secession. Marx was focused on the possibility of destroying true chattel slavery, which he knew to be a critical component of the reigning capitalist order. He further insisted that it was folly to imagine that the slaveholders, aroused and on the warpath, would be satisfied by Northern recognition of the Confederacy. Rather, it would open the way to an aggressive South that would strive to incorporate the border states and extend slaveholder hegemony throughout North America. He reminded his readers that it was under Southern leadership that the Union had sought to introduce "the armed propaganda of slavery in Mexico, Central and South America."[15] Spanish Cuba, with its flourishing slave system, had already been singled out as the slave power's next prey.

Marx's argument and belief was that the real confrontation was between two social regimes, one based on slavery and the other on free labor: "The struggle has broken out because the two systems can no longer live peaceably side by side on the North American continent. It can only be ended by the victory of one system or the other." In this mortal struggle the North, however moderate its initial inclinations, would eventually be driven to revolutionary measures.

Civil War," in Foner's Politics and Ideology in the Age of the Civil War (Oxford 1980, pp. 15–33) and John Ashworth, Slavery, Capitalism and Politics in the Antebellum Republic, Vol. 2, The Coming of the Civil War, Cambridge 2007.

[14] "The North American Civil War," p. 71.

[15] "The North American Civil War," p. 71. Marx's argument was on target. See Robert May, The Southern Dream of Caribbean Empire, London 2002.

Marx believed that the polity favored by the Southern slaveowners was very different from the republic aspired to by Northerners. He did not spell out all his reasons, but he was essentially right about this. Southern slaveholders wished to see a Federal state that would uphold slave property; that would return and deter slave runaways, as laid down in the Fugitive Slave Act of 1850; and that would allow slaveholding Southerners access to Federal territories. The planters were happy that the antebellum state was modest in size and competence, since this meant low taxes and little or no interference with their "peculiar institution."[16] They did not favor either high tariffs or expensive internal improvements. But this restricted view of the state was accompanied by provisions that affected the lives of Northerners in quite intimate ways. The fugitive slave law of 1850 required all citizens to cooperate with the Federal marshals in apprehending runaways. In the Southern view, slaveholders should be free to bring slaves to Federal territories, an importation seen as an unwelcome and unfair intrusion by migrants from the Northern states, whether they were antislavery or simply antiblack. Southerners had favored censorship of the Federal mail, to prevent its use for abolitionist literature. They supported a foreign policy that pursued future acquisitions suitable for plantation development. But they did not want a state that had the power to intervene in the special internal arrangements of the slave states themselves. For them, a Republican president with the power to appoint thousands of Federal officials in the Southern states and with no intention of suppressing radical abolitionists spelled great danger.

Marx did not support the North because he believed that its victory would directly lead to socialism. Rather, he saw in South and North two species of capitalism—one allowing slavery, the other not. The then existing regime of American society and economy embraced the enslavement of four million people whose enforced toil produced the republic's most valuable export, cotton, as well as much tobacco, sugar, rice, and turpentine. Defeating the slave power was going to be difficult. The wealth and pride of the 300,000 slaveholders (there were actually 395,000 slave owners, according to the 1860 Census, but at the time Marx was writing this had not yet been published) was at stake. These slaveholders were able to corrupt or intimidate many of the poor Southern whites, and they had rich and influential supporters among the merchants, bankers and textile manufacturers of New York, London and Paris. Defeating the slave power and freeing the slaves would not destroy capitalism, but it would create conditions far more favorable to organizing and elevating labor, whether white or black. Marx portrayed the wealthy slave owners as akin to Europe's aristocrats, and their removal as a task for the sort of democratic revolution he had advocated in the Communist Manifesto as the immediate aim for German revolutionaries.

LINCOLN ON MOB VIOLENCE AND THE RIGHT OF REVOLUTION

Lincoln, as a Whig brought up in Kentucky and southern Illinois, was quite familiar with the tensions created by slavery in the borderlands between South and North. His wife's close relatives were slaveholders; one of his great uncles owned forty slaves. As a moderate Whig and, later, moderate Republican, Lincoln was ready to uphold the legal and constitutional rights of slaveholders. But he worried about the nation's coherence and integrity. The earliest statement of his political philosophy, his speech "On the Perpetuation of Our Political Institutions," delivered at the Young Men's Lyceum in Springfield in 1838, gives expression to his pride in US political institutions. But it also expresses deep dismay at the growing streak of lawlessness he sees in American life. He was alarmed at rising antagonism stemming from race, slavery and abolition, citing the summary execution of blacks believed to be plotting rebellion; the wanton killing of a mulatto; and attacks on law-abiding abolitionists by violent mobs, leading to the death of Elijah Lovejoy, editor of an antislavery paper. These events violated the rule of law that should be every citizen's "political religion."[17] As he will have been aware, such mob actions were orchestrated by self-described "men of property and standing," the supposedly patriotic allies of Southern politicians—at this point all parties were cross-sectional in their support. The rioters portrayed the Abolitionists as the pawns of a foreign—specifically British—plot against America.[18] Here were disturbing signs that the republic's institutions were infected by an uncontrollable and deep-seated malady. Lincoln feared for a future in which some aspiring tyrant would establish his personal rule "at the expense of emancipating slaves or enslaving free men."[19] The lawless threat might come either from slaveholders or from abolitionists.

Lincoln's stress on the republic of laws and due process was accompanied by a defense of the need for a National Bank to collect and disburse the public revenues and by his consequent hostility to Van Buren's proposal that revenues should instead be entrusted to local "sub-treasuries." In a major speech he gave as a member of the Illinois state legislature Lincoln attacked this scheme. In Lincoln's view the Bank, run as a privately-owned public corporation, had two decisive advantages. Firstly, it put the money deposited with it to work, earning interest and furnishing credit, where the unspent revenue would simply rust away in the network of sub-treasury lock boxes. Secondly the National Bank better served align the "duty" and the "interest" of Bank officials than would a dispersed chain of sub-treasuries. As a permanent corporation the Bank knew that it would only continue to be entrusted with the public revenues if it proved a faithful custodian. The shifting personnel of a scattered network of sub-treasury officials in each state would be far more vulnerable to individual frailty or fecklessness (leading to the wry comment: "it may not be improper here to add, that Judas carried the bag, was the Sub-Treasurer of the Savior and his disciples"[20]).

Already at this comparatively early period, Lincoln saw corporate capital and credit as a fructifying force, idealizing corporate ownership and distrusting public initiatives in the realm of finance.

When elected to the House of Representatives in Washington, Lincoln's first act (in January 1848) was to denounce the victorious and almost concluded war with Mexico as unnecessary, unconstitutional, and the result of presidential mendacity and aggression.[21] While not pinning the blame for the war on slavery, as some did, and while accepting its result as a fait accompli, Lincoln backed David Wilmot's motion, which stipulated that slavery should be entirely excluded from any newly acquired land. Slavery had been abolished in Mexico in 1829, during the administration of Vicente Guerrero, and there was a real prospect that the self-proclaimed champions of "Anglo-Saxon freedom" would reestablish slavery in lands where it had already been eliminated.[22]

In the course of his speech attacking the way the Mexican war had been launched, Lincoln delivered the following judgment:

> Any people anywhere being inclined and having the power, have the right to rise up and shake off the existing government, and form a new one that suits them better. This is a most valuable, a most sacred right—a right which, we hope and believe, is to liberate the world. Nor is this right confined to cases in which the whole people of an existing government may choose to exercise it. Any portion of such a people that can, may revolutionize, and make their own so much of the territory as they inhabit. More than this, a majority of any portion of such a people may revolutionize, putting down a minority, intermingled with or near about them, who may oppose their movements. Such a minority was precisely the case of > the Tories in our own Revolution. It is a quality of revolutions not to go by old lines, or old laws.[23]

This blunt and brusque version of the "self-determination" principle was offered as the right way to look at Mexico's "revolution" against Spain and Texas's "revolution" against Mexico. Its terms might easily endorse "settler sovereignty," but Lincoln was later to enter a crucial caveat on this point (to be considered below).

Lincoln set out his views on slavery in a series of major speeches that defined him as a politician. These included one in Peoria in 1854 that dwelled on the implications of the Kansas-Nebraska Act and offered a sketch of the republic's successive attempts to compromise over slavery; the "House Divided" speech in 1858, delivered to a Republican convention; several speeches he gave as a Republican senatorial candidate in debate with Stephen Douglas (including one devoted to the Dred Scott ruling); and a speech at the Cooper Union in New York, in 1860. Put together, they make a weighty tome, and no other Republican leader devoted such sustained attention to the topic. The speeches often lasted two or three hours, were each heard by audiences of several thousand, and were reprinted verbatim in sympathetic newspapers. Southern leaders and opinion formers became familiar with their contents. Characteristically, they are quite unrelenting about the wrongs of slavery, but also moderate in their conclusions. Once he became a presidential candidate, Lincoln reiterated his respect for the compromises embodied in the US Constitution and the compromise acts of 1820 and 1850, but he opposed any further concessions. He favored an end to slavery in the Federal district in Washington because such a move was not excluded by those agreements. Likewise he opposes the Dred Scott ruling allowing slaves to be brought into Federal territory. But he was prepared to recognize and implement established law, including that relating to fugitives. For the long term Lincoln believed that means should be found gradually to emancipate the slaves, for example by freeing the children born to slave mothers once the children reached the age of 25, or some other alternative that gave compensation to their owners and allowed the former slaves to be settled in Africa. Abolitionists like William Lloyd Garrison had long attacked the latter idea. It was associated with Whig slaveholders, notably Henry Clay, a man much admired by Lincoln, who supported what was known as the colonization of African Americans, treating them as aliens in the land where most of them had been born and inviting them to "return" to the land of their ancestors.

[23] Basler, Abraham Lincoln: His Speeches and Writings, p. 209. Lincoln was at this time involved in a group that called itself the Young Indians. He was hugely impressed by a speech against the Mexican War delivered by Alexander Stephens of Georgia, another member of the group, in which he attacked hostilities that were "aggressive and degrading," since they involved "waging a war against a neighboring people to compel them to sell their country." Stephens insisted that facing such a prospect he would himself prefer to perish on "the funeral pyre of liberty" rather than sell "the land of my home." Stephens, who remained friendly to Lincoln, was, of course, to become vice president of the Confederacy. The quoted excerpts are from Basler, p. 214.

Lincoln's support for colonization separated him from the main currents of abolitionism, but his concern for the integrity of the Federal state, his early disapproval of the lawlessness of the defenders of slavery, and his distaste for the slaveholders' demand for special treatment all signal themes that characterized the Republican Party of the 1850s. Unlike the Radicals, he did not fulminate against the "slave power," but he did attack the exorbitant representation of Southern white men in the House of Representatives and electoral college, which came about because the slave population of each state was counted when apportioning delegates, with each slave deemed equivalent to three-fifths of a free man. He sought a new and more demanding ideal of the nation and the republic. Whereas antebellum US national feeling characteristically deferred to the slaveholders, the Republicans sponsored a new vision of the nation that challenged the South's claim to special consideration. In the Republican view, if slaves could be brought into Federal territories then the incoming slaveholders would be able to grab the best land and develop it more rapidly than free farmers. The Republicans also favored public improvements and free education. The Republican vision had great appeal in the regions characterized by cheap and rapid transportation, the growth of manufacturing, and the spread of the "market revolution."[24] This surge of growth spread wealth quite broadly among farmers, artisans, and small businessmen, in contrast to the South, where the cotton boom enriched a narrower circle of slave owners and their hangers-on.[25] Lincoln believed that the broad prosperity of the North and the Northwest was rooted in its free labor system, a view shared by Marx. Republican pride in the progress of the free states repelled the Southern mainstream. Lincoln won 40 percent of the popular vote in 1860, but all of these votes came from the free states.

That Lincoln detested slavery was clear from his speeches and writings, and it is not surprising that he sketched half a dozen different key arguments on the topic in his notebooks.[26] He was also willing to talk about complex and gradual schemes of compensated emancipation. But as a national leader, what he offered was not an attack on slavery but implacable resistance to its territorial expansion. The puzzle here can only be resolved by identifying what else it was about his outlook and deepest convictions that restrained his evidently sincere opposition to slavery. The answer is probably his profound attachment to the Constitution and his awareness that within that Constitution it would be extraordinarily difficult to change the historic compromise the document represented between North and South, slavery and freedom. Lincoln's patriotism was even stronger than his dislike of slavery and obliged him, he believed, to accommodate to the latter out of due regard for a nation established by, and catering to, Southern slaveholders.

RIVAL NATIONALISMS?

The Republican Party was founded to defend the rights of "free labor" and to fight for a ban on slavery in Federal territories. The Republicans also adopted the "agrarian" stakeholder view, a semi-socialist idea that any man wishing to become a farmer should be given land for a homestead in the Federal territories, a proposal that was to be translated into legislation in 1862. Lincoln had worked hard, educated himself, and become a prominent attorney and political figure. This background reinforced his belief that the free labor system allowed a man to make his way in the world. The Republicans also supported a system of public education for all and the foundation of a chain of "land grant" colleges, namely colleges endowed with revenue from the sale of public land. Lincoln believed that the pacts that had made the United States must be respected, but he also held that in the long run the nation could not remain half slave and half free.

Marx did not directly compare the claims of North and South as competing nationalisms. Instead he questioned whether the South was a nation, writing, "'The South,' however, is neither a territory strictly detached from the North geographically, nor a moral unity. It is not a country at all, but a battle slogan." Many who were much closer to the situation than Marx entered the same judgment in the years before 1861, yet soon had to acknowledge that the Confederacy did rapidly acquire many of the ideological trappings of a nation, complete with a claimed "moral unity" based on exaltation of the racial conceits and values of a slave society and of the conviction that white Southerners were the true Americans. Their values were a strange mixture of traditional patriotism and paternalism and—for whites alone—libertarianism. Hundreds of thousands of white Southerners who owned no slaves nevertheless fought and died for the rebellion, seeing the Confederacy as the embodiment of their racial privileges and rural civilization. The rebels were fighting for a cause that embodied a way of life, one that embraced minimal taxation and extensive "states' rights." The mass of slaveless whites not only had the vote but also enjoyed the "freedom of the range," which is to say that they could graze their animals on vast tracts of public land and on uncultivated private land. They also enjoyed significant hunting rights. Such privileges allowed them to live, as they put it, "high on the hog." Engels pointed out to Marx that the secession movement had backing from the generality of whites in the more developed and populous parts of the South.[27]

Southern nationalism itself responded to, and stimulated, Unionist or Yankee nationalism.[28] Whereas patriotism was about the past, the new nationalist idea, a reflection of modernity, was about the future. Even at a time when truly industrial methods only affected a few branches of society, "print capitalism" and the "market revolution" were already transforming public space and time. The new steam presses poured out a torrent of newspapers, magazines, and novels, all of them summoning up rival "imagined communities."[29] Rail and cable further accelerated the dynamics of agreement and contradiction. Harriet Beecher Stowe's Uncle Tom's Cabin appeared first as serial installments in a newspaper, then as a book. It moved the Northern reader to tears, but seemed a grotesque libel to Southerners. The North's imagined community could not embrace the slaveholder, let alone the degraded slave traders, and the South's drew the line at the abolitionist and the radical newspaper editor. That incompatible national imaginings played a part in precipitating the conflict by no means takes away from the underlying discrepancy between the two social formations.

That the Civil War was an "irrepressible conflict," that its roots lay in the different labor regimes of the two sections, and that these differences crystallized in opposing images of the good society are not novel propositions. Different versions of them have been entertained by, among many others, such notable historians as David Potter, Don Fehrenbacker, Eric Foner, Eugene Genovese, John Ashworth and Bruce Levine.[30] The idea that rival nationalisms played their part is an extension of such views, but Daniel Crofts points to the difficulty of pinpointing the exact moment of their birth:

[28] Many historians reject out of hand, as Marx did, the idea that there was a Southern nationalism. Often they do so because they do not wish in any way to endorse the Confederacy or the later cult of Dixie. This is understandable, but wrong, as Drew Gilpin Faust has argued in an important study of the topic. Nationalism can be flawed and self-destructive, and it can change for better or worse. See Faust's The Creation of Confederate Nationalism: Ideology and Identity in the Civil War South, Baton Rouge 1989. See also Manisha Sinha's The Counter-Revolution of Slavery, Chapel Hill 2000, pp. 63–94. For the general argument, see Tom Nairn, Faces of Nationalism, London 1995.

> It is tempting to project back onto the prewar months the fiercely aroused nationalisms that appeared in mid-April [1861]. To do so would not be entirely in error, but it invites distortion. The irreconcilably antagonistic North and South described by historians such as Foner and Genovese were much easier to detect after April 15. Then and only then could Northerners start to think in terms of a conflict urged on behalf of "the general interests of self-government" and the hopes of humanity and the interests of freedom among all peoples and for ages to come.[31]

But this account gives too much to Unionist rhetoric. The Union's war aim was quite simply the preservation of the Union, and the frustration of "the interests of self-government" as understood by the majority of Southern whites. Both nationalisms had a markedly expansive character, but the Union's was purely continental at this stage, whereas the Confederacy's looked toward South America (notably to Cuba) as well as to the west. The clash was thus one of rival empires as well as competing nations.

It was the election of Abraham Lincoln that precipitated Secession. Lincoln's positions on slavery, as we have seen, were moderate—he took his stand only against any expansion of slavery, as he carefully explained in his exchanges with Stephen Douglas in the 1850s. But he represented a dangerous figure for Southern slaveholders nonetheless, because he attacked slavery as a wrong and because he concentrated on this issue to the virtual exclusion of any other. If Marx was right about the inherently expansionist character of Southern slavery, then Lincoln's modest but firm stance against it was enough to provoke them to the desperate expedient of secession. As I have already noted, there was no real space constraint—and if there had been, Kansas was not the right place for cotton plantations—but Lincoln's presidency rankled for other reasons.

The vehement speeches that defined Lincoln's emergence as a Republican challenger were insulting as well as alarming to Southern ears. He was not more radical than other Republicans in his conclusions—rather the reverse—but he was more consistent and unwavering in his focus, and that was very unsettling.[32] How could his appointees be trusted? How would he and they respond to any future John Brown–style adventure? Many leading Southerners, though exercised by such dangers, nevertheless still at first opposed secession (Alexander Stephens, the future Confederate vice president, being a case in point), on the grounds that it was fraught with even worse danger—revolutions invariably destroy those who start them. But the more moderate Southerners were at the mercy of the more extreme. The departure of one slave state, let alone five or more, would decisively weaken the remaining Southern states' position in Washington. Such a conclusion belongs to the realm of rational calculation, but at a certain point, the clash of two incompatible nationalisms—and the sense of rightfulness and justification they entail—is needed to explain the willingness to engage in a life-and-death struggle.

Marx had scorn for national one-sidedness and self-satisfaction, but he did see a sequence of national revolutions as necessary to the war against aristocracy and monarchy. He may not have been fully aware of the extent to which he saw both German nationalism and North American nationalism as progressive forces. In 1861 his options stemmed from a conviction that the Civil War had a good prospect of destroying the world's major bastion of chattel slavery and racial oppression. But he was also aware that ideas produced by the German national revolution were helping to redefine the Union.

[32] Lincoln's steady focus on slavery after 1854 emerges clearly in Foner's The Fiery Trial.

THE GERMAN AMERICANS

This brings us to the too often neglected contribution of the German Americans. Bruce Levine's study The Spirit of 1848 shows the transformative impact of the huge German immigration around the midcentury.[33] At this time the level of immigration was rising to new heights, and Germans comprised between a third and a half of all newcomers. In the single year 1853, over a quarter of a million German immigrants arrived. The German Americans soon became naturalized and formed an important pool of votes for those who knew how to woo them. To begin with, Democratic rhetoric had some impact on them, but by the mid-1850s many German Americans were attracted to the Republicans, and they in turn helped to make Republicanism and the antislavery position more broadly attractive.

Protestant evangelicalism strongly influenced US abolitionism. The evangelical repudiation of slavery was very welcome, but eventually too close an association between the two served to limit antislavery's base. The evangelicals twinned antislavery with temperance and Protestantism, and this diminished the appeal of abolitionism in the eyes of many Catholics and not a few freethinkers. Already in the 1830s William Lloyd Garrison and William Channing were seeking to root the antislavery critique in more rationalist varieties of Protestant Christianity. There was also a current of radical English immigration that inclined to antislavery and the secular politics of Tom Paine.[34] But the large-scale German influx greatly strengthened the secular culture of antislavery. With their breweries, beer gardens, musical concerts, and turnverein (exercise clubs), the German radicals furnished a strong secular current in the antislavery movement, and even the German Protestants had concerns which differentiated them from the US Methodists and Baptists.

The temperance cause loomed large for evangelicals but had no charm for German and Nordic immigrants. The more radical German Americans supported women's rights and female suffrage;

Mathilda Anneke published a German-language women's paper. Margarete Schurz was influential in the introduction of public kindergartens. Sometimes Marx's German American followers are portrayed as deferring to the prejudices of white, male trade unionists, but this is unfair. When Joseph Wedemeyer, Marx's longtime friend and comrade, helped to found the American Workers League (Amerikanische Arbeitersbund) in Chicago in 1853, its founding statement of principles declared that "all workers who live in the United States without distinction of occupation, language, color, or sex can become members."[35] Today such a formula sounds entirely conventional, but in 1853 it was very fresh. Indeed, this may have been the first occasion on which a workers' organization adopted it. The revolutionary German Americans did not invent this stance all by themselves, but they did readily adopt a critique of racial and gender exclusion pioneered by radical abolitionists. Like other exiles, the German Americans quarreled with one another, some inclining to the Republicans and others opting for purely labor-oriented groups, and Marx's followers shared this division. Many saw the founding of a labor party as the long-term goal, but even some of those closest to Marx, like Wedemeyer, also saw a tactical need to strengthen the Republicans and attack the slave power. Indeed, August Nimtz concludes that "the Marx party, specifically through Wedemeyer…played an important role in winning the German émigré community to the Republican cause."[36]

The mass of German Americans were naturally hostile to the nativist chauvinism of the Know Nothings (or American Party). The Republican Party only emerged as the dominant force in the North in the 1850s by defeating the Know Nothings and repudiating its own nativist temptation. While some Republican leaders flirted with nativist prejudice, the party itself attacked—even demonized—"the Slave Power" and not the immigrants. The presence of hundreds of thousands of German American voters helped to ensure this orientation.[37]

[35] Levine, The Spirit of 1848, p. 125. In later decades some German Americans did indeed soft-pedal women's rights when seeking to recruit Irish American trade unionists, but while this should be duly noted, it is far from characterizing all German Americans, whether followers of Marx or not. For an interesting study that sometimes veers towards caricature, see Timothy Messer-Kruse, The Yankee International, 1848–76: Marxism and the American Reform Tradition, Chapel Hill 1998. This author has a justifiable pride in the native American radical tradition and some valid criticisms of some of the positions adopted by German American "Marxists," but he is so obsessed with pitting the two ethnic political cultures against one another that he fails to notice how effectively they often combined, especially in the years 1850–70. See Paul Buhle, Marxism in the United States, New York 1983, for a more balanced assessment.

[36] Nimtz, Marx and Engels, p. 170.

As the Civil War unfolded, German Americans and their overseas friends furnished vital support to the Northern cause. At the outbreak of the war, a German American militia in St. Louis played a key role in preventing Missouri's governor from delivering the state—and the city's huge arsenal—into Confederate hands. Wedemeyer became a colonel, served as a staff officer in St. Louis for General John Frémont, and was put in charge of the city's defenses. Eventually 200,000 Germans fought for the Union, with 36,000 fighting in German-speaking units. Carl Schurz became a major general, and later a senator. Franz Sigel and Alexander Schimmelfennig became generals. Two other members of the Communist League who also became Unionist officers were August Willich and Fritz Anneke. Indeed, the correspondence of Marx and Engels is studded with references to the military progress of these friends and acquaintances. The imperative to rally against the "Slave Power" also alleviated the sometimes bitter differences of émigré politics.

The military resources represented by the wider German-American enrollment were very significant, but the same could be said of the Irish American contingents, which grew to be just as large. The German Americans brought with them an openness to the antislavery idea that was to promote a new sense of the character of the war and the way it should be fought. Reviewing a recent collection of hundreds of letters written by German American volunteers, Kenneth Barkin writes: "the major reason for volunteering [for the Union army] was to bring slavery to an end."[38] This new research very much vindicates Levine's argument in The Spirit of 1848.

The veterans of 1848 saw themselves as social revolutionaries but also as exponents of a national idea and movement. Whatever their ambivalence—and it was considerable—they were aware of the lessons of the Napoleonic epoch and of the nationalist renewal that it had provoked in Germany. One of the most striking expressions of this movement had been the doctrines of Carl von Clausewitz—his contention that war was the continuation of politics by other means, his attention to moral factors, and his insistence on the priority of destroying the enemy's social basis rather than capturing territory or capital cities. Clausewitz's magnum opus, On War, had been published in 1832, and its ideas had currency among the 1848 veterans. Unionist military strategy at first ignored the Clausewitzian imperatives and instead preferred the doctrine of Antoine Jomini, a Swiss military theorist who had sympathized with the French Revolution.[39] With few exceptions, Northern commanders were determined to avoid resorting to revolutionary measures, fearing that this would lead to race war. Instead, they relied implicitly on a strategy of blockade and cordons to exhaust the Confederacy and on the capture of Richmond (a strategy that Marx questioned in his article for the March 27, 1862, issue of Die Presse).

At a different level, Francis Lieber, a teacher at Columbia College and a German American of pre-1848 vintage, helped to shape the Union response to the war. The War Department looked to him when devising its rules of military conduct. Lieber played an important role in the Loyal Publication Society. He had been a strong exponent of the need for a party system in the antebellum period, but thought a new approach was needed once fighting began. His pamphlet No Party Now But All for Our Country stressed the wartime need to suppress party conflict and devote all energies to defeating the rebellion. His program for a more thoroughgoing and single-minded mobilization for the war effort was welcomed by the Union Leagues.[40]

The German American mobilization for the Union was disinterested in that it did not ask for anything for itself in return for its support, though it did sometimes urge recognition for the workingman.[41] (Northern Protestant churches gave strong support to the Union, but some of their leaders urged that the time had come for Protestantism to be recognized as the country's official religion.)[42]

The national imagination pitted producers against parasites, or plain folk against snobs. Both Marx and Lincoln used a class-like language in evaluating the conflict. Marx stressed that secession was, above all, the work of aristocratic slaveholders, implicitly absolving the plain folk of the South from responsibility. There were clear majorities for secession in the representatives' gatherings that agreed to the setting up of the Confederacy, with the issue of secession decided by special conventions in ten cases and by the legislature in one other. Scrutiny of these decisions—and the contrary decisions taken by one special convention and three legislatures—shows that the participants were nearly all slaveholders and considerably better off than the average free citizen (only about a third of the heads of Southern households owned slaves). The supporters of immediate secession were considerably richer than those who were lukewarm or opposed. Put another way, those with more slaves—the main form of wealth—were keenest on secession.[43]

Lincoln claimed to find a similar pattern in Washington in the first days of the war as many deserted their posts:

> It is worthy of note that while in this the government's hour of trial large numbers of those in the Army and Navy, who have been favored with offices, [have] proved false to the hand that had pampered them, not one common soldier, or common sailor, is known to have deserted his flag. The most important fact of all is the unanimous firmness of the common soldiers and common sailors…This is the patriotic instinct of the plain people. They understand, without an argument, that destroying the government which was made by Washington means no good to them.[44]

Though certainly invoking class-like qualities, at the same time Lincoln is certainly appealing to national sentiment, just as on the Confederate side there was also, very emphatically, an appeal to the spirit of George Washington (and Thomas Jefferson) and a claim that the common (white) folk were the heart of the nation and that it was they who filled the fighting ranks of the rebel army. (This was true, though by the end of the extraordinarily grueling conflict, Southern desertion rates were to be higher.)

THE NORTH DECIDES TO FIGHT

Lincoln was to spell out an important qualification to the sweeping endorsement of the right of revolution in his Mexican War speech, one that had a direct bearing on the South's right to self-determination. He declared: "The doctrine of self-government is right—absolutely and eternally right—but it has no just application, as here attempted. Or perhaps I should rather say that whether it has such just application depends upon whether a negro is not or is a man. If he is not a man, why in that case, he who is a man may, as a matter of self-government, do just as he pleases with him. But if the negro is a man, is it not to that extent a total destruction of self-government to say that he, too, shall not govern himself?

---

[44] Quoted by William Lee Miller in President Lincoln: the Duty of a Statesman, New York 2008, p. 106.

When the white man governs himself that is self-government, but when he governs himself and also governs another man, that is more than self-government—that is despotism. If the negro is a man, why then my ancient faith teaches me that 'all men are created equal' and that there can be no moral right in connection with one man's making a slave of another."[45]

Lincoln uttered these words in Peoria in 1854 responding to the debate over the Kansas-Nebraska Act and the dispute over the right of communities in the Federal territories to establish themselves as newly formed states, with or without slaves. The principle outlined in the above passage ruled out what Marx called "settler sovereignty." However attractive and compelling Lincoln's argument might be, it could only be urged in favor of Unionist resistance to secession if the Union had itself repudiated slavery. But Lincoln and the majority of Republicans expressly condoned the survival of slavery in the Union and only opposed its extension to the Federal territories.

Once elected, Lincoln's main concern was to court the slaveholding border states and make sure as few of them as possible backed the rebellion. His success in this became the source of his caution in moving against slavery. Amending the Constitution in order to outlaw slavery was anyway out of the question—it would have needed large qualified majorities to pass in Congress and be endorsed by the states. Lincoln also held that the wrong of slavery was a national and not personal affair, and therefore slaveholders should be compensated for their loss of property. Given that the slaves of the South were worth more than all the machines, factories, wharves, railroads, and farm buildings of the North put together, any program of emancipation was going to be very gradual. In his first inaugural address Lincoln declares that the only major difference between the sections was with reference not to slavery as such but to its expansion.

[45] Abraham Lincoln, speech in Peoria (Illinois) on October 16, 1854. Available in Basler, Abraham Lincoln: His Speeches and Writings, pp. 283–325. The quote from the Declaration of Independence strikes a patriotic note, though some might conclude that the speech also queried the break of 1776, given the prominence of slavery in several North American slave colonies. No doubt Lincoln would have insisted that the objection was not available to George III and his governments, since they were massively implicated in slavery, and that at least the Founding Fathers were uneasy about the institution.

Many US historians treat the Northern decision to go to war in a fatalistic way, echoing Lincoln's own later phrase: "And the war came."[46] The Unionist cause—US or American nationalism—is simply taken for granted as an absolute value needing no further explanation or justification. However, Sean Wilentz adopts a bolder line, taking his cue from the Lincoln's first inaugural address:

> Above and beyond the slavery issue, Lincoln unflinchingly defended certain basic ideals of freedom and democratic self-government, which he asserted he had been elected to vindicate. There was, he said, a single "substantial dispute" in the sectional crisis: "one section of our country believes that slavery is right and ought to be extended, while the other believes it is wrong and ought not to be extended." There could be no doubt about where Lincoln stood, and where his administration would stand, on that fundamental moral question.[47]

[46] The phrase "And the war came" occurs in Lincoln's second inaugural address (reprinted in this volume). It has been adopted for many valuable accounts, but its implicit denial of Northern agency fails to acknowledge the emergence of a new nationalism or to pinpoint the Union's legitimacy deficit in 1861–2 and hence a vital factor impelling the president to remedy it. See Kenneth Stampp, And the War Came, Baton Rouge 1970; Daniel Crofts, "And the War Came," in A Companion to the Civil War and Reconstruction, Lacy Ford, ed., pp. 183–200; James McPherson, "And the War Came," in This Mighty Scourge: Perspectives on the Civil War, Oxford 2007, pp. 3–20, 17. The legitimacy deficit was the more damaging in that abolitionists and Radicals, who might have been the warmest supporters of the administration, felt it keenly. It was alleviated by the Emancipation Proclamation but not fully dispelled until 1865, as we will see.

[47] Sean Wilentz, The Rise of American Democracy, New York 2005, p. 783. Wilentz proceeds from these remarks to this conclusion: "The only just and legitimate way to settle the matter [the difference over slavery extension], Lincoln insisted…was through a deliberate democratic decision made by the citizenry" (p. 763). A riposte to this is suggested by Louis Menand's observation: "The Civil War was a vindication, as Lincoln had hoped it would be, of the American experiment. Except for one thing, which is that people who live in democratic societies are not supposed to settle their disagreements by killing one another." Louis Menand, The Metaphysical Club: A Story of Ideas in America, New York 2001, p. x. This important book, together with Drew Gilpin Faust's The Republic of Suffering, New York 2007, prompts the thought that the massive

But Lincoln's formula was deliberately circumscribed to allow agreement to disagree, and not to challenge slavery as such. If slavery really was a moral outrage—and if it disqualified sovereign right, as Lincoln himself had declared in Peoria in 1854—then he should have said that slavery was "wrong and ought to be abolished." In the absence of any action against slavery—even something very gradual like a "Free Womb" law—the war policy of the Union, measured against Lincoln's own statements, suffered a yawning legitimacy deficit. As to whether there could be doubt about where Lincoln stood, it is a simple fact that many of his contemporaries, especially the Radicals and abolitionists, did indeed doubt him and his administration. Marx, for his part, was aware of the problem, and troubled by it, but prepared to place a wager that the North would be forced to take revolutionary antislavery measures.

During the secession crisis Lincoln refused to compromise an iota of his stand against any expansion of slavery, something that could not be said of other Republican leaders once thought to be more radical than Lincoln (notably Seward). But he was prepared indefinitely to extend or perpetuate the compromise that he had made. He supported a proposed new amendment—it would have been the Thirteenth—to declare the future of slavery in the various states to be wholly the concern of those states forevermore, and no business of the Federal authorities. In February and March the proposed amendment received the necessary qualified majority in Congress and the approval of several Northern states, as well as Lincoln's approval. But it was then overtaken by the logic of secession and the firing on Fort Sumter.[48]

If the new president could not come out more clearly against slavery, then he could not challenge the South's "right to revolution." Lincoln declared himself satisfied that the Union cause and his oath of office were fully self-sufficient and amply justified resistance to rebellion. To underline that secession was rebellion, bloodletting of the war weakened the justifications offered for it. Of course, those who went to war on both sides made poor guesses as to its duration, and this ignorance was itself a very significant cause of the war.

[48] William Freehling, The South Vs. the South: How Anti-Confederate Southerners Shaped the Course of the Civil War, Oxford 2001, p. 39; and Michael Vorenberg, Final Freedom, Cambridge 2001, pp. 18–22.

he waited until a Federal installation had been attacked before ordering military action. While there was certainly room for doubt concerning Lincoln's exact position on slavery, it is also very possible that he was himself aware that the Union cause with slavery was very much weaker that it would be without slavery. The gains of an emancipation policy were later explained in terms of weakening the Confederate economy or strengthening the Union Army, but, important as these considerations were, there was another just as important: the imperative to remedy the North's legitimacy deficit, for the sake of the morale of the Union's keenest supporters. At some level Lincoln was probably aware of this, but in 1861 he was beset by an immediate and elemental challenge to which he had to respond. In his statement concerning the right to revolution there was a half-stated implication that such a right only existed where it was realistic. For a while opposition to secession could be offered in terms of realpolitik—the South was too weak to sustain it and its rebellion was destroying international respect for the republic and what it stood for.

William Seward, shortly to become Lincoln's secretary of state, broadly hinted at the international situation and the damage that secession would do to the projection of US power. Speaking in the Senate in January 1861 he declared:

> The American man-of-war is a noble spectacle. I have seen it enter an ancient port in the Mediterranean. All the world wondered at it and talked about it. Salvos of artillery, from forts and shipping in the harbor, saluted its flag. Princes and princesses and merchants paid it homage, and all the people blessed it as a harbinger of hope for their own ultimate freedom…I imagine now the same noble vessel entering the same haven. The flag of thirty-three stars and thirteen stripes has been drawn down, and in its place a signal is run up, which flaunts the device of a lone star or a palmetto tree. Men ask, "Who is the stranger that thus steals into our waters?" The answer, contemptuously given, is: "She comes from one of the obscure republics of North America. Let her pass on."[49]

[49] Quoted in a perceptive study by Richard Franklin Bensel, Yankee Leviathan: the Origins of Central State Authority in America, 1859–1877, Cambridge 1990, p. 18. That rival expansionist impulses in both sections provoked sectional hostility was clear enough by the 1850s. See Michael Morrison, Slavery and the

The secession of a limited number of rural states would, in this view, drastically diminish US power. It would hand over control of the Mississippi to the rebels and put in question free access to Southern markets. Even worse, it would spell the end of the "empire of liberty," harming both sections, since, separated, they would no longer count. Seward was speaking in the Senate and addressing his remarks as much to moderate Southerners, who could be deterred from joining the secession movement, as to Northerners. All concerned were aware that the European powers were already jostling to take advantage of Washington's distraction. (A French military expedition had landed in Mexico and was about to install a puppet regime, that of the "Emperor Maximilian.") If there had been a sectional compromise, and some sort of nominal union had been salvaged, we can be pretty sure that it would have been sealed by territorial expansion—most likely the seizure of Cuba.

The Confederate president, Jefferson Davis, sought to play down the defense of slavery as the motive for the conflict and instead dwelt on the Northern threat to states' rights and on the affronts that had been offered to Southern honor. He stressed continuity between the ideals of the American Revolution and their latter-day embodiment in the Confederacy. The Confederate Constitution was closely modeled on that of 1787. Davis's vice president, Alexander Stephens, was not so careful—he described slavery as the "cornerstone" of the Confederacy. The nature of the conflict itself would steadily highlight Southern dependence on slavery. The slaveholders' aversion to taxation led the Confederate authorities to try to finance the war simply by printing money, with paralyzing consequences.

Of course dissidents in the North claimed that Lincoln rode roughshod over republican liberties. But this was in the service of a Unionist nationalism to which many Democrats as well as Republicans also subscribed. As the conflict proceeded, the salience of slavery in Southern society itself became of decisive importance, creating severe problems for the Confederacy and becoming a target of Unionist strategy. The Confederacy's very belated attempt to free a few hundred slaves and enroll them in a colored regiment came much too late to have any impact and still rested on a racial compact. But implicitly it conceded that the South had built on a faulty foundation.[50]

Let us return to the sources of the conflict and the nature of the Republican threat. The Civil War crisis was, of course, precipitated by the growth of the Republican party and the election of a Republican president. Lincoln would be able to make a host of appointments, including many in the Southern states themselves. He would be able to veto legislation and give orders to the executive apparatus. Moreover, civil society in the North had become tolerant of provocations escalating from Uncle Tom's Cabin and its more militant sequel (Dred: A Tale of the Great Dismal Swamp, 1856) to John Brown's attack on Harper's Ferry. Brown was an out-and-out revolutionary yet broad sections of Northern opinion were inclined to excuse—or even endorse—his bloody escapades. Southern leaders abominated religious abolitionism, but they were even more alarmed at the growth of a secular Republican politics that could win Northern majorities and use these to dominate the state. Southern fear of Republicanism and radical abolitionism imbued secession with a pre-emptive counter-revolutionary purpose and vocation, something easily perceived by Marx. Yet while the South's counter-revolution speedily carved out a new state, the Northern revolution proved weak and laggard.

CONTRABANDS AND EMANCIPATION: CIVIL WAR STRATEGY AND POLITICS

Lincoln had gone to great lengths to promote the widest possible alliance in defense of the Union, accommodating moderates and making concessions to slaveholders in the border states. But by the summer of 1862, lack of progress, heavy casualties, and the cautious and defensive conduct of the war were inspiring mounting criticism and a greater willingness to listen to abolitionists and Radical Republicans, who argued for a bolder strategy, both militarily and politically.

The more Marx learned about militant abolitionism, the more impressed he became. In an article for Die Presse of August 9, 1862, he wrote of the growing attention paid in the North to Abolitionist orators, and in particular to Wendell Philips, who "for thirty years… has without intermission and at the risk of his life proclaimed the emancipation of the slaves as his battle cry." He paraphrases at length a speech by Phillips "of the highest importance" in which the veteran abolitionist indicts Lincoln's conservative and cowardly policy:

> The government [of Lincoln] fights for the maintenance of slavery and therefore it fights in vain … He [Lincoln] waits … for the nation to take him in hand and sweep away slavery through him … If the war is continued in this fashion it is a useless squandering of blood and gold … Dissolve this Union in God's name and put another in its place, on the cornerstone of which is written: "Political equality for all the citizens in the world" … Let us hope that the war lasts long enough to transform us into men, and then we shall quickly triumph. God has put the thunderbolt of emancipation into our hands in order to crush the rebellion.[51]

Lincoln's willingness to adopt an emancipation policy was somewhat greater than his abolitionist and Republican critics allowed. Even compensated emancipation was still keenly opposed by the loyal border states, and by many Democrats who declared they would fight for the Union but not for the Negro. Lincoln believed that maintenance of the broadest Unionist coalition was essential to victory. He also greatly preferred an emancipation accompanied by compensation, and allowing due process to the property-holders. Democrats and moderate Republicans long hoped to persuade the Confederacy to come to terms, and to this end, they opposed measures that would irrevocably alienate the South. But while abolitionists and radical Republicans railed against Lincoln's studied moderation, it was the actions of a few thousand slave rebels outside the political system—the "contrabands"—which helped the Radicals in Washington eventually to win the argument.

[51] "Abolitionist Demonstrations in North America," Marx and Engels, The Civil War in the US, pp. 202–6.

The arrival of fugitive slaves in Union encampments surrounding the Confederacy made slavery and its role in the conflict impossible to ignore. Some Union commanders tried to return the fugitives to their masters. Others found this a perverse and impractical response. General Benjamin Butler—stationed in Virginia—became the first Union commander to obtain Washington's backing for a policy of refusing to return escaping slaves; instead, he put them to work as civilian auxiliaries. The legal term contraband was adopted to explain and justify this practice, though the term awkwardly implied that the (ex)-slaves were confiscated rebel property. A Confiscation Act passed by Congress and "reluctantly" endorsed by the president declared that slaves working for the rebel forces would be subject to confiscation and would be put to good use as support workers by the Union Army. In August, General Frémont, commanding in Missouri, declared martial law and announced that rebels were liable to summary execution and that their slaves were free. There was an outcry; Frémont refused to modify his order and was dismissed.

Lincoln allowed the pragmatic use of "contrabands" but not advocacy of an emancipationist military policy. Frémont had acted impulsively and in hope of political advancement. But the deeds and words of two field commanders—David Hunter in South Carolina and John Phelps in Louisiana—showed that military emancipation had an operational logic. General Phelps, commanding a Vermont regiment, urged, "The government should abolish slavery as the French destroyed the ancien régime."[52] His men enrolled all slaves who presented themselves, and forbade planters to use the whip. Similar proposals came from General Hunter, who was advancing along the South Carolina coast and islands. Both men would be removed from their commands. General Butler, who had welcomed the contrabands, at first declined to form black regiments, but by mid-1862 he had dropped his opposition. (Refusing to accept colored soldiers in Louisiana was particularly absurd, as they had always existed in this state and had even been recognized by the Confederacy.) Thanks to his political connections, Butler managed to recruit black units without getting immediately dismissed. Meanwhile the growing number of "contrabands" showed the folly of making no open attempt to deprive the rebels of slave labor and of not urging Union commanders to enroll as many former slaves as possible by offering them their freedom.[53]

By the summer of 1862 the Union's failure to make military progress led many to listen to the abolitionists and radical Republicans who were making the case for an immediate emancipation policy. Speaking tours by Wendell Phillips, Anne Dickinson, and Frederick Douglass attracted huge and enthusiastic crowds. Lincoln became increasingly eager to break what seemed like a military stalemate. The Confederacy was able to send more white soldiers to the front because slaves were still toiling to produce the supplies needed by the Confederate armies. The Confederates also used slaves in their military camps to carry out service and support roles. A second Confiscation Act in July allowed Union commanders to commandeer rebel property, and put "contrabands" to work, with fewer formalities. But in Lincoln's view neither Congress nor the military had the authority to determine the future fate of the "contrabands" who, in law, had become the property of the state, not free citizens.

The president still worried about the reaction of the border states—their representatives in Congress ensured that—but by June 1862 their key centers were securely held by Union troops. More worrying was the military impasse and a discouraging international reaction, with the British considering diplomatic recognition of the rebels. Lincoln believed that his "war powers" as president and commander-in-chief fully entitled him to free the slaves of rebels and to arm freedmen if he deemed it a military necessity. But he had to frame his use of these powers in such a way as to minimize the risk of a challenge from Congress or the Supreme Court (where there was still a Democratic majority). He also felt the need to justify emancipation in such a way as to avoid giving the impression that he wanted slaves to slaughter their masters and mistresses in their beds. Cabinet colleagues urged him to wait until there was good news, so that the emancipation would not seem like an act of desperation. In September 1862, following the battle of Antietam, he issued the preliminary proclamation, giving the rebels time to abandon the insurrection, failing which the proclamation would come into force on January 1, 1863.

Marx and Engels had from the outset insisted on the war's antislavery logic, but the first eighteen months of the conflict tested their conviction. Engels was particularly distressed by the passivity and defensiveness of the Union commanders, and beyond that what he called "the slackness and obtuseness" that appeared throughout the North, the lack of popular zeal for the republic, contrasting it with the daring and energy of the rebels. On August 7, 1862 Marx urged his friend not to be overinfluenced by the "military aspect" of matters. On October 29, following the announcement of the Emancipation Proclamation, Marx was powerfully reassured. He wrote:

> The fury with which the Southerners have received Lincoln's [Emancipation] Acts proves their importance. All Lincoln's Acts appear like the pettifogging conditions which one lawyer puts to his opposing lawyer. But this does not alter their historic content. Indeed it amuses me when I compare them with the drapery in which the Frenchman envelops even the most unimportant point.[54]

Thereafter Marx and Engels had growing confidence in Lincoln, even if they continued to complain about the quality of the Union's military leadership and the need for a thoroughgoing shake-up in the republic's ruling institutions.

The Emancipation Proclamation brought new legitimacy and—at least in principle—new opportunities to deepen the struggle. However, it did not entirely sever the Union from support of slavery. Its terms respected the slave property rights of loyal slaveholders in the border states and in areas occupied by the Union Army. Emancipation applied to the roughly three million slaves beyond

Union control, since they were the property of slaveholders still in rebellion. These freed people were enjoined "to abstain from all violence, unless in necessary self-defense" and to be willing to work at "reasonable wages." The Proclamation includes a clause permitting freedmen to be enrolled for garrison duty. The Proclamation went further than the Confiscation Acts in allowing former slaves to be organized in fighting units though for some time many were kept in menial support roles. Those who were enlisted as soldiers were placed under white officers and, to begin with, given a lower rate of pay. Eventually the thirst for manpower in a hugely destructive war led to the enrollment of 180,000 African Americans in the Union Army and over 10,000 in the Navy. (By the end of the conflict, however, only about a hundred African Americans had been commissioned as officers of the colored units, most of these being chaplains or doctors). Many "contrabands" did not become soldiers but were put to work digging trenches or graves, or in other support roles. Most Union commanders remained cautious in their use of black troops and their appeals to the black population, shunning the sort of autonomous mobilization thought entirely appropriate for German American or Irish American troops.

The Emancipation policy exacerbated Confederate problems in areas near the fighting, but it remained unclear whether the proclamation's message was reaching much further or whether the slaves could respond even if it was. Militia, patrols, and military police roamed the Southern countryside looking for slave fugitives and Confederate deserters. The number of slave fugitives grew to as many as 400,000 or 500,000 by the end of the war, a total that includes many who fled their masters in Kentucky, the border states, and the other Union-occupied areas that had been excluded from the Emancipation Proclamation. Although there are some signs of slave desertion or noncooperation in rebel-held areas, the patrols, militia, and military police were still a strong deterrent for those deep in Confederate territory, and only those close to the front could escape. A few could hide out in swamps and forests, but it was Union advances—from Vicksburg in July 1863 to Atlanta in September 1864—that eventually made it possible for slaves to desert the plantations en masse. This having been said, the war placed the slave order under great strain, with many white men of military age away and their wives managing as best they could. Anxious about their economic fate, planters ordered cotton to be grown and neglected the cultivation of foodstuffs. The war still made for very uneasy relations between slaves and overseers or mistresses. Peter Kolchin writes:

> Slaves took advantage of wartime disruption in numerous ways: they obeyed orders with less alacrity, they challenged weakened authority more readily, they followed the progress of Yankee forces and aided that progress in a variety of ways, from providing valuable military intelligence to enlisting in the Union army, and they fled in increasing numbers, especially when Federal troops neared. Despite heightened fears on the part of the white population, however, they did not engage in the sort of massive uprising that occurred in Saint Domingue during the French Revolution.[55]

It was more rational for Southern slaves to look to the Union army, with its new black contingents, to lead the assault on the slave order.

The emancipation policy certainly helped in Europe, rendering public opinion in Britain and France more hostile to recognizing the rebels. The fledgling labor and socialist movements were not completely united, but the most dynamic and representative currents now rallied against the Confederacy. Marx and Engels based their efforts to develop the International Workers Association on this trend. Marx believed that the willingness of Manchester workers to rally in support of the North, even though the "cotton famine" menaced their own livelihood, showed the moral superiority of a rising class.

Lincoln was dismayed when General Meade failed to aggressively follow up his victory over the rebels at Gettysburg. Instead, Meade issued a proclamation saying that the country "looks to the army for greater efforts to drive from our soil every vestige of the presence of the invader." Lincoln was dismayed to find that he had yet another general who entirely failed to grasp the simple idea that "the whole country is our soil."[56] But above and beyond the importance of defending the whole territory of the former Union was the claim that the North was defending a new Union that would correspond more closely to the democratic nation state cherished by so many nineteenth-century nationalists.[57] In his famous address at Gettysburg Lincoln underlined the "new birth of freedom" that must inform and infuse the military struggle. He used the word nation, with its warm resonance, five times, in preference to the flatter term union. Was this rebirth defined by slave emancipation or was it simply a vindication of American "principles of self-government"? Both interpretations were available. The rebirth of the national spirit was something that many immigrants as well as natives would be able to understand, because they came from lands like Germany and Ireland where the national revolution was as yet unconsummated. (The Irish Fenians strongly supported the North, helping to organize a number of units). And as revolutionary and democratic nationalists, they were less inclined to be fixated by given political forms, such as the US Constitution.

European nationalisms, with their dominant ethnicities and religions, had their own problems with reconciling rival concepts and recognizing minorities. The Republicans had shied away from crude nativism, but without embracing the radical abolitionist call for equality. The formulas expressed by Lincoln at Gettysburg did not offer citizenship to the freedmen (nor to American Indians), though Northern European Protestant immigrants somehow fit in. Dorothy Ross urged that Gettysburg marks a step back from the universalism of the Declaration of Independence:

> Lincoln transforms a truth open to each man as man into something he shares by virtue of his partnership in the nation…Lincoln solved the moral conflict he faced between principles and national survival by linking human rights to national allegiance, but human rights became the subordinate partner.[58]

However, one could say that lofty statements of rights desperately need to be brought down to earth and that at least Lincoln was pushing in that direction (Marx inclined to this conclusion). But at the time of Gettysburg, slavery was not yet finished, and what remained of it might still be given a new lease of life in the event of the Northern peace party gaining the upper hand. The Radical concern to get some sweeping and thorough antislavery measure agreed upon—perhaps a Thirteenth Amendment—stemmed from this fear.

The leaders of the North faced more dissidence than did those of the South. The war's heavy toll on life and the North's failure to inflict decisive defeats on the Confederate forces led "copperhead" Democrats to hanker for peace talks. Conscription led to violent draft riots in 1863 in New York and other urban centers, with the rioters attacking blacks as the supposed cause of the conflict. But even New England abolitionists with impeccable patriot credentials could doubt whether war was the right way to impose their section's superior civilization. The avowed abolitionist (and future chief justice) Oliver Wendell Holmes Jr., as a young officer who had just experienced several terrible, bloody engagements, wrote to his orthodox Republican father:

> If it is true that we represent civilization wh. is in its nature, as well as slavery, diffuse & aggressive, and if civn and progress are better things why they will conquer in the long run, we may be sure, and will stand a better chance in their proper province—peace—than in war, the brother of slavery—it is slavery's parent, child and sustainer all at once.[59]

What Holmes here refers to as civilization and progress are forces that Marx would have seen as capitalism or the advance of bourgeois social relations. The sentiments expressed point to pacifism rather than anti-imperialism. The idea is that one way or another the North is going to prevail, so why not do so in a kinder, gentler way? The North's ownership of the future is set down to the extraordinary locomotive of its capitalist economy. Marx himself probably would have agreed that the North would prevail in any case, but would have added that 300,000 slaveholders were not going to give up their human property without a continuing fight.

Holmes's letter was written in December 1862, at a time when the consequences and character of the emancipation policy were not yet clear. Without abandoning all his misgivings, Holmes became more committed to the war over the next year or two. His enthusiasm for the Union cause was boosted by the bravery of the black soldiers in the assault of Fort Wagner, by revulsion at the racial attacks in New York, and, finally, by the growing effectiveness of the Northern war machine, which at last made all the bloodshed seem to be to some purpose after all.[60] The fluctuations of Northern morale illustrated the old saw that nothing succeeds like success.

The gradual improvement in the Union's military position, especially the taking of Vicksburg in July 1863, allowed for a greater application of the emancipation policy, as Union forces broke through into territories where there were large numbers of slaves. A static war, and one focused on set-piece engagements, meant that the slaves in the Confederate rear areas had little chance of playing any role. The majority of African Americans who enrolled, including slaves, came from areas already controlled by the Union. Indeed, many tens of thousands of them came from Kentucky, since, as the loyal slaveholders had warned, Union commanders had no way of knowing whether a black recruit was someone's property or, if he was, what the home state or political stance of that property owner might be. Heavy troop losses—and black losses were very heavy—meant that commanders were disinclined to ask awkward questions. For their part, the new recruits saw enlistment as a good way to escape bondage, even if it was also an illegal one. (Legal slavery actually outlasted the Confederacy and was only formally ended towards the close of 1865, when the Thirteenth Amendment, introduced by the Congressional Radicals, was finally endorsed by the requisite qualified majority of states.)

The advantages of an "aggressive" emancipation policy—one that aimed to penetrate Confederate lines—were logistical, as well as military in the narrow sense, as may be inferred from Grant's account of the advantages of a war of movement in North Carolina. It would, Grant wrote, "give us possession of many Negroes who are indirectly aiding the rebellion."[61] In practice, of course, the appearance of Union columns led the slaves to act no longer as mere "possessions," but as Union scouts, auxiliaries, and recruits eager to see the Confederacy defeated. The Emancipation policy was always premised on the view that slaves would respond to it. So long as slaves were still unarmed in the face of mounted patrols and blood-hounds, there was little they could do, but once Union troops thrust into Confederate territory the black population became an invaluable ally, helping the Union at last to crush the stubborn rebellion. There had been intimations of this in 1862 and 1863 but, partly because of excessive caution, the emancipation policy was not pursued with sufficient vigor until the last six months of the war. [62]

From time to time Lincoln hankered for an aggressive military policy linked to emancipationism. As early as March 1863 he wrote to Governor Andrew Johnson of Tennessee warmly endorsing the idea of Johnson taking command of a "negro military force" since "[t]he colored population is the great available, yet unavailed of, force for the restoration of the union." He was especially supportive of this since Johnson was the governor of a slave state, and "[himself] a slaveholder." Lincoln was convinced that "[t]he bare sight of fifty thousand armed and drilled black soldiers on the banks of the Mississippi would end the rebellion at once."[63] Wendell Phillips had pointed out in an influential lecture that Toussaint Louverture had raised precisely such a drilled black force in Saint Domingue in the 1790s and trounced the Spanish and British.[64] But, unlike Andrew Johnson, Toussaint was black and a former slave.

Frederick Douglass, 1852

Lincoln later returned to the idea of an unorthodox force that might get behind enemy lines. In August 1864, he invited Frederick Douglass, the black abolitionist, to visit him to discuss whether there might be some way of bringing the emancipation message to the mass of still enslaved blacks and of encouraging them to desert the plantations. He explained, “The slaves are not coming as rapidly and numerously to us as we had hoped.”[65] Lincoln seems to have envisioned a small, highly mobile force, but it is not clear whether he intended that the commander be black, nor what rules of engagement the unit might have. The president was keen to avoid any hint or imputation of race war (the Proclamation’s injunction against violence toward slaveholders was prompted by this concern). The encounter with Douglass did not come to anything. Douglass thought a propagandist column would soon be overwhelmed. The two men did not meet again for several months during which General Sherman's capture of Atlanta and march to the sea at last brought the possibility of escape to masses of slaves on his route. Union successes also ensured Lincoln's victory in the election of 1864, something that had seemed—to Lincoln as well as his critics and opponents—very much in doubt in the summer of that year.

THE ADDRESS OF THE INTERNATIONAL TO PRESIDENT LINCOLN

It is at this point that we should consider the brief and mediated exchange between Marx and the US president. The two men were both averse to wordy rhetoric and conventional pieties, and yet both discovered an emancipatory potential in a bloody and often sordid Civil War. Lincoln did not indulge in flowery language. When it came to justifying slave emancipation, Lincoln was bound by political and constitutional considerations, the need to retain the loyalty of the border states, and the legal obligation to take only such actions as conformed to his war powers as president. So neither the Emancipation Proclamation nor the Gettysburg address avow an abolitionist objective, even if both had an implicit antislavery message for those willing to hear it.

The Radical Republicans liked the Emancipation Proclamation but saw it as incomplete. It left in bondage some 800,000 slaves owned by loyal masters—and, of course, those in rebel territory—so the final fate of slavery still remained to be decided. Radical Republicans debated different options, and in January 1864 they introduced a Thirteenth Amendment that, if approved by the necessary majorities, would end slavery and override any peace negotiations or Supreme Court rulings that might salvage slavery's considerable remnants.[66]

Lincoln was aware that the Proclamation might be vulnerable, and this awareness may explain why he invited the artist Francis Carpenter to stay a few months at the White House and paint a picture of the first reading of the Proclamation to Lincoln's cabinet. The painting makes it clear that the measure was backed by the cabinet's weightiest members, with Seward prominently depicted addressing his colleagues. Lincoln was obviously proud of the Proclamation—he described it as "the central event of my administration and the great event of the nineteenth century"—but he also wanted to display the backing it enjoyed from all his distinguished colleagues. Seward himself saw matters differently, explaining to the painter that the Emancipation Proclamation was "merely incidental" and that the most important cabinet meeting was the one that followed the firing on Fort Sumter. However, the painting, usually in a lithograph version, was to be widely adopted, becoming one of the most widely diffused of national images in subsequent decades.[67]

Lincoln's course following the Emancipation Proclamation aimed not just to maintain and invigorate the Unionist coalition but also to appeal to public opinion in the wider Atlantic world and to head off the inclination of the governments in Paris and London to recognize the Confederacy or, later, to offer mediation. Lincoln's carefully constructed appeals to abolitionism were a vital part of this. Since the International Workingmen's Association (IWA) embraced several British and French trade unions, it was evidently worthy of some diplomatic acknowledgment. The General Council of the IWA asked Karl Marx to draft a message of congratulation to Lincoln on the occasion of his reelection. The Republican watchword "Free Labor, Free Soil, Free Men" was designed to indict the "Slave Power" and, however vaguely, to offer rights, land, and recognition to the laborer. This was not anticapitalism, but it was, in Marx's terms, a step in the right direction.

Marx found drafting the International's Address to Lincoln more difficult than he had anticipated. He complained to Engels that such a text was "much harder [to draft] than a substantial work," since he was anxious that "the phraseology to which this sort of scribbling is restricted should at least be distinguished from the democratic, vulgar phraseology …"[68] Nevertheless he allowed himself the following resonant, if complex, paragraph:

---

[67] Harold Holzer, "Picturing Freedom," in The Emancipation Proclamation, Harold Holzer, E. G. Medford and Frank Williams, eds., Baton Rouge 2006, pp. 83–136.

> When an oligarchy of 300,000 slaveholders dared to inscribe, for the first time in the annals of the world, "slavery" on the banner of armed revolt; when on the very spots where hardly a century ago the idea of one great democratic republic had first sprung up, whence the first Declaration of the Rights of Man was issued, and the first impulse given to the European revolution of the eighteenth century … then the working classes of Europe understood at once, even before the fanatic partisanship of the upper classes for the Confederate gentry had given warning, that the slaveholders' rebellion was to sound the tocsin for a general holy crusade of property against labor …

The address also warned that so long as the republic was "defiled by slavery," so long as the Negro was "mastered and sold without his concurrence," and so long as it was "the highest prerogative of the white-skinned laborer to sell himself and choose his own master," they would be "unable to attain the true freedom of labor."[69]

The repeated invocation of the cause of labor in the address thus gave its own more radical twist to the "free labor" argument characteristic of Lincoln and other Republicans. In the address, Marx observed:

> The workingmen of Europe feel sure that as the American War of Independence initiated a new era of ascendancy for the middle class, so the American antislavery war will do for the working classes. They consider it an earnest of the epoch to come, that it fell to the lot of Abraham Lincoln, the single-minded son of the working class, to lead his country through matchless struggle for the rescue of an enchained race and the reconstruction of the social world.[70]

The meanings of the address are rarely addressed, so it is all the more regrettable to find it interpreted in a tendentious way, as it is in Timothy Messer-Kruse's book The Yankee International, 1846–1876: Marxism and the American Reform Tradition, Chapel Hill 1998, pp. 54–6. This author

The US ambassador to Britain, Charles Francis Adams, replied to the address, on behalf of the president, a month later, writing, "I am directed to inform you that the address of the Central Council of your Association, which was duly transmitted through this legation to the President of the United States, has been received by him. So far as the sentiments expressed by it are personal, they are accepted by him with a sincere and anxious desire that he may be able to prove himself not unworthy of the confidence which has recently been extended to him by his fellow citizens." Adams went on to declare that "the United States regard their cause in the present conflict with slavery-maintaining insurgents as the cause of human nature and…they derive new encouragement to persevere from the testimony of the workingmen of Europe."[71] Thus both the address and the reply refer to labor with the greatest respect and both assert the rights of labor, embedding them in, respectively, the "rights of man" and "the cause of human nature."

THE STATUS OF THE FREEDMEN AND WOMEN

As emancipation advanced on the military and legislative fronts, the question was raised were the freedmen and women US citizens and did they have the vote? In the months before he unveiled his emancipation policy, Lincoln had gone out of his way to reiterate his support for colonization of those freed from slavery. He had invited black leaders to the White House to lecture them on the wisdom of leaving a land where they would never be accepted as real equals. This was the summer of 1862 and may charitably be interpreted as an attempt to placate Northern racism. But in 1864–5, as the emancipation policy led to large-scale escapes and as notes Marx complaining at the "bother" of having to write something of such little importance as this address and claims that he only consented to do so because "[in] Marx's view, slavery had to be destroyed in order to allow for the historical development of the white working class" (p. 54). This illogically insinuates that Marx was privileging the white workers by insisting that the more oppressed blacks should be freed first. In reality, Marx was rejecting the idea of a preordained sequence.

[71] "The American Ambassador's Reply," in The Civil War in the United States, Marx and Engels, pp. 262–3.

the Thirteenth Amendment gathered support, a new abolitionist and antiracist agenda emerged concerning the civic status of those who were to be freed from slavery. Lincoln had repeatedly declared that slaves were part of humankind and that it was blasphemy to belittle or deny this, as he thought Stephen Douglas and other Democratic leaders did. But Lincoln's vehemence on the equal humanity of the former slaves did not mean that they were all simply Americans who were entitled, once released from slavery, to equal citizenship. As we have seen, he long believed that they would remain a sort of alien or stranger and should be invited to leave North America and found a land of their own in Africa or the Caribbean.[72]

In a speech at Charleston on September 18, 1858—part of his famous debating duel with Stephen Douglas—Lincoln had insisted, "I am not, nor have I ever been, in favor of making voters or jurors of negroes, nor of qualifying them to hold office, nor to intermarry with white people."[73] This view of the Negro and his rights was not lightly held, but it did change in the course of the conflict.

In the last year of the war Lincoln gave up his long-held attachment to the policy of encouraging freed people to leave the United States and find a new life in Africa. He found that colonization was rejected not only by black abolitionists and church leaders but also by the "contrabands" who had fled the Confederacy. Elizabeth Keckley, seamstress and confidante to the president's wife, Mary Todd Lincoln, and herself a former slave, headed the Contraband Relief Association in Washington, D.C.[74] The president was curious about the outlook of the contrabands and Keckley arranged for a few to visit the White House. As we have noted, the "contrabands" had pressured the Union authorities to take a stand on slavery. Now they helped to persuade Lincoln to give up the idea of colonization, which African Americans had many reasons to reject. A point they sometimes made that may have had a special appeal to Lincoln was the argument of "unrequited labor." After all, the slaves' toil had built the seat of government in Washington, D.C., and many fortunes in both South and North.[75] There was also the emphatic rejection voiced by the black leader Edward Thomas: "Are you an American? Are you a Patriot? So are we. Would you spurn all absurd, meddlesome, impudent propositions for your colonization in a foreign country? So do we."[76]

[72] Lincoln's long attachment to the colonization idea is documented by Eric Foner in "Lincoln and Colonization," in Our Lincoln: New Perspectives on Lincoln and His World, Eric Foner, ed., New York 2008, pp. 135–66.

[73] Speech of September 18, 1858, taken from Harold Holzer's The Lincoln-Douglas Debates, New York 1993, p. 189. This was not an offhand remark, but rather forms part of a careful introduction to his speech. However, on one point it jars with the positive terms he used more than a year before to refer to the enfranchisement of some blacks in the early United States. In a speech on June 26, 1857, on the Dred Scott ruling he cites the dissenting opinion by Judge Curtis, which had shown that some free blacks in five states in the 1780s did exercise the vote. While not advocating giving the vote to free blacks Lincoln seemed keen to stress that, contra Chief Justice Taney, some free blacks did have (voting) rights in the early republic.

[74] Foner, Fiery Trial, p. 257.

By the time of the Lincoln's second inauguration, in March 1865, the president was less constrained than on earlier occasions and placed slavery as central to the conflict in a way that he had previously avoided. He gave vent to his sense of the heavy wrong that his nation had committed by permitting an extremity of human bondage. He declared that each side in the still unfinished conflict had looked for "an easier triumph" but had not been able to contrive "a result less fundamental and astounding." He saw the carnage of the war as perhaps God's punishment for the nation's "offences" and concluded that he could only hope and pray that "this mighty scourge of war" would come to a speedy end. He added: "Yet if God wills that it continue, until all the wealth piled up by the bondman's two hundred and fifty years of unrequited toil shall be sunk, and until every drop of blood drawn with the lash shall be paid by another drawn with the sword, as was said three thousand years ago, so still it must be said, 'the judgments of the Lord are true and righteous altogether.'"

In this same volume James Oakes argues that the "unrequited labor" strand in Lincoln's rejection of slavery became more marked in the late 1850s and the war years, in his essay "Natural Rights, Citizenship Rights, States' Rights, and Black Rights: Another Look at Lincoln and Race," pp. 109–34.

This passage certainly put "American slavery" at the center, and strikingly memorialized its enormity as a system for the exploitation of labor. But the Second Inaugural Address did not mention the black soldiers or outline any ideas as to the future fate of the emancipated slave. In the preceding months Radical members of Congress had urged that the freedmen should be given the vote as part of the reconstruction of the rebel states. Lincoln had been noncommittal to begin with, but as he explained himself, he became more positive. Writing to the governor of Louisiana at a time when that state was establishing franchise qualifications, he gently observed, "I barely suggest for your private consideration whether some of the colored people may not be let in—as for instance the very intelligent, and especially those who have fought gallantly in our ranks."[77] In this attempt to cajole the Louisiana governor, using a moderate tone was no doubt advisable, and the enfranchisement of black soldiers would already establish a considerable bloc of black voters. If Lincoln had lived, it seems quite possible that as the situation evolved, so would his views on this matter. James Oakes has noted that Lincoln, in the last year of his life, went out of his way to seek out Frederick Douglass, the outstanding black abolitionist, as on the occasion noted already. Given the racism that permeated the North as much as the South, Lincoln's willingness to solicit the views of the veteran abolitionist and treat him as an equal was a significant development. When Douglass was stopped at the door of the reception held following Lincoln's second inaugural, the president went over publicly to greet him and make clear to all how welcome this black leader was in the White House. [78]

Douglass himself later wrote, "Viewed from genuine abolition ground, Mr. Lincoln seemed tardy, cold, dull, and indifferent, but measuring him by the sentiment of his country, a sentiment he was bound as a statesman to consult, he was swift, zealous, radical, and determined." This verdict doesn't directly refer to race, but we may assume that racial feeling is also covered by the term sentiment. Lincoln's attempts to reach out to Douglass in the last year of his life seem to signal the stirring of an awareness of the need for African American agency if freedom were really to be won.

[78] Oakes, The Radical and the Republican, pp. 238–43. Oakes explains that Douglass had declined an invitation from the president about a week after his meeting at the Oval Office in August 1864 on the grounds of a prior speaking engagement. Their third (very friendly) encounter was not until six months later. While both men were very busy the apparent lack of follow-through to the second meeting remains puzzling.

By the time of the Second Inaugural the Confederacy was collapsing. The North's belated victory reflected growing success in mobilizing its potential resources—and the Confederacy's increasing failure to do so. The emancipation policy, black enlistment and Union strikes deep inside rebel territory allowed black courage and toil to favor and fortify the Union. So long as it could maintain 400,000 men in the field—as it did until the last months of 1864—the Confederacy still had a hope of exploiting one of the waves of Northern defeatism that periodically swept the North and bringing it to terms. But while the North was at last bringing its resources to bear the Confederacy was dragged down by problems that stemmed directly from the slave regime. Confederate nationalism and the battlefield effectiveness of the rebel forces were sapped by severe shortages, hyperinflation and market collapse. The Southern armies possessed the war materiel they needed to maintain the fight. Indeed, if he had known about it, Marx could have been impressed by the success of the state-directed Southern war industries. But the class-egoism of the planters—their tax allergy and their obsession with growing cotton—led to financial chaos and agricultural dearth. The planter-dominated government resorted to printing bank notes and haphazard requisitions. The resulting hyperinflation disorganized production and exchange. The planters stockpiled some 7 million bales of the commodity in the hope of selling at a good price once the war had ended. The depreciating currency robbed producers of any incentive to grow food for sale, leading to desperate food shortages—in an agricultural state. The Southern desertion rate overtook that of the North. Eventually the Southern military decided to negotiate surrender rather than to pursue a guerrilla struggle that might once again have put wind in the sails of a Northern peace movement. Educated Americans knew about the major role played by "guerrilla" struggle in the Spanish resistance to Napoleon. They also knew about Toussaint Louverture's victory over the British and the defeat of the French by the Haitian republic. But the Southern elite had no stomach for such a fight since it would have imperilled the entire social order of the South. By surrendering when they did the Southern officers were able to retain their side-arms, their horses and some hope of keeping their land and, as we have seen, of rebuilding their local leadership and cross-sectional alliances. [79]

The assassination of Lincoln prompted the International to send another "Address," this time to Andrew Johnson, the new American president.[80] This address closed with the observation that the way was now open to a "new era of the emancipation of labor." But Marx and Engels were soon alarmed by the actions of Lincoln's successor. On July 15, 1865, Engels writes to his friend attacking Johnson: "His hatred of Negroes comes out more and more violently…If things go on like this, in six months all the old villains of secession will be sitting in Congress at Washington. Without colored suffrage, nothing whatever can be done there."[81] The IWA General Council sent a protest to President Johnson in September 1865 and urged that the freedmen should not be denied the vote. In April 1866 Marx writes to Engels, "After the Civil War the United States are only now really entering the revolutionary phase."[82] A clash between president and Congress drove the Republicans to more radical measures just as the ending of the war was marked by a multiplication of movements and demands.

CONSEQUENCES OF VICTORY

Marx and Engels expected more from the victory of the Union than an end to slavery, momentous as that was. They also expected the producers to assert new political and social rights. If the freedmen moved simply from chattel slavery to wage slavery, if they were denied the right to vote, or to organize, or to receive an education, then the term emancipation would be a mockery. Some Union commanders were already settling freedmen on public or confiscated land. The decision to set up a Bureau of Refugees, Freedmen, and Abandoned Lands in March 1865 seemed to mark a recognition that the occupying power was to take responsibility for an extraordinary situation.

As it turned out, the era of Reconstruction did indeed bring a radical surge in both South and North, with the Republican party seeking to keep abreast of events by adopting the ideas of radical abolitionists, black as well as white, and with pressure being exerted by a shifting coalition of labor unions, social reformers, African American conventions, feminists, and last but not least, the multiplying American sections of the IWA. The martyred president's acknowledgment of its earlier address, and the warm, not to say fulsome, nature of Marx's tribute to the "son of the working class" helped to make the International a quite respectable and visible body. The post–Civil War radicalization in North America in some ways may be compared with the British experience of slave emancipation and home political reform in the 1830s.[83] In both countries, abolitionism and the "free labor" doctrine seemed at a certain juncture to consecrate wage labor and its central role in the capitalist order, only to give rise to popular movements—Chartism in Britain, a wave of class struggles and popular radicalism in the US—that challenged the given form of the bourgeois order. Although the banner of free labor expressed bourgeois hegemony at one moment, it furnished a means of mobilizing against it at another. In one register, the ideal of free labor encouraged the aspiration of workers to become independent small producers, with their own workshops and farms. Hence the Republican slogan "Free soil, free labor, free men" and its embodiment in the Homestead Act of 1862.[84] But in the United States of the 1860s and 1870s, as in the Britain of the 1840s, there were increasing numbers of wageworkers who did not want to become farmers and who looked to a collective improvement in the rights of working people. David Montgomery, taking a sample of over seventy labor organizers of the later 1860s about whom information is available, found that most of them were second-generation wageworkers, about half of them British immigrants. Their efforts focused not on acquiring land but on regulating the conditions of labor and securing political and industrial representation of the workingman.[85] Of course some workers did take up the offer of land, but many realized that this could prove a trap. Already by the middle and late 1860s the farmers' Grange movement was complaining about exorbitant railroad freight rates and cutthroat competition from large producers.

David Fernbach points out that the "Address to President Lincoln" was one of the first public acts of the International.[86] Lincoln's reply was a publicity coup. Moreover, the campaign to radicalize the resistance to Southern secession—to turn the Civil War into a social revolution—seems to have had a major impact on Marx's thinking and vocabulary. The addresses written by Marx for the International, including the association's own inaugural address, make repeated use of the term "emancipation," a word that

Marx used in his early writings but which did not figure in the Communist Manifesto or in his writings in the 1850s. Marx's return to the concept also involved a modification of the way it was used by abolitionists. For most abolitionists the word emancipation conjured up the idea of an Emancipator, an external agent carrying out the process of liberation. Marx believed that the new working class would be the agent of its own liberation. He did sometimes take note of slave resistance and slave revolt, but he did not study the Haitian example and tended to believe that slaves needed external deliverance. Given that people of color were a minority—albeit a large one—in the Southern US, this was very likely to be the case in North America. But the notion of emancipation also contains within it the idea that the person or social group to be emancipated is self-standing, capable of exercising freedom, and has no need of an exploiter. Marx had always seen the modern industrial working class as the first exploited class that—because of the social and political rights it had, or would, conquer, and because it was schooled and organized by capitalism itself—could take its destiny into its own hands. The agent here was the "collective worker," all those who contributed to social labor. Marx argues in the IWA's inaugural address that "the emancipation of the working class will be the task of the working class itself." In a word, it will be self-emancipation. Marx saw the fostering of working-class organization as the International's most crucial task, and he believed that class struggle would set up a learning process that would lead them sooner or later to see the need for working-class political power.[87] Even this modification of the emancipation concept may have contained some small, unconscious echo of Lincoln at Gettysburg, as when Marx commends the Paris Commune for embodying "the people acting for itself, by itself."[88]

Raya Dunayevskaya argues in Marxism and Freedom that the US agitation for an eight-hour day during and immediately after the Civil War prompted Marx to deepen and elaborate his analysis of the length of the working day in Das Kapital, published in 1867.[89] The early US labor movement, like Britain's, sought, and sometimes won, laws limiting the length of the working day. In the years 1864–8 this campaign achieved a new scale and intensity in the United States. Some employers argued that this would be ruinous, since they made all their profits in the last two hours of the day—an argument Marx refuted. He showed that the more efficient employers would be able to thrive under such regulation. As we will see below, struggles over this issue were to play a major role in US labor organizing in the postbellum world. The eight-hour day movement was important to Marx because it expanded the free time available to the laborer.

Marx was well aware that the forced labor of the slave meant very long hours for all, whether old or young, male or female. And in the scarce hours left to them the slaves were as far as possible denied uses of their time that would pose any risk to the system. Thus rigorous laws sought to prevent slaves from learning to read or write, or to venture outside the plantation without a pass. The wageworker, even though intensely exploited, had greater opportunities for education and communication. When Joseph Wedemeyer organized the Arbeitsbund that organization sought to develop the workers' access to culture, to press for universal public education, and to oppose "all laws that violate anyone's natural rights, like temperance, Sabbath, or other prohibitionist laws."[90]

The discretion available to the wageworker in the sphere of consumption, culture, and reproduction was registered as a vital point in Marx's work for Das Kapital. Slaves were superexploited because they did not receive any monetary reward for toil that yielded a huge flow of premium commodities. With little or no cash, they had no claim on social wealth. Although the wageworkers received much less than the value of their work, they were able to shape their own "extended reproduction," that is, not only to reproduce themselves and their families in ways of their own choosing but also to achieve a level of social communication beyond that—for example, by buying newspapers and even helping to produce them.[91] Plantation slaves were, by contrast, permitted only "simple reproduction" within a narrow locality—a subsistence defined by allowances from the planter and by what they could themselves produce in garden plots. Marx and the abolitionists sometimes went too far in attributing an abject state to the slaves. They were not sufficiently aware of the reality of a slave community that produced its own culture of survival and resistance. But they were nevertheless quite right to indict the tight invigilation of the slaves, the narrow space allowed them, the daily violence of the slave system, and the constant disruption of the slave community as the plantation economy advanced. The controversies over North American slavery brought home to Marx the relatively broader possibilities of class struggle open to the wageworker even in normal times.

The political antecedents and consequences of slavery and emancipation in the US republic also had a deep impact on Marx and other nineteenth-century socialists. Marx was far from admiring the US political system, which he regarded as continuing to exhibit extreme degrees of corruption, demagoguery, and humbug. But he was impressed by the vast scale and almost elemental character of the social struggles that had been unleashed there. Curiously, Marx and Engels devoted little attention to the aspects of the Constitution and its functioning that rendered it so vulnerable to abuses. For example, they did not note the vagaries of the electoral college or the indirect election of senators. Nevertheless Lincoln's conduct during the Civil War crisis illustrated important points, in Marx's view. The challenge of a "slaveholders' revolt" justified resort to military means. Karl Kautsky and other Marxists were later to argue that any workers' government elected within a bourgeois democratic regime should expect there to be the capitalist equivalent of a "slaveholders' revolt" and should prepare to suppress it by any means necessary. Lincoln's preparedness to suspend habeas corpus and to impose presidential Reconstruction showed that democracy might need to be defended by emergency measures. The example of the Paris Commune reminded Marx of the term "dictatorship of the proletariat," a term that he had not used between 1852 and 1871. Like the Romans, Marx saw dictatorship as different from tyranny in that the dictator wielded extraconstitutional powers for a brief emergency period. Lincoln's actions were justified by socialists using such arguments as Hal Draper points out in his discussion of the evolution of Marx's ideas.[92]

At the close of the Civil War, Engels wrote to Wedemeyer with the following prophecy:

> Once slavery, the greatest shackle on the political and social development of the United States, has been broken, the country is bound to receive an impetus from which it will acquire quite a different position in world history within the shortest possible time, and a use will then soon be found for the army and navy with which the war is providing it.[93]

Northern capitalism did indeed receive great impetus from the war, after which it embarked on headlong continental expansion. For three decades this proved to be such an absorbing task that little was done to project US power outside the country's own borders. William Seward wanted Caribbean acquisitions, but the Radical Republicans were not interested.[94] Troops were sent to repress the resistance of the Sioux, Cheyenne, and Apache, and steps were taken to modernize the navy, but the terrible losses of the Civil War bequeathed a great distrust of military adventures that lasted for a generation.

Instead, the main focus was on three intimately interlinked processes that were of supreme interest to Marx and Engels: the advance of capitalism in North America, the unfolding of an epic class struggle, and the progress made toward building a genuine workers' party. The outcome of this mighty contest was to determine the possibility, timing and character of any US bid for empire.

RECONSTRUCTION AND LABOR FERMENT

In the post–Civil War era, the recently reunited United States was the most dynamic and soon the largest capitalist state in the world. No country illustrated Marx's ideas with greater precision and purity. Great railroads spanned the continent, and vast factories sprouted up, producing steel, agricultural machinery, sewing machines. The emancipation of four million slaves, the demobilization of three million soldiers, and the arrival of a stream of new immigrants swelled the size of the most diverse laboring class in the world. Marx predicted that capitalist conditions would generate class conflict as workers were brought into contact with one another and discovered their common condition. Though they might at first follow their employers, their attempts to acquire security and improved pay or conditions would repeatedly bring them into conflict with them. This would teach the workers the need to organize and seek political representation. And since capitalism would create wealth at one pole and misery at another, and since it would be gripped by recurrent crises, the workers would be drawn to support increasingly radical measures. The Gilded Age served as a laboratory test of such ideas, and with its robber-baron capitalists and titanic labor conflicts, it vindicated many of them.[95] But despite several attempts, no broad-based working-class party emerged in the United States, and the country proved a laggard in developing a welfare state. In these respects much greater progress was made in Europe, especially in Marx's native Germany, where the rise of a Social Democratic Party inspired by Marx's ideas persuaded Chancellor Otto von Bismarck to begin construction of a social security system.

Marx had observed that labor in the white skin would not be truly free so long as labor in the black skin was in chains. This should be understood as a complex sociological proposition as much as a simple moral statement. In 1865, the Thirteenth Amendment, which abolished slavery in the United States, ended a formal legal status that was already crumbling because of massive slave desertions, the Emancipation Proclamation, and deep, disruptive inroads by the Union armies. The greater part of the Confederate forces had melted away and the planter class was reeling from its spectacular defeat. But, paradoxically, local white power emerged in some ways stronger than before. Alarmed at the sight of free black people, former Confederate officers and men formed militia and patrols designed to defend white families from luridly imagined threats and to deny land and hunting rights to the freemen, to ensure that they were still available for work. Union officers enforced a ban on the whip, but they could not be everywhere. Moreover, the coercion applied to the freed people was increasingly economic rather than physical. Many were obliged to enter very lopsided contracts, with minimal pay until the crop had been sold and with wages paid in "checks" that could only be redeemed at the local store.

[95] Matthew Josephson, The Robber Barons, New York 1934.

The new president in Washington condoned and shared the Southern whites' reaction to black freedom. Johnson urged white-only Southern assemblies to endorse the Thirteenth Amendment, saying that if they did their states could then reenter the Union. He was angered by the continuing demands of the Radical Republicans and the actions of some Union officers who had taken over properties abandoned by Confederate officials and begun distributing land to the freedmen. Johnson believed that the freedmen now needed to be taught their place. He sympathized with the actions of all-white assemblies who enacted strict new labor codes, obliging the freedmen to accept work where it was offered and penalizing "vagrants." Leading Southern gentlemen and ladies paid court to Johnson in the White House, hailing him as the harbinger of reconciliation and the savior of his country. So although Johnson did press Southerners to accept the Thirteenth Amendment, he did so while assuring them that their acceptance would smooth their state's path to rapid reentry into the Union. The idea that the original secessions had been illegal, null, and void potentially opened the way to arguing that the seceders could now simply return. The Republicans insisted that it should fall to Congress to set out the terms of "Reconstruction." They passed resolutions stripping former Confederate officials and officers of their political rights and laying down procedures for fines and confiscations. But the president found ways to frustrate them.

Using his presidential power, Johnson issued thousands of pardons to Confederate military and civilian officials. He also issued a decree halting the distribution of land to the freedmen (of course the estates of whites who had been pardoned could not be seized anyway). The Republican Radicals were able to pass a series of Reconstruction Acts by margins large enough to make the measures immune to presidential veto. In 1866 the Republicans had shied away from giving the freedmen the vote, but the conflict with Johnson and their own plans for Reconstruction persuaded them that only extending the franchise could bring about the election of genuinely loyal assemblies in the Southern states. The presence of an occupying Union Army certainly helped, but the Republicans also needed to mobilize as much political support as possible in the states undergoing Reconstruction.

The Republicans failed (by a narrow margin) to impeach Johnson for treason, but nevertheless were able to impose much of their own vision of Reconstruction on the former slave states, thanks to the presence of Union troops and to the emergence of Union Leagues drawing support from the freedmen and from Southern whites who resented the power of the planters. But the Republican leaders set too much store by the ballot, underestimating the need for measures to tackle the severe economic problems of the South. So long as Union troops were on hand, the freedmen braved intimidation and went out to vote, but occupation was not a long-term solution. Returning Confederate soldiery lurked in the shadows and bided their time.[96]

As the Northern public became aware of the new President's gross indulgence of traitors and of the planters' resort to violence in their attempt to rebuild a coercive labor regime, support for the Radicals grew. Northern outrage at the presidential pardons and at the vicious racial revanchism of the Ku Klux Klan and kindred groups led the Congressional Republican majority to support more radical measures and to propose extending the vote to the freedmen of the South. The Fourteenth Amendment of 1868 promoted the enfranchisement of black males. In 1866–8 the Radical Republicans had the wind in their sails and managed to overrule the president on key issues. But the momentum of the Radicals was checked by the defeat of their attempt to impeach Johnson, with the appearance of moderates who refused to back the measure. The Republican Party recovered in 1868 by endorsing General Ulysses S. Grant, the hugely popular Union commander, as its candidate in the presidential election. Though this ensured a Republican victory, it gave the White House to a man who lacked political experience and judgment, surrounded himself with mediocrities, and failed to include a single Southern Republican in his cabinet. However, as a military commander Grant had at least learned how fickle, short-sighted, and cowardly was the "public opinion" manufactured by the newspapers.

President Grant lent his backing to a Republican strategy of restoring some of the sanctions on former Confederate officials and obliging the reconstructed states to give freedmen the vote as the price of reentry into the Union. For a while the Radical Republicans could still influence Grant, but they failed to register that the revolution in the South was generating its own counterrevolution and could only be sustained by strong and constant support from Washington, and by a far-reaching mobilization of those who supported the new order in the South.

Reconstruction set out to make freedom and equality more tangible, and for a while it succeeded in curbing white terror and promoting black representation and equality. Congressional Reconstruction had given the vote to the freedmen, and the result was to be Republican majorities in the occupied states and the election of some 600 black legislators and officials throughout the occupied South. By itself this was an extraordinary development. African Americans now sat in the Senate and House of Representatives in Washington as well as in the state assemblies.[97]

In Louisiana attempts had been made to segregate public space and means of transport. The state's 1868 Constitutional Convention asserted the novel concept of "public rights," which would give equal access to public space. The Constitution's Bill of Rights declared that all citizens of the state should enjoy "the same civil, political, and public rights and privileges, and be subject to the same pains and penalties." The concept of public rights was clarified by a prohibition of racial discrimination on public transport and in places of public resort or accommodation. Rebecca Scott, quoting the document, contrasts this clear requirement with the “oblique language” of the Fourteenth Amendment.[98]

Many abolitionists and Radical Republicans believed that the suppression of slavery was not enough and that the freedmen deserved at least free education, and preferably land and the vote as well. In this situation it was important that some Union Leagues were responsive to abolitionist appeals and that a convention of 150 colored men from 17 states met in Syracuse, New York, in October 1864. The Syracuse convention and subsequent gatherings in Charleston and New Orleans framed a broad program for equal civic and political rights. Many of the participants in these events were already free before the war. They articulated the aspirations of colored communities in Louisiana, South Carolina, and Tennessee—areas occupied by Unionist forces long before the final collapse. Their leaders argued that black soldiers had earned citizenship by helping to save the Union. They also paid their taxes, and therefore deserved representation. At Syracuse, Charleston, and elsewhere the call was not simply for rights in the abstract but for tangible expressions of a new status—the right to vote and serve on juries—and a Homestead Act for the South that would give land to the freedmen. A “Declaration of Rights and Wrongs,” adopted at both Syracuse and Charleston, warned that passing measures favorable to the freedmen would be a hollow mockery if planters were still free to intimidate and dragoon them.[99]

The Reconstruction administrations were elected by precarious majorities, achieved by the votes of black men, and also by reaching out to whites who had never owned slaves or supported the Secession, or who had found the Confederacy a nightmare. The Freedmen’s Bureau, established in 1865, was wound up in 1870. Radical Republicans and abolitionists were too inclined to believe that once slavery had been struck down a new regime of wages and “free labor” would automatically follow. Many freedmen and women devoted more time to cultivating tiny plots that they rented or claimed as squatters. Though some entered into agreements with the planters, who still owned the best land, their new employers complained that the freed people thought that they could withdraw their labor whenever convenient or demand higher pay just when the harvest had to be brought in. An early recovery of the Southern economy was not sustained because of a credit famine. Merchants were only willing to advance credit for staple production, leading to shortfalls in the production of subsistence crops. The plantation economy went into decline, with many landowners in the cotton belt offering sharecropping arrangements to the freedmen. In some cases the sharecropper would be the tenant of a piece of land, some of which could be used for subsistence production. But to begin with it was more common for the sharecropper to work on a planter’s land for a modest wage and the promise of further pay once the crop was sold. Thus the sharecropper bore the risk of a poor market on his own shoulders, and this was not the end of his problems. Tenants and sharecroppers often needed to borrow money, and they became indebted to store owners, who would charge them high rates of interest on loans as well as high prices for merchandise. These arrangements narrowed the scope of the Southern market, fostered stagnation and decline, and caused economic pain to white farmers as well as black laborers and tenants.[100]

With Union soldiers on call, the freedmen voted in new officials and sent black representatives and senators to Washington. The Reconstruction administrations also fostered a variety of social programs. These regimes, lasting from four to ten years, were innovative. As Eric Foner explains, they sought to introduce social institutions that the old slave-state authorities had neglected: “Public schools, hospitals, penitentiaries, and asylums for orphans and the insane were established for the first time or received increased funding. South Carolina funded medical care for poor citizens, and Alabama funded free legal counsel for indigent defendants."[101] With some charitable assistance, the Reconstruction administrations laid the basis for an educational system that was to comprise university colleges as well as high schools, open to the freed people and their descendants. The social programs of Reconstruction demanded resources that were in chronically short supply. Raising taxes alienated potential supporters. The South experienced a credit famine, as banks and storekeepers would advance supplies only for cotton cultivation and did so in far more modest installments than they had before the war, when slave property could be offered as collateral.

[100] The postbellum miseries of the freed people are trenchantly explored by Roger Ransom and Richard Sutch in One Kind of Freedom: the Economic Consequences of Emancipation, second ed., Cambridge 2001, especially pp. 244–53.

The empowerment of the freedmen was carried through in the teeth of continuing resistance from white "rifle clubs," the Ku Klux Klan, and kindred organizations. The Reconstruction administrations fared best—at least for a while—in states where there was either a large black population (South Carolina and Louisiana) or a solid phalanx of white Republicans (Texas and Arkansas).[102] Much depended on the quality and energy of local political leadership. What was needed was an alternative to Federal troops as guarantors of the new order.

In the few areas where there were not only Union soldiers but also black elected officials and police, there were instances of freedmen's labor associations successfully taking over and running the plantations. This occurred on several of the rice plantations along the rivers of coastal South Carolina. The planters' practice of paying wages in "checks" at high-priced stores that they controlled had bred hostility to the wage system: "In Colleton County, by the early 1870s, several large plantations were operating under what a newspaper called "a sort of 'communism,' " with black laborers forming societies, electing officers, and purchasing estates collectively.[103] But such enclaves of labor power were precarious, and in the later 1870s black organization and ownership was to be targeted in South Carolina as it was elsewhere.

The Northern public had been disturbed by white terrorism and so-called "race riots" (really ethnic cleansing), but it had little patience for the heavy costs of an extended occupation of the South and was demoralized by reports of carpetbagger corruption. Prior to the 1872 election, a group of "reform" or Liberal Republicans, led by Horace Greeley, mustered a challenge to Grant, but they argued for less rather than more engagement in the South. Grant's reelection gave a little extra time, but neither the president nor the Republicans gave decisive support to the Reconstruction administrations. To do so would have been expensive and contrary to the growing view that the time had come for a reconciliation with Southern elites. The size of Union forces in the South was continually being whittled down, and white vigilantism was emboldened. Some attempts were made in South Carolina to defend Reconstruction by relying on a local mixed militia, but eventually in the key states the Republican governors had to rely on Federal troops.[104]

THE RESTORED UNION AND A THWARTED REVOLUTION

The Civil War had landed Washington with a debt of $2.8 billion, and the bankers had extracted exceedingly favorable terms.[105] Schuyler Colfax, from Indiana, proposed that the huge war effort required new taxes—a progressive income tax and a levy on the shareholders of the banks and the new corporations. Colfax pointed out that the farmer had to pay a tax on his property, so justice demanded that there should be a tax on capital—especially that of shareholders—as well as on employees and cultivators.[106] The income tax was agreed upon but the plan for a tax on capital was vetoed by Wall Street and the treasury secretary. The income tax was set at 3 percent and much war expenditure was paid for either by issuing war bonds or by printing greenbacks. Some urged that the public debt be paid off in the same way, although the value of the paper currency had fallen by about a third. The Republicans, having contracted the debt, argued that paying it off with devalued paper would be a sorry reward for the patriotism of those who had subscribed, whether bankers or ordinary citizens. Their decision to pay off that debt in gold left the Treasury bare, unable to pay for Reconstruction in the South or ensure steady growth in the North. Neither the Lincoln administration nor its Republican successors seized the opportunity to introduce a central bank or effectively to regulate the thousands of private banks. This was to be a source of future financial instability and meant that farmers and small or medium businesses did not have access to reliable and reasonably-priced credit. In a book of letters addressed to Colfax in 1865, Henry Carey, the noted critic of free-trade economics, warned that a credit famine would ruin all hopes for successful Reconstruction.[107] Yet nothing was done to meet this problem, Southern producers were starved of credit and by 1880 per capita income in the US South was only 50 percent of the national average, and it would remain so for many decades after. The weakness of the Southern economy was a drag on national performance, but the national economy also suffered because of the primitive banking regime. One rather understated criticism of the postbellum US financial system concludes: "The main costs to the US economy of not having a central bank were a less efficient payments system and a greater potential for instability."[108] The North's master financier, Jay Cooke, who had marketed the Union's war bonds, was himself to be bankrupted by the crisis of 1873.

[105] The total cost of the war has been estimated at $6.5 billion by Claudia Goldin and Frank Lewis, prompting Phillip Paludan's comment, "That amount would have allowed the government to purchase and free all the 4,000,000 slaves (at 1860 prices) give each family 40 acres and a mule and still have provided $3.5 billion as reparations to former slaves for a century of lost wages." As it happened, by 1869 Schuyler Colfax was vice president and, one might have hoped, ready to devise a way of taxing the new breed of robber barons. Unfortunately, it was soon discovered that he was implicated in the Credit Mobilier scandal. The Credit Mobilier had issued shares to large numbers of legislators, backing return for their backing on its railroad projects. (From the days of John Law onward, there has always been a connection between financial innovation and swindling.)

During the heyday of Radical Reconstruction Northern white workingmen made some gains of their own. The freed people were in a struggle for the control of space, both public and private; the Northern workers sought to control time. In this industrializing era the average working day lasted more than eleven hours. In 1868 Congress was persuaded to establish an eight-hour legal working day for Federal employees. Eight states had similar laws, though implementation was weak. Radical Reconstruction also favored the first attempts to regulate the railroads. The stirrings of a new social utopianism and a very practical trade union movement were encouraged by the polarizations around Radical Republicanism. Wendell Phillips led prominent abolitionists and Radicals in supporting Eight Hour Leagues. In demanding the eight-hour day the "labor reformers" were accepting "clock time" and a degree of labor discipline as part of a wider scheme of improvement. Starting from free labor principles, Ira Steward argued that shorter hours meant higher pay and that higher pay would combat unemployment and the erosion of wages by inflation. As he bluntly put it, "new employments depend upon a more expensive style of living."[109]

In 1867 a National Labor Union was formed to spread the eight-hour day demand. At its first national meeting the NLU declared: "The National Labor Union knows no north, no south, no east, no west, neither color nor sex, on the question of the rights of labor."[110] The London headquarters of the International sent a warning in May 1869 attacking both ill-founded rumors of war (between Britain and the US) and the all-too-real domestic threat to living standards:

> The palpable effect of the Civil War was, of course, to deteriorate the position of the American workman. In the United States, as in Europe, the monster incubus of a national debt was shifted > from hand to hand, to settle down on the shoulders of the working class.[111]

However, it ventured to anticipate that there would be resistance, and resistance that would have been enhanced by what had already been achieved: "For all this, the Civil War did compensate by freeing the slave and [by] the consequent moral impetus this gave to your own class movement."[112]

Phillip Paludan urges that the war's deleterious impact on labor, and labor's reaction, have not received sufficient attention. The immiseration of Northern workers as a consequence of the great inflation of the 1860s prompted hundreds of strikes and the emergence of many new workers' organizations. Indeed for a while there was a sharp discrepancy between the squeezing of these workers and the improvements accruing to both farmers and former slaves. The Homestead program allowed farmers' sons to acquire land cheaply. Farmers could pay off debts with depreciated currency, and the building of new railroads soon gave them easier access to markets. As for the former slaves, the disintegration of a formidable apparatus of labor coercion had immediate benefits, as families reunited and some withdrew from the labor force while others received at least modest payment.[113] But in both cases these improvements were precarious, as Northern and Northwestern railroads raised freight rates, Southern landowners drove a harder bargain, and white vigilantes sought to intimidate the freedmen.

Some Southern black workers sought to join the eight hours movement. The New Orleans Tribune, published by black journalists, supported the campaign, and a State Labor Convention in South Carolina called for a nine-hour day. But true wage labor was of limited significance in the South, so the impact of these moves was small. A Colored Workers Convention in New York in 1869 sought to build a bridge between organized labor and the freedmen. The "Declaration of Rights and Wrongs" framed by African American conventions at Syracuse and Charleston denounced segregation in public places and warned that measures favorable to the freedmen would be a hollow mockery if planters were still free to intimidate and dragoon them.[114] But the differing problems of workers in the South and North made it more difficult to promote an alliance between them.

THE POSTWAR RADICALIZATION

Marx's addresses had increased awareness of the International Workingmen's Association in the United States. The IWA attracted a diverse range of supporters there, and even as senior a figure as Senator Charles Sumner was occasionally prepared to support events staged by the International. By the early 1870s the IWA had fifty sections in a dozen urban areas, ranging from Boston and New York in the East, to such crucial hubs as St. Louis and Chicago in the Midwest, to San Francisco on the West Coast. In New York there were militia companies led by supporters of the International, and an African American militia was also said to have become affiliated. But there is no mention of sections in the South, even in those areas like South Carolina where there was labor militancy. The reason for this was very likely the threatening security situation, which obliged all supporters of Reconstruction to cleave to the Republican Party and its militia. (During the early 1870s the young Albert Parsons—subsequently a strong supporter of the International, advocate of independent working-class politics, and Haymarket martyr—was a colonel in the Texas National Guard, which was in effect a Republican militia).

Some leading female abolitionists declined to support the Fourteenth Amendment on the ground that while promoting the enfranchisement of black men it left women without the vote.[115] This was an argument about priorities, since nearly all abolitionists supported women's suffrage. The great majority of abolitionists believed that any chance of achieving black male enfranchisement should be supported. The 1868 elections, allowing voters their first opportunity to respond to Johnson's conduct and to news of white brutality in the South, was a good year for Republicans in most parts of the North and West, and confirmed the Republican Congress's desire for black suffrage in the South. Where the Republican leadership had the courage to fight for black male suffrage in the North and West, then they had a good prospect of winning it at home as well as for the South. The fact that so many African Americans had risked their lives for the Union carried great weight with Northern voters. In Iowa, a proposal to give black men the vote passed in a referendum in 1868 though a similar proposal had failed there in 1857. However, the skill and conviction with which the Iowa Republicans seized the "egalitarian moment" was not seen everywhere.[116]

The vulnerability of the black communities in the South also furnished an added argument for black male enfranchisement. The women of the North and West had certainly rallied to support the war effort and were shortly to gain the right for themselves to vote for school boards in Kansas and elsewhere. But whereas the racial order was—at least momentarily—disputed, gender divisions had not been challenged by the war. (Though, as we will see below, this began to change with the advent of peace.) The dispute over this issue soon subsided, as most socialists and abolitionists did support votes for women. This cleared the way for new attempts in the 1870s to explore the makings of a progressive coalition.[117]

The appearance of the labor movements encouraged the view that a fresh start could be made in the 1870s, with the emergence of new issues and voices. Racism, sexism, and conscious or unconscious bourgeois ideology continued to hold much of the population in thrall and to weaken progressive movements. But much more remarkable than this predictable state of affairs was the emergence of challenges to it: to racism, including institutional racism; to male privilege in the home and workplace as well as at the ballot box; and to the divine right of employers to dictate to their employees and to accumulate vast personal fortunes.

See also Elizabeth Cady Stanton and Susan B. Anthony, Correspondence, Writings, Speeches, Ellen Dubois, ed., New York 1981, pp. 92–112; 166–9. Dubois, in her editorial presentation, argues that Anthony and Cady Stanton were, in different ways, both trying to adapt the women's movement to the need for wider alliances. While Anthony drew on "free labor" ideology to criticize women's dependence, Stanton sketched the programmatic basis for an alliance between the women's and labor movements.

For a brief span—about half a dozen years—the US sections of the IWA became the sounding board and banner for a diverse series of radical initiatives. The IWA and the National Labor Union were seen as sister organizations. The German American Marxists wielded what was then a very novel doctrine—the idea that if labor were only sufficiently well organized it would became a mighty lever for social advances, opening the way to all sections of the oppressed. The privileges of white and male workers were not addressed: all attention was focused on the great concentration of privilege represented by capital. In theory, female and black workers were welcome to join the workers' organizations and would enjoy equal rights within them, though the practice often lagged some way behind. Some of the IWA's US sections developed a primitive and sectarian Marxism that contrasts with the program and practice of the German Social Democratic Party. Marx and Engels were often uneasy at the narrow-mindedness of their American followers, but they were themselves partly responsible for this, since they had not yet developed a conception of the different character and goals of trade unions on the one hand and political parties on the other. The fact that the International embraced, or mixed, both types of organization was no bad thing, but because there had been no theorization of their distinct and different purposes the result was often confusion and tension. There was also the dilemma posed by the scope for social alliances. The workers needed to organize themselves as a distinct body, yet they also needed to reach out to potential allies—farmers, farm laborers, progressive members of the middle class, home workers—on a range of issues. The implicit labor metaphysic of some of the German American Marxists failed to tackle these issues. Nevertheless, in the short run the International actually thrived by avoiding a clear stance on such questions and simply allowing each section to organize in its own way and according to its own priorities.

The German American Marxists might have been narrow-minded, but still they were committed to the principles of racial and gender equality, though they soft-pedaled these issues when seeking to recruit bona fide wageworkers such as the Irish of Pennsylvania, New York, and elsewhere who did not share these principled commitments, arguing that it would be easier to educate them once they had joined the IWA. Marx and Engels, familiar with anti-Irish discrimination in England, readily agreed that special efforts should be made to win over the Irish workers. They may not fully have realized that in the US the Irish workers—especially the Pennsylvania miners—had been stigmatized as "copperheads" and traitors because they were believed to have lacked enthusiasm for the Northern cause. The International's strong Unionist credentials and welcoming attitude toward the Irish proved a good combination.

The IWA became a rallying point for many of the disparate forces of emancipation seeking to take part in the reconstruction of the social order. It attracted the attention of Victoria Woodhull—in some ways the Arianna Huffington of the 1870s—who edited the widely selling and much discussed Woodhull & Claflin's Weekly and used it to publicize the initiatives of the IWA. Tennie Claflin, Victoria's sister, was elected colonel of a militia after urging that the workers would need a force to defend them in the struggles to come. In 1870 and 1871 the Weekly published several articles summarizing the Communist Manifesto or explaining the documents of the IWA. It exposed the schemes of the railway promoters and argued that the greed of the owners of the Staten Island ferry led them to skimp on safety, and their negligence eventually caused a disaster in which a hundred passengers perished. An editorial evoked the new spirit:

> This is the age of rights, when, for the first time in human history, the rights of all living things are, in some way, recognized as existing. We are far enough yet from according to all their rights, but we talk about them, we see them, and thought is busy to determine how best they should be secured.[118]

[118] "The Rights of Children," Woodhull & Claflin's Weekly, December 6, 1870.

A series of articles entitled "Man's Rights, or How Would you Like It?" explored the idea of women taking leading positions in economic affairs while it became the turn of men to be "housekeepers and kitchen girls."[119] Other articles sought to reconcile a needed collectivism with the rights of the individual. The banks and the corporations should be taken into truly public ownership, and democratic institutions should ensure "the personal participation of each in the preparation, administration, and execution of the laws by which all are governed." But the state should not seek to prescribe how people lived: "Social freedom means the absolute immunity from impertinent intrusion in all affairs of exclusively personal concernment, such as scientific or religious belief, the sexual relationship, habits of dress, diet or the like."[120]

With her sister, Woodhull was the founder of Wall Street's first female brokerage, and used her rewards from this to finance the Weekly, "the lady broker's paper." Eclectic and radical, the Weekly showed a lively interest in socialism and new forms of collective self-government and published a special edition of Marx's "Address on the Civil War in France." Marx wrote a friendly note to Woodhull and suggested that his daughter Jenny could supply an article on her experiences in France following the suppression of the Paris Commune.[121]

After the European panic occasioned by the Commune uprising, Marx and his followers had moved the IWA's headquarters to New York. This is often seen as a ploy by Marx and his followers to prevent the IWA failing into the hands of the anarchists. No doubt there is truth in this. Yet there was indeed, as Marx claimed, a promising opening in the United States in which the International could begin to sink real roots in North America.

[121] Unfortunately this cordial tone was not maintained. Primed by the doctrinaire Internationalists, in a later letter Marx casually refers to Woodhull as "a banker's woman, free lover and general humbug"; so far as sexual matters were concerned, Marx, the likely father of Frederick Demuth, was more deserving of the term "humbug" than Woodhull.

In Europe, respectable opinion was outraged by the supposed excesses of the Communards in 1871. But in the United States it was the bloody suppression of the Commune that provoked outrage, and sympathy for the victims. Marx's Civil War in France was widely read by reformers and radicals. The IWA mustered a demonstration of 70,000 or more in New York in December 1871 to pay tribute to the Commune's tens of thousands of martyrs. The parade brought together the Skidmore Guards (a black militia), the female leadership of Section 12 (Woodhull and Claflin), an Irish band, a range of trade unions, supporters of Cuba's fight for independence marching under the Cuban flag, and a broad spectrum of socialist, feminist, Radical, and Reform politics. In its aftermath, Section 12 and its supporters in the Equal Rights Association, a new reform body, proposed running a ticket in the forthcoming presidential election, with Victoria Woodhull and Frederick Douglass as the candidates. For a brief moment an attempt was made to present a progressive alternative in the 1872 elections, but it passed.[122]

Many of Marx's US followers distrusted Woodhull. She was president of the American Society of Spiritualists, and her Wall Street brokerage had the support of Cornelius Vanderbilt, the richest man in America. The IWA Council declared that wage earners should comprise at least 60 percent of the membership in all sections. Section 12 was suspended for failing to reach this figure. The failure to distinguish between trade union and party was part of the problem here. So, too, was the conception that workers' interests were somehow natural and sociologically given without benefit of ideology or politics. The sectarian exclusion of Section 12 weakened the International, though in the short run the dissension it aroused was eclipsed when Woodhull and her Weekly became embroiled in an unrelated obscenity suit. Incensed by hypocritical attacks on her philosophy of "free love," she ran a story in the Weekly exposing the extramarital affair of New York's most prominent preacher. The scandal briefly led to Woodhull's imprisonment and prevented her from developing her political profile. Feminist and spiritualist leaders followed the socialists in keeping their distance from her.[123]

[122] The classic study is Montgomery's Beyond Equality; the IWA is discussed on pp. 414–21. But see also Herbert Gutman, Work, Culture and Society in Industrializing America, Oxford 1976, pp. 293–343, and Samuel Bernstein, The First International in America, New York 1962.

There was to be a legacy of distrust and factional strife between those of Marx's German American followers who believed that party building was the priority, and others who saw the trade unions as the priority. Both "Yankee" and German Internationalists deplored racial violence and supported female enfranchisement, but the trade unionists gave low priority to such issues, and many Socialists despised the narrowness and caution of the trade union leaders. On the other hand the rumblings of class conflict split the radical Republicans, as some sided with the employers, others with the workers, some supporting the eight-hour demand, and others hostile to it. Then the postwar boom was brought to a shuddering halt by the crash of 1873. The wages of workers had been eroded by the depreciating purchasing power of greenbacks. With their own living standards falling by as much as a third in a few years, the workers of the North and West were first and foremost concerned about bread-and-butter issues. The Republicans lost ground, as they seemed incapable of defending either the wages of Northern workers or the political gains of Southern freedmen. Ultimately the Republicans had deferred to the large property holders in both sections.

AN EXPLOSION OF CLASS STRUGGLE: 1877 AND AFTER

The presidential election of 1876 was deadlocked in the electoral college. The Republicans had failed to find anyone with even remotely Grant's appeal and received many fewer votes, but there was an even tie in the college. This eventually led to a deal—the Wormley House pact of 1877—whereby the Republican went to the White House but the Federal Army was withdrawn from the South. The last Reconstruction governments there collapsed, to be replaced by white "Redeemers," but the spirit of radicalism unleashed by the Civil War and its outcome had not yet been laid to rest.

[123] For a rounded assessment see Amanda Frisken, Victoria Woodhull's Sexual Revolution, Philadelphia 2004.

The deal hatched by the Republicans and Democrats was not a pretty one. It sent the less popular candidate to the White House and allowed him to find jobs in Washington for a horde of displaced Southern Republicans. The press was full of reports of payoffs involving the award of railroad franchises. The new administration soon catered to bankers and bondholders by resuming specie payments. These developments confirmed the scathing assessments of the most dogmatic Marxists of the Socialist Party. The bosses were using the two main parties as blatant spoils machines, and in most areas they were oblivious to the plight of the growing working class. To the socialists, the need for a quite new party—a farmer-labor party—could not have been clearer. The Internationalists moved to form a Workers Party. Robin Archer has recently shed new light on why this possibility was nipped in the bud. He sees it as happening because of a combination of ferocious repression, Socialist sectarianism, and the reluctance of workers' organizations to address political questions, since to do so would risk antagonizing the large number of religious workers with their ties to the existing party system.[124]

The existing party system was difficult to beat because it adjusted to the threat of third parties either by stealing their slogans or by ganging up against them—as the Republicans and Democrats did with their joint slate in Illinois in the 1880s. Successful labor leaders were wooed as candidates by the two established parties. But both parties took handouts from the robber barons, with state assemblies becoming the pawns of railway promoters awarding them large tracts of public land in return for kickbacks. The state authorities also frequently allowed the state militia to be used as strike breakers. Although striking workers sometimes enjoyed public support, the newspapers and middle class opinion easily turned against them.

However, it was an employers' offensive and an across-the-board 10 percent cut in rail workers' pay that detonated the Great Rail Strike of 1877. Many of the rail workers were Union Army veterans, and the rail companies sought to encourage their loyalty by issuing them uniforms and placing well-known generals on the board. But with this further pay cut such petty palliatives could no longer hold them in check. The Great Strike of 1877 has been described as "one of the bitterest explosions of class warfare in American history."[125] It reached inland to the great rail hubs and soon gripped the greater part of the North and West. Though it erupted three months after the ending of Reconstruction, the Great Strike did not come out of a blue sky. The employers had acted in a concerted fashion and counted on support from Washington, now that the political crisis had been resolved and the troops withdrawn from the South. The rail workers had much public sympathy, and their action encouraged others to down tools and take to the streets in urban areas.[126] Workers in mines and steel plants joined in. The strike gathered momentum because some militia units were loath to threaten lives. One commander explained, "Meeting an enemy in the field of battle, you go there to kill … But here you have men with fathers and brothers and relatives mingled in the crowd of rioters. The sympathy of the people, of the troops, my own sympathy, was with the strikers proper. We all felt that these men were not receiving enough wages."[127]

In St. Louis, the strike, orchestrated by the Workingmen's Party, an offshoot of the International, had control of the city for several days. Burbank reports:

> The British Consul in St. Louis noted an example of how society was being turned upside down: on a railroad in Ohio, the strikers "had taken the road into their own hands, running the trains and collecting the fares" and felt that they deserved praise because they turned over the proceeds to company officials. The consul commented stiffly that "it is … to be deplored that a large part of > the public appear to regard such conduct as a legitimate mode of warfare."[128]

The strikers produced their own newspaper, the St. Louis Times, which attacked the voice of the city's leaders:

> The St. Louis Times jeered at The Republican's solemn warnings, quoting the phrase about the railroad men striking "at the very vitals of society": on the contrary, said the Times, it was "the very vitals of society' which were on strike, 'and hungry vitals they are too!"[129]

African Americans played a prominent role in the St. Louis action, a fact harped on by municipal authorities and the local press in their attacks on the strike. A report of the general meeting convoked by the strike leadership noted: "The chairman introduced the Negro speaker, whose remarks were frequently applauded."[130] The strike leadership required the authorities to enact a series of radical measures, including restoration of wage cuts and the generalization of the eight-hour day, but were thwarted when a Committee of Public Safety set up by the leading men of the city raised a militia and sent it to crush the rebellion and end the strike. However, the black population of St. Louis remained a force to be reckoned with—in 1879 blacks fleeing Southern repression, the "Exodusters," were able to shelter in St. Louis prior to leaving for Kansas.[131]

Just as the withdrawal of Federal troops abandoned the field to semiprivate white militia in the South, so the employers in the North were able to pay for thousands, sometimes tens of thousands, of National Guards, specially recruited "deputy marshals," and Pinkerton men to break the strike, which had spread until it had national scope.[132] One hundred strikers lost their lives in the course of the 1877 strike. The employers were also able to bring in black workers to take the place of strikers. The more far-seeing and enlightened labor organizers had urged that blacks be welcomed and organized, too, but it took time for formal recognition to be translated into practical action.[133]

The new president, Rutherford B. Hayes, noted in his diary that the 1877 strike had been suppressed "by force." Grant, the man he replaced, was vacationing in Europe—he found these proceedings "a little queer." During his own administration, Grant noted, the entire Democratic Party and "the morbidly honest and 'reformatory' portion of the Republicans had thought it 'horrible' to employ Federal troops 'to protect the lives of negroes.' Now, however, there is no hesitation about exhausting the whole power of the government to suppress a strike on the slightest intimation that danger threatened."[134]

By the 1880s there were 30,000 Pinkerton men, making them a larger force than the Army of the Republic. The latter's strength had dropped to less than 27,000, with those soldiers not in the West reduced to strikebreaking roles. By 1877 the Democrats were calling for Army strength to be further reduced to no more than 20,000. The robber barons of the North and West and the planters of the South had found brutally effective ways to cow the direct producers. Both distrusted the Army and both hated the Federal taxing power. The steep reductions in the Federal military establishment reflected both an economy drive and the conviction of some that an Army that stemmed from the Civil War and Reconstruction was not well adapted to enforcing labor discipline.

An unsavory alliance of politicos and robber barons had beaten the rail workers into submission, but this was just the start of two decades of large-scale clashes. From actions by the Illinois and Pennsylvania dockers, lumbermen, miners, and steelworkers of the 1880s to the Pullman and Homestead strikes of the 1890s, the United States was shaken by epic and desperate industrial struggles. These battles involved tens, sometimes hundreds, of thousands of workers and had no equal in Europe. In the great battles of the 1880s and 1890s, hundreds of strikers were killed, thousands imprisoned, and tens of thousands blacklisted. These grueling labor battles sometimes seemed like a civilian echo of the Civil War, with the strikers cast as copperheads, or even rebels, and the army, police, and deputy marshals as the loyalists. The Republicans, encouraged by Unionist veterans organizations like the GAR, sought to retain the support of their followers by voting pensions for veterans. Black veterans also qualified. Thanks to this, by 1914 the US provision for public pensions was larger than Germany's, but it was destined steadily to diminish as the old soldiers died. This was a sectional welfare state; the Southern authorities did not have the resources to match it on behalf of Confederate veterans.[135]

Stephen Skowronek describes the closing decades of the nineteenth century as the epoch of the "patchwork state" and emphasizes the role of labor struggles in shaping its peculiar formation.[136] The antebellum regime had defended plantations without regulating them; the postbellum regime did similar service for the new corporations. It is sometimes believed that the Civil War, whatever else it did—or did not do—at least modernized and strengthened the US Federal state. But the authority of the state remained very uneven, the civilian administration was in hock to party placemen, and the legislatures were in league with the money power. These features had survived the war and been intensified by Reconstruction and its overturning. The frustration of "bourgeois" revolution brought no gain to Northern workers or Southern freedmen.

DEFEAT AND TRIUMPH FOR AMERICAN WORKERS

The double defeat of Reconstruction had suppressed black rights in the South and curtailed labor rights in the North. Jim Crow in the South and the widespread use of Pinkerton's men and other goons in the North were both victories for privatized violence and a minimal view of the state. They were a defeat for the republican ideal of a unified and responsible federal authority. It was most particularly a defeat for Lincoln's idea that the rule of law should be the "political religion" of all Americans.

There was orchestrated violence in the North, but it was put into the shade by Jim Crow. During the years 1884–1899, between 107 and 241 African Americans were murdered each year by lynch mobs, with total victims numbering more than 3,000. Lynchings were concentrated in the South and a great majority of the victims were black, but they were not unknown elsewhere and they sometimes targeted white labor organizers, Chinese, and Mexicans. Along the Mexican border dozens of Hispanics were lynched during these years. And there were also lynchings of whites in other parts of the Union, especially the "wild" West.[137] The intensification of Jim Crow in the South was accompanied by the spread of onerous, if less extreme, practices of racial exclusion in other sections, affecting residence, employment, and education.[138]

The freed people of the South and the labor organizers of the North not only faced physical threats but also found their attempts to organize and negotiate assaulted in the name of the same conservative strain in free labor ideology—that which construed any regulation or combination as a violation of "freedom of contract." The Republicans and Democrats deferred to this doctrine and the Supreme Court codified it. These rulings pulverized the workers and sharecroppers, leaving them to negotiate only as individuals.

Without a political order capable of regulating the employers, the case for a social democratic party was more difficult to make, and to some a syndicalist perspective seemed more realistic. Another obstacle to proposals for a labor party was the fact that the federal state was fiscally hamstrung, rendering impractical projects for a welfare state. The Union's vast Civil War outlays had been met in part, as noted above, by the progressive income tax.[139] However, in the early 1870s the income tax was dropped—and then declared unconstitutional by the Supreme Court. The Fourteenth Amendment had promised "all persons" the equal protection of the laws. Though this proved a dead letter so far as the freedmen were concerned, the corporations—who enjoyed the legal status of persons—successfully invoked it against measures for corporate taxation and regulation.

These and other reactionary developments might themselves have increased the willingness of the trade unions to back a labor party. Indeed, those trying to organize general or industrial unions aimed at the mass of workers realized that they needed the support of government. But Archer argues that many key craft leaders—especially Samuel Gompers—had greater industrial bargaining power and feared that their organizations might be put at risk if they teamed up with political adventurers.

Several key trade unions had been inspired by the agitation surrounding the IWA and Marx's writings on the importance of self-organization by the workers. Several US unions were to describe themselves as International organizations—the International Longshoremen or International Garment Workers Union and so forth—an echo of the IWA. Sometimes the "International" was justified by its reference to organizing in Canada, but it had a resonance beyond this. If Marx's followers—many of them German Americans—can take a share of the credit for the impetus given to trade union organization, they must also accept some of the blame for the failure of the US workers' movement to develop a labor party and for the related tardy development and weakness of the US welfare state. Indeed, some blame the influence of Karl Marx for these failures.[140]

Yet Marx favored both trade unions and social democratic or socialist parties in the 1870s, as may readily be seen in the case of Germany. The German SPD was clearly linked to and supportive of organized labor, but its Erfurt program committed it to revolutionary and democratic objectives and to immediate reforms. It campaigned for votes for women and the defense of the German forests. It supported rights for homosexuals and an end to Germany's imperial exploits in Africa, and it debated the "agrarian question."[141] The breadth of the SPD's program did not, of course, wholly stem from Karl Marx but came also from several other currents, including the Lassalleans. Though Marx had tenaciously fought against what he saw as Lassalle's misguided belief in the progressive character of the German state, he nevertheless went out of his way to cultivate Lassalle's acquaintance, gently to warn him of his mistakes, and above all to remain in touch with the tens of thousands of German socialists who were influenced by him. Marx stressed the great potential and attractive power of the working class, but in his "Critique of the Gotha Programme" he combated the idea that labor was the only source of value, insisting that land (by which he meant nature) was a vital source of use values.[142]

[140] Messer-Kruse in Yankee International and Archer in Why Is There No Labor Party in the United States? come close to this but ultimately concede that on such questions there was a large gap between Marx and those in the US who regarded themselves as his followers. (These included Samuel Gompers.)

The programmatic scope of the SPD is not the only evidence of the approach favored by Marx and Engels. The program of the French workers party was directly inspired by a conversation with Marx. Its very first clause declared, "the emancipation of the class of producers involves all mankind, without distinction of sex or race."[143] Its immediate program committed it to universal suffrage and equal pay for equal work. No doubt that economism still lurks in it, but in 1879 a platform like this was not such a bad starting point. The idea that trade unions and political organization are mutually exclusive put supposedly Marxian US Socialists and trade unionists at odds with their mentor.

The paternalist ethos of the early socialist movement rendered its commitment to equal rights for women ethereal and abstract.

But as women were drawn into the labor movement in the 1880s, female activists challenged the idea that a woman's place was in the home. While male labor organizers were prone to support the notion that the male worker should earn a "family wage," the socialist organizations, especially those influenced by the German SPD, took a different stance: they urged that women would not be truly emancipated until they entered the world of paid labor on equal terms with men. August Bebel, one of the historic leaders of the SPD, wrote a book on the topic, Woman Under Socialism (1879), which was widely read in both German and English. Bebel urged that domestic labor should be lightened, and women's employment promoted, by the provision of free communal child-care facilities and restaurants. Though they did not anticipate twentieth-century feminism and often romanticized patriarchal features of the family, the socialists of this era did pay some attention to the issue of gender equality.[144] Female members of the Socialist Labor Party were able to offer a feminist interpretation of Bebel's ideas and to use them to argue for the importance of organizing women workers. Given the employment of large numbers of women in new branches of the economy, socialist women became a significant force.

In 1887 Engels paid tribute to the giant strides being made by the American workers movement, embracing momentous class battles in Illinois and Pennsylvania, the spread of the Eight Hour Leagues, the growth of the Knights of Labor, the sacrifices that had established May 1 as International Labor Day, and the electoral achievements of the first state-level labor parties.[145] But appreciative as he was, he insisted that the whole movement would lose its way unless it could develop a transformative program: "A new party must have a distinct platform," one adapted to American conditions. Without this, any "new party would have but a rudimentary existence." However, beyond saying that the kernel of this program would have to be public ownership of "land, railways, mines, machinery, etc." he did not speculate as to what problems that program should address. Engels rebuked the doctrinaires of the heavily German American Socialist Labor Party for their hostility to unions and their failure to grapple with American reality. He urged them to "doff every remnant of their foreign garb," "go to the Americans who are the vast majority" and "on all accounts learn English."[146]

[145] See Frederick Engels, "Preface to the American Edition," The Condition of the Working Class in England, New York 1887, reprinted in this volume.

The advice Engels offered, though entirely justified, was also elementary and even simplistic. Programmatic thinking was not entirely lacking in the United States, but it was throttled by the given forms of the labor movement. In many trade unions there was a formal ban on any political discussion, on the grounds that it would prove divisive. The largest working-class organization, the Noble Order of the Knights of Labor, had a similar ban. The Knights of Labor only emerged from clandestinity in 1881 and never entirely shook off its roots as a secret society. Security threats distracted them from public debate of their objectives. Terence Powderley, the Knights' leader, was intensely hostile to foreign-born doctrinaires and strove to exclude or neutralize them. The unions and the Knights made efforts to organize African American and female workers but had no discussion of how to campaign for respect for their rights.[147]

Engels's text was most likely to be read by the members of the Socialist Labor Party, but he did not go far enough in pressing them to become relevant to US conditions. His insistence that the US labor party would have to commit itself to public ownership of the railways and steel was timely—and if it had been heeded by some progressive coalition it might have averted the disaster awaiting these industries in the mid to late twentieth century. His brief list should have included the banks, since they were critical to industry and agriculture. His call for the nationalization of land short-circuited the tangled problems of the county's three million farmers and four million tenants and laborers. By the time of the 1870 census there were 4.9 million wage earners, some of them white-collar, but the agricultural sector was still hugely important. The spread of the Farmers' Alliance in the 1880s and 1890s showed the huge scope there was for mobilizing indebted farmers and rack-rented tenants or sharecroppers, both black and white. Engels endorsed the idea that a US labor party should aim to win a majority in Congress and elect its candidate to the White House, but without an appeal to farmers, tenants, and rural laborers—and many others besides—this was a pipe dream. While Marx and Engels were quite right to shun many of the "Sentimental reformers" with their patented cure-alls, some of these individuals focused on critical issues of taxation and banking, or security and democracy. The milieu of labor reformers had identified and skillfully exploited the issue of the eight-hour day, a programmatic demand that had a mobilizing and universalist impulse (though enforcement was often difficult under US conditions).

The London International had cordial relations with Richard Hinton, a labor reformer and organizer of the Washington, D.C., Section. When the German Marxist leader Sorge sought to bring this section under his control, the General Council in London declared that this was going too far and that the Washington Section should run its own affairs. This section refused to back Sorge's expulsion of Section 12. The British-born Hinton was a former companion of John Brown's and officer of the First Kansas Colored Regiment, and he was fascinated by Edward Kellogg's plan for a network of public banks and Osborn Ward's proposals for cooperative agriculture and industry. In late-nineteenth-century conditions the smallholder was on a hiding to nothing—cooperatives with some public support could have made a lot of sense. Hinton's section included many civil servants, who would actually have to implement any massive program of nationalization. They were probably aware that the country only had 60,000 civil servants and any socialist plan must stimulate local publicly or socially owned enterprises and bottom-up initiatives.[148] Hinton was later to be associated with Eugene Debs's Socialist Party, as editor of its magazine.

In his survey Engels developed a very polite critique of the ideas of Henry George, even conceding that the land tax might have some role. Another radical taxation proposal that merited examination was Schuyler Colfax's idea (mentioned above) of a levy on all shareholding capital.[149] Finally, there was the issue of Lincoln's very unfinished revolution in the American South. Prior to the triumph of the ultraracists in 1900 there were several movements which showed that white and black farmers and laborers could support the same goals; these included the Readjusters movement, which gained power in Virginia in the late 1870s, the Farmers' Alliance, the "fusion" movement in North Carolina, and many branches of Populism. It is striking that these moments of interracial cooperation were targeted at the banks, the railroad corporations, and (in the case of Virginia) the large bondholders.[150] The coal mines of Tennessee also witnessed trade union battles that brought together black and white workers opposed to their employers' leasing of convict labor.[151]

The years 1886–96 witnessed the rise and fall of the People's Party, mounting the most serious third party challenge to the post–Civil War US political regime. The Populist movement was born out of bitterness at the depressed condition of farming and at the venality of Wormley House politics. Farmers in all parts of the Union, but most particularly in the Midwest and South, called on the Federal and state authorities to come to the aid of farmers devastated by low prices, high freight rates and expensive credit. Among the demands launched by the movement were nationalization of the railroads, the coining of silver and the setting up of "sub-treasuries" at state and federal level which would serve as marketing boards for the main cash crops. The farmers' produce would be held in public warehouses in each county; against this collateral they would be able to take out publicly-guaranteed, low interest loans. The People's Party proved attractive enough to elect some Senators and Governors, and scores of state level legislators. It did particularly well in the South, especially where it reached tacit agreements with the Republican party to combine forces against the dominant Democrats.The party's standard bearers were white but it received significant black support, partly thanks to tactical deals with the Republicans. The Democratic party responded with alarm and ferocity to Populist success, on the one hand adopting some of its more eye-catching proposals (e.g. monetizing silver in order to avoid "crucifying mankind on a cross of gold") and on the other unleashing a campaign of physical intimidation against Southern Populists (in the Georgia campaign in 1892 fifteen men were killed because of their politics). Carl Degler suggests that the Democrat leaders saw the Populist challenge as a "second Reconstruction" and were determined to stamp it out.[152] The defeat of the Southern Populists was accompanied by a further tightening of racial oppression and the consolidation of the Democrats as the unquestioned ruling party of the South. The Populists did try to reach out to the urban workers. They supported two policies cherished by organized labor—the eight hour agitation and opposition to the leasing of convicts to private employers. A group of Populists wanted Eugene Debs, the labor organizer, to become the party's presidential candidate in the 1896 election but he declined. The Populists did not challenge the racial order and were easily deterred from coming to the defense of blacks. Their leaders sometimes couched their appeals in a stridently Protestant idiom that did not appeal to Catholics. The party's most radical proposal was for the "sub-treasury" scheme but key leaders kept their distance from this. The rise and fall of the Populists showed that the idea of a Farmer-Labor party was not just an ideological figment but it also demonstrated the resilience of the reigning political regime.[153]

In private correspondence Engels had a poor view of the theoretical grasp of the American Marxists and socialists. However, Engels was hugely impressed by the anthropological studies of Lewis Henry Morgan and Marx took seriously Henry Carey's economic writings. Within a little more or less than a decade of Engels's death, three outstanding works appeared that would very likely have improved his view of critical thought in the United States: Louis Boudin, The Theoretical System of Karl Marx (1907); Thorsten Veblen, The Theory of Business Enterprise (1904); and W.E.B. Du Bois, The Souls of Black Folk (1903).

The eruption of titanic class struggles also had an impact on currents in US intellectual life far removed from Marxism. Eugene Debs's American Railway Union (ARU) broke with the caution of craft unionism and tried to organize the entire railroad industry. In 1892 the ARU forced major concessions from the Northern Union railroad, and its membership grew to 150,000. However, when the ARU showed that it could paralyze one half of the entire rail network, the administration of Grover Cleveland stepped in to break the strike through injunctions and imprisonments. A conversation with an ARU picket had an electrifying impact on the philosopher John Dewey: "My nerves were more thrilled than they had been for years; I felt as if I had better resign my job teaching and follow him round till I got into life. One lost all sense of the right and wrong of things in admiration of his absolute, almost fanatic, sincerity and earnestness, and in admiration of the magnificent combination that was going on. Simply as an aesthetic matter, I don't believe the world has been but few times such a spectacle of magnificent union of men about a common interest, as this strike evinces…The govt is evidently going to take a hand in and the men will be beaten almost to a certainty—but it's a great thing and the beginning of greater."[154]

Eugene Debs was arrested for defying the government injunction, and read Marx's work in jail. Marx's ideas were themselves beginning to influence the culture of US radicalism, just as they were also, in their turn, shaped by the American experience of robber baron capitalism and desperate class struggle. Marx's dark vision clearly supplies the central themes of Jack London's extraordinarily powerful novel The Iron Heel, a book read by millions in a large number of languages—and which many claimed had changed their lives. The history of the United States in the Gilded Age had resonated with such epic class struggles that they fleshed out the social imaginary of socialists and other radicals, not just in North America but also in Europe and far beyond—Latin America, Asia, and Africa. The New World had always tapped into European utopian longings, sometimes accompanied by dystopian fears. The United States of the great capitalist trusts and their Congressional marionettes offered an awesome spectacle—but so did the resistance of US workers and farmers. The international day of the working class, May 1, after all, memorializes US workers—the Haymarket martyrs of May 1886. So just as the US capitalist, with his top hat and cigar, typified the boss class, so the US workingman, with his shirt and jeans or overalls, became the image of the proletarian (and Lucy Parsons, Mother Jones, and "Rosie the Riveter" supplied his female counterpart). The set-piece battles in industrial America between the two sides were typically on a larger scale than European industrial disputes. There is, of course, irony in the fact that the iconic US worker was ultimately defeated or contained, while organized labor in Europe and the antipodes secured representation and even some social gains.

Albert Parsons, the Haymarket martyr, and his wife, Lucy Parsons, who did so much to defend the memory of her husband and his colleagues, had both participated in the Internationalist movement of the 1870s. They first met in Texas. Albert had volunteered for the Confederate army at the age of 13, but later came to apologize for this. Because of his military experience, he was made colonel of a militia regiment formed to defend Reconstruction. Lucy Parsons was a woman of mixed race (with indigenous, African and European forbears), who may have been born a slave. They moved to Chicago in the mid-1870s, where they were at first active as socialist agitators in the International Working People's Association (IWPA), which saw itself first as a branch of the International and later were self-described anarchists. They were strongly committed to the idea that the workers needed to emancipate themselves. They were subsequently associated with a double attempt to radicalize the program and method of the trade unions. They insisted that the eight-hour day should mean "eight for ten," that is, ten hours' pay for eight hours' work, or an eight-hour day with no loss of pay. This way of shaping the demand had not always been so sharply pursued before. They also propagated the idea that workers should support one another's struggles with boycotts and sympathy strikes.

Albert Parsons was a gifted orator and journalist, but he also assisted in the formation of a workers' militia that would protect political meetings and demonstrations. The Chicago businessmen had already formed their own militia, equipped with carbines and a Gatling gun. However, the famous Haymarket massacre involved neither of these formations. The workers' rally was unarmed and unprotected. An individual, perhaps a provocateur, threw a bomb, and four policemen were killed in the resulting melee. Albert and Lucy, who were unarmed, had taken their children to the rally. The Chicago police responded to the bomb throwing by indiscriminate shooting, killing perhaps a dozen and may have caused some of their own casualties. The anarchist and socialist movement had rhetorically posed the question of revolutionary violence without clearly deciding and explaining the circumstances that might require and justify it.

The eight-hour movement in Chicago had huge support in May 1886, but that support was disoriented by the carefully orchestrated media hysteria claiming an anarchist terror plot. The subsequent trial of the supposed ringleaders of an armed uprising was a judicial lynching rather than a legal process—as the pardons later issued to those who had been imprisoned (rather than hanged) acknowledged and documented. The issuing of this pardon just eight years after the trial illustrates an interesting aspect of the Chicago anarchists: namely, that they did not abstain from electoral politics. Mayor Harrison testified in favor of Albert Parsons, and Parsons urged his followers to vote for Harrison—who lost in 1886 but was reelected in 1893. When Peter Altgelt, the Governor of Illinois, issued pardons to the surviving Haymarket leaders in 1892, he did not suffer electorally.[155] Though generally scornful of politicians, Lucy Parsons expressed her high regard for Altgelt's courage.

Lucy Parsons was a dedicated and accomplished orator, agitator, and organizer, roles that she sustained for half a century after her husband was hanged. She had a special gift for encapsulating the syndicalist worldview. From today's perspective, her identity as a woman and a person of mixed ancestry—Mexican, white and black—makes her a symbol of multiculturalism. However, her own self-conception stressed her identity as a neo-abolitionist exposing "wage slavery." In the 1890s she launched a journal called The Liberator, a deliberate echo of William Lloyd Garrison's famous abolitionist magazine. She expressed her horror at Southern lynchings and other attacks on African Americans. But she believed that it was class, not color, that defined the exploited and the oppressed. She urged the Southern blacks to organize and resist without fully registering that white violence was designed to make this impossible. Her anarchist or syndicalist beliefs led her to warn Southern blacks that neither preachers nor politicians would help them. She became a member of Industrial Workers of the World, the syndicalist organization, at its founding conference in Chicago in 1905. For her, the redemptive power of "One Big Union" was needed to crush and scatter the bosses, whether the latter owned factories, railroads, or plantations.[156]

Another product of Reconstruction and the International milieu was Timothy Thomas Fortune, a New York journalist who had been born a slave in Florida and freed by the Emancipation Proclamation and who later served as an aide to his father, a Radical Republican. Fortune's writings, especially White and Black: Land, Labor and Politics in the South (1884), analyzed the racial formation of class in the postbellum South. Fortune saw racial and class privilege as mutually supportive. His focus on the historic confrontation between "labor and capital" betrayed some Marxist influence, but he was also founder of the Afro-American League, one of the successors to the Black Convention Movement of 1830–70 and a precursor of the NAACP.[157] In the 1890s he worked for Booker T. Washington and advocated measures favorable to black business and a black middle class.

Both color-blindness and conscious racism prevented US labor from taking up the cause of the victims of white oppression in the South. Employers were often able to exploit and foster racial antagonism. Booker T. Washington sometimes urged employers to take on black employees with the argument that they would be good workers who would spurn the troublemakers. Blinkered as they were, the more ideological wing of German American socialism never recanted their commitment to human unity. Even a writer as critical of the German American Marxists as Messer-Kruse concedes that they "never renounced their devotion to the principle of racial equality,"[158] something which cannot be said of several traditions of Anglo-American socialism.[159]

If the nonappearance of a US labor party marked a critical defeat for Karl Marx, the failure of the Republican Party to emerge from Reconstruction and its sequel as a party of bourgeois rectitude and reform registered a spectacular defeat for Lincoln's hopes for his party and country. After dominating Washington for half a century the Republicans were the party of cartels and corruption. The Democrats were also no slouches when it came to ingratiating themselves with Big Money or persecuting social reformers. Both parties failed US capitalism by offering neither honest stewardship nor the regulatory institutions that might have checked abuse and underpinned progressive development. Instead, as Matthew Josephson showed so vividly, venal "politicos" became the handmaidens of the new corporations and the enemies of social improvement.[160] Moreover, no event so well exhibited the vices of the US political class as the Wormley House deal that ended Reconstruction in 1877. The violence of Southern whites was rewarded, the freedmen and women were abandoned, the wishes of the voters were flouted, and railroad contracts were forwarded or thwarted. The participants in these proceedings sought to camouflage their sordid character by claiming that "reform" would be promoted, but this had become a code word for spending cuts, not integrity and authority in Federal administration. The freed people were left on their own, while Republican placemen forced to flee the South were found jobs in the Treasury Department in Washington.[161]

[159] Whatever their other failings, twentieth-century American Marxists, white as well as black, were to make an outstanding contribution to the battle against white racism and for civil rights. No other political current has such an honorable and courageous record. It is to this tradition and a Marxist US New Left that we owe the term political correctness. Despite occasional excesses, PC has nevertheless proved to be a hugely progressive force, establishing a basic etiquette of respect and collaboration. Mocked though it sometimes is, its achievement is a noble one. This having been said, Marx—at least in his private correspondence—furnishes a field day for PC critics, though they should notice that his negative characterizations are bestowed impartially on Germans and French, Yankees and South Americans, blacks and Jews. Cherishing universalism, he is excessively hostile to any type of partiality.

[160] Matthew Josephson, The Politicos, New York 1963.

But the real problem was that in each recession many banks failed and even in good times the service offered to farmers was miserably inadequate. The modest resources available to the Federal government were also a significant factor in the failure of Reconstruction, as we have seen. Abraham Lincoln gave considerable latitude to his treasury secretaries, but by inclination he favored private sector solutions and was wary of giving too much scope to publicly controlled entities. If the US postbellum record was much weaker than it should have been, the decisions taken—and not taken—by his administration help to explain this. However, it was the retreat from Reconstruction, the granting of virtual autonomy to Southern Dixiecrats, and the blunting of Federal powers by the Supreme Court that gave free rein to robber baron capitalism.

Marx and Engels themselves were often scornful of Republican leaders, including Lincoln, and generally distrusted the machinations of large states. But, with occasional misgivings, they had placed a wager that the Civil War would lead to slave emancipation, and that emancipation would in its turn pose the issue of votes for the freedmen. They further predicted more and larger labor struggles. Their predictions were borne out, although the new unions were eventually contained or defeated. The American Federation of Labor was founded, but it turned its back on the formation of a labor party. The example and watchwords of the Internationalists and of the Haymarket martyrs helped to encourage worker resistance in Shanghai, Petrograd, Calcutta, Havana, Turin, Barcelona, Berlin, Vienna, and Glasgow. In the years before the outbreak of the great slaughter in 1914, socialists, anarchists, and syndicalists worked to oppose imperial war, and to foster internationalism and class solidarity. And though they underestimated the power of nationalism and militarism, they were right about imperialism.

MARX IN THE US?

It remains only to address a final problem. Karl Marx's conception of history bequeathed a theoretical puzzle to later historical materialists, namely, what is the role of the individual in history? Such powerful writers and thinkers as Georgi Plekhanov, Isaac Deutscher, Jean-Paul Sartre, and Ernest Mandel debated the topic, often drawing attention to the fact that even deep-laid historical processes often depend on highly personal capacities and decisions. Considering the remarkable sequence of events I have surveyed here, it is clear that some individuals are so placed that they can influence the course of history. Lincoln did so with the Emancipation Proclamation. He thereby started a revolution, but he did not live to finish it. The freed people, the former abolitionists of whatever race, sex, or class had to contend with the consequences—angry white men in the South and greedy businessmen in the North. Through the IWA, Karl Marx had an impact on a generation of American workers and radicals, but despite heroic battles to do so, the IWA proved unable to build a political workers' movement to compare with those in Europe and the antipodes.

This leads me to a final thought. What would have happened if Marx or Engels had themselves sailed from England to make their home in New York or Chicago? It would have provoked a sensation. Marx would have earned good fees as a lecturer, and his family, including his daughters and sons-in-law, would very likely have flourished. Engels was hugely invigorated by the trip he did make to New York and Boston in 1887, but he declined to give public lectures there, and he did not return.[162]

But the truly tantalizing issue is whether they would have been able to find a more promising path for the American left. Obviously, there is no real way of knowing. But if their conduct in Germany in 1848–9, or in the 1860s, is any guide, Marx and Engels would have strongly opposed any policy of subordinating the real movement to some socialist shibboleth. They might well have helped to consolidate the International's achievements. They would very likely have favored opening the unions to the generality of workers and they would surely have given exceptional importance to curbing the freelance violence of the Southern "rifle clubs" and Northern company goons. Marx would have urged workers to develop their own organizations. But, just as he saw the importance of the slavery issue at the start of the Civil War, so he would surely have focused on "winning the battle of democracy," securing the basic rights of the producers—including the freedmen—in all sections as preparation for an ensuing social revolution. Eschewing reactionary socialism or the counterfeit anti-imperialism of some Southern slaveholders, Marx and Engels would have insisted that only the socialization of the great cartels and financial groups could enable the producers and their social allies to confront the challenges of modern society and to aspire to a society in which the free development of each is the precondition for the free development of all.

[162] Eleanor Marx and Edward Aveling also visited the US in 1887, and their combined lecture tour was very well received by the public. However, the visit was to be marred by controversies over the expenses claimed by Aveling. See Yvonne Kapp, Eleanor Marx, volume 2, London 1976, pp. 141–91.

Abraham Lincoln

First Inaugural Address

Fellow Citizens of the United States:

In compliance with a custom as old as the Government itself, I appear before you to address you briefly and to take in your presence the oath prescribed by the Constitution of the United States to be taken by the President before he enters on the execution of this office.

I do not consider it necessary at present for me to discuss those matters of administration about which there is no special anxiety or excitement.

Apprehension seems to exist among the people of the Southern States that by the accession of a Republican Administration their property and their peace and personal security are to be endangered. There has never been any reasonable cause for such apprehension. Indeed, the most ample evidence to the contrary has all the while existed and been open to their inspection. It is found in nearly all the published speeches of him who now addresses you. I do but quote from one of those speeches when I declare that I have no purpose directly or indirectly to interfere with the institution of slavery in the States where it exists. I believe I have no lawful right to do so, and I have no inclination to do so.

Those who nominated and elected me did so with full knowledge that I had made this and many similar declarations and had never recanted them; and more than this, they placed in the platform for my acceptance, and as a law to themselves and to me, the clear and emphatic resolution which I now read:

> Resolved, that the maintenance inviolate of the rights of the States, and especially the right of each State to order and control its own domestic institutions according to its own judgment exclusively, is essential to that balance of power on which the perfection and endurance of our political fabric depend, and we denounce the lawless invasion by armed force of the soil of any State or Territory, no matter what pretext, as among the gravest of crimes.

I now reiterate these sentiments, and in doing so I only press upon the public attention the most conclusive evidence of which the case is susceptible that the property, peace, and security of no section are to be in any wise endangered by the now incoming Administration. I add, too, that all the protection which, consistently with the Constitution and the laws, can be given will be cheerfully given to all the States when lawfully demanded, for whatever cause—as cheerfully to one section as to another.

There is much controversy about the delivering up of fugitives from service or labor. The clause I now read is as plainly written in the Constitution as any other of its provisions:

No person held to service or labor in one State, under the laws thereof, escaping into another, shall in consequence of any law or regulation therein be discharged from such service or labor, but shall be delivered up on claim of the party to whom such service or labor may be due.

It is scarcely questioned that this provision was intended by those who made it for the reclaiming of what we call fugitive slaves, and the intention of the lawgiver is the law. All members of Congress swear their support to the whole Constitution—to this provision as much as to any other. To the proposition, then, that slaves whose cases come within the terms of this clause "shall be delivered up" their oaths are unanimous. Now, if they would make the effort in good temper, could they not with nearly equal unanimity frame and pass a law by means of which to keep good that unanimous oath?

There is some difference of opinion whether this clause should be enforced by national or by State authority, but surely that difference is not a very material one. If the slave is to be surrendered, it can be of but little consequence to him or to others by which authority it is done. And should anyone in any case be content that his oath shall go unkept on a merely unsubstantial controversy as to how it shall be kept?

Again: In any law upon this subject ought not all the safeguards of liberty known in civilized and humane jurisprudence to be introduced, so that a free man be not in any case surrendered as a slave? And might it not be well at the same time to provide by law for the enforcement of that clause in the Constitution which guarantees that "the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States"?

I take the official oath today with no mental reservations and with no purpose to construe the Constitution or laws by any hypercritical rules; and while I do not choose now to specify particular acts of Congress as proper to be enforced, I do suggest that it will be much safer for all, both in official and private stations, to conform to and abide by all those acts which stand unrepealed than to violate any of them trusting to find impunity in having them held to be unconstitutional.

It is seventy-two years since the first inauguration of a President under our National Constitution. During that period fifteen different and greatly distinguished citizens have in succession administered the executive branch of the Government. They have conducted it through many perils, and generally with great success. Yet, with all this scope of precedent, I now enter upon the same task for the brief constitutional term of four years under great and peculiar difficulty. A disruption of the Federal Union, heretofore only menaced, is now formidably attempted.

I hold that in contemplation of universal law and of the Constitution the Union of these States is perpetual. Perpetuity is implied, if not expressed, in the fundamental law of all national governments. It is safe to assert that no government proper ever had a provision in its organic law for its own termination. Continue to execute all the express provisions of our National Constitution, and the Union will endure forever, it being impossible to destroy it except by some action not provided for in the instrument itself.

Again: If the United States be not a government proper, but an association of States in the nature of contract merely, can it, as a contract, be peaceably unmade by less than all the parties who made it? One party to a contract may violate it—break it, so to speak—but does it not require all to lawfully rescind it?

Descending from these general principles, we find the proposition that in legal contemplation the Union is perpetual confirmed by the history of the Union itself. The Union is much older than the Constitution. It was formed, in fact, by the Articles of Association in 1774. It was matured and continued by the Declaration of Independence in 1776. It was further matured, and the faith of all the then thirteen States expressly plighted and engaged that it should be perpetual, by the Articles of Confederation in 1778. And finally, in 1787, one of the declared objects for ordaining and establishing the Constitution was "to form a more perfect Union."

But if destruction of the Union by one or by a part only of the States be lawfully possible, the Union is less perfect than before the Constitution, having lost the vital element of perpetuity.

It follows from these views that no State upon its own mere motion can lawfully get out of the Union; that resolves and ordinances to that effect are legally void; and that acts of violence within any State or States against the authority of the United States are insurrectionary or revolutionary, according to circumstances.

I therefore consider that in view of the Constitution and the laws the Union is unbroken, and to the extent of my ability I shall take care, as the Constitution itself expressly enjoins upon me, that the laws of the Union be faithfully executed in all the States. Doing this I deem to be only a simple duty on my part, and I shall perform it so far as practicable unless my rightful masters, the American people, shall withhold the requisite means or in some authoritative manner direct the contrary. I trust this will not be regarded as a menace, but only as the declared purpose of the Union that it will constitutionally defend and maintain itself.

In doing this there needs to be no bloodshed or violence, and there shall be none unless it be forced upon the national authority. The power confided to me will be used to hold, occupy, and possess the property and places belonging to the Government and to collect the duties and imposts; but beyond what may be necessary for these objects, there will be no invasion, no using of force against or among the people anywhere. Where hostility to the United States in any interior locality shall be so great and universal as to prevent competent resident citizens from holding the Federal offices, there will be no attempt to force obnoxious strangers among the people for that object. While the strict legal right may exist in the Government to enforce the exercise of these offices, the attempt to do so would be so irritating and so nearly impracticable withal that I deem it better to forego for the time the uses of such offices.

The mails, unless repelled, will continue to be furnished in all parts of the Union. So far as possible the people everywhere shall have that sense of perfect security which is most favorable to calm thought and reflection. The course here indicated will be followed unless current events and experience shall show a modification or change to be proper, and in every case and exigency my best discretion will be exercised, according to circumstances actually existing and with a view and a hope of a peaceful solution of the national troubles and the restoration of fraternal sympathies and affections.

That there are persons in one section or another who seek to destroy the Union at all events and are glad of any pretext to do it I will neither affirm nor deny, but if there be such, I need address no word to them. To those, however, who really love the Union may I not speak?

Before entering upon so grave a matter as the destruction of our national fabric, with all its benefits, its memories, and its hopes, would it not be wise to ascertain precisely why we do it? Will you hazard so desperate a step while there is any possibility that any portion of the ills you fly from have no real existence? Will you, while the certain ills you fly to are greater than all the real ones you fly from, will you risk the commission of so fearful a mistake?

All profess to be content in the Union if all constitutional rights can be maintained. Is it true, then, that any right plainly written in the Constitution has been denied? I think not. Happily, the human mind is so constituted that no party can reach to the audacity of doing this. Think, if you can, of a single instance in which a plainly written provision of the Constitution has ever been denied. If by the mere force of numbers a majority should deprive a minority of any clearly written constitutional right, it might in a moral point of view justify revolution—certainly would if such right were a vital one. But such is not our case. All the vital rights of minorities and of individuals are so plainly assured to them by affirmations and negations, guarantees and prohibitions in the Constitution that controversies never arise concerning them. But no organic law can ever be framed with a provision specifically applicable to every question which may occur in practical administration. No foresight can anticipate nor any document of reasonable length contain express provisions for all possible questions. Shall fugitives from labor be surrendered by national or by State authority? The Constitution does not expressly say. May Congress prohibit slavery in the Territories? The Constitution does not expressly say. Must Congress protect slavery in the Territories? The Constitution does not expressly say.

From questions of this class spring all our constitutional controversies, and we divide upon them into majorities and minorities. If the minority will not acquiesce, the majority must, or the Government must cease. There is no other alternative, for continuing the Government is acquiescence on one side or the other. If a minority in such case will secede rather than acquiesce, they make a precedent which in turn will divide and ruin them, for a minority of their own will secede from them whenever a majority refuses to be controlled by such minority. For instance, why may not any portion of a new confederacy a year or two hence arbitrarily secede again, precisely as portions of the present Union now claim to secede from it? All who cherish disunion sentiments are now being educated to the exact temper of doing this.

Is there such perfect identity of interests among the States to compose a new union as to produce harmony only and prevent renewed secession?

Plainly the central idea of secession is the essence of anarchy. A majority held in restraint by constitutional checks and limitations and always changing easily with deliberate changes of popular opinions and sentiments is the only true sovereign of a free people. Whoever rejects it does of necessity fly to anarchy or to despotism. Unanimity is impossible. The rule of a minority, as a permanent arrangement, is wholly inadmissible; so that, rejecting the majority principle, anarchy or despotism in some form is all that is left.

I do not forget the position assumed by some that constitutional questions are to be decided by the Supreme Court, nor do I deny that such decisions must be binding in any case upon the parties to a suit as to the object of that suit, while they are also entitled to very high respect and consideration in all parallel cases by all other departments of the Government. And while it is obviously possible that such decision may be erroneous in any given case, still the evil effect following it, being limited to that particular case, with the chance that it may be overruled and never become a precedent for other cases, can better be borne than could the evils of a different practice. At the same time, the candid citizen must confess that if the policy of the Government upon vital questions affecting the whole people is to be irrevocably fixed by decisions of the Supreme Court, the instant they are made in ordinary litigation between parties in personal actions, the people will have ceased to be their own rulers, having to that extent practically resigned their Government into the hands of that eminent tribunal. Nor is there in this view any assault upon the court or the judges. It is a duty from which they may not shrink to decide cases properly brought before them, and it is no fault of theirs if others seek to turn their decisions to political purposes.

One section of our country believes slavery is right and ought to be extended, while the other believes it is wrong and ought not to be extended. This is the only substantial dispute. The fugitive-slave clause of the Constitution and the law for the suppression of the foreign slave trade are each as well enforced, perhaps, as any law can ever be in a community where the moral sense of the people imperfectly supports the law itself. The great body of the people abide by the dry legal obligation in both cases, and a few break over in each. This, I think, cannot be perfectly cured, and it would be worse in both cases after the separation of the sections than before. The foreign slave trade, now imperfectly suppressed, would be ultimately revived without restriction in one section, while fugitive slaves, now only partially surrendered, would not be surrendered at all by the other.

Physically speaking, we cannot separate. We cannot remove our respective sections from each other nor build an impassable wall between them. A husband and wife may be divorced and go out of the presence and beyond the reach of each other, but the different parts of our country cannot do this. They cannot but remain face to face, and intercourse, either amicable or hostile, must continue between them. Is it possible, then, to make that intercourse more advantageous or more satisfactory after separation than before? Can aliens make treaties easier than friends can make laws? Can treaties be more faithfully enforced between aliens than laws can among friends? Suppose you go to war: you cannot fight always, and when, after much loss on both sides and no gain on either, you cease fighting, the identical old questions, as to terms of intercourse, are again upon you.

This country, with its institutions, belongs to the people who inhabit it. Whenever they shall grow weary of the existing Government, they can exercise their constitutional right of amending it or their revolutionary right to dismember or overthrow it. I cannot be ignorant of the fact that many worthy and patriotic citizens are desirous of having the National Constitution amended. While I make no recommendation of amendments, I fully recognize the rightful authority of the people over the whole subject, to be exercised in either of the modes prescribed in the instrument itself, and I should, under existing circumstances, favor rather than oppose a fair opportunity being afforded the people to act upon it. I will venture to add that to me the convention mode seems preferable, in that it allows amendments to originate with the people themselves, instead of only permitting them to take or reject propositions originated by others, not especially chosen for the purpose, and which might not be precisely such as they would wish to either accept or refuse. I understand a proposed amendment to the Constitution—which amendment, however, I have not seen—has passed Congress, to the effect that the Federal Government shall never interfere with the domestic institutions of the States, including that of persons held to service. To avoid misconstruction of what I have said, I depart from my purpose not to speak of particular amendments so far as to say that, holding such a provision to now be implied constitutional law, I have no objection to its being made express and irrevocable.

The Chief Magistrate derives all his authority from the people, and they have referred none upon him to fix terms for the separation of the States. The people themselves can do this if also they choose, but the Executive as such has nothing to do with it. His duty is to administer the present Government as it came to his hands and to transmit it unimpaired by him to his successor.

Why should there not be a patient confidence in the ultimate justice of the people? Is there any better or equal hope in the world? In our present differences, is either party without faith of being in the right? If the Almighty Ruler of Nations, with His eternal truth and justice, be on your side of the North, or on yours of the South, that truth and that justice will surely prevail by the judgment of this great tribunal of the American people.

By the frame of the Government under which we live this same people have wisely given their public servants but little power for mischief, and have with equal wisdom provided for the return of that little to their own hands at very short intervals. While the people retain their virtue and vigilance no Administration by any extreme of wickedness or folly can very seriously injure the Government in the short space of four years.

My countrymen, one and all, think calmly and well upon this whole subject. Nothing valuable can be lost by taking time. If there be an object to hurry any of you in hot haste to a step which you would never take deliberately, that object will be frustrated by taking time, but no good object can be frustrated by it. Such of you as are now dissatisfied still have the old Constitution unimpaired, and, on the sensitive point, the laws of your own framing under it, while the new Administration will have no immediate power, if it would, to change either. If it were admitted that you who are dissatisfied hold the right side in the dispute, there still is no single good reason for precipitate action. Intelligence, patriotism, Christianity, and a firm reliance on Him who has never yet forsaken this favored land are still competent to adjust in the best way all our present difficulty.

In your hands, my dissatisfied fellow countrymen, and not in mine, is the momentous issue of civil war. The Government will not assail you. You can have no conflict without being yourselves the aggressors. You have no oath registered in heaven to destroy the Government, while I shall have the most solemn one to "preserve, protect, and defend it."

I am loath to close. We are not enemies, but friends. We must not be enemies. Though passion may have strained it must not break our bonds of affection. The mystic chords of memory, stretching from every battlefield and patriot grave to every living heart and hearthstone all over this broad land, will yet swell the chorus of the Union, when again touched, as surely they will be, by the better angels of our nature.

Emancipation Proclamation

Whereas, on the twenty-second day of September, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and sixty-two, a proclamation was issued by the President of the United States, containing, among other things, the following, to wit:

> That on the first day of January, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and sixty-three, all persons held as slaves within any State or designated part of a State, the people whereof shall then be in rebellion against the United States, shall be then, thenceforward, and forever free; and the Executive Government of the United States, including the military and naval authority thereof, will recognize and maintain the freedom of such persons, and will do no act or acts to repress such persons, or any of them, in any efforts they may make for their actual freedom.
> That the Executive will, on the first day of January aforesaid, by proclamation designate the States and parts of States, if any, in which the people thereof, respectively, shall then be in rebellion against the United States; and the fact that any State, or the people thereof, shall on that day be, in good faith, represented in the Congress of the United States by members chosen thereto at elections wherein a majority of the qualified voters of such State shall have participated, shall, in the absence of strong countervailing testimony, be deemed conclusive evidence that such State, and the people thereof, are not then in rebellion against the United States.

Now, therefore, I, Abraham Lincoln, President of the United States, by virtue of the power in me vested as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States in time of actual armed rebellion against the authority and government of the United States, and as a fit and necessary war measure for suppressing said rebellion, do on this first day of January in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and sixty-three, and in accordance with my purpose so to do publicly proclaimed for the full period of one hundred days from the day first above mentioned, order and designate as the States and parts of States wherein the people thereof respectively are this day in rebellion against the United States, the following, to wit:

> Arkansas, Texas, Louisiana (except the Parishes of St. Bernard, Plaquemines, Jefferson, St. John, St. Charles, St. James Ascension, Assumption, Terrebonne, Lafourche, St. Mary, St. Martin, and Orleans, including the City of New Orleans), Mississippi, Alabama, Florida, Georgia, South Carolina, North Carolina, and Virginia (except the forty-eight counties designated as West Virginia, and also the counties of Berkley, Accomac, Northampton, Elizabeth City, York, Princess Ann, and Norfolk, including the cities of Norfolk and Portsmouth, and which excepted parts, are for the present, left precisely as if this proclamation were not issued).

And by virtue of the power and for the purpose aforesaid, I do order and declare that all persons held as slaves within said designated States, and parts of States, are, and henceforward shall be free; and that the Executive government of the United States, including the military and naval authorities thereof, will recognize and maintain the freedom of said persons.

And I hereby enjoin upon the people so declared to be free to abstain from all violence, unless in necessary self-defense; and I recommend to them that in all cases when allowed, they labor faithfully for reasonable wages.

And I further declare and make known, that such persons of suitable condition will be received into the armed service of the United States to garrison forts, positions, stations, and other places, and to man vessels of all sorts in said service.

And upon this act, sincerely believed to be an act of justice, warranted by the Constitution, upon military necessity, I invoke the considerate judgment of mankind, and the gracious favor of Almighty God.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

Done at the City of Washington, this first day of January in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and sixty three, and of the Independence of the United States of America the eighty-seventh. By the President: ABRAHAM LINCOLN WILLIAM H. SEWARD, Secretary of State.

Gettysburg Address

Fourscore and seven years ago, our fathers brought forth on this continent a new nation, conceived in liberty and dedicated to the proposition that all men are created equal. Now we are engaged in a great civil war, testing whether that nation or any nation so conceived and so dedicated can long endure. We are met on a great battlefield of that war. We have come to dedicate a portion of that field as a final resting place for those who here gave their lives that that nation might live. It is altogether fitting and proper that we should do this. But in a larger sense, we cannot dedicate, we cannot consecrate, we cannot hallow this ground. The brave men, living and dead, who struggled here have consecrated it far above our poor power to add or detract. The world will little note nor long remember what we say here, but it can never forget what they did here. It is for us the living, rather, to be dedicated here to the unfinished work which they who fought here have thus far so nobly advanced. It is rather for us to be here dedicated to the great task remaining before us: that from these honored dead we take increased devotion to that cause for which they gave the last full measure of devotion; that we here highly resolve that these dead shall not have died in vain, that this nation under God shall have a new birth of freedom, and that government of the people, by the people, for the people shall not perish from the earth.

Second Inaugural Address

Fellow Countrymen:

At this second appearing to take the oath of the Presidential office there is less occasion for an extended address than there was at the first. Then a statement somewhat in detail of a course to be pursued seemed fitting and proper. Now, at the expiration of four years during which public declarations have been constantly called forth on every point and phase of the great contest which still absorbs the attention and engrosses the energies of the nation, little that is new could be presented. The progress of our arms, upon which all else chiefly depends, is as well known to the public as to myself, and it is, I trust, reasonably satisfactory and encouraging to all. With high hope for the future, no prediction in regard to it is ventured.

On the occasion corresponding to this four years ago, all thoughts were anxiously directed to an impending civil war. All dreaded it; all sought to avert it. While the inaugural address was being delivered from this place, devoted altogether to saving the Union without war, insurgent agents were in the city seeking to destroy it without war—seeking to dissolve the Union and divide effects by negotiation. Both parties deprecated war, but one of them would make war rather than let the nation survive, and the other would accept war rather than let it perish, and the war came.

One eighth of the whole population were colored slaves, not distributed generally over the Union but localized in the southern part of it. These slaves constituted a peculiar and powerful interest. All knew that this interest was somehow the cause of the war. To strengthen, perpetuate, and extend this interest was the object for which the insurgents would rend the Union even by war, while the Government claimed no right to do more than to restrict the territorial enlargement of it. Neither party expected for the war the magnitude or the duration which it has already attained. Neither anticipated that the cause of the conflict might cease with, or even before, the conflict itself should cease. Each looked for an easier triumph and a result less fundamental and astounding. Both read the same Bible and pray to the same God, and each invokes His aid against the other. It may seem strange that any men should dare to ask a just God's assistance in wringing their bread from the sweat of other men's faces, but let us judge not, that we be not judged. The prayers of both could not be answered. That of neither has been answered fully. The Almighty has His own purposes. "Woe unto the world because of offenses; for it must needs be that offenses come, but woe to that man by whom the offense cometh." If we shall suppose that American slavery is one of those offenses which, in the providence of God, must needs come, but which, having continued through His appointed time, He now wills to remove, and that He gives to both North and South this terrible war as the woe due to those by whom the offense came, shall we discern therein any departure from those divine attributes which the believers in a living God always ascribe to Him? Fondly do we hope, fervently do we pray, that this mighty scourge of war may speedily pass away. Yet if God wills that it continue until all the wealth piled by the bondsman's two hundred and fifty years of unrequited toil shall be sunk, and until every drop of blood drawn with the lash shall be paid by another drawn with the sword, as was said three thousand years ago, so still it must be said "the judgments of the Lord are true and righteous altogether."

With malice toward none, with charity for all, with firmness in the right as God gives us to see the right, let us strive on to finish the work we are in, to bind up the nation's wounds, to care for him who shall have borne the battle and for his widow and his orphan, to do all which may achieve and cherish a just and lasting peace among ourselves and with all nations.

Karl Marx

The North American Civil War

London, October 20, 1861

For months now, the leading London papers, both weekly and daily, have been repeating the same litany on the American Civil War. While they insult the free states of the North, they anxiously defend themselves against the suspicion of sympathizing with the slave states of the South. In fact, they continually write two articles: one in which they attack the North, another in which they excuse their attacks on the North. Qui s'excuse, s'accuse.

Their extenuating arguments are basically as follow. The war between North and South is a tariff war. Furthermore, the war is not being fought over any issue of principle; it is not concerned with the question of slavery but in fact centers on the North's lust for sovereignty. In the final analysis, even if justice is on the side of the North, does it not remain a futile endeavor to subjugate eight million Anglo-Saxons by force! Would not a separation from the South release the North from all connection with Negro slavery and assure to it, with its 20 million inhabitants and its vast territory, a higher level of development up to now scarcely dreamed of? Should the North not then welcome secession as a happy event, instead of wanting to crush it by means of a bloody and futile civil war?

Let us examine point by point the case made out by the English press.

The war between North and South—so runs the first excuse—is merely a tariff war, a war between a protectionist system and a free-trade system, and England, of course, is on the side of free trade. Is the slave owner to enjoy the fruits of slave labor to the full, or is he to be cheated of part of these fruits by the Northern protectionists? This is the question at issue in the war. It was reserved for the Times to make this brilliant discovery; the Economist, Examiner, Saturday Review and the like have elaborated on the same theme. It is characteristic that this discovery was made not in Charleston, but in London. In America everyone knew, of course, that between 1846 and 1861 a system of free trade prevailed and that Representative Morrill only carried his protectionist tariff through Congress after the rebellion had already broken out. Secession did not take place, therefore, because Congress had passed the Morrill tariff; at most, the Morrill tariff was passed by Congress because secession had taken place. To be sure, when South Carolina had its first attack of secessionism, in 1832, the protectionist tariff of 1828 served as a pretext; but that a pretext is all it was is shown by a statement made by General Jackson. This time, however, the old pretext has in fact not been repeated. In the secession Congress at Montgomery,[1] every mention of the tariff question was avoided, because in Louisiana, one of the most influential Southern states, the cultivation of sugar is based entirely on protection.

But, the London press pleads further, the war in the United States is nothing but a war aimed at preserving the Union by force. The Yankees cannot make up their minds to strike off fifteen stars from their banner.[2] They want to cut a colossal figure on the world stage. Indeed, it would be quite a different matter if the war were being fought in order to abolish slavery. But the slavery question, as the Saturday Review, among others, categorically declares, has absolutely nothing to do with this war.

It must be remembered above all that the war was started not by the North but by the South. The North is on the defensive. For months it had quietly stood by and watched while the secessionists took possession of forts, arsenals, shipyards, customs houses, pay offices, ships, and stores of arms belonging to the Union, insulted its flag, and took Northern troops prisoner. The secessionists finally decided to force the Union government out of its passive stance by means of a blatant act of war; for no other reason than this they proceeded to bombard Fort Sumter near Charleston. On April 11 [1861] their General Beauregard had learned in a meeting with Major Anderson, the commander of Fort Sumter, that the fort only had rations for three more days and that it would therefore have to be surrendered peacefully after this period. In order to forestall this peaceful surrender the secessionists opened the bombardment early the next morning (April 12), bringing about the fall of the place after a few hours. Hardly had this news been telegraphed to Montgomery, the seat of the secession Congress, when War Minister Walker declared publicly, in the name of the new Confederacy, "No man can say where the war opened today will end." At the same time he prophesied that before the first of May the flag of the Southern Confederacy would wave from the dome of the old Capitol in Washington and within a short time perhaps also from the Faneuil

Hall in Boston. Only then did Lincoln issue the proclamation summoning 75,000 men to protect the Union. The bombardment of Fort Sumter cut off the only possible constitutional way out: the summoning of a general convention of the American people, as Lincoln had proposed in his inaugural address. As it was, Lincoln was left with the choice of fleeing from Washington, evacuating Maryland and Delaware, surrendering Kentucky, Missouri, and Virginia, or of answering war with war.

The question as to the principle underlying the American Civil War is answered by the battle slogan with which the South broke the peace. [Alexander H.] Stephens, the Vice President of the Southern Confederacy, declared in the secession Congress that what fundamentally distinguished the constitution recently hatched in Montgomery from that of Washington and Jefferson was that slavery was now recognized for the first time as an institution good in itself and as the foundation of the whole political edifice, whereas the revolutionary fathers, men encumbered by the prejudices of the eighteenth century, had treated slavery as an evil imported from England and to be eradicated in the course of time. Another Southern matador, Mr. Spratt, declared, "For us it is a question of the foundation of a great slave republic." Thus if the North drew its sword only in defense of the Union, had not the South already declared that the continuance of slavery was no longer compatible with the continuance of the Union?

Just as the bombardment of Fort Sumter gave the signal for the opening of the war, the electoral victory of the Northern Republican party, Lincoln's election to the presidency, had given the signal for secession. Lincoln was elected on November 6, 1860. On November 8 the message was telegraphed from South Carolina, "Secession is regarded here as an accomplished fact"; on November 10, the Georgia legislature occupied itself with plans for secession, and on November 13 a special sitting of the Mississippi legislature was called to consider secession. But Lincoln's election was itself only the result of a split in the Democratic camp. During the election campaign the Northern Democrats concentrated their votes on Douglas, the Southern Democrats on [John C.] Breckinridge; the Republican party owed its victory to this split in the Democratic vote. How, on the one hand, did the Republican party achieve this dominant position in the North; how, on the other hand, did this division arise within the Democratic party, whose members, North and South, had operated in conjunction for more than half a century?

Buchanan's presidency[3] saw the control which the South had gradually usurped over the Union, as a result of its alliance with the Northern Democrats, reach its peak. The last Continental Congress of 1787 and the first constitutional Congress of 1789–90 had legally excluded slavery from all territories of the republic northwest of Ohio. (Territories are the colonies lying within the United States which have not yet achieved the population level laid down in the Constitution for the formation of autonomous states.) The so-called Missouri Compromise (1820), as a result of which Missouri entered the ranks of the United States as a slave-owning state, excluded slavery from all other territories north of 36° 30´ latitude and west of the Missouri [River]. As a result of this compromise the area of slavery was extended by several degrees of longitude while, on the other hand, quite definite geographical limits seemed to be placed on its future propagation. This geographical barrier was in turn torn down by the so-called Kansas-Nebraska Bill, whose author, Stephen A. Douglas, was at the time leader of the Northern Democrats. This bill, which passed both Houses of Congress, repealed the Missouri Compromise, placed slavery and freedom on an equal footing, enjoined the Union government to treat both with indifference, and left it to the sovereign people to decide whether slavery was to be introduced in a territory or not. Thus, for the first time in the history of the United States, every geographical and legal barrier in the way of an extension of slavery in the territories was removed. Under this new legislation the hitherto free territory of New Mexico, an area five times greater than New York State, was transformed into a slave territory, and the area of slavery was extended from the Mexican republic to latitude 38° north. In 1859 New Mexico was given a legal slave code which vies in barbarity with the statute books of Texas and Alabama. However, as the 1860 census shows, New Mexico does not yet have fifty slaves in a population of about 100,000. The South therefore only had to send over the border a few adventurers with some slaves and, with the help of the central government in Washington, get its officials and contractors to drum up a sham representative body in New Mexico, in order to impose slavery and the rule of the slaveholders on the territory.

[3] James Buchanan was US president from 1857 to 1861.

However, this convenient method proved inapplicable in the other territories. The South, therefore, went one step further and appealed from Congress to the Supreme Court of the United States. This Supreme Court, which numbers nine judges, five of whom are Southerners, had long been the most amenable instrument of the slaveholders. In 1857, in the notorious Dred Scott case, it decided that every American citizen had the right to take with him into any territory any property recognized by the Constitution. The Constitution recognizes slaves as property and commits the Union government to the protection of this property. Consequently, on the basis of the Constitution, slaves could be forced by their owners to work in the territories, and thus every individual slaveholder was entitled to introduce slavery into territories hitherto free against the will of the majority of the settlers. The territorial legislatures were denied the right to exclude slavery, and Congress and the Union government were charged with the duty of protecting the pioneers of the slave system.

While the Missouri Compromise of 1820 had extended the geographical boundaries of slavery in the territories, and while the Kansas-Nebraska Bill of 1854 had eliminated all geographical boundaries and replaced them by a political barrier, the will of the majority of the settlers, the Supreme Court's decision of 1857 tore down even this political barrier and transformed all territories of the republic, present and future, from nurseries of free states into nurseries of slavery.

At the same time, under Buchanan's administration, the more severe law of 1850 on the extradition of fugitive slaves was ruthlessly carried out in the Northern states. It seemed to be the constitutional calling of the North to play slave-catcher for the Southern slaveholders. On the other hand, in order to hinder as far as possible the colonization of the territories by free settlers, the slaveholders' party frustrated all so-called free-soil measures, that is, measures intended to guarantee the settlers a fixed amount of uncultivated public land free of charge.

As in domestic policy, so also in the foreign policy of the United States the interests of the slaveholders served as the guiding star. Buchanan had in fact purchased the presidential office by issuing the Ostend Manifesto,[4] in which the acquisition of Cuba, whether by payment or by force of arms, is proclaimed as the great political task of the nation. Under his administration northern Mexico had already been divided up among American land speculators, who were impatiently awaiting the signal to fall upon Chihuahua, Coahuila, and Sonora. The incessant piratical filibusters against the Central American states were no less carried out under the direction of the White House in Washington.[5] Closely connected with this foreign policy, which was manifestly aimed at conquering new territory for the expansion of slavery and the rule of the slaveholders, was the resumption of the slave trade, secretly supported by the Union government. Stephen A. Douglas himself declared in the American Senate on August 20, 1859, that during the previous year more Negroes had been requisitioned from Africa than ever before in any single year, even at the time when the slave trade was still legal. The number of slaves imported in the last year amounted to 15,000.

Armed propaganda abroad on behalf of slavery was the avowed aim of national policy; the Union had in fact become the slave of the 300,000 slaveholders who rule the South. This state of affairs had been brought about by a series of compromises which the South owed to its alliance with the Northern Democrats. All the periodic attempts made since 1817 to resist the ever increasing encroachments of the slaveholders had come to grief against this alliance. Finally, there came a turning point.

Hardly had the Kansas-Nebraska Bill been passed, erasing the geographical boundary of slavery and making its introduction into new territories subject to the will of the majority of the settlers, when armed emissaries of the slaveholders, border rabble from Missouri and Arkansas, fell upon Kansas, a bowie-knife in one hand and a revolver in the other, and with the most atrocious barbarity tried to drive out its settlers from the territory which they had colonized. As these raids were supported by the central government in Washington, a tremendous reaction ensued. In the whole of the North, but particularly in the Northwest, a relief organization was formed to provide support for Kansas in the shape of men, weapons, and money. Out of this relief organization grew the Republican party, which thus has its origins in the struggle for Kansas. After the failure of the attempts to transform Kansas into a slave territory by force of arms, the South tried to achieve the same result by way of political intrigue. Buchanan's administration, in particular, did its utmost to maneuver Kansas into the ranks of the United States as a slave state by the imposition of a slave constitution. Hence a new struggle took place, this time conducted for the most part in the Washington Congress. Even Stephen A. Douglas, leader of the Northern Democrats, now (1857–8) entered the lists, against the administration and against his Southern allies, because the imposition of a slave constitution would contradict the principle of settlers' sovereignty passed in the Nebraska Bill of 1854. Douglas, senator for Illinois, a northwestern state, would naturally have forfeited all his influence if he had wanted to concede to the South the right to steal by force of arms or acts of Congress the territories colonized by the North. Thus while the struggle for Kansas gave birth to the Republican party, it simultaneously gave rise to the first split within the Democratic party itself.

---

[4] The Ostend Manifesto was issued in 1854 by the United States ambassadors to Spain, France, and England (the latter being Buchanan); it contained an offer to purchase Cuba from Spain and threatened to seize it by force if Spain refused.

[5] Nicaragua was the particular object of these expeditions.

The Republican party issued its first program for the presidential election of 1856. Although its candidate, John Frémont, did not win, the huge number of votes cast for him demonstrated the rapid growth of the party, particularly in the Northwest. In their second national convention for the presidential election (May 17, 1860), the Republicans repeated their program of 1856, enriched by only a few additional points. Its main contents were that not a foot of new territory would be conceded to slavery, and that the filibustering[6] policy abroad must cease; the resumption of the slave trade was condemned, and lastly, free-soil laws would be enacted in order to further free colonization.

[6] The term "filibuster" here denotes American insurrectionist activities carried out in a foreign country.

The point of decisive importance in this program was that slavery was not to be conceded another foot of new ground; rather, it was to remain confined once and for all within the limits of the states where it already legally existed. Slavery was thus to be interned for good. However, permanent territorial expansion and the continual extension of slavery beyond its old borders is a law of existence for the slave states of the Union.

The cultivation of the Southern export crops, i.e., cotton, tobacco, sugar, etc., by slaves is only profitable so long as it is conducted on a mass scale by large gangs of slaves and in wide areas of naturally fertile soil requiring only simple labor. Intensive cultivation, which depends less on the fertility of the soil and more on capital investment and on intelligent and energetic labor, runs contrary to the nature of slavery. Hence the rapid transformation of states such as Maryland and Virginia, which in earlier times employed slavery in the production of export commodities, into states which raise slaves in order to export them to states lying further south. Even in South Carolina, where slaves form four-sevenths of the population, the cultivation of cotton has remained almost stationary for years, due to the exhaustion of the soil. Indeed, South Carolina has become partly transformed into a slave-raising state by pressure of circumstances insofar as it already sells slaves to the states of the deep South and Southwest to a value of four million dollars annually. As soon as this point is reached, the acquisition of new territory becomes necessary, so that one section of the slaveholders can introduce slave labor into new fertile estates and thus create a new market for slave raising and the sale of slaves by the section it has left behind. There is not the least doubt, for example, that without the acquisition of Louisiana, Missouri, and Arkansas by the United States, slavery would long ago have disappeared in Virginia and Maryland. In the secession Congress at Montgomery, one of the Southern spokesmen, Senator Toombs, strikingly formulated the economic law that necessitates the constant expansion of the slave territory. “In fifteen years more,” he said, “without a great increase in slave territory, either the slaves must be permitted to flee from the whites, or the whites must flee from the slaves.”

As is well known, individual states are represented in the Congressional House of Representatives according to the size of their respective populations. Since the population of the free states is growing incomparably more quickly than that of the slave states, the number of Northern representatives has inevitably overtaken the number of Southerners. The actual seat of Southern political power, therefore, is being transferred more and more to the American Senate, where every state, whether its population is great or small, is represented by two senators. In order to assert its influence in the Senate and, through the Senate, its hegemony over the United States, the South thus needed a continual formation of new slave states. But this could only be brought about by conquering foreign countries, as in the case of Texas, or by transforming the United States territories first into slave territories, later into slave states, as in the case of Missouri, Arkansas, etc. John Calhoun, whom the slaveholders admire as their statesman par excellence, declared in the Senate as early as February 19, 1847 that only the Senate offered the South the means of restoring a balance of power between South and North, that the extension of the slave territory was necessary to restore this balance, and that therefore the attempts of the South to create new slave states by force were justified.

When it comes down to it, the number of actual slaveholders in the South of the Union is not more than 300,000, an exclusive oligarchy confronted by the many million so-called poor whites, whose number has constantly grown as a result of the concentration of landed property, and whose situation can only be compared with that of the Roman plebeians in the direst period of Rome's decline. Only with the acquisition of new territories, the prospect of such acquisition, and filibustering expeditions is it possible to harmonize the interests of these "poor whites" successfully with those of the slaveholders, to channel their restless thirst for action in a harmless direction, and to tempt them with the prospect of becoming slaveholders themselves one day.

As a result of economic laws, then, to confine slavery to the limits of its old terrain would inevitably have led to its gradual extinction; politically it would have destroyed the hegemony exercised by the slave states by way of the Senate; and finally it would have exposed the slaveholding oligarchy to ominous dangers within their own states from the "poor whites." With the principle that every further extension of slave territories was to be prohibited by law, the Republicans therefore mounted a radical attack on the rule of the slaveholders. Consequently, the Republican election victory could not help but lead to open struggle between North and South. However, as has already been mentioned, this election victory was itself conditioned by the split in the Democratic camp.

The Kansas struggle had already provoked a split between the slave party and its Democratic allies in the North. The same quarrel now broke out again in a more general form with the presidential election of 1860. The Northern Democrats, with Douglas as their candidate, made the introduction of slavery into the territories dependent upon the will of the majority of settlers. The slaveholders' party, with Breckinridge as its candidate, asserted that the Constitution of the United States, as the Supreme Court had also declared, made legal provision for slavery; slavery was in actual fact already legal in all territories and did not require special naturalization. Thus, while the Republicans prohibited any growth of slave territories, the Southern party laid claim to all territories as legally warranted domains. What they had tried, for instance, with Kansas—imposing slavery on a territory against the will of the settlers themselves, by way of the central government—they now held up as a law for all Union territories. Such a concession lay beyond the power of the Democratic leaders and would only have caused their army to desert to the Republican camp. On the other hand, Douglas's "settlers' sovereignty" could not satisfy the slaveholders' party. What the slaveholders wanted to achieve had to be brought about in the next four years under the new President; it could only be brought about by means of the central government and could not be delayed any longer. It did not escape the slaveholders' notice that a new power had arisen, the Northwest, whose population, which had almost doubled between 1850 and 1860, was already more or less equal to the white population of the slave states—a power which neither by tradition, temperament, nor way of life was inclined to let itself be dragged from compromise to compromise in the fashion of the old Northern states. The Union was only of value for the South insofar as it let it use federal power as a means of implementing its slave policy. If it did not, it was better to break now than to watch the development of the Republican party and the rapid growth of the Northwest for another four years, and to begin the struggle under less favorable conditions. The slaveholders' party, therefore, now staked its all! When the Northern Democrats refused to play the role of the Southern "poor whites" any longer, the South brought about Lincoln's victory by splitting the votes and used this victory as an excuse for drawing the sword.

As is clear, the whole movement was and is based on the slave question. Not in the sense of whether the slaves within the existing slave states should be directly emancipated or not, but whether the twenty million free Americans of the North should subordinate themselves any longer to an oligarchy of 300,000 slaveholders; whether the vast territories of the Republic should become the nurseries of free states or of slavery; finally, whether the foreign policy of the Union should take the armed propaganda of slavery as its device throughout Mexico and Central and South America.

In a foreign article we shall examine the assertion of the London press that the North should sanction secession as the most favorable and only possible solution of the conflict.[7]

The American Question in England

London, September 18, 1861

Mrs. Beecher Stowe's letter to Lord Shaftesbury, whatever its intrinsic merit may be, has done a great deal of good, by forcing the anti-Northern organs of the London press to speak out and lay before the general public the ostensible reasons for their hostile tone against the North and their ill-concealed sympathies with the South, which looks rather strange on the part of people affecting an utter horror of slavery. Their first and main grievance is that the present American war is "not one for the abolition of slavery," and that therefore the high-minded Britisher, used to undertaking wars of his own, and interesting himself in other people's wars only on the basis of "broad humanitarian principles," cannot be expected to feel any sympathy with his Northern cousins. "In the first place," says the Economist, "the assumption that the quarrel between the North and South is a quarrel between Negro freedom on the one side, and Negro slavery on the other, is as impudent as it is untrue." "The North," says the Saturday Review, "does not proclaim abolition, and never pretended to fight for antislavery. The North has not hoisted for its oriflamme the sacred symbol of justice to the Negro; its cri de guerre[1] is not unconditional abolition." "If," says the Examiner, "we have been deceived about the real significance of the sublime movement, who but the Federalists themselves have to answer for the deception?"

Now, in the first instance, the premise must be conceded. The war has not been undertaken with a view to putting down slavery, and the United States authorities themselves have taken the greatest pains to protest against any such idea. But then, it ought to be remembered that it was not the North but the South which undertook this war, the former acting only on the defense. If it be true that the North, after long hesitation and an exhibition of forbearance unknown in the annals of European history, drew at last the sword not for crushing slavery, but for saving the Union, the South, on its part, inaugurated the war by loudly proclaiming "the peculiar institution" as the only and main end of the rebellion. It confessed to fighting for the liberty of enslaving other people, a liberty which, despite the Northern protests, it asserted to be put in danger by the victory of the Republican Party and the election of Mr. Lincoln to the Presidential chair. The Confederate Congress boasted that its newfangled Constitution, as distinguished from the Constitution of the Washingtons, Jeffersons, and Adamses, had recognized for the first time slavery as a thing good in itself, a bulwark of civilization, and a divine institution. If the North professed to fight but for the Union, the South gloried in rebellion for the supremacy of slavery. If antislavery and idealistic England felt not attracted by the profession of the North, how came it to pass that it was not violently repulsed by the cynical confessions of the South?

[1] War cry.

The Saturday Review helps itself out of this ugly dilemma by disbelieving the declarations of the seceders themselves. It sees deeper than this, and discovers "that slavery had very little to do with secession," the declarations of Jeff [erson] Davis and company to the contrary being mere "conventionalisms" with "about as much meaning as the conventionalisms about violated altars and desecrated hearths, which always occur in such proclamations."

The staple of argument on the part of the anti-Northern papers is very scanty, and throughout all of them we find almost the same sentences recurring, like the formulas of a mathematical series, at certain intervals, with very little art of variation or combination. "Why," exclaims the Economist, "it is only yesterday, when the Secession movement first gained serious head, on the first announcement of Mr. Lincoln's election, that the Northerners offered to the South, if they would remain in the Union, every conceivable security for the performance and inviolability of the obnoxious institution—that they disavowed in the most solemn manner all intention of interfering with it—that their leaders proposed compromise after compromise in Congress, all based upon the concession that slavery should not be meddled with." "How happens it," says the Examiner, "that the North was ready to compromise matters by the largest concessions to the South as to slavery? How was it that a certain geographical line was proposed in Congress within which slavery was to be recognized as an essential institution? The Southern states were not content with this."

What the Economist and the Examiner had to ask was not only why the Crittenden and other compromise measures were proposed in Congress, but why they were not passed? They affect to consider those compromise proposals as accepted by the North and rejected by the South, while in point of fact they were baffled by the Northern party that had carried the Lincoln election. Proposals never matured into resolutions, but always remaining in the embryo state of pia desideria,[2] the South had of course never any occasion either of rejecting or acquiescing. We come nearer to the pith of the question by the following remark of the Examiner:

> Mrs. Stowe says: "The slave party, finding they could no longer use the Union for their purposes, resolved to destroy it." There is here an admission that up to that time the slave party had used the Union for their purposes, and it would have been well if Mrs. Stowe could have distinctly shown where it was that the North began to make its stand against slavery.

One might suppose that The Examiner and the other oracles of public opinion in England had made themselves sufficiently familiar with the contemporaneous history to not need Mrs. Stowe's information on such all-important points. The progressive abuse of the Union by the slave power, working through its alliance with the Northern Democratic Party, is, so to say, the general formula of United States history since the beginning of this century. The successive compromise measures mark the successive degrees of the encroachment by which the Union became more and more transformed into the slave of the slave owner. Each of these compromises denotes a new encroachment of the South, a new concession of the North. At the same time none of the successive victories of the South was carried but after a hot contest with an antagonistic force in the North, appearing under different party names with different watchwords and under different colors. If the positive and final result of each single contest told in favor of the South, the attentive observer of history could not but see that every new advance of the slave power was a step forward to its ultimate defeat. Even at the time of the Missouri Compromise, the contending forces were so evenly balanced that Jefferson, as we see from his memoirs, apprehended the Union to be in danger of splitting on that deadly antagonism. The encroachments of the slaveholding power reached their maximum point, when by the Kansas-Nebraska bill, for the first time in the history of the United States—as Mr. Douglas himself confessed—every legal barrier to the diffusion of slavery within the United States territories was broken down; when afterward a Northern candidate bought his presidential nomination by pledging the Union to conquer or purchase in Cuba a new field of dominion for the slaveholder; when later on by the Dred Scott decision diffusion of slavery by the Federal power was proclaimed as the law of the American Constitution; and lastly, when the African slave trade was de facto reopened on a larger scale than during the times of its legal existence. But concurrently with this climax of southern encroachments, carried by the connivance of the Northern Democratic Party, there were unmistakable signs of Northern antagonistic agencies having gathered such strength as must soon turn the balance of power. The Kansas war, the formation of the Republican party, and the large vote cast for Mr. Frémont during the Presidential election of 1856 were so many palpable proofs that the North had accumulated sufficient energies to rectify the aberrations which United States history, under the slave owners' pressure, had undergone for half a century, and to make it return to the true principles of its development. Apart from those political phenomena, there was one broad statistical and economical fact indicating that the abuse of the Federal Union by the slave interest had approached the point from which it would have to recede forcibly or de bonne grace.[3] That fact was the growth of the Northwest, the immense strides its population had made from 1850 to 1860, and the new and reinvigorating influence it could not but bear on the destinies of the United States.

---

[3] With good grace.

Now, was all this a secret chapter of history? Was "the admission" Mrs. Beecher Stowe wanted to reveal to the Examiner and the other political illuminati of the London press the carefully hidden truth that "up to that time the slave party had used the Union for their purposes?" Is it the fault of the American North that the English pressmen were taken quite unawares by the violent clash of the antagonistic forces, the friction of which was the moving power of its history for half a century? Is it the fault of the Americans that the English press mistake for the fanciful crotchet hatched in a single day what was in reality the matured result of long years of struggle? The very fact that the formation and progress of the Republican Party in America have hardly been noticed by the London press speaks volumes as to the hollowness of its antislavery tirades. Take, for instance, the two antipodes of the London press, the London Times and Reynolds's Weekly Newspaper, the one the great organ of the respectable classes and the other the only remaining organ of the working class. The former, not long before Mr. Buchanan's career drew to an end, published an elaborate apology for his Administration and a defamatory libel against the Republican movement. Reynolds, on his part, was during Mr. Buchanan's stay at London one of his minions, and since that time never missed an occasion to write him up and to write his adversaries down. How did it come to pass that the Republican Party, whose platform was drawn up on the avowed antagonism to the encroachments of the slaveocracy and the abuse of the Union by the slave interest, carried the day in the North? How, in the second instance, did it come to pass that the great bulk of the Northern Democratic party, flinging aside its old connections with the leaders of slaveocracy, setting at naught its traditions of half a century, sacrificing great commercial interests and greater political prejudices, rushed to the support of the present Republican Administration and offered it men and money with an unsparing hand? Instead of answering these questions, the Economist exclaims:

> Can we forget that Abolitionists have habitually been as ferociously persecuted and maltreated in the North and West as in the South? Can it be denied that the testiness and halfheartedness, not to say insincerity, of the Government at Washington have for years supplied the chief impediment which has thwarted our efforts for the effectual suppression of the slave trade on the coast of Africa, while a vast proportion of the clippers actually engaged in that trade have been built with Northern capital, owned by Northern merchants, and manned by Northern seamen?

This is, in fact, a masterly piece of logic. Antislavery England cannot sympathize with the North breaking down the withering influence of slaveocracy because she cannot forget that the North, while bound by that influence, supported the slave trade, mobbed the Abolitionists, and had its Democratic institutions tainted by the slave driver's prejudices. She cannot sympathize with Mr. Lincoln's Administration because she had to find fault with Mr. Buchanan's Administration. She must needs sullenly cavil at the present movement of the Northern resurrection, cheer up the Northern sympathizers with the slave trade, branded in the Republican platform, and coquet with the Southern slaveocracy setting up an empire of its own, because she cannot forget that the North of yesterday was not the North of today. The necessity of justifying its attitude by such pettifogging Old Bailey[4] pleas proves more than anything else that the anti-Northern part of the English press is instigated by hidden motives, too mean and dastardly to be openly avowed.

As it is one of its pet maneuvers to taunt the present Republican Administration with the doings of its proslavery predecessors, so it tries hard to persuade the English people that the New York Herald ought to be considered the only authentic expositor of Northern opinion. The London Times having given out the cue in this direction, the servum pecus[5] of the other anti-Northern organs, great and small, persist in beating the same bush. So says the Economist: "In the light of the strife, New York papers and New York politicians were not wanting who exhorted the combatants, now that they had large armies in the field, to employ them not against each other but against Great Britain—to compromise the internal quarrel, the slave question included, and invade the British territory without notice and with overwhelming force." The Economist knows perfectly well that the N.Y. Herald's efforts, which were eagerly supported by the London Times, at embroiling the United States into a war with England only intended securing the success of Secession and thwarting the movement of Northern regeneration.

[5] Slavish herd.

Still, there is one concession made by the anti-Northern English press. The Saturday [Review] snob tells us, "What was at issue in Lincoln's election, and what has precipitated the convulsion, was merely the limitation of the institution of slavery to states where that institution already exists." And the Economist remarks:

> It is true enough that it was the aim of the Republican Party which elected Mr. Lincoln to prevent slavery from spreading into the unsettled Territories … It may be true that the success of the North, if complete and unconditional, would enable them to confine slavery within the fifteen states which have already adopted it, and might thus lead to its eventual extinction—though this is rather probable than certain.

In 1859, on the occasion of John Brown's Harper's Ferry expedition, the very same Economist published a series of elaborate articles with a view to prove that by dint of an economical law, American slavery was doomed to gradual extinction from the moment it should be deprived of its power of expansion. That "economical law" was perfectly understood by the slaveocracy. "In 15 years more," said Toombs, "without a great increase in Slave territory, either the slaves must be permitted to flee from the whites, or the whites must flee from the slaves." The limitation of slavery to its constitutional area, as proclaimed by the Republicans, was the distinct ground upon which the menace of Secession was first uttered in the House of Representatives, on December 19, 1859. Mr. Singleton (Mississippi) having asked Mr. Curtis (Iowa), "if the Republican Party would never let the South have another foot of slave territory while it remained in the Union," and Mr. Curtis having responded in the affirmative, Mr. Singleton said this would dissolve the Union. His advice to Mississippi was the sooner it got out of the Union the better—"gentlemen should recollect that Jefferson Davis led our forces in Mexico, and still he lives, perhaps to lead the Southern army."[6] Quite apart from the economical law which makes the diffusion of slavery a vital condition for its maintenance within its constitutional areas, the leaders of the South had never deceived themselves as to its necessity for keeping up their political sway over the United States. John Calhoun, in the defense of his propositions to the Senate, stated distinctly on Feb. 19, 1847, "that the Senate was the only balance of power left to the South in the Government," and that the creation of new slave states had become necessary "for the retention of the equipoise of power in the Senate." Moreover, the Oligarchy of the 300,000 slave owners could not even maintain their sway at home save by constantly throwing out to their white plebeians the bait of prospective conquests within and without the frontiers of the United States. If, then, according to the oracles of the English press, the North had arrived at the fixed resolution of circumscribing slavery within its present limits and of thus extinguishing it in a constitutional way, was this not sufficient to enlist the sympathies of antislavery England?

But the English Puritans seem indeed not to be contented save by an explicit Abolitionist war. "This," says the Economist, "therefore, not being a war for the emancipation of the Negro race, on what other ground can we be fairly called upon to sympathize so warmly with the Federal cause?" "There was a time," says the Examiner, "when our sympathies were with the North, thinking that it was really in earnest in making a stand against the encroachments of the slave states" and in adopting "emancipation as a measure of justice to the black race."

However, in the very same numbers in which these papers tell us that they cannot sympathize with the North because its war is no Abolitionist war, we are informed that "the desperate expedient" of proclaiming Negro emancipation and summoning the slaves to a general insurrection is a thing "the mere conception of which is repulsive and dreadful" and that "a compromise" would be "far preferable to success purchased at such a cost and stained by such a crime."

[6] For Singleton's speech of December 19, 1859, see the Appendix to the Congressional Globe, First Session 36th Congress, Part IV (Washington 1860), pp. 47–54.

Thus the English eagerness for the Abolitionist war is all cant. The cloven foot peeps out in the following sentences: "Lastly," says the Economist, "is the Morrill tariff a title to our gratitude and to our sympathy, or is the certainty that, in case of Northern triumph, that tariff should be extended over the whole Republic a reason why we ought to be clamorously anxious for their success?" "The North Americans," says the Examiner, "are in earnest about nothing but a selfish protective tariff…The southern states were tired of being robbed of the fruits of their slave labor by the protective tariff of the North."

The Examiner and The Economist complement each other. The latter is honest enough to confess at last that with him and his followers sympathy is a mere question of tariff, while the former reduces the war between North and South to a tariff war, to a war between Protection and Free Trade. The Examiner is perhaps not aware that even the South Carolina Nullifiers of 1832, as General Jackson testifies, used Protection only as a pretext for secession, but even the Examiner ought to know that the present rebellion did not wait upon the passing of the Morrill tariff for breaking out. In point of fact, the Southerners could not have been tired of being robbed of the fruits of their slave labor by the Protective tariff of the North, considering that from 1846–1861 a Free Trade tariff had obtained.

The Spectator characterizes in its last number the secret thought of some of the anti-Northern organs in the following striking manner:

> What, then, do the anti-Northern organs really profess to think desirable, under the justification of this plea of deferring to the inexorable logic of facts? They argue that disunion is desirable just because, as we have said, it is the only possible step to a conclusion of this "causeless and fratricidal strife," and next, of course—only as an afterthought, and as a humble apology for Providence and "justification of the ways of God to man," now that the inevitable necessity stands revealed—for further reasons discovered as beautiful adaptations to the moral exigencies of the country, when once the issue is discerned. It is discovered that it will be very much for the advantage of the states to be dissolved into rival groups. They will mutually check each other's ambition; they will neutralize each other's power; and if ever England should get into a dispute with > one or more of them, more jealousy will bring the antagonistic groups to our aid. This will be, it is urged, a very wholesome state of things, for it will relieve us from anxiety and it will encourage political "competition," that great safeguard of honesty and purity, among the states themselves.

Such is the case—very gravely urged—of the numerous class of Southern sympathizers now springing up among us. Translated into English—and we grieve that an English argument on such a subject should be of a nature that requires translating—it means that we deplore the present great scale of this "fratricidal" war because it may concentrate in one fearful spasm a series of chronic petty wars and passions and jealousies among groups of rival states in times to come. The real truth is, and this very un-English feeling distinctly discerns this truth, though it cloaks it in decent phrases, that rival groups of American states could not live together in peace or harmony. The chronic condition would be one of malignant hostility rising out of the very causes which have produced the present contest. It is asserted that the different groups of states have different tariff interests. These different tariff interests would be the sources of constant petty wars if the states were once dissolved, and slavery, the root of all the strife, would be the spring of innumerable animosities, discords, and campaigns. No stable equilibrium could ever again be established among the rival states. And yet it is maintained that this long future of incessant strife is the providential solution of the great question now at issue—the only real reason why it is looked upon favorably being this: that whereas the present great-scale conflict may issue in a restored and stronger political unity, the alternative of infinitely multiplied small-scale quarrels will issue in a weak and divided continent that England cannot fear.

Now we do not deny that the Americans themselves sowed the seeds of this petty and contemptible state of feeling by the unfriendly and bullying attitude they have so often manifested to England, but we do say that the state of feeling on our part is petty and contemptible. We see that in a deferred issue there is no hope of a deep and enduring tranquility for America, that it means a decline and fall of the American nation into quarrelsome clans and tribes, and yet we hold up our hands in horror at the present "fratricidal" strife because it holds out hopes of finality. We exhort them to look favorably on the indefinite future of small strifes, equally fratricidal and probably far more demoralizing, because the latter would draw out of our side the thorn of American rivalry.

New York Daily Tribune, October 11, 1861

The Civil War in The United States

"Let him go, he is not worth thine ire!"[1] This advice from Leporello to Don Juan's deserted love is now the repeated call of English statesmanship to the North of the United States—recently voiced anew by Lord John Russell. If the North lets the South go, it will free itself from any complicity in slavery—its historical original sin—and it will create the basis for a new and higher stage of development.

Indeed, if North and South formed two autonomous countries like England and Hanover, for instance, their separation would be no more difficult than was the separation of England and Hanover. "The South," however, is neither geographically clearly separate from the North nor is it a moral entity. It is not a country at all, but a battle cry.

The advice of an amicable separation presupposes that the Southern Confederacy, although it took the offensive in the Civil War, is at least conducting it for defensive purposes. It presupposes that the slaveholders' party is concerned only to unite the areas it has controlled up till now into an autonomous group of states, and to release them from the domination of the Union. Nothing could be more wrong. "The South needs its entire territory. It will and must have it." This was the battle cry with which the secessionists fell upon Kentucky. By their "entire territory" they understand primarily all the so-called border states: Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina, Kentucky, Tennessee, Missouri, and Arkansas. Moreover, they claim the whole territory south of the line which runs from the northwest corner of Missouri to the Pacific Ocean. Thus what the slaveholders call "the South" covers more than three quarters of the present area of the Union. A large part of the territory which they claim is still in the possession of the Union and would first have to be conquered from it. But none of the so-called border states, including those in Confederate possession, was ever an actual slave state. The border states form, rather, that area of the United States where the system of slavery and the system of free labor exist side by side and struggle for mastery: the actual battleground between South and North, between slavery and freedom. The war waged by the Southern Confederacy is, therefore, not a war of defense but a war of conquest, aimed at extending and perpetuating slavery.

[1] From Byron's Don Juan. Leporello's advice was mischievous in its intent.

The chain of mountains which begins in Alabama and stretches North to the Hudson River—in a manner of speaking the spinal column of the United States—cuts the so-called South into three parts. The mountainous country formed by the Allegheny Mountains with their two parallel ranges, the Cumberland Range to the west and the Blue Ridge Mountains to the east, forms a wedgelike division between the lowlands along the western coast of the Atlantic Ocean and the lowlands of the southern valleys of the Mississippi. The two lowland regions separated by this mountain country form, with their vast rice swamps and wide expanses of cotton plantations, the actual area of slavery. The long wedge of mountain country which penetrates into the heart of slavery, with its correspondingly freer atmosphere, invigorating climate, and soil rich in coal, salt, limestone, iron ore, and gold—in short, every raw material necessary for diversified industrial development—is for the most part already a free country. As a result of its physical composition, the soil here can only be successfully cultivated by free small farmers. The slave system vegetates here only as a sporadic growth and has never struck roots. In the largest part of the so-called border states it is the inhabitants of these highland regions who comprise the core of the free population, which out of self-interest, if nothing else, has sided with the Northern party.

Let us consider the contested area in detail.

Delaware, the northeasternmost of the border states, belongs to the Union both morally and in actual fact. Since the beginning of the war all attempts on the part of the secessionists to form even a faction favorable to them have come to grief against the unanimity of the population. The slave element in this state has long been dying out. Between 1850 and 1860 alone the number of slaves declined by a half, so that Delaware now has only 1,798 slaves out of a total population of 112,218. Nevertheless, the Southern Confederacy lays claim to Delaware, and it would in fact be militarily untenable as soon as the South took control of Maryland.

Maryland exhibits the abovementioned conflict between highlands and lowlands. Out of a total population of 687,034 there are in Maryland 87,188 slaves. The recent general elections to the Washington Congress have again forcefully proved that the overwhelming majority of the people sides with the Union. The army of 30,000 Union troops at present occupying Maryland is not only to serve as a reserve for the army on the Potomac, but also to hold the rebellious slaveholders in the interior of the state in check. Here a phenomenon can be seen similar to those in other border states, i.e., that the great mass of the people sides with the North and a numerically insignificant slaveholders' party sides with the South. What the slaveholders' party lacks in numbers it makes up for in the instruments of power, secured by many years' possession of all state offices, hereditary preoccupation with political intrigue, and the concentration of great wealth in a few hands.

Virginia at present forms the great cantonment where the main secessionist army and the main Unionist army confront each other. In the northwest highlands of Virginia the slaves number 15,000, while the free majority, which is twenty times as large, consists for the most part of independent farmers. The eastern lowlands of Virginia, on the other hand, have almost half a million slaves. The raising and selling of Negroes represents its main source of income. As soon as the lowland ringleaders had carried through the secession ordinance in the state legislature at Richmond, by means of intrigue, and had in all haste thrown open the gates of Virginia to the Southern army, northwestern Virginia seceded from the secession and formed a new state; it took up arms under the banner of the Union and is now defending its territory against the Southern invaders.

Tennessee, with 1,109,847 inhabitants, of whom 275,784 are slaves, is in the hands of the Southern Confederacy, which has placed the whole state under martial law and imposed a system of proscription which recalls the days of the Roman triumvirate. In the winter of 1860–61, when the slaveholders suggested a general people's convention to vote on the question of secession, the majority of the people turned down a convention in order to forestall any pretext for the secessionist movement. Later, when Tennessee had been militarily overrun by the Southern Confederacy and had been subjected to a system of terror, a third of the voters in the elections still declared themselves in favor of the Union. As in most of the border states, the actual center of resistance to the slaveholders' party here is to be found in the mountainous country, in east Tennessee. On June 17, 1861, a general convention of the people of east Tennessee assembled in Greenville, declared itself for the Union, delegated the former Governor of the state, Andrew Johnson, one of the most ardent Unionists, to the Senate in Washington, and published a "declaration of grievances" which exposes all the deception, intrigue and terror used to "vote out" Tennessee from the Union. Since then the secessionists have held east Tennessee in check by force of arms.

Similar situations to those in West Virginia and east Tennessee are to be found in the north of Alabama, northwest Georgia, and the north of North Carolina.

Farther west, in the border state of Missouri, whose population of 1,173,317 includes 114,965 slaves—the latter mostly concentrated in the northwestern area of the state—the people's convention of August 1861 decided in favor of the Union. Jackson, the Governor of the state and tool of the slaveholders' party, rebelled against the Missouri legislature and was outlawed; he then put himself at the head of the armed hordes which fell upon Missouri from Texas, Arkansas, and Tennessee in order to bring it to its knees before the Confederacy and to sever its bond with the Union by the sword. Next to Virginia, Missouri represents the main theater of the civil war at the moment.

New Mexico—not a state, but merely a territory, whose twenty-five slaves were imported under Buchanan's presidency so that a slave constitution could be sent after them from Washington—has felt no enthusiasm for the South, as even the South concedes. But the South's enthusiasm for New Mexico caused it to spew a band of armed adventurers over the border from Texas. New Mexico has entreated the Union government for protection against these liberators.

As will have been noticed, we lay particular stress on the numerical proportion of slaves to free citizens in the individual border states. This proportion is in fact of decisive importance. It is the thermometer with which the vitality of the slave system must be measured. The very soul of the whole secessionist movement is to be found in South Carolina. It has 402,541 slaves to 301,271 free men. Second comes Mississippi, which gave the Southern Confederacy its dictator, Jefferson Davis. It has 436,696 slaves to 354,699 free men. Third comes Alabama, with 435,132 slaves to 529,164 free men.

The last of the contested border states which we still have to mention is Kentucky. Its recent history is particularly characteristic of the policy of the Southern Confederacy. Kentucky, with 1,135,713 inhabitants, has 225,490 slaves. In three successive general elections (in winter 1860–61, when delegates were elected for a congress of the border states; in June 1861, when the elections for the Washington Congress were held; and finally in August 1861 in the elections for the Kentucky state legislature), an increasing majority decided in favor of the Union. On the other hand, Magoffin, the Governor of Kentucky, and all the state dignitaries are fanatical supporters of the slaveholders' party, as is Breckinridge, Kentucky's representative in the Senate at Washington, Vice-President of the United States under Buchanan, and presidential candidate of the slaveholders' party in 1860. Although the influence of the slaveholders' party was too weak to win Kentucky for secession, it was powerful enough to tempt it into a declaration of neutrality at the outbreak of war. The Confederacy recognized its neutrality as long as it suited its purpose, as long as it was busy crushing the resistance in east Tennessee. No sooner had this been achieved when it hammered on the gates of Kentucky with the butt-end of a gun: "The South needs its entire territory. It will and must have it!"

At the same time, a corps of Confederate freebooters invaded the "neutral" state from the southwest and southeast. Kentucky awoke from its dream of neutrality; its legislature openly sided with the Union, surrounded the treacherous Governor with a committee of public safety, called the people to arms, outlawed Breckinridge, and ordered the secessionists to withdraw immediately from the area which they had invaded. This was the signal for war. A Confederate army is moving in on Louisville while volunteers stream in from Illinois, Indiana, and Ohio to save Kentucky from the armed missionaries of slavery.

The attempts made by the Confederacy to annex Missouri and Kentucky, for example, expose the hollowness of the pretext that it is fighting for the rights of the individual states against the encroachment of the Union. To be sure, it acknowledges the right of the individual states which it counts as belonging to the "South" to break away from the Union, but by no means their right to remain in the Union.

No matter how much slavery, the war without, and military dictatorship within give the actual slave states a temporary semblance of harmony, even they are not without dissident elements. Texas, with 180,388 slaves out of 601,039 inhabitants, is a striking example. The law of 1845, by virtue of which Texas entered the ranks of the United States as a slave state, entitled it to form not just one but five states out of its territory. As a result the South would have won ten instead of two new votes in the American Senate; and an increase in the number of its votes in the Senate was a major political objective at that time. From 1845 to 1860, however, the slaveholders found it impracticable to split up Texas—where the German population plays a great part[2]—into even two states without giving the party of free labor the upper hand over the party of slavery. This is the best proof of how strong the opposition to the slaveholders' oligarchy is in Texas itself.

Georgia is the biggest and most populous of the slave states. With a total of 1,057,327 inhabitants, it has 462,230 slaves; that is, nearly half the population. Nevertheless, the slaveholders' party has not yet succeeded in having the constitution which it imposed on the South at Montgomery sanctioned in Georgia by a general vote of the people.

In the Louisiana state convention, which met on March 21, 1861, at New Orleans, Roselius, the state's political veteran, declared: "The Montgomery constitution is not a constitution, but a conspiracy. It does not inaugurate a government by the people, but a detestable and unrestricted oligarchy. The people were not permitted to play any part in this matter. The Convention of Montgomery has dug the grave of political liberty, and now we are summoned to attend its burial."

[2] The German Texans, who formed in the 1850s about one fifth of the state's white population, included a large proportion of refugees from the 1848 revolution.

The oligarchy of 300,000 slaveholders used the Montgomery Congress not only to proclaim the separation of the South from the North; it also exploited the Congress to overturn the internal system of government of the slave states, to completely subjugate that part of the white population which had still maintained some degree of independence under the protection of the democratic Constitution of the Union. Even between 1856 and 1860 the political spokesmen, lawyers, moralists, and theologians of the slaveholders' party had tried to prove not so much that Negro slavery is justified but rather that color is immaterial and that slavery is the lot of the working class everywhere.

It can be seen, then, that the war of the Southern Confederacy is, in the truest sense of the word, a war of conquest for the extension and perpetuation of slavery. The larger part of the border states and territories are still in the possession of the Union, whose side they have taken first by way of the ballot box and then with arms. But for the Confederacy they count as "the South," and it is trying to conquer them from the Union. In the border states which the Confederacy has for the time being occupied it holds the relatively free highland areas in check by means of martial law. Within the actual slave states themselves it is supplanting the democracy which existed hitherto by the unbridled oligarchy of 300,000 slaveholders.

By abandoning its plans for conquest, the Southern Confederacy would abandon its own economic viability and the very purpose of secession. Indeed, secession only took place because it no longer seemed possible to bring about the transformation of the border states and territories within the Union. On the other hand, with a peaceful surrender of the contested area to the Southern Confederacy the North would relinquish more than three quarters of the entire territory of the United States to the slave republic. The North would lose the Gulf of Mexico completely, the Atlantic Ocean with the exception of the narrow stretch from the Penobscot estuary to Delaware Bay, and would even cut itself off from the Pacific Ocean. Missouri, Kansas, New Mexico, Arkansas, and Texas would be followed by California. Unable to wrest the mouth of the Mississippi from the hands of the strong, hostile slave republic in the South, the great agricultural states in the basin between the Rocky Mountains and the Alleghenies, in the valleys of the Mississippi, Missouri, and Ohio, would be forced by economic interests to secede from the North and to join the Southern Confederacy. These Northwestern states would in turn draw the other Northern states lying further east after them—with the possible exception of New England—into the same vortex of secession.

The Union would thus not in fact be dissolved, but rather reorganized, a reorganization on the basis of slavery, under the acknowledged control of the slaveholding oligarchy. The plan for such a reorganization was openly proclaimed by the leading Southern spokesmen at the Montgomery Congress and accounts for the article of the new constitution which leaves open the possibility of each state of the old Union joining the new Confederacy. The slave system would thus infect the whole Union. In the Northern states, where Negro slavery is, in practice, inoperable, the whole working class would be gradually reduced to the level of helotry. This would be in full accord with the loudly proclaimed principle that only certain races are capable of freedom, and as in the South actual labor is the lot of the Negroes, so in the North it is the lot of the Germans and Irish or their direct descendants.

The present struggle between South and North is thus nothing less than a struggle between two social systems: the system of slavery and the system of free labor. The struggle has broken out because the two systems can no longer peacefully coexist on the North American continent. It can only be ended by the victory of one system or the other.

While the border states, the contested areas in which the two systems have so far fought for control, are a thorn in the flesh of the South, it cannot, on the other hand, be overlooked that they have formed the North's main weak point in the course of the war. Some of the slaveholders in these districts feigned loyalty to the North at the bidding of the Southern conspirators; others indeed found that it accorded with their real interests and traditional outlook to side with the Union. Both groups have equally crippled the North. Anxiety to keep the "loyal" slaveholders of the border states in good humor and fear of driving them into the arms of the secession—in a word, a tender regard for the interests, prejudices, and sensibilities of these ambiguous allies—have afflicted the Union government with incurable paralysis since the beginning of the war, driven it to take half measures, forced it to hypocritically disavow the principle at issue in the war and to spare the enemy's most vulnerable spot—the root of the evil—slavery itself.

When Lincoln recently was faint-hearted enough to revoke Frémont's Missouri proclamation emancipating Negroes belonging to the rebels,[3] this was only in deference to the loud protest of the "loyal" slaveholders of Kentucky. However, a turning point has already been reached. With Kentucky, the last border state has been pressed into the series of battlefields between South and North. With the real war for the border states being conducted in the border states themselves, the question of winning or losing them has been withdrawn from the sphere of diplomatic and parliamentary negotiations. One section of the slaveholders will cast off its loyalist mask; the other will content itself with the prospect of compensation, such as Great Britain gave the West Indian planters.[4] Events themselves demand that the decisive pronouncement be made: the emancipation of the slaves.

Several recent declarations demonstrate that even the most obdurate Northern Democrats and diplomats feel themselves drawn to this point. In an open letter General Cass, War Minister under Buchanan and hitherto one of the South's most ardent allies, declares the emancipation of the slaves to be the sine qua non for the salvation of the Union. Dr. Brownson, the spokesman of the Northern Catholic party, and according to his own admission the most energetic opponent of the emancipation movement between 1836 and 1860, published in his last Review for October an article in favor of abolition. Among other things he says, "If we have opposed Abolition heretofore because we would preserve the Union, we must a fortiori now oppose slavery whenever, in our judgment, its continuance becomes incompatible with the maintenance of the Union, or of the nation as a free republican state."[5]

Finally, the World, a New York organ of the Washington Cabinet's diplomats, closes one of its latest tirades against the abolitionists with these words: "On the day when it shall be decided that either slavery or the Union must go down, on that day sentence of death is passed on slavery. If the North cannot triumph without emancipation, it will triumph with emancipation."

The American Civil War

PART I

From whatever standpoint one regards it, the American Civil War presents a spectacle without parallel in the annals of military history. The vast extent of the disputed territory; the far-flung front of the lines of operation; the numerical strength of the hostile armies, the creation of which drew barely any support from a prior organizational basis; the fabulous costs of these armies; the manner of leading them; and the general tactical and strategical principles in accordance with which the war is waged are all new in the eyes of the European onlooker.

The secessionist conspiracy, organized, patronized, and supported long before its outbreak by Buchanan's administration, gave the South an advantage by which alone it could hope to achieve its aim. Endangered by its slave population and by a strong Unionist element among the whites themselves, with a number of free men two-thirds smaller than the North, but readier to attack, thanks to the multitude of adventurous idlers that it harbors—for the South everything depended on a swift, bold, almost foolhardy offensive. If the Southerners succeeded in taking St. Louis, Cincinnati, Washington, Baltimore, and perhaps Philadelphia, they might then count on a panic, during which diplomacy and bribery could secure recognition of the independence of all the slave states. If this first onslaught failed, at least at the decisive points, their position must then become daily worse, simultaneously with the development of the strength of the North. This point was rightly understood by the men who in truly Bonapartist spirit had organized the secessionist conspiracy. They opened the campaign in corresponding manner. Their bands of adventurers overran Missouri and Tennessee, while their more regular troops invaded east Virginia and prepared a coup de main against Washington. With the miscarriage of this coup, the Southern campaign was, from the military standpoint, lost.

The North came to the theater of war reluctantly, sleepily, as was to be expected with its higher industrial and commercial development. The social machinery was here far more complicated than in the South, and it required far more time to give its motion this unwonted direction. The enlistment of the volunteers for three months was a great but perhaps unavoidable mistake. It was the policy of the North to remain on the defensive in the beginning at all decisive points, to organize its forces, to train them through operations on a small scale and without the risk of decisive battles, and as soon as the organization was sufficiently strengthened and the traitorous element simultaneously more or less removed from the army to pass finally to an energetic, unflagging offensive and, above all, to reconquer Kentucky, Tennessee, Virginia, and North Carolina. The transformation of the civilians into soldiers was bound to take more time in the North than in the South. Once effected, one could count on the individual superiority of the Northern man.

By and large, and allowing for mistakes which sprang more from political than from military sources, the North acted in accordance with those principles. The guerrilla warfare in Missouri and West Virginia, while it protected the Unionist populations, accustomed the troops to field service and to fire without exposing them to decisive defeats. The great disgrace of Bull Run was to some extent the result of the earlier error of enlisting volunteers for three months. It was senseless to allow a strong position, on difficult terrain and in possession of a foe little inferior in numbers, to be attacked by raw recruits in the front ranks. The panic which took possession of the Union army at the decisive moment, the cause of which has still not been clarified, could surprise no one who was in some degree familiar with the history of peoples' wars. Such things happened to the French troops very often from 1792 to 1795; they did not, however, prevent these same troops from winning the battles of Jemappes and Fleurus, Moutenotte, Castiglione, and Rivoli. The jests of the European press over the Bull Run panic had only one excuse for their silliness—the previous bragging of a section of the North American press.

The six months' respite that followed the defeat of Manassas was utilized by the North better than by the South. Not only were the Northern ranks recruited in greater measure than the Southern. Their officers received better instructions; the discipline and training of the troops did not encounter the same obstacles as in the South. Traitors and incompetent interlopers were more and more removed, and the period of the Bull Run panic already belongs to the past. The armies on both sides are naturally not to be measured by the standard of great European armies or even of the former regular army of the United States. Napoleon could in fact drill battalions of raw recruits in the depots during the first month, have them on the march during the second, and during the third lead them against the foe, but then every battalion received a sufficient stiffening of officers and noncommissioned officers, every company some old soldiers, and on the day of the battle the new troops were brigaded together with veterans and, so to speak, framed by the latter. All these conditions were lacking in America. Without the considerable mass of military experience that emigrated to America in consequence of the European revolutionary commotions of 1848–1849, the organization of the Union Army would have required a much longer time still. The very small number of the killed and wounded in proportion to the sum total of the troops engaged (customarily one in twenty) proves that most of the engagements, even the latest in Kentucky and Tennessee, were fought mainly with firearms at fairly long range, and that the incidental bayonet charges either soon halted before the enemy's fire or put the foe to flight before it came to a hand-to-hand encounter. Meanwhile, the new campaign has been opened under more favorable auspices with the advance of Buell and Halleck through Kentucky to Tennessee. After the reconquest of Missouri and West Virginia, the Union opened the campaign with the advance into Kentucky. Here the secessionists held three strong positions, fortified camps: Columbus on the Mississippi to their left, Bowling Green in the center, Mill Spring on the Cumberland River to the right. Their line stretched three hundred miles from west to east. The extension of this line denied the three corps the possibility of affording each other mutual support and offered the Union troops the chance of attacking each individually with superior forces. The great mistake in the disposition of the secessionists sprang from the attempt to hold all they had occupied. A single, fortified, strong central camp, chosen as the battlefield for a decisive engagement and held by the main body of the army, would have defended Kentucky far more effectively. It must either have attracted the main force of the Unionists or put the latter in a dangerous position should they attempt to march on without regard to so strong a concentration of troops.

Under the given circumstances the Unionists resolved to attack those three camps one after another, to maneuver their enemy out of them and force him to accept battle in open country. This plan, which conformed to all the rules of the art of war, was carried out with energy and dispatch. Towards the middle of January a corps of about 15,000 Unionists marched on Mill Spring, which was held by 20,000 secessionists. The Unionists maneuvered in a manner that led the enemy to believe he had to deal only with a weak reconnoitering corps. General Zollicoffer fell forthwith into the trap, sallied from his fortified camp, and attacked the Unionists. He soon convinced himself that a superior force confronted him. He fell, and his troops suffered a complete defeat, like the Unionists at Bull Run. This time, however, the victory was exploited in quite other fashion.

The stricken army was hard pressed until it arrived broken, demoralized, without field artillery or baggage, in its encampment at Mill Spring. This camp was pitched on the northern bank at the Cumberland River, so that in the event of another defeat the troops had no retreat open to them save across the river by way of a few steamers and riverboats. We find in general that almost all the secessionist camps were pitched on the enemy side of the stream. To take up such a position is not only according to rule, but also very practical if there is a bridge in the rear. In such case the encampment serves as the bridgehead and gives its holders the chance of throwing their fighting forces at pleasure on both banks of the stream and so maintaining complete command of these banks.

Without a bridge in the rear, on the contrary, a camp on the enemy side of the stream cuts off the retreat after an unlucky engagement and compels the troops to capitulate or exposes them to massacre and drowning, a fate that befell the Unionists at Ball's Bluff on the enemy side of the Potomac, whither the treachery of General Stone had sent them.

When the beaten secessionists had pitched their camp at Mill Spring, they had at once understood that an attack by the enemy on their fortifications must be repulsed or in a very short time capitulation must follow. After the experience of the morning they had lost confidence in their powers of resistance. Accordingly, when next day the Unionists advanced to attack the camp, they found that the foe had taken advantage of the night to put across the stream, leaving the camp, the baggage, the artillery and stores behind him. In this way the extreme right of the secessionist line was pushed back to Tennessee, and east Kentucky, where the mass of the population is hostile to the slaveholders' party, was reconquered for the Union.

At the same time—towards the middle of January—the preparations for dislodging the secessionists from Columbus and Bowling Green commenced. A strong flotilla of mortar vessels and ironclad gunboats was held in readiness, and the news was spread in all directions that it was to serve as a convoy to a large army marching along the Mississippi from Cairo to Memphis and New Orleans. All the demonstrations on the Mississippi, however, were merely mock maneuvers. At the decisive moment the gunboats were brought to the Ohio and thence to the Tennessee, up which they traveled as far as Fort Henry. This place, together with Fort Donelson on the Cumberland River, formed the second line of defense of the secessionists in Tennessee. The position was well chosen, for in case of a retreat behind the Cumberland the latter stream would have covered its front, the Tennessee its left flank, while the narrow strip of land between the two streams was sufficiently covered by the two forts abovementioned. The swift action of the Unionists, however, broke through the line itself before the left wing and the center of the first line were attacked.

In the first week of February the gunboats of the Unionists appeared before Fort Henry, which surrendered after a short bombardment. The garrison escaped to Fort Donelson, since the land forces of the expedition were not strong enough to encircle the place. The gunboats now traveled down the Tennessee again, upstream to the Ohio, and thence up the Cumberland as far as Fort Donelson. A single gunboat sailed boldly up the Tennessee through the very heart of the State of Tennessee, skirting the State of Mississippi and pushing on as far as Florence in north Alabama, where a series of swamps and banks (known by the name of the Muscle Shoals) forbade further navigation. This fact, that a single gunboat made this long voyage of at least 150 miles and then returned, without experiencing any kind of attack, proves that Union sentiment prevails along the river and will be very useful to the Union troops should they push forward so far.

The boat expedition up the Cumberland now combined its movements with those of the land forces under Generals Halleck and Grant. The secessionists at Bowling Green were deceived over the movements of the Unionists. They accordingly remained quietly in their camp while, a week after the fall of Fort Henry, Fort Donelson was surrounded on the land side by 40,000 Unionists and threatened on the river side by a strong flotilla of gunboats. Like the camps at Mill Spring and Fort Henry, Fort Donelson had the river lying in the rear, without a bridge for retreat. It was the strongest place the Unionists had attacked up to the present. The works were carried out with the greatest care; moreover, the place was capacious enough to accommodate the 20,000 men who occupied it. On the first day of the attack the gunboats silenced the fire of the batteries trained towards the river side and bombarded the interior of the defense works, while the land troops drove back the enemy outposts and forced the main body of the secessionists to seek shelter right under the guns of their own defense works. On the second day the gunboats, which had suffered severely the day before, appear to have accomplished but little. The land troops, on the contrary, had to fight a long and, in places, hot encounter with the columns of the garrison, which sought to break through the right wing of the enemy in order to secure their line of retreat to Nashville. However, an energetic attack of the Unionist right wing on the left wing of the secessionists, and considerable reinforcements that the left wing of the Unionists received, decided the victory in favor of the assailants. Divers outworks had been stormed. The garrison, forced into its inner lines of defense, without the chance of retreat and manifestly not in a position to withstand an assault next morning, surrendered unconditionally on the following day.

PART II

Conclusion of yesterday's feuilleton.

With Fort Donelson, the enemy's artillery, baggage, and military stores fell into the hands of the Unionists; 13,000 secessionists surrendered on the day of its capture, 1,000 more the next day; and as soon as the outposts of the victors appeared before Clarksville, a town that lies farther up the Cumberland River, it opened its gates. Here too considerable supplies for the secessionists had been stored.

The capture of Fort Donelson presents only one riddle: the flight of General Floyd with 5,000 men on the second day of the bombardment. These fugitives were too numerous to be smuggled away in steamboats during the night. With some measures of precaution on the part of the assailants, they could not have got away.

Seven days after the surrender of Fort Donelson, Nashville was occupied by the Federals. The distance between the two places amounts to about 100 English miles, and a march of 15 miles a day, on very wretched roads and during the most unfavorable season of the year, redounds to the honor of the Unionist troops. On receipt of the news of the fall of Fort Donelson, the secessionists evacuated Bowling Green; a week later, they abandoned Columbus and withdrew to a Mississippi island 45 miles south. Thus Kentucky was completely reconquered for the Union. Tennessee, however, can be held by the secessionists only if they invite and win a big battle. They are said in fact to have concentrated 65,000 men for this purpose. Meanwhile, nothing prevents the Unionists from bringing a superior force against them.

The leadership of the Kentucky campaign from Somerset to Nashville deserves the highest praise. The reconquest of so extensive a territory, the advance from the Ohio to the Cumberland during a single month, evidence an energy, resolution, and speed such as have seldom been attained by regular armies in Europe. One may compare, for example, the slow advance of the Allies from Magenta to Solferino in 1859—without pursuit of the retreating foe, without endeavor to cut off his stragglers or in any way to envelop and encircle whole bodies of his troops.

Halleck and Grant, in particular, furnish good examples of resolute military leadership. Without the least regard either for Columbus or Bowling Green, they concentrate their forces on the decisive points, Fort Henry and Fort Donelson, launch a swift and energetic attack on these and precisely thereby render Columbus and Bowling Green untenable. Then they march at once to Clarksville and Nashville, without allowing the retreating secessionists time to take up new positions in north Tennessee. During this rapid pursuit, the corps of secessionist troops in Columbus remains completely cut off from the center and right wing of its army. English papers have criticized this operation unjustly. Even if the attack on Fort Donelson failed, the secessionists kept busy by General Buell at Bowling Green could not dispatch sufficient men to enable the garrison to follow the repulsed Unionists into the open country or to endanger their retreat. Columbus, on the other hand, lay so far off that it could not interfere with Grant's movements at all. In fact, after the Unionists had cleared Missouri of the secessionists, Columbus was for the latter an entirely useless post. The troops that formed its garrison had greatly to hasten their retreat to Memphis or even to Arkansas in order to escape the danger of ingloriously laying down their arms.

In consequence of the clearing of Missouri and the reconquest of Kentucky, the theater of war has so far narrowed that the different armies can cooperate to a certain extent along the whole line of operations and work for the achievement of definite results. In other words, the war now takes on for the first time a strategic character, and the geographical configuration of the country acquires a new interest. It is now the task of the Northern generals to find the Achilles heel of the cotton states.

Up to the capture of Nashville no concerted strategy between the army of Kentucky and the army on the Potomac was possible. They were too far apart from one another. They stood in the same front line, but their lines of operation were entirely different. Only with the victorious advance into Tennessee did the movements of the army of Kentucky become important for the entire theater of war.

The American papers influenced by McClellan are going great guns with the "anaconda" envelopment theory. According to this an immense line of armies is to wind round the rebellion, gradually constrict its coils, and finally strangle the enemy. This is sheer childishness. It is a rehash of the so-called cordon system devised in Austria about 1770, which was employed against the French from 1792 to 1797 with such great obstinacy and with such constant failure. At Jemappes, Fleurus, and, more especially, at Moutenotte, Millesimo, Dego, Castiglione, and Rivoli, the knockout blow was dealt to this system. The French cut the "anaconda" in two by attacking at a point where they had concentrated superior forces. Then the coils of the "anaconda" were cut to pieces seriatim.

In well-populated and more or less centralized states there is always a center, with the occupation of which by the foe the national resistance would be broken. Paris is a shining example. The slave states, however, possess no such center. They are thinly populated, with few large towns and all these on the seacoast. The question therefore arises: Does a military center of gravity nevertheless exist, with the capture of which the backbone of their resistance breaks, or are they, as Russia still was in 1812, not to be conquered without occupying every village and every plot of land—in a word, the entire periphery? Cast a glance at the geographical formation of Secessia, with its long stretch of coast on the Atlantic Ocean and its long stretch of coast on the Gulf of Mexico. So long as the Confederates held Kentucky and Tennessee, the whole formed a great compact mass. The loss of both these states drives an immense wedge into their territory, separating the states on the North Atlantic Ocean from the states on the Gulf of Mexico. The direct route from Virginia and the two Carolinas to Texas, Louisiana, Mississippi, and even, in part, to Alabama leads through Tennessee, which is now occupied by the Unionists. The sole route that, after the complete conquest of Tennessee by the Union, connects the two sections of the slave states goes through Georgia. This proves that Georgia is the key to Secessia. With the loss of Georgia the Confederacy would be cut into two sections which would have lost all connection with one another. A reconquest of Georgia by the secessionists, however, would be almost unthinkable, for the Unionist fighting forces would be concentrated in a center position, while their adversaries, divided into two camps, would have scarcely sufficient forces to summon to a united attack.

Would the conquest of all Georgia, with the seacoast of Florida, be requisite for such an operation? By no means. In a land where communication, particularly between distant points, depends more on railways than on highways, the seizure of the railways is sufficient. The southernmost railway line between the states on the Gulf of Mexico and the Atlantic coast goes through Macon and Gordon near Milledgeville.

The occupation of these two points would accordingly cut Secessia in two and enable the Unionists to beat one part after another. At the same time, one gathers from the above that no Southern republic is capable of living without the possession of Tennessee. Without Tennessee, Georgia's vital spot lies only eight or ten days' march from the frontier; the North would constantly have its hand at the throat of the South, and on the slightest pressure the South would have to yield or fight for its life anew, under circumstances in which a single defeat would cut off every prospect of success.

From the foregoing considerations it follows:

The Potomac is not the most important position of the war theater. The taking of Richmond and the advance of the Potomac army further South—difficult on account of the many streams that cut across the line of march—could produce a tremendous moral effect. From a purely military standpoint, they would decide nothing.

The decision of the campaign belongs to the Kentucky army, now in Tennessee. On the one hand, this army is nearest the decisive points; on the other hand, it occupies a territory without which Secession is incapable of living. This army would accordingly have to be strengthened at the expense of all the rest and the sacrifice of all minor operations. Its next points of attack would be Chattanooga and Dalton on the upper Tennessee, the most important railway centers of the entire South. After their occupation the connection between the eastern and western states of Secessia would be limited to the connecting lines in Georgia. The further question would then arise of cutting off another railway line with Atlanta and Georgia, and finally of destroying the last connection between the two sections by the capture of Macon and Gordon.

On the contrary, should the "anaconda" plan be followed, then despite all successes in particular cases and even on the Potomac, the war may be prolonged indefinitely, while the financial difficulties together with diplomatic complications acquire fresh scope.

Die Presse, March 27, 1862

A Criticism of American Affairs

The crisis which at the moment dominates conditions in the United States has been brought about by twofold causes: military and political.

Had the last campaign been conducted according to a single strategic plan, the main army of the West must then, as previously explained in these columns, have availed itself of its successes in Kentucky and Tennessee to penetrate through north Alabama to Georgia and to seize there the railroad centers at Decatur, Milledgeville, etc. The connection between the Eastern and the Western army of the Secessionists would thereby have been broken and their mutual support rendered impossible. Instead of this, the Kentucky army marched south down the Mississippi in the direction of New Orleans and its victory near Memphis had no other result than to dispatch the greater part of Beauregard's troops to Richmond, so that the Confederates here now suddenly confronted McClellan, who had not exploited the defeat of the enemy's troops at Yorktown and Williamsburg, and on the other hand had from the first split up his own fighting forces, with a superior army in a superior position. McClellan's generalship, already described by us previously, was in itself sufficient to secure the downfall of the strongest and best-disciplined army. Finally, War Secretary Stanton made an unpardonable mistake. To make an impression abroad, he suspended recruiting after the conquest of Tennessee and so condemned the army to constant attenuation, just when it stood most in need of reinforcements for a rapid, decisive offensive. Despite the strategic blunders and despite McClellan's generalship, with a steady influx of recruits the war, if not decided by now, would nevertheless have been rapidly nearing a victorious decision. Stanton's step was so much the more unfortunate as the South was then enlisting every man from 18 to 35 years old, to a man, and was therefore staking everything on a single card. It is those people who have been trained in the meantime that almost everywhere give the Confederates the upper hand and secure the initiative to them. They held Halleck fast, dislodged Curtis from Arkansas, beat McClellan, and under Stonewall Jackson gave the signal for the guerrilla raids that now reach as far as the Ohio.

In part, the military causes of the crisis are connected with the political. It was the influence of the Democratic Party that elevated an incompetent like McClellan, because he was formerly a supporter of Breckinridge, to the position of commander in chief of all the military forces of the North. It was anxious regard for the wishes, advantages, and interests of the spokesmen of the border slave states that hitherto broke off the Civil War's point of principle and, so to speak, deprived it of its soul. The "loyal" slaveholders of these border states saw to it that the fugitive-slave laws dictated by the South were maintained and the sympathies of the Negroes for the North forcibly suppressed; that no general could venture to put a company of Negroes in the field; and that slavery was finally transformed from the Achilles' heel of the South into its invulnerable hide of horn. Thanks to the slaves, who perform all productive labors, the entire manhood of the South that is fit to fight can be led into the field!

At the present moment, when secession's stocks are rising, the spokesmen of the border states increase their claims. However, Lincoln's appeal to them shows, where it threatens them with inundation by the Abolition party, that things are taking a revolutionary turn. Lincoln knows what Europe does not know, that it is by no means apathy or giving way under pressure of defeat that causes his demand for 300,000 recruits to meet with such a cold response. New England and the Northwest, which have provided the main body of the army, are determined to enforce a revolutionary waging of war on the government and to inscribe the battle slogan of "Abolition of Slavery!" on the star-spangled banner. Lincoln yields only hesitantly and uneasily to this pressure from without, but knows that he is incapable of offering resistance to it for long. Hence his fervent appeal to the border states to renounce the institution of slavery voluntarily and under the conditions of a favorable contract. He knows that it is only the continuance of slavery in the border states that has so far left slavery untouched in the South and prohibited the North from applying its great radical remedy. He errs only if he imagines that the "loyal" slaveholders are to be moved by benevolent speeches and rational arguments. They will yield only to force.

So far we have only witnessed the first act of the Civil War—the constitutional waging of war. The second act, the revolutionary waging of war, is at hand.

Meanwhile, during its first session, the Congress—which has now adjourned—has decreed a series of important measures that we will briefly summarize here:

Apart from its financial legislation, it has passed the Homestead Bill that the Northern popular masses had long striven for in vain; by this, a part of the state lands is given gratis for cultivation to the colonists, whether American-born or immigrants. It has abolished slavery in [the District of] Columbia and the national capital, with monetary compensation for the former slaveholders. Slavery has been declared "forever impossible" in all the Territories of the United States. The Act under which the new State of West Virginia is taken into the Union prescribes abolition of slavery by stages and declares all Negro children born after July 4, 1863, to be born free. The conditions of this emancipation by stages are on the whole borrowed from the law that was enacted 70 years ago in Pennsylvania for the same purpose. By a fourth Act, all slaves of rebels are to be emancipated as soon as they fall into the hands of the republican army. Another law, which is now being put into effect for the first time, provides that these emancipated Negroes may be militarily organized and sent into the field against the South. The independence of the Negro republics of Liberia and Haiti has been recognized, and, finally, a treaty for the abolition of the slave trade has been concluded with England.

Thus, however the dice may fall in the fortunes of battle, it can now safely be said that Negro slavery will not long outlive the Civil War.

Abolitionist Demonstrations in America

It was previously observed in these columns that President Lincoln, legally cautious, constitutionally conciliatory, by birth a citizen of the border slave state of Kentucky, escapes only with difficulty from the control of the "loyal" slaveholders, seeks to avoid any open breach with them, and precisely thereby calls forth a conflict with the parties of the North which are consistent in point of principle and are pushed more and more into the foreground by events. The speech that Wendell Phillips delivered at Abington, Massachusetts, on the occasion of the anniversary of the slaves' emancipation in the British West Indies, may be regarded as a prologue to this conflict.

Together with Garrison[1] and G. Smith, Wendell Phillips is the leader of the Abolitionists in New England. For 30 years he has without intermission and at the risk of his life proclaimed the emancipation of the slaves as his battle cry, regardless alike of the persiflage of the press, the enraged howls of paid rowdies, and the conciliatory representations of solicitous friends. Even by his opponents he is acknowledged as one of the greatest orators of the North, as combining iron character with forceful energy and purest conviction. The London Times—and what could characterize this magnanimous paper more strikingly—today denounces Wendell Phillips's speech at Abington to the government at Washington. It is an "abuse" of freedom of speech. Anything more violent it is scarcely possible to image—says the Times—and anything more daring in time of Civil War was never perpetrated in any country by any sane man who valued his life and liberty. In reading the speech…it is scarcely possible to avoid the conclusion that the speaker's object was to force the government to prosecute him.[2]

---

[1] William Lloyd Garrison.

And the Times, in spite of, or perhaps because of its hatred of, the Union government, appears not at all disinclined to assume the role of public prosecutor!

In the present state of affairs, Wendell Phillips's speech is of greater importance than a battle bulletin. We therefore epitomize its most striking passages.[3]

The government, he says among other things, fights for the maintenance of slavery, and therefore it fights in vain. Lincoln wages a political war. Even at the present time he is more afraid of Kentucky than of the entire North. He believes in the South. The Negroes on the Southern battlefields, when asked whether the rain of cannonballs and bombs that tore up the earth all round and split the trees asunder did not terrify them, answered, "No, massa; we know that they are not meant for us!" The rebels could speak of McClellan's bombs in the same way. They know that they are not meant for them, to do them harm. I do not say that McClellan is a traitor, but I say that if he were a traitor, he must have acted exactly as he has done. Have no fear for Richmond; McClellan will not take it. If the war is continued in this fashion, without a rational aim, then it is a useless squandering of blood and gold. It would be better were the South independent today than to hazard one more human life for a war based on the present execrable policy. To continue the war in the fashion prevailing hitherto requires 125,000 men a year and a million dollars a day.

But you cannot get rid of the South. As Jefferson said of slavery, "The Southern states have the wolf by the ears, but they can neither hold him nor let him go." In the same way we have the South by the ears and can neither hold it nor let it go. Recognize it tomorrow and you will have no peace. For eighty years it has lived with us, in fear of us the whole time, with hatred for us half the time, ever troubling and abusing us. Made presumptuous by conceding its present claims, it would not keep within an imaginary borderline a year—nay, the moment that we speak of conditions of peace, it will cry victory! We shall never have peace until slavery is uprooted. So long as you retain the present tortoise at the head of our government, you make a hole with one hand in order to fill it with the other. Let the entire nation endorse the resolutions of the New York Chamber of Commerce and then the army will have something for which it is worthwhile fighting. Had Jefferson Davis the power, he would not capture Washington. He knows that the bomb that fell in this Sodom would rouse the whole nation.

[2] The London Times, August 22, 1862.

[3] For the complete speech see W. Phillips, Speeches, Lectures and Letters, Series 1 Boston 1864, 448–463. The address is entitled "The Cabinet."

The entire North would thunder with one voice: "Down with slavery, down with everything that stands in the way of saving the republic!" Jefferson Davis is quite satisfied with his successes. They are greater than he anticipated, far greater! If he can continue to swim on them till March 4, 1863, England will then, and this is in order, recognize the Southern Confederacy…The President has not put the Confiscation Act into operation. He may be honest, but what has his honesty to do with the matter? He has neither insight nor foresight. When I was in Washington, I ascertained that three months ago Lincoln had written the proclamation for a general emancipation of the slaves and that McClellan blustered him out of his decision and that the representatives of Kentucky blustered him into the retention of McClellan, in whom he places no confidence. It will take years for Lincoln to learn to combine his legal scruples as an attorney with the demands of the Civil War. This is the appalling condition of a democratic government and its greatest evil.

In France a hundred men, convinced for good reasons, would carry the nation with them, but in order that our government may take a step, nineteen millions must previously put themselves in motion. And to how many of these millions has it been preached for years that slavery is an institution ordained by God! With these prejudices, with paralyzed hands and hearts, you entreat the President to save you from the Negro! If this theory is correct, then only slaveholding despotism can bring a temporary peace…I know Lincoln. I have taken his measure in Washington. He is a first-rate second-rate man. He waits honestly, like another Vesenius, for the nation to take him in hand and sweep away slavery through him…In past years, not far from the platform from which I now speak, the Whigs fired off small mortars in order to stifle my voice. And what is the result?

The sons of these Whigs now fill their own graves in the marshes of Chickahominy! Dissolve this Union in God's name and put another in its place, on the cornerstone of which is written: "Political equality for all the citizens of the world…" During my stay in Chicago I asked lawyers of Illinois, among whom Lincoln had practiced, what sort of man he was. Whether he could say No. The answer was: "He lacks backbone. If the Americans wanted to elect a man absolutely incapable of leadership, of initiative, then they were bound to elect Abraham Lincoln…Never has a man heard him say No!…" I asked, "Is McClellan a man who can say No?" The manager of the Chicago Central Railroad, on which McClellan was employed, answered, "He is incapable of making a decision. Put a question to him and it takes an hour for him to think of the answer. During the time that he was connected with the administration of the Central Railroad, he never decided a single important controversial question."

And these are the two men who, above all others, now hold the fate of the Northern republic in their hands! Those best acquainted with the state of the army assure us that Richmond could have been taken five times, had the do-nothing at the head of the army of the Potomac allowed it, but he preferred to dig up dirt in the Chickahominy swamps, in order ignominiously to abandon the locality and his dirt ramparts. Lincoln, out of cowardly fear of the border slave states, keeps this man in his present position, but the day will come when Lincoln will confess that he has never believed in McClellan…Let us hope that the war lasts long enough to transform us into men, and then we shall quickly triumph. God has put the thunderbolt of emancipation into our hands in order to crush this rebellion…

Letters

Letter from Marx to Pavel Vasilyevich Annenkov

… Thus, M. Proudhon, mainly because he lacks the historical knowledge, has not perceived that as men develop their productive forces, that is, as they live, they develop certain relations with one another and that the nature of these relations is bound to change with the change and growth of these productive forces. He has not perceived that economic categories are only abstract expressions of these actually existing relations and only remain true while these relations exist. He therefore falls into the error of the bourgeois economists, who regard these economic categories as eternal laws and not as historical laws which are valid only for a particular historical development, for a definite development of the productive forces. Instead, therefore, of regarding the politico-economic categories as abstract expressions of the real, transitory, historic social relations, M. Proudhon, by a mystic inversion, regards real relations merely as reifications of these abstractions. These abstractions themselves are formulas which have been slumbering in the bosom of God the Father since the beginning of the world.

But here our good M. Proudhon falls into severe intellectual convulsions. If all these economic categories are emanations from the bosom of God, if they constitute the hidden and eternal life of man, how does it come about, first, that there is such a thing as development, and secondly, that M. Proudhon is not a conservative? He explains these evident contradictions by a whole system of antagonisms …

Now I will give you an example of M. Proudhon's dialectics.

Freedom and slavery constitute an antagonism. I need not speak either of the good or of the bad sides of freedom. As to slavery, I need not speak of its bad sides. The only thing that has to be explained is the good side of slavery. We are not dealing with indirect slavery, the slavery of the proletariat, but with direct slavery, the slavery of the black people in Surinam, in Brazil, and in the Southern States of North America.

Direct slavery is as much the pivot of our industrialism today as machinery, credit, etc. Without slavery, no cotton; without cotton, no modern industry. It is slavery which has given value to the colonies; the colonies have created world trade; world trade is the necessary condition of large-scale machine industry. Thus, before the traffic in Negroes began, the colonies supplied the Old World with only very few products and did not visibly change the face of the earth. Slavery is therefore an economic category of the utmost importance. Without slavery, North America, the most progressive country, would be turned into a patriarchal land. If North America were wiped off the map of the world the result would be anarchy, the total decay of trade and of modern civilization. But to make slavery disappear would mean to wipe America off the map of the world. Since slavery is an economic category, it has existed in every nation since the world began. Modern nations have merely known how to disguise slavery in their own countries while they openly imported it into the New World. After these observations on slavery, how will our worthy M. Proudhon proceed? He will look for the synthesis between freedom and slavery, the true juste-milieu; in other words, equilibrium between slavery and freedom…

Indeed, he does what all good bourgeois do. They all assert that in principle—that is, considered as abstract ideas—competition, monopoly, etc. are the only basis of life, but that in practice they leave much to be desired. They all want competition without the pernicious effects of competition. They all want the impossible, namely, the conditions of bourgeois existence without the necessary consequences of those conditions. None of them understands that the bourgeois form of production is historical and transitory, just as the feudal form was. This mistake arises from the fact that the bourgeois man is to them the only possible basis of every society; they cannot imagine a society in which men have ceased to be bourgeois…

You will now understand why M. Proudhon is the declared enemy of every political movement. The solution of actual problems does not lie for him in public action but in the dialectical rotations of his own head. Since to him the categories are the motive force, it is not necessary to change practical life in order to change the categories. Quite the contrary. One must change the categories and the consequence will be a change in the existing society.

In his desire to reconcile the contradictions, M. Proudhon does not even ask whether it is not the basis of those contradictions that must really be overthrown. He is exactly like the political doctrinaire who chooses to regard the king, the chamber of deputies, and the chamber of peers as integral parts of social life, as eternal categories. All he is looking for is a new formula by which to establish an equilibrium between these powers whose equilibrium consists precisely in the actually existing movement in which one power is now the conqueror and now the slave of the other. Thus in the eighteenth century a number of mediocre minds were busy finding the true formula which would bring the social estates, nobility, king, parliament, etc., into equilibrium, and they woke up one morning to find that all this—king, parliament and nobility—had disappeared. The true equilibrium in this antagonism was the overthrow of all the social relations which served as a basis for these feudal institutions and for the antagonisms of these feudal institutions.

Because M. Proudhon places eternal ideas, the categories of pure reason, on the one side and human beings and their practical life, which, according to him, is the application of these categories, on the other, one finds with him from the beginning a dualism between life and ideas, between soul and body, a dualism which recurs in many forms. You can see now that this antagonism is nothing but the incapacity of M. Proudhon to understand the profane origin and the profane history of the categories which he deifies…

Letters between Karl Marx and Frederick Engels (1860–1866)

MARX TO ENGELS, JANUARY 11, 1860[1]

In my opinion, the biggest things that are happening in the world today are on the one hand the movement of the slaves in America started by the death of John Brown, and on the other the movement of the serfs in Russia…

I have just seen in the Tribune that there has been a fresh rising of slaves in Missouri, naturally suppressed. But the signal has now been given. If things get serious by and by, what will then become of Manchester?

ENGELS TO MARX, JANUARY 26, 1860

Your opinion of the significance of the slave movement in America and Russia is now confirmed. The Harper's Ferry affair with its aftermath in Missouri bears its fruit: the free Negroes in the South are everywhere hunted out of the states, and I have just read in the first New York cotton report (W. P. Wright and Co., January 10, 1860) that the planters have hurried their cotton on to the ports in order to guard against any probable consequences arising out of the Harper's Ferry affair.

[1] This and the extracts which follow relating to the American Civil War have been taken from the complete German edition of the works of Karl Marx and Frederick Engels: Gesamtausgabe, Dritte Abteilung ("Der Briefwechsel zwischen Marx und Engels"), Band 2 (1854–1860) and Band 3 (1861–1867) [Collected Works, Third Division ("The Correspondence Between Marx and Engels"), Vols. 2 and 3], Berlin 1930. A number of the letters are contained in K. Marx and F. Engels, Correspondence, A Selection with Commentary and Notes, London and New York 1934.

ENGELS TO MARX, JANUARY 7, 1861

Things in North America are also becoming exciting. Matters must be going very badly for them with the slaves if the Southerners play so risky a game. The least volunteer putsch from the North could set everything ablaze. In any case, it seems that one way or another slavery is rapidly going to come to an end, and then it will be the same with cotton production. But how this will react on England will then soon become manifest. And with such mighty movements an ass like Bonaparte believes he can permanently fish in troubled waters.

MARX TO ENGELS, JUNE 9, 1861

Many thanks for the letter about America. Should anything important (militarily) occur, then always write me your opinion about it. According to the picture that I have formed of General Scott—now, moreover, 76 years old—from the Mexican War (see Ripley), I expect the greatest blunders from him unless the old donkey is controlled by others. Slowness and indecision, above all. For the rest, I see by the facts reported in the Tribune that the North now speaks openly of a slave war and the destruction of slavery.

ENGELS TO MARX, NOVEMBER 27, 1861

Have these Yankees then gone completely crazy to carry out the mad coup with the Confederate Commissioners? The fact that here in the Channel too a warship was waiting for the mail steamer proves that general instructions must have been issued from Washington.

To take political prisoners by force on a foreign ship is the clearest casus belli there can be. The fellows must be sheer fools to land themselves in for a war with England. If war should actually break out, you can send your letters to New York via Germany or the Havre addressed to an intermediary, but you will have to take care that you don't give any assistance to the enemies of the Queen.

MARX TO ENGELS, DECEMBER 9, 1861

War, as I have declared in the Presse from the first day, will not break out with America, and I only regret that I had not the means to exploit the asininity of the Reuter and Times–swayed Stock Exchange during this fool period.

MARX TO ENGELS, MARCH 3, 1862

I should be glad if you supplied me this week (by Friday morning) with an English article on the American War. You can write entirely without constraint. The Tribune will print it as the letter of a foreign officer. Nota bene: The Tribune hates McClellan, who is in league with the Democratic Party and who, so long as he was commander in chief of all the armies, prevented any action not only on the Potomac (where this was perhaps justified) but in all theaters of war, particularly in the West, by direct intervention. (He was also the soul of the extremely disgraceful intrigue against Frémont.) This Mc, moreover, out of esprit de corps and hatred of the civilians, protected all the traitors in the army, e.g., Colonel Maynard and General Stone. The arrest of the latter ensued a day or two after [Mc]Clellan had been deposed as commander-in-chief of the whole army. In the same way, the shameless Washington "representative" of the New York Herald was arrested as a spy contrary to M'Clellan's wishes and after he had entertained the entire staff of M'C[lellan] the day before at a champagne breakfast.

MARX TO ENGELS, MAY 6, 1862

I shall write to Dana once more. I miss the sending of the Tribune sadly. This is a mean trick of Greeley and McElrath. From the last numbers of the Tribune for March I have learned two things. Firstly, that McClellan had been accurately informed eight days beforehand of the Confederates' retreat. Secondly, that the Times's Russell availed himself of his nosing in Washington during the Trent affair to gamble on the Stock Exchange in New York…

Bonaparte's present maneuvers in Mexico (the affair originally emanated from Pam[2]) are explained by the fact that Juarez only recognizes the official debt to France of £46,000. But Miramon and his gang, per medium of the Swiss banker Jecker et Co., had issued state bonds to the amount of $52,000,000 (on which about $4,000,000 have been paid). These state bonds—Jecker et Co. being only the hommes de pailles[3]—have fallen almost for zéro into the hands of Morny et Co. They demand recognition of them by Juarez. Hinc illae lacrimae.[4]

Schurz is—a brigadier general with Frémont! ! !

MARX TO ENGELS, MAY 27, 1862

The blowing up of the Merrimac seems to me an evident act of cowardice on the part of the dirty dogs of Confederacy. The hounds could still risk something. It is wonderfully fine how the Times (which supported all the Coercion Bills against Ireland with so much fiery zeal) wails that "liberty" must be lost in the event of the North tyrannizing the South. The Economist is also good. In its last number it declares that the Yankees' financial prosperity—the nondepreciation of their paper money—is incomprehensible to it (although the matter is perfectly simple). It had hitherto consoled its readers from week to week with this depreciation. Although it now admits that it does not understand what is its business and has misled its readers concerning this, it is at present solacing them with dark doubts about the "military operations," of which it officially knows nothing.

[2] Lord Palmerston, prime minister 1855–58 and 1859–65.

[3] Straw men [original editor's note].

[4] Hence these tears [original editor's note].

What extraordinarily facilitated the paper operations of the Yankees (the main point being the confidence placed in their cause and therewith in their government) was without question the circumstance that in consequence of secession the West was almost denuded of paper money and therefore of a circulating medium generally. All the banks whose principal securities consisted of the bonds of slave states were bankrupted. Moreover, currency for millions, which circulated in the West in the form of direct banknotes of the Southern banks, was swept away. Then, partly in consequence of the Morrill tariff, partly in consequence of the war itself, which largely put an end to the import of luxuries, the Yankees had a balance of trade and therefore a rate of exchange favorable to themselves and against Europe the whole time. An unfavorable rate of exchange might have badly affected the patriotic confidence in their paper on the part of the philistines.

For the rest—this comical concern of John Bull for the interest on the national debt that Uncle Sam will have to pay! As if it were not a mere bagatelle in comparison with Bull's national debt; moreover, the United States are unquestionably richer today than were the Bulls with their debt of a billion in 1815.

Has Pam not got Bonaparte into a pretty pickle in Mexico?

ENGELS TO MARX, MAY 29, 1862

Anneke is with Buell's army and from today is writing in the Augsburger. I am rather anxious about Halleck's troops; the affair drags on so long, and yet he does not appear to receive any reinforcements, though Spence's lies in the Times have surely no significance. Willich is a colonel (the eternal colonel!) and commands the 32nd Indiana regiment…

A certain amount of guerrilla warfare does now seem after all to be beginning, but it is certainly not of great importance, and if only a victory ensues, the reserve forces following in its wake, together with some cavalry, will soon put an end to the business. In case of a defeat, it would of course be vexatious.

ENGELS TO MARX, JULY 30, 1862[5]

Things go wrong in America, and it is after all Mr. Stanton who is chiefly to blame, for the reason that after the conquest of Tennessee he suspended recruiting out of sheer vainglory and so condemned the army to constant weakening just when it stood most in need of reinforcements for a rapid, decisive offensive. With a steady influx of recruits, even if the war were not decided by now, its success would nevertheless have been beyond doubt. With continual victories recruits would also have come freely. This step was all the sillier as the South was then enlisting all men from 18 to 35 years of age, and was therefore staking everything on a single card. It is those people who have joined up in the meantime who now give the Confederates the upper hand everywhere and secure the initiative to them. They held Halleck fast, dislodged Curtis from Arkansas, smote McClellan, and under Jackson in the Shenandoah valley gave the signal for the guerrilla raids that now reach as far as the Ohio. No one could have acted more stupidly than Stanton.

Further. When Stanton saw that he could not dislodge McClellan from the command of the Potomac army, he perpetrated the stupidity of weakening him by conferring special commands on Frémont, Banks, and McDowell and of splitting up the forces to the end of removing McClellan. The consequence of this is not only that McC[lellan] has been beaten, but also that public opinion now maintains that it is not McC[lellan] but Stanton who is to blame for the defeat. Serves Mr. Stant[on] right.

All that would be of no consequence; it might even be of service, in that the war would at last be waged in a revolutionary way. But there's the trouble. The defeats do not stir these Yankees up; they make them slack. If, merely to obtain recruits, they have already come to the point of declaring themselves prepared to take them for nine months only, what is meant is nothing other than this: we are in a bad way, and all we want is the semblance of an army as a means of making a demonstration during the peace negotiations. Those 300,000 volunteers were the criterion, and by refusing to provide them the North declares that to it, its whole cause is au fond muck. Furthermore, what cowardice in government and Congress. They are afraid of conscription, of resolute financial steps, of attacks on slavery, of everything that is urgently necessary; they let everything loaf along as it will, and if the semblance of some measure finally gets through Congress, the honorable Lincoln so qualifies it that nothing at all is left of it any longer. This slackness, this collapse like a punctured pig's bladder, under the pressure of defeats that have annihilated one army, the strongest and best, and actually left Washington exposed, this total absence of any elasticity in the whole mass of the people—this proves to me that it is all up. The few mass meetings, etc., do not mean anything; they don't attain even the stir of a presidential election.

[5] Part of this letter is included by Marx in his article "A Criticism of American Affairs," Die Presse, August 9, 1862, 198–201.

In addition, the total lack of talent. One general more stupid than the other. Not one that would be capable of the least initiative or of independent decision. For three months the initiative once more wholly with the adversary. Then, one financial measure more lunatic than the other. Helplessness and cowardice everywhere, save among the common soldiers. The politicians in like case—just as absurd and devoid of counsel. And the populace is more helpless than if it had lingered three thousand years under the Austrian scepter.

For the South, on the contrary—it's no use shutting one's eyes to the fact—it's a matter of bloody earnest. That we get no cotton is already one proof. The guerrillas in the border states are a second. But that after being thus shut off from the world, an agricultural people can sustain such a war and after severe defeats and losses in resources, men, and territory can nevertheless now stand forth as the victor and threaten to carry its offensive right into the North, this is in my opinion decisive. Besides, they fight quite famously, and with the second occupation of Kentucky and Tennessee, what Union feeling still existed there outside the highlands is now surely lost.

If they get Missouri, they get the Territories too, and then the North can pack up.

As said, if the North does not proceed forthwith in revolutionary fashion, it will get an ungodly hiding and deserve it—and it looks like it.

MARX TO ENGELS, JULY 30, 1862

As to America, that, says he [Lassalle], is quite interesting. The Yankees have no "ideas." "Individual liberty" is merely a "negative idea," etc., and more of this old, decayed, speculative rubbish.

MARX TO ENGELS, AUGUST 7, 1862

I do not altogether share your views on the American Civil War. I do not think that all is up. The Northerners have been dominated from the first by the representatives of the border slave states, who also pushed McClellan, that old partisan of Breckinridge, to the top. The Southerners, on the other hand, acted as one man from the beginning. The North itself has turned the slaves into a military force on the side of the Southerners, instead of turning it against them. The South leaves productive labor to the slaves and could therefore put its whole fighting strength in the field without disturbance. The South had unified military leadership, the North had not. That no strategic plan existed was already obvious from all the maneuvers of the Kentucky army after the conquest of Tennessee. In my opinion all this will take another turn. In the end the North will make war seriously, adopt revolutionary methods, and throw over the domination of the border slave statesmen. A single Negro regiment would have a remarkable effect on Southern nerves.

The difficulty of getting the 300,000 men seems to me purely political. The Northwest and New England wish to, and will, force the government to give up the diplomatic method of conducting war which it has used hitherto, and they are now making terms on which the 300,000 men shall come forth. If Lincoln does not give way (which he will do, however), there will be a revolution.

As to the lack of military talent, the method which has prevailed up till now of selecting generals purely from considerations of diplomacy and party intrigue is scarcely designed to bring talent to the front. General Pope seems to me to be a man of energy, however.

With regard to the financial measures, they are clumsy, as they are bound to be in a country where up to now no taxes (for the whole state) have in fact existed; but they are not nearly so idiotic as the measures taken by Pitt and Co. The present depreciation of money is due, I think, not to economic but to purely political reasons—distrust. It will therefore change with a different policy.

The long and short of the business seems to me to be that a war of this kind must be conducted on revolutionary lines, while the Yankees have so far been trying to conduct it constitutionally.

MARX TO ENGELS, SEPTEMBER 10, 1862

As regards the Yankees, I am assuredly still of my previous opinion that the North will finally prevail; certainly the Civil War may go through all sorts of episodes, even armistices, perhaps, and be long drawn out. The South would and could only conclude peace on condition that it received the border slave states. In this event California would also fall to it; the Northwest would follow, and the entire Federation, with perhaps the exception of the New England states, would form a single country once more, this time under the acknowledged supremacy of the slaveholders. It would be the reconstruction of the United States on the basis demanded by the South. This, however, is impossible and will not happen.

The North can, for its part, only conclude peace if the Confederacy limits itself to the old slave states and those confined between the Mississippi River and the Atlantic. In this case the Confederacy would soon come to its blessed end. Intervening armistices, etc., on the basis of a status quo, could at most entail pauses in the prosecution of the war.

The manner in which the North wages war is only to be expected from a bourgeois republic, where fraud has so long reigned supreme. The South, an oligarchy, is better adapted thereto, particularly as it is an oligarchy where the whole of the productive labor falls on the Negroes and the four millions of "white trash" are filibusters by profession. All the same, I would wager my head that these boys come off second best, despite "Stonewall Jackson." To be sure, it is possible that it will come to a sort of revolution in the North itself first.

Willich is a brigadier general and, as Kapp has related in Cologne, Steffen is now to take the field also.

It seems to me that you let yourself be swayed a little too much by the military aspect of things.

MARX TO ENGELS, OCTOBER 29, 1862

As for America, I believe that the Maryland campaign was decisive insofar as it showed that even in this section of the border states most sympathetic to the South, support for the Confederates is weak. But the whole struggle turns on the border states. Whoever gets them dominates the Union. At the same time, the fact that Lincoln issued the forthcoming Emancipation Act at a moment when the Confederates were pushing forward in Kentucky shows that all consideration for the loyal slaveholders in the border states has ceased. The emigration of the slave owners from Missouri, Kentucky, and Tennessee to the South, with their black chattels, is already enormous, and if the war is prolonged for a while, as it is certain to be, the Southerners will have lost all hold there. The South began the war for these territories. The war itself was the means of destroying its power in the border states, where apart from this the ties with the South were becoming weaker every day, because a market can no longer be found for the breeding of slaves and the internal slave trade. In my opinion, therefore, for the South it will only be a matter now of the defensive. But their sole possibility of success lay in an offensive. If the report is confirmed that Hooker is getting the active command of the Potomac army, that McClellan is being "retired" to the "theoretical" post of commander in chief, and that Halleck is taking over the chief command in the West, then the conduct of the war in Virginia may also take on a more energetic character. Moreover, the most favorable time of year for the Confederates is now past.

There is no doubt at all that morally the collapse of the Maryland campaign was of the most tremendous importance.

As to finance, the United States know from the time of the War of Independence, and we know from the Austrian experience, how far one can go with depreciated paper money. It is a fact that the Yankees never exported more corn to England than they have this year, that the present harvest is again far above the average, and that the trade balance was never more favorable for them than it has been for the last two years. As soon as the new system of taxation (a very hackneyed one, it is true, exactly in Pitt's style) comes into operation, the paper money which up to now has only been continually emitted will also at last begin to flow back again. An extension of the paper issue on the present scale will therefore became superfluous and further depreciation will thus be checked. What had made even the present depreciation less dangerous than it was in France, and even in England, in similar circumstances has been the fact that the Yankees never prohibited two prices, a gold price and a paper price. The actual damage done resolves itself into a state debt, for which the proper equivalent has never been received, and a premium on jobbing and speculation.

When the English boast that their depreciation was never more than 11½ percent (other people believe that it amounted to more than double this during some time), they conveniently forget that they not only continued to pay their old taxes but every year paid new ones as well, so that the return flow of the banknotes was assured from the beginning, while the Yankees have actually carried on the war for a year and a half without taxes (except the greatly diminished import duties), simply by repeating the issue of paper. For a process of this kind, which has now reached the turning point, the actual depreciation is still comparatively small.

The fury with which the Southerners have received Lincoln's Acts proves their importance. All Lincoln's Acts appear like the mean pettifogging conditions which one lawyer puts to his opposing lawyer. But this does not alter their historic content, and indeed it amuses me when I compare them with the drapery in which the Frenchman envelops even the most unimportant point.

Of course, like other people, I see the repulsive side of the form the movement takes among the Yankees, but I find the explanation of it in the nature of "bourgeois" democracy. The events over there are a world upheaval, nevertheless, and there is nothing more disgusting in the whole business than the English attitude towards them.

ENGELS TO MARX, NOVEMBER 5, 1862

As regards America I also think, of course, that the Confederates in Maryland have received an unexpected moral blow of great significance. I am also convinced that the definite possession of the border states will decide the result of the war. But I am by no means certain that the affair is going to proceed along such classic lines as you appear to believe. Despite all the screams of the Yankees, there is still no sign whatever available that the people regard this business as a real question of national existence. On the contrary, these election victories of the Democrats go to prove rather that the party which has had enough of the war is growing. If there were only some proof or some indication that the masses in the North were beginning to rise as they did in France in 1792 and 1793, then it would all be very fine. But the only revolution to be expected seems rather to be a Democratic counterrevolution and a rotten peace, including the partition of the border states. That this would not be the end of the affair by a long way—granted. But for the present moment I must say I cannot work up any enthusiasm for a people which on such a colossal issue allows itself to be continually beaten by a fourth of its own population and which after eighteen months of war has achieved nothing more than the discovery that all its generals are idiots and all its officials rascals and traitors. After all, the thing must happen differently, even in a bourgeois republic, if it is not to end in utter failure. I entirely agree with what you say about the meanness of the English way of looking at the business.

ENGELS TO MARX, NOVEMBER 15, 1862

I impatiently await the steamer that is bringing news of the New York elections. If the Democrats triumph in the State of New York, then I no longer know what I am to think of the Yankees. That a people placed in a great historical dilemma, which is at the same time a matter of its own existence, can after eighteen months' struggle become reactionary in its mass and vote for climbing down is a bit beyond my understanding. Good as it is from one aspect that even in America the bourgeois republic exposes itself in thoroughgoing fashion, so that in future it can never again be preached on its own merits, but solely as a means, and a form of transition, to the social revolution, still it is mortifying that a lousy oligarchy with only half the number of inhabitants proves itself just as strong as the unwieldy, great, helpless democracy. For the rest, if the Democrats triumph, the worthy McClellan and the West Pointers have the better of it most beautifully, and its glory will soon be at an end. The fellows are capable of concluding peace, if the South returns to the Union on condition that the President shall always be a Southerner and the Congress shall always consist of Southerners and Northerners in equal numbers. They are even capable of proclaiming Jeff Davis President of the United States forthwith and to surrender even the whole of the border states, if there is no other way to peace. Then, good-bye America.

Of Lincoln's emancipation, likewise, one still sees no effect up to the present, save that from fear of a Negro inundation the Northwest has voted Democratic.

MARX TO ENGELS, NOVEMBER 17, 1862

It seems to me that you are looking too much at only one side of the American quarrel. I have looked at a mass of Southern papers in the American coffeehouse and have seen from these that the Confederacy is in a tight corner. The English newspapers have suppressed the battle of "Corinth." The Southern papers describe it as the most extraordinarily bad luck that has befallen them since the armed rising. The State of Georgia has declared the Confederate "Conscription Acts" to be null and void. In the person of Floyd the thief, Virginia has disputed the right of the "creatures (literally) of Jefferson Davis" further to levy troops in his state. Oldham, representative of Texas in the Congress of Richmond, has lodged a protest against the transportation of the "picked troops" of the Southwest to the East, that is, Virginia. From all these disputes two things emerge quite incontestably:

That the Confederate government has overreached itself in its violent efforts to fill the ranks of the army;

That the states are asserting their "state rights" against the separatist Confederacy, just as the latter made them its pretext against the Union.

I regard the victories of the Democrats in the North as a reaction, which was made easy for this conservative and blackleg element by the Federal government's bad direction of the war and financial blunders. It is for the rest a species of reaction met with in every revolutionary movement, and at the time of the Convention, for instance, was so strong that it was considered counterrevolutionary to want to submit the death of the King to suffrage universel[6] and under the Directory so strong that Mr. Bonaparte I had to bombard Paris.

On the other hand, the elections have no bearing on the composition of the Congress prior to December 4, 1863; they serve, therefore, merely as a spur to the Republican government, over whose head the sword hangs. And in any case the Republican House of Representatives will put the term of life allotted to it to better use, if only from hatred of the opposing party.

As to McClellan, he has in his own army Hooker and other Republicans, who will any day arrest him on the order of the government.

In addition, there is the French attempt at intervention, which will call forth a reaction against the reaction.

I do not therefore regard things as so bad. What might be much more injurious in my view is the sheep's attitude of the workers in Lancashire. Such a thing has never been heard of in the world. All the more is this the case as the manufacturing rabble do not even pretend "to make sacrifices" themselves, but leave to the rest of England the honor of keeping their army going for them; that is, impose on the rest of England the costs of maintenance of their variable capital.

During this recent period England has disgraced herself more than any other country, the workers by their christian slave nature, the bourgeois and aristocrats by their enthusiasm for slavery in its most direct form. But the two manifestations supplement one another.

[6] Universal suffrage; that is, a general vote.

MARX TO ENGELS, JANUARY 2, 1863

Burnside seems to have committed great tactical blunders in the battle of Fredericksburg. He was obviously nervous in the employment of such great military forces. As far, however, as the fundamental asininity is concerned: 1. In connection with the wait of 26 days, there is unquestionably direct treason at work in the war administration at Washington. Even the New York correspondent of the Times admitted that only after weeks did Burnside obtain resources which had been promised him immediately. 2. That nevertheless he then made this attack shows the moral weakness of the man. The worthy Tribune began to cast suspicion on him and threatened him with dismissal. This paper, with its enthusiasm and its ignorance, does great harm.

The Democrats and M'Clellanists naturally cried out in unison, in order to exaggerate the unfortunate position. For the "rumor" that M'Clellan, the "Monk" of the Times, had been summoned to Washington, we are indebted to Mr. Reuter.

"Politically," the defeat was good. They ought not to have had good luck before January 1, 1863. Anything of the sort could have caused the "Proclamation" to be revoked.

The Times and Co. are utterly furious over the workers' meetings in Manchester, Sheffield, and London. It is very good that the eyes of the Yankees are opened in this way. For the rest, Opdyke (Mayor of New York and political economist) has already said at a meeting in New York: "We know that the English working class are with us, and that the governing classes of England are against us."

I greatly regret that Germany does not hold similar demonstrations. They cost nothing and "internationally" bring in large returns. Germany would have all the more warrant for these, as in this war she has done more for the Yankees than France in the eighteenth century. It is the old German stupidity of not making herself felt in the world theater and stressing what she actually accomplishes.

ENGELS TO MARX, FEBRUARY 17, 1863

Things look rotten in Yankeeland. It is true that with the customary irony of world history the Democrats, as against the philistine, have now become the war party, and the bankrupt poetaster Ch. Mackay has again made himself thoroughly ridiculous. I also hear from private sources in New York that the preparations of the North are being continued on a hitherto unheard-of scale. But, on the other hand, the signs of moral slackening are increasing daily, and the inability to conquer is daily becoming greater. Where is the party whose victory and avènement[7] would be synonymous with prosecution of the war à outrance[8] and by every means? The people has been bamboozled, that is the trouble, and it is lucky that a peace is a physical impossibility, otherwise they would have made one long ago, merely to be able to live for the almighty dollar again.

A Confederate major, who participated in the engagements near Richmond on Lee's staff, told me during the last few days that according to papers which Lee himself had shown him, the rebels had no less than 40,000 stragglers at the end of these actions! He referred specifically to the Western regiments of the Federals with great respect; for the rest, however, he is an ass. [The conclusion of this letter is missing—Ed.]

ENGELS TO MARX, JUNE 11, 1863

There are nice goings-on in America. Fighting Joe has made an awful fool of himself with his boasts,[9] Rosecrans is asleep, and only Grant operates well. His movement against Vicksburg from southwest to northeast, cutting off the relief army, repulsing it; then rapid advance against Vicksburg; and even the impetuous, unavailing assaults are all very good. I do not believe in the possibility of assembling sufficient relief troops in time. On the other hand, we have so often seen the American generals suddenly operate well for a fortnight and then perpetrate the greatest asininities once more, that one can say nothing whatever about their future movements.

---

[7] Advent; appearance on the scene.

[8] To the finish.

[9] Refers to General Hooker. Toward the close of March 1863, Hooker announced to his officers that his plans were perfect and that he would have no mercy upon Lee. At the battle of Chancellorsville (May 1863), the Confederate army, though outnumbered two to one, forced Hooker to retreat. Despite this reverse, the Union commander issued an order in which he congratulated his army for its "achievements." (For his General Orders, No. 49, see War of the Rebellion: Official Records, Army, 1 ser., xxv, pt. 1, p. 171).

MARX TO ENGELS, MAY 26, 1864

What do you say of Grant's operations? The Times, of course, has admiration only for Lee's strategy, concealed behind retreats. "It," said Tussy[10] this morning, "considers this very canny, I dare say." I wish for nothing more fervently than that Butler may have success. It would be priceless, if he marched into Richmond first. It would be bad if Grant had to retreat, but I think that fellow knows what he is about. At any rate, the first Kentucky campaign, Vicksburg, and the beating that Bragg got in Tennessee are due to him.

MARX TO ENGELS, JUNE 7, 1864

The American news seems to me to be very good, and I was particularly delighted with today's leader in the Times, in which it proves that Grant is being beaten continuously and will possibly be punished for his defeats—by the capture of Richmond.

MARX TO ENGELS, SEPTEMBER 7, 1864

As regards America, I consider the present moment, entre nous, to be very critical. If it brings Grant a great defeat or Sherman a great victory, then it's all right. A chronic series of small checks, precisely at the present election time, would be dangerous. I am entirely of your opinion that thus far Lincoln's reelection is pretty certain, still a hundred to one. But in the model country of the democratic swindle this election time is full of contingencies that may give the logic of events (an expression that Magnus Urquhartus[11] considers to be just as senseless as "the justice of a locomotive") a quite unexpected smack in the face. An armistice seems to be very necessary for the South, to save it from complete exhaustion. It has been the first to bring up this cry not only in its Northern organs, but directly in the Richmond organs, though now, when it has found an echo in New York, the Richmond Examiner throws it back to the Yankees with scorn. That Mr. Davis has decided to treat the Negro soldiers as "prisoners of war"—latest official instruction of his War Secretary—is very characteristic.

Lincoln has in his hands great resources with which to carry this election. (Peace proposals on his part are naturally mere humbug!) The election of an opposition candidate would probably lead to a real revolution. But all the same one cannot fail to recognize that for the coming eight weeks, in which the issue will in the first instance be decided, much depends on military accident. This is absolutely the most critical point since the beginning of the war. If this is shifted, old Lincoln can then blunder on to his heart's content. For the rest, the old man cannot possibly "make" generals. He could already choose his ministers better. The Confederate papers, however, attack their ministers quite as much as the Yankees do those at Washington. If Lincoln gets through this time—as is very probable—it will be on a much more radical platform and under wholly changed circumstances. In conformity with his legal manner, the old man will then find more radical methods compatible with his conscience.

MARX TO ENGELS, DECEMBER 2, 1864

The worst of such an agitation is that one is much bothered as soon as one participates in it. For example, it was again a matter of an Address, this time to Lincoln,[12] and again I had to compose the stuff (which was much harder than a substantial work), in order that the phraseology to which this sort of scribbling is restricted should at least be distinguished from the democratic, vulgar phraseology…

As the Address to Lincoln was to be handed to Adams, part of the Englishmen on the Committee wanted to have the deputation introduced by a member of Parliament, since it was customary. This hankering was defeated by the majority of the English and the unanimity of the Continentals, and it was declared, on the contrary, that such old English customs ought to be abolished. On the other hand, M. Le Lubez[13], like a real crapaud, wanted to have the Address made out not to Lincoln, but to the American people. I have made him duly ridiculous and explained to the Englishmen that the French democratic etiquette is not worth a farthing more than the monarchical etiquette.

… Lincoln's answer[14] to us is in today's Times.

MARX TO ENGELS, FEBRUARY 10, 1865

The fact that Lincoln has replied to us so courteously and to the "Bourgeois Emancipation Society" so rudely and purely formally has made the Daily News so angry that it did not print the reply to us. When, however, it saw to its sorrow that the Times did so, it had to publish it belatedly in the stop press. Levy, too, has had to swallow the bitter pill. The difference between L[incoln]'s reply to us and to the bourgeois has made such a stir here that the "Clubs" in the West

The Confederacy seems to be at an end.

MARX TO ENGELS, JUNE 24, 1865

Johnson's policy disquiets me.[15] Ridiculous affectation of severity against single persons, up to the present extremely vacillating and weak in substance. The reaction has already begun in America and will soon be greatly strengthened, if the hitherto prevailing slackness does not quickly cease.

---

[15] The elevation of Johnson to the presidency following the assassination of Lincoln was enthusiastically hailed by the leaders of the Radical wing of the Republican Party. They saw in the new president a mn after their own heart, a vigorous opponent of "the bloated slaveocracy" of the South. As such, they expected him to punish the ex-Confederate leaders, to break up their large landed estates and to guarantee Negro suffrage. Their expectations, however, were not realized, as Johnson, wedged between a falling oligarchy (slave planters) and a rising plutocracy (industrial and financial bourgeoisie), decided to fight the latter by capitulating to the former. The result was a "reactionary holiday" the beginnings of which became apparent in May 1865, when Johnson issued a proclamation providing for the reconstruction of seven Southern states along the lines laid down by Lincoln. During the summer and fall of 1865, all of these states, except Texas, complied with the President's request, elected state officials and sent representatives to Congress. However, in December 1865, both houses declined to permit the newly elected members to take their seats. Under these circumstances, the battle was on with Stevens, the leader of the parliamentary Left, gradually winning over a majority of congressmen to the formulation of a Radical reconstruction program. See J.S. Allen, Reconstruction: The Battle for Democracy, New York 1937. For the Address of the First International to Johnson, see pp. 214–5.

ENGELS TO MARX, JULY 15, 1865

I, too, like Mr. Johnson's policy less and less. His hatred of Negroes comes out more and more violently, while as against the old lords of the South he lets all power go out of his hands. If things go on like this, in six months all the old villains of secession will be sitting in Congress at Washington. Without colored suffrage nothing whatever can be done there, and J[ohnson] leaves it to the vanquished, the ex-slaveholders, to decide upon this matter. It is too absurd. However, one must certainly reckon with things developing differently from what Messrs. the Barons imagine. The majority of them are surely totally ruined and will be glad to sell land to migrants and speculators from the North. These will come soon enough and change many things. The mean whites, I think, will gradually die out. With this stock there is nothing more to be done; what is left after two generations will merge with the migrants into a stock entirely different. The Negroes will probably become small squatters, as in Jamaica. So that finally, indeed, the oligarchy goes down, but the process could now be brought to a speedy conclusion on the spot at one time, whilst, as it is, it becomes long-drawn-out.

MARX TO ENGELS, APRIL 23, 1866

After the Civil War phase the United States are really only now entering the revolutionary phase, and the European wiseacres, who believe in the omnipotence of Mr. Johnson, will soon be disillusioned.

INSTRUCTIONS FOR THE LONDON DELEGATES TO THE PROVISIONAL GENERAL COUNCIL OF THE IWA DRAFTED BY MARX IN AUGUST 1866

Limitation of the Working Day—A preliminary condition, without which all further attempts at improvement and emancipation must prove abortive, is the limitation of the working day. It is needed to restore the health and physical energies of the working class, that is the great body of every nation, as well as to secure them the possibility of intellectual development, social intercourse, social and political action. We propose eight hours' work as the legal limit of the working day, this limitation being generally agreed by the workmen of the United States of America, the Congress [of the IWA] will raise it to [become] the common platform of the working classes all over the world. [Adopted by the IWA and published in Der Verbote, 10 and 11, October–November 1866.]

MARX TO ENGELS, JULY 25, 1877

What do you think of the workers of the United States? This eruption against the oligarchy of associated capital which has arisen since the Civil War will of course be put down, but it could quite well form the starting point for the establishment of a serious workers party in the United States. There are, moreover, favorable circumstances. The policy of the new President will turn the Negroes into allies of the workers, and the large expropriations of the land (especially fertile land) in favor of the railway, mining, etc., companies will convert the farmers of the West, who are already very disenchanted, into allies of the workers. Thus a fine mess is in the offing there, and transferring the center of the International to the United States might, post festum, turn out to have been a peculiarly opportune move.

Letters between Marx and Lincoln

ADDRESS OF THE INTERNATIONAL WORKINGMEN'S ASSOCIATION TO ABRAHAM LINCOLN

To Abraham Lincoln,
President of the United States of America.

Sir,

We congratulate the American people upon your reelection by a large majority.

If resistance to the Slave Power was the reserved watchword of your first election, the triumphant war cry of your reelection is Death to Slavery.

From the commencement of the titanic American strife the workingmen of Europe felt instinctively that the star-spangled banner carried the destiny of their class. The contest for the territories which opened the dire epopée,[1] was it not to decide whether the virgin soil of immense tracts should be wedded to the labor of the immigrant or prostituted by the tramp of the slave driver?

When an oligarchy of 300,000 slaveholders dared to inscribe, for the first time in the annals of the world, "slavery" on the banner of armed revolt; when on the very spots where hardly a century ago the idea of one great democratic republic had first sprung up, whence the first Declaration of the Rights of Man was issued, and the first impulse given to the European revolution of the eighteenth century; when on those very spots counterrevolution, with systematic thoroughness, gloried in rescinding "the ideas entertained at the time of the formation of the old Constitution" and maintained "slavery to be a beneficent institution, indeed the only solution of the great problem of the relation of labor to capital," and cynically proclaimed property in man "the cornerstone of the new edifice," then the working classes of Europe understood at once, even before the fanatic partisanship of the upper classes for the Confederate gentry had given its dismal warning, that the slaveholders' rebellion was to sound the tocsin for a general holy crusade of property against labor, and that for the men of labor, with their hopes for the future, even their past conquests were at stake in that tremendous conflict on the other side of the Atlantic. Everywhere they bore therefore patiently the hardships imposed upon them by the cotton crisis, opposed enthusiastically the proslavery intervention, importunities of their "betters," and from most parts of Europe contributed their quota of blood to the good cause.

[1] Epic.

While the workingmen, the true political power of the North, allowed slavery to defile their own republic, while before the Negro, mastered and sold without his concurrence, they boasted it the highest prerogative of the white-skinned laborer to sell himself and choose his own master, they were unable to attain the true freedom of labor or to support their European brethren in their struggle for emancipation, but this barrier to progress has been swept off by the red sea of civil war.

The workingmen of Europe feel sure that as the American War of Independence initiated a new era of ascendancy for the middle class, so the American antislavery war will do for the working classes. They consider it an earnest of the epoch to come, that it fell to the lot of Abraham Lincoln, the single-minded son of the working class, to lead his country through the matchless struggle for the rescue of an enchained race and the reconstruction of a social world.

Signed on behalf of the International Workingmen's Association, the Central Council…

Bee-Hive (London), January 7, 1865

THE AMERICAN AMBASSADOR'S REPLY TO THE ADDRESS OF THE INTERNATIONAL WORKINGMEN'S ASSOCIATION

To the Editor of the Times.
Sir,

Some few weeks since a congratulatory address was sent from the Central Council of the above Association to Mr. Lincoln. The address was transmitted through the United States' Legation and the following reply has been received. Its publication will oblige,

Respectfully yours,

W. R. Cremer.
Legation of the United States,
London, Jan. 31.

Sir,

I am directed to inform you that the address of the Central Council of your association, which was duly transmitted through this legation to the President of the United States, has been received by him. So far as the sentiments expressed by it are personal, they are accepted by him with a sincere and anxious desire that he may be able to prove himself not unworthy of the confidence which has been recently extended to him by his fellow citizens and by so many of the friends of humanity and progress throughout the world. The government of the United States has a clear consciousness that its policy neither is nor could be reactionary, but at the same time it adheres to the course which it adopted at the beginning, of abstaining everywhere from propagandism and unlawful intervention. It strives to do equal and exact justice to all states and to all men, and it relies upon the beneficial results of that effort for support at home and for respect and goodwill throughout the world. Nations do not exist for themselves alone, but to promote the welfare and happiness of mankind by benevolent intercourse and example. It is in this relation that the United States regard their cause in the present conflict with slavery-maintaining insurgents as the cause of human nature, and they derive new encouragement to persevere from the testimony of the workingmen of Europe that the national attitude is favored with their enlightened approval and earnest sympathies.

I have the honor to be, Sir, your obedient servant,
Charles Francis Adams.

The Times, February 6, 1865.

ADDRESS OF THE INTERNATIONAL WORKINGMEN'S ASSOCIATION TO PRESIDENT JOHNSON

To Andrew Johnson,
President of the United States.

Sir,

The demon of the "peculiar institution," for the supremacy of which the South rose in arms, would not allow his worshipers to honorably succumb on the open field. What he had begun in treason, he must needs end in infamy. As Philip II's war for the Inquisition bred a Gerard, thus Jefferson Davis's proslavery war a Booth.

It is not our part to call words of sorrow and horror, while the heart of two worlds heaves with emotion. Even the sycophants who, year after year and day by day, stuck to their Sisyphus work of morally assassinating Abraham Lincoln and the great republic he headed stand now aghast at this universal outburst of popular feeling, and rival with each other to strew rhetorical flowers on his open grave. They have now at last found out that he was a man neither to be browbeaten by adversity nor intoxicated by success; inflexibly pressing on to his great goal, never compromising it by blind haste; slowly maturing his steps, never retracing them; carried away by no surge of popular favor, disheartened by no slackening of the popular pulse; tempering stern acts by the gleams of a kind heart; illuminating scenes dark with passion by the smile of humor; doing his titanic work as humbly and homely as heaven-born rulers do little things with the grandiloquence of pomp and state; in one word, one of the rare men who succeed in becoming great, without ceasing to be good. Such, indeed, was the modesty of this great and good man, that the world only discovered him a hero after he had fallen a martyr.

To be singled out by the side of such a chief, the second victim to the infernal gods of slavery, was an honor due to Mr. Seward. Had he not, at a time of general hesitation, the sagacity to foresee and the manliness to foretell "the irrepressible conflict"? Did he not, in the darkest hours of that conflict, prove true to the Roman duty to never despair of the republic and its stars? We earnestly hope that he and his son will be restored to health, public activity, and well-deserved honors within much less than "90 days."

After a tremendous war, but [one] which, if we consider its vast dimensions, and its broad scope, and compare it to the Old World's 100 years' wars, and 30 years' wars, and 23 years' wars, can hardly be said to have lasted 90 days, yours, Sir, has become the task to uproot by the law what has been felled by the sword, to preside over the arduous work of political reconstruction and social regeneration. A profound sense of your great mission will save you from any compromise with stern duties. You will never forget that to initiate the new era of the emancipation of labor, the American people devolved the responsibilities of leadership upon two men of labor—the one Abraham Lincoln, the other Andrew Johnson.

INDEPENDENCE VS. DEPENDENCE! WHICH?

Though not attributed, this article was likely written by Victoria Woodhull.

In this age of progress, wherein rapid strides are being made in all branches of civilization, woman seems to be about the only constituent feature devoid of the general spirit that controls. All the elements of society are becoming more distinctly individualized with increasing heterogeneity. Its lines of demarcation, while increasing numerically, become more distinct. The whole tendency is to individual independence and mutual dependence. It is most true that in the aid progress receives from peoples, the female element is but poorly represented, but its effects are sufficiently obvious and diffusive to demonstrate, even to her, that there must be a forward movement made by the sex, else it will be left entirely too far in the rear to perform even an unimportant part in the great wants that the immediate future will develop.

The wife was formerly the housekeeper; she is becoming less and less so every day. Many of the duties that once devolved upon her are now performed by special trades. Each branch of housewifery is coming to be the basis of a separate branch of business. Schools perform all the duties of education that once devolved upon the mother, and tailors and dressmakers absorb the labor of the wardrobe. The grocer and the baker pretty nearly supply the table, while the idea of furnishing meals complete is rapidly gaining acceptance. Thus, one by one, the duties of the housewife are being taken from her by the better understanding and adaptation of principles of general economy.

While this revolution is in progress, the preparatory steps to cooperative housekeeping are being taken. Thousands live at one place and eat at another, when once such practice was unknown. Dining saloons are increasing more rapidly than any other branch of business, and more transient meals are eaten every day. The result of this will be a division of living under the two systems represented by the two classes of hotels—the table d'hôte and the à la carte. The residence portions of our cities will be converted into vast hotels, which will be arranged and divided for the accommodation of families of all sizes. A thousand people can live in one hotel, under one general system of superintendence, at much less expense than two hundred and fifty families of four members each can in as many houses and under as many systems. As a system of economy this practice is sure to prevail, for progress in this respect is as equally marked as in attainment, and, if we mistake not, is of a higher order. To obtain more effect from a given amount of power is a higher branch of science than to obtain the same by increasing the power. To lessen resistance is better than to increase power, and on this principle progress in the principles of living is being made toward cooperation. Allowing that the practice will become general, what will become of the "special sphere" of woman that is painted in such vivid colors by the opponents of the extension of female privileges? Are the powers of woman to be wasted upon vain frivolities so widely practiced now, when this principle is already operating, or are they to be cast in some useful channel—some honorable calling? Is fashion to consume the entire time of women of the immediate future, or shall they become active members of the social body, not only forming a portion of its numbers but contributing their share to the amount of results to be gained? True, the beginning of this practice is forcing woman into wider fields of usefulness; forcing them without preparation into competition with man, who has been trained to industry from youth—a vast disparity over which the complaint of unequal pay is sometimes raised without real cause.

Does woman foresee what these things are to lead to, or does she prefer to remain blind to the tendencies of progress in this regard? It is evident to every mind not willfully blind that woman is gradually merging into all the employments of life. [She is] being driven to it by the force of circumstances coming from new developments. It is a necessity. Occupation they must have, for not all women even will be content to lead useless lives. This condition is gradually increasing both in volume and extent, and with a persistency which overcomes all opposition custom offers, it proclaims its intentions. Why cannot its drift be recognized as a matter of course and all provisions made to help the cause along? Women who do not perceive these things, from habitual blindness to all that usefulness indicates, may be excused for their supineness; but men, who are habitually provident, stand condemned of inconsistency for all the opposition manifested to the course events will pursue.

In consideration of the fact that woman is entering the active sphere of life and is every day widening this sphere, can she sit in utter quiescence saying she has no desire to establish herself as an element of power politically? In this she voluntarily acknowledges her inferiority and her willingness to remain the political slave, which is but a shade removed from the slavery that cost the country so much life to extinguish.

However much man may at present resist the bold demands of the few now calling for political equality, were the sex as a whole to rouse itself into a comprehension of the situation and its prophecies, with the determination to assert equality of privilege in the control of that in which they have an equality of interest, he would not dare to refuse. Let the question be put home to yourselves in the light of rising events and considered with calmness and wisdom. Are you willing to remain a political nonentity, a dependent upon the consideration of those who do possess political rights, and be subservient to masters of others' making? Shall you not the rather demand political equality, basing it on an equality of interest in the results to be obtained through the exercise of political rights? The first means continued dependence; the last means the beginning of independence. These are the questions. Consider them.

THE RIGHTS OF CHILDREN

We clip the following sensible remarks from an article in the Philadelphia Daily Chronicle, and commend them to the consideration of our readers:

This is the age when, for the first time in human history, the rights of all living things are, in some way, recognized as existing. We are far enough yet from according to all their rights, but we talk about them; we see them, and thought is busy to determine how they should be best secured.

Even the dumb animals have their advocates. The bird flies, and the horse labors, exempt from many a former abuse, danger, or ill. Man, with his superior muscle and pluck, has secured for himself a recognition that forbids others to trample upon privileges which he calls his own. And woman, too, is rising with her demand that whatever is man's right should also be conceded as her right as well. It is an age of rights; we wish to give all their due; and those who cannot speak for themselves must be spoken for.

In regard to women, our idea is that their present condition is neither as bad as it has been nor as good as it will be. There has already been so much thought and said about their rights as to receive some modification and a fairer degree of common justice. But in regard to the rights of children very little has been thought, or said, or done. They cannot speak for themselves. There are few to speak for them. They are still looked upon very much as property. It is still conceded that their parents have an exclusive right to them. If those parents wish to send them to beg day after day, it is thought that they have an undoubted right to do so. If they desire to send their children forth as bootblacks at six or eight years of age, there are few interested, or disposed, to dispute their right to do so. Or, if they will that their children must stand all day at the loom, or by the spindles, or do some kind of manual work, instead of going to school, it is usually regarded as right that they should do even this. Nobody, perhaps, regards it as wisdom for them to do any of these things, but there are enough who regard it as an undoubted parental prerogative.

Now it is just this which we wish to stoutly and emphatically deny. The children have rights of their own, rights in which society ought to protect them in all cases where parental wisdom fails to do it. Children are not property. They are not the born servants and slaves of their parents. They belong to themselves, and it is their inalienable right to be, in an age like this, fitted for taking some useful and self-supporting place in the world's works. It is their right to receive an education according to their capacity, just as good as our public schools can provide. No parental authority has any right to intervene between them and those advantages which shall make their experience and influence in life the best possible. It is really of less consequence that the home of today be uncomfortable, than that both it and the homes of its children should be without promise. And parents should not be allowed to sacrifice the future of their children to their own desire to get on a little further in the world. Children ought to be protected against this shortsighted avarice of their fathers and mothers. Children are not to blame for the ignorance in which they are growing up. The fault is first parental, then social. If parents are poor and ignorant, general laws ought to provide that every child should not suffer unnecessarily from neglect, and humane individuals ought to see to it that in every neighborhood those laws take effect.

These poor parents plead that they need the work of their children to help in the maintenance of the family, to buy the clothing and the daily bread. In some cases this plea is just. In a larger number of cases it is groundless. Where it is just, it would be a better public economy to keep the family and pay for the children's schooling than to allow the parents to deprive the children of their early advantages, their right to the privilege of education. The better citizens they would then become would more than repay the community in dollars and cents for its forethought and justice.

It ought to be a recognized first principle that every child born into the bosom of society has a right to the very best we can do for it. The welfare of the whole community is more or less involved in its welfare. If it is so cared for as to be useful and productive, society is the gainer. But if it be left in neglect, becomes a vagrant, a criminal, or a sot, society is continually taxed for its support and has constantly a heavy bill of expenses to defend itself from its vicious depredations. If we do not secure to children their inalienable rights, we suffer grievously for our neglect. We make the public expense greater, the public safety less, the public morality lower, and allow the whole public tone to fall far below the demands of a nominally Christian and enlightened age.

There are many other considerations touching the rights of children which are applicable to their treatment in the home. But today we had in view their treatment by society—its duty to secure them protection against the enslaving desire of poor and ignorant parents. We have abundant occasion to consider the matter. Here stand these twenty thousand children who have no schooling, no wise provisions made for them, who are beggars, vagrants, little bootblacks, newsboys, and who are maturing every day. What are their prospects? What are they likely to become? What are all the Christians, all the philanthropists, all the wealthy and the wise doing to secure them their higher rights?

INTERVIEW WITH KARL MARX, THE HEAD OF L'INTERNATIONALE

R. Landor

You have asked me to find out something about the International Association, and I have tried to do so. The enterprise is a difficult one just now. London is indisputably the headquarters of the association, but the English people have got a scare, and smell International in everything as King James smelled gunpowder after the famous plot. The consciousness of the society has naturally increased with the suspiciousness of the public, and if those who guide it have a secret to keep, they are of the stamp of men who keep a secret well. I have called on two of their leading members, have talked with one freely, and I here give you the substance of my conversation. I have satisfied myself of one thing: that it is a society of genuine workingmen, but that these workmen are directed by social and political theories of another class. One man whom I saw, a leading member of the council, was sitting at his workman's bench during our interview, and left off talking to me from time to time to receive a complaint, delivered in no courteous tone, from one of the many little masters in the neighborhood who employed him. I have heard this same man make eloquent speeches in public, inspired in every passage with the energy of hate toward the classes that call themselves his rulers. I understood the speeches after this glimpse at the domestic life of the orator. He must have felt that he had brains enough to have organized a working government, and yet here he was obliged to devote his life to the most revolting task work of a mechanical profession. He was proud and sensitive, and yet at every turn he had to return a bow for a grunt and a smile for a command that stood on about the same level in the scale of civility with a huntsman's call to his dog. This man helped me to a glimpse of one side of the nature of the International, the result of LABOR AGAINST CAPITAL of the workman who produces against the middleman who enjoys. Here was the hand that would smile hard when the time came, and as to the head that plans, I think I saw that too, in my interview with Dr. Karl Marx.

Dr. Karl Marx is a German doctor of philosophy, with a German breadth of knowledge derived both from observation of the living world and from books. I should conclude that he has never been a worker in the ordinary sense of the term. His surroundings and appearance are those of a well-to-do man of the middle class. The drawing room into which I was ushered on the night of the interview would have formed very comfortable quarters for a thriving stockbroker who had made his competence and was now beginning to make his fortune. It was comfort personified, the apartment of a man of taste and of easy means, but with nothing in it peculiarly characteristic of its owner. A fine album of Rhine views on the table, however, gave a clue to his nationality. I peered cautiously into the vase on the side table for a bomb. I sniffed for petroleum, but the smell was the smell of roses. I crept back stealthily to my seat, and moodily awaited the worst.

He has entered and greeted me cordially, and we are sitting face-to-face. Yes, I am tête-à-tête with the revolution incarnate, with the real founder and guiding spirit of the International Society, with the author of the address in which capital was told that if it warred on labor it must expect to have its house burned down about its ears—in a word, with the APOLOGIST FOR THE COMMUNE of Paris. Do you remember the bust of Socrates? the man who died rather than protest his belief in the Gods of the time—the man with the fine sweep of profile for the forehead running meanly at the end into a little snub, curled-up feature, like a bisected pothook, that formed the nose. Take this bust in your mind's eye, color the beard black, dashing it here and there with puffs of gray; clap the head thus made on a portly body of the middle height, and the Doctor is before you. Throw a veil over the upper part of the face and you might be in the company of a born vestryman. Reveal the essential feature, the immense brow, and you know at once that you have to deal with that most formidable of all composite individual forces—a dreamer who thinks, a thinker who dreams.

I went straight to my business. The world, I said, seemed to be in the dark about the International, hating it very much but not able to say clearly what thing it hated. Some, who professed to have peered further into the gloom than their neighbors, declared that they had made out a sort of Janus figure, with a fair, honest workman's smile on one of its faces, and on the other a murderous conspirator's scowl. Would he light up the case of mystery in which the theory dwelt?

The professor laughed—chuckled a little, I fancied, at the thought that we were so frightened of him. "There is no mystery to clear up, dear sir," he began, in a very polished form of the Hans Breitmann dialect, "except perhaps the mystery of human stupidity in those who perpetually ignore the fact that our association is a public one, and that the fullest reports of its proceedings are published for all who care to read them. You may buy our rules for a penny, and a shilling laid out in pamphlets will teach you almost as much about us as we know ourselves."

> R. L.: Almost—yes, perhaps so, but will not the something I shall not know constitute the all-important reservation? To be quite frank with you, and to put the case as it strikes an outside observer, this general claim of depreciation of you must mean something more than the ignorant ill-will of the multitude. And it is still pertinent to ask, even after what you have told me, What is the International Society?
>
> Dr. M.: You have only to look at the individuals of which it is composed—workmen.
>
> R. L.: Yes, but the soldier need be no exponent of the statecraft that sets him in motion. I know some of your members, and I can believe that they are not of the stuff of which conspirators are made. Besides, a secret shared by a million men would be no secret at all. But what if these were only the instruments in the hands of a bold and—I hope you will forgive me for adding—not overscrupulous conclave.
>
> Dr. M.: There is nothing to prove it.
> R. L.: The last Paris insurrection?

Dr. M.: I demand firstly the proof that there was any plot at all—that anything happened that was not the legitimate effect of the circumstances of the moment; or, the plot granted, I demand the proofs of the participation in it of the International Association.

R. L.: The presence in the communal body of so many members of the association.

Dr. M.: Then it was a plot of the Freemasons too, for their share in the work as individuals was by no means a slight one. I should not be surprised, indeed, to find the Pope setting down the whole insurrection to their account. But try another explanation. The insurrection in Paris was made by the workmen of Paris. The ablest of the workmen must necessarily have been its leaders and administrators, but the ablest of the workmen happen also to be members of the International Association. Yet the association, as such, may be in no way responsible for their action.

R. L.: It will seem otherwise to the world. People talk of secret instructions from London, and even grants of money. Can it be affirmed that the alleged openness of the association's proceedings precludes all secrecy of communication?

Dr. M.: What association ever formed carried on its work without private as well as public agencies? But to talk of secret instruction from London, as of decrees in the matter of faith and morals from some center of Papal domination and intrigue, is wholly to misconceive the nature of the International. This would imply a centralized form of government for the International, whereas the real form is designedly that which gives the greatest play to local energy and independence. In fact, the International is not properly a government for the working class at all. It is a bond of union rather than a controlling force.

R. L.: And of union to what end?

Dr. M.: The economical emancipation of the working class by the conquest of political power. The use of that political power to the attainment of social ends. It is necessary that our aims should be thus comprehensive to include every form of working-class activity. To have made them of a special character would have been to adapt them to the needs of one section—one nation of workmen alone. But how could all men be asked to unite to further the objects of a few? To have done that, the association must have forfeited its title of International. The association does not dictate the form of political movements; it only requires a pledge as to their end. It is a network of affiliated societies spreading all over the world of labor. In each part of the world some special aspect of the problem presents itself, and the workmen there address themselves to its consideration in their own way. Combinations among workmen cannot be absolutely identical in detail in Newcastle and in Barcelona, in London and in Berlin. In England, for instance, the way to show political power lies open to the working class. Insurrection would be madness where peaceful agitation would more swiftly and surely do the work. In France, a hundred laws of repression and a mortal antagonism between classes seem to necessitate the violent solution of social war. The choice of that solution is the affair of the working classes of that country. The International does not presume to dictate in the matter, and hardly to advise. But to every movement it accords its sympathy and its aid within the limits assigned by its own laws.

R. L.: And what is the nature of that aid?

Dr. M.: To give an example, one of the commonest forms of the movement for emancipation is that of strikes. Formerly, when a strike took place in one country, it was defeated by the importation of workmen from another. The International has nearly stopped all that. It receives information of the intended strike; it spreads that information among its members, who at once see that for them the seat of the struggle must be forbidden ground. The masters are thus left alone to reckon with their men. In most cases the men require no other aid than that. Their own subscriptions or those of the societies to which they are more immediately affiliated supply them with funds, but should the pressure upon them become too heavy and the strike be one of which the association approves, their necessities are supplied out of the common purse. By these means a strike of the cigar makers of Barcelona was brought to a victorious issue the other day. But the society has no interest in strikes, though it supports them under certain conditions. It cannot possibly gain by them in a pecuniary point of view, but it may easily lose. Let us sum it all up in a word. The working classes remain poor amid the increase of wealth, wretched amid the increase of luxury. Their material privation dwarfs their moral as well as their physical stature. They cannot rely on others for a remedy. It has become then with them an imperative necessity to take their own case in hand. They must revise the relations between themselves and the capitalists and landlords, and that means they must transform society. This is the general end of every known workmen's organization—land and labor leagues, trade and friendly societies, cooperative stores and cooperative production are but means toward it. To establish a perfect solidarity between these organizations is the business of the International Association. Its influence is beginning to be felt everywhere. Two papers spread its views in Spain, three in Germany, the same number in Austria and in Holland, six in Belgium, and six in Switzerland. And now that I have told you what the International is, you may, perhaps, be in a position to form your own opinion as to its pretended plots.

R. L.: And Mazzini, is he member of your body?

Dr. M. (laughing): Ah, no. We should have made but little progress if we had not got beyond the range of his ideas.

R. L.: You surprise me. I should certainly have thought that he represented most advanced views.

Dr. M.: He represents nothing better than the old idea of a middle-class republic. We seek no part with the middle class. He has fallen as far to the rear of the modern movement as the German professors, who, nevertheless, are still considered in Europe as the apostles of the cultured democratism of the future. They were so at one time—before '48, perhaps, when the German middle class, in the English sense, had scarcely attained its proper development. But now they have gone over bodily to the reaction, and the proletariat knows them no more.

R. L.: Some people have thought they saw signs of a positivist element in your organization.

Dr. M.: No such thing. We have positivists among us, and others not of our body who work as well. But this is not by virtue of their philosophy, which will have nothing to do with popular government as we understand it, and which seeks only to put a new hierarchy in place of the old one.

R. L.: It seems to me, then, that the leaders of the new international movement have had to form a philosophy as well as an association for themselves.

Dr. M.: Precisely. It is hardly likely, for instance, that we could hope to prosper in our war against capital if we derived our tactics, say, from the political economy of Mill. He has traced one kind of relationship between labor and capital. We hope to show that it is possible to establish another.

R. L.: And the United States?

Dr. M.: The chief centers of our activity are for the present among the old societies of Europe. Many circumstances have hitherto tended to prevent the labor problem from assuming an all-absorbing importance in the United States. But they are rapidly disappearing, and it is rapidly coming to the front there with the growth, as in Europe, of a laboring class distinct from the rest of the community and divorced from capital.

R. L.: It would seem that in this country the hoped-for solution, whatever it may be, will be attained without the violent means of revolution. The English system of agitating by platform and press until minorities become converted into majorities is a hopeful sign.

Dr. M.: I am not so sanguine on that point as you. The English middle class has always shown itself willing enough to accept the verdict of the majority, so long as it enjoyed the monopoly of the voting power. But mark me: as soon as it finds itself outvoted on what it considers vital questions, we shall see here a new slave-owner's war.

I have here given you as well as I can remember them the heads of my conversation with this remarkable man. I shall leave you to form your own conclusions. Whatever may be said for or against the probability of its complicity with the movement of the Commune, we may be assured that in the International Association the civilized world has a new power in its midst with which it must soon come to a reckoning for good or ill.

Conclusion to Black and White

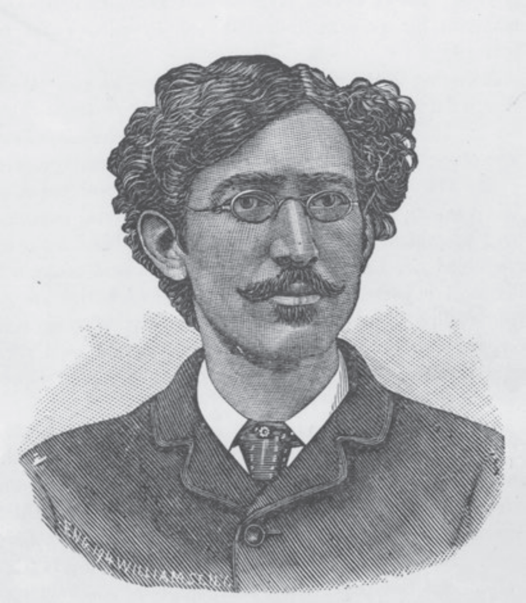
Thomas Fortune

I know it is not fashionable for writers on economic questions to tell the truth, but the truth should be told, though it kill. When the wail of distress encircles the world, the man who is linked by "the touch of nature" which "makes the whole world kin" to the common destiny of the race universal, who hates injustice wherever it lifts up its head, who sympathizes with the distressed, the weak, and the friendless in every corner of the globe, such a man is morally bound to tell the truth as he conceives it to be the truth.

In these times, when the lawmaking and enforcing authority is leagued against the people, when great periodicals—monthly, weekly, and daily—echo the mandates or anticipate the wishes of the powerful men who produce our social demoralization, it becomes necessary for the few men who do not agree to the arguments advanced or the interests sought to be bolstered up to "cry aloud and spare not." The man who with the truth in his possession flatters with lies, that "thrift may follow fawning," is too vile to merit the contempt of honest men.

The government of the United States confiscated as "contraband of war" the slave population of the South, but it left to the portion of the unrepentant rebel a far more valuable species of property. The slave, the perishable wealth, was confiscated to the government and then manumitted, but property in land, the wealth which perishes not nor can fly away, and which had made the institution of slavery possible, was left as the heritage of the robber who had not hesitated to lift his iconoclastic hand against the liberties of his country.



Thomas Fortune, 1887

The baron of feudal Europe would have been paralyzed with astonishment at the leniency of the conquering invader who should take from him his slave, subject to mutation, and leave him his landed possessions, which are as fixed as the Universe of Nature. He would ask no more advantageous concession. But the United States took the slave and left the thing which gave birth to chattel slavery and which is now fast giving birth to industrial slavery, a slavery more excruciating in its exactions, more irresponsible in its machinations than that other slavery, which I once endured. The chattel slave–holder must, to preserve the value of his property, feed, clothe, and house his property and give it proper medical attention when disease or accident threaten its life. But industrial slavery requires no such care. The new slaveholder is only solicitous of obtaining the maximum of labor for the minimum of cost. He does not regard the man as of any consequence when he can no longer produce. Having worked him to death, or ruined his constitution and robbed him of his labor, he turns him out upon the world to live upon the charity of mankind or to die of inattention and starvation. He knows that it profits him nothing to waste time and money upon a disabled industrial slave. The multitude of laborers from which he can recruit his necessary laboring force is so enormous that solicitude on his part for one that falls by the wayside would be a gratuitous expenditure of humanity and charity which the world is too intensely selfish and materialistic to expect of him. Here he forges wealth and death at one and the same time. He could not do this if our social system did not confer upon him a monopoly of the soil from which subsistence must be derived, because the industrial slave, given an equal opportunity to produce for himself, would not produce for another. On the other hand, the large industrial operations, with the multitude of laborers from which Adam Smith declares employers grow rich, as far as this applies to the soil would not be possible, since the vast volume of increased production brought about by the industry of the multitude of coequal small farmers would so reduce the cost price of food products as to destroy the incentive to speculation in them, and at the same time utterly destroy the necessity or the possibility of famines, such as those which have from time to time come upon the Irish people. There could be no famine, in the natural course of things, where all had an opportunity to cultivate as much land as they could wherever they found any not already under cultivation by someone else. It needs no stretch of the imagination to see what a startling tendency the announcement that all vacant land was free to settlement upon condition of cultivation would have to the depopulation of overcrowded cities like New York, Baltimore, and Savannah, where the so-called pressure of population upon subsistence has produced a hand-to-hand fight for existence by the wage workers in every avenue of industry.

This is no fancy picture. It is a plain, logical deduction of what would result from the restoration to the people of that equal chance in the race of life which every man has a right to expect, to demand, and to exact as a condition of his membership of organized society.

The wag who started the “forty acres and a mule” idea among the black people of the South was a wise fool; wise in that he enunciated a principle which every argument of sound policy should have dictated, upon the condition that the forty acres could in no wise be alienated, and that it could be regarded only as property as long as it was cultivated; and a fool because he designed simply to impose upon the credulity and ignorance of his victims. But the justness of the "forty acre" donation cannot be controverted. In the first place, the slave had earned this miserable stipend from the government by two hundred years of unrequited toil, and, secondly, as a free man, he was inherently entitled to so much of the soil of his country as would suffice to maintain him in the freedom thrust upon him. To tell him he was a free man, and at the same time shut him off from free access to the soil upon which he had been reared, without a penny in his pocket, and with an army of children at his coattail—some of his reputed wife's children being the illegitimate offspring of a former inhuman master—was to add insult to injury, to mix syrup and hyssop, to aggravate into curses the pretended conference of blessings.

When I think of the absolutely destitute condition of the colored people of the South at the close of the Rebellion, when I remember the moral and intellectual enervation which slavery had produced in them, when I remember that not only were they thus bankrupt but that they were absolutely and unconditionally cut off from the soil, with absolutely no right or title in it, I am surprised—not that they have already got a respectable slice of landed interests, not that they have taken hold eagerly of the advantages of moral and intellectual opportunities of development placed in their reach by the charitable philanthropy of good men and women, not that they have bought homes and supplied them with articles of convenience and comfort, often of luxury—but I am surprised that the race did not turn robbers and highwaymen, and in turn terrorize and rob society as society had for so long terrorized and robbed them. The thing is strange, marvelous, phenomenal in the extreme. Instead of becoming outlaws, as the critical condition would seem to have indicated, the black men of the South went manfully to work to better their own condition and the crippled condition of the country which had been produced by the ravages of internecine rebellion; while the white men of the South, the capitalists, the land-sharks, the poor white trash, and the nondescripts, with a thousand years of Christian civilization and culture behind them, with "the boast of chivalry, the pomp of power," these white scamps, who had imposed upon the world the idea that they were paragons of virtue and the heaven-sent vicegerents of civil power, organized themselves into a band of outlaws whose concatenative chain of auxiliaries ran through the entire South, and deliberately proceeded to murder innocent men and women for POLITICAL REASONS and to systematically rob them of their honest labor, because they were too accursedly lazy to labor themselves.

But this highly abnormal, unnatural condition of things is fast passing away. The white man, having asserted his superiority in the matters of assassination and robbery, has settled down upon a barrel of dynamite, as he did in the days of slavery, and will await the explosion with the same fatuity and self-satisfaction true of him in other days. But as convulsions from within are more violent and destructive than convulsions from without, being more deep-seated and therefore more difficult to reach, the next explosion will be more disastrous, more far-reaching in its havoc than the one which metamorphosed social conditions in the South and from the dreadful reactions of which we are just now recovering.

As I have said elsewhere, the future struggle in the South will be not between white men and black men but between capital and labor, landlord and tenant. Already the cohorts are marshalling to the fray; already the forces are mustering to the field at the sound of the slogan.

The same battle will be fought upon Southern soil that is in preparation in other states, where the conditions are older in development, but no more deep-seated, no more pernicious, no more blighting upon the industries of the country and the growth of the people.

It is not my purpose here to enter into an extended analysis of the foundations upon which our land system rests, nor to give my views as to how matters might be remedied. I may take up the question at some future time. It is sufficient for my purpose to have indicated that the social problems in the South, as they exfoliate more and more as resultant upon the war, will be found to be the same as those found in every other section of our country, and to have pointed out that the questions of "race," "condition," "politics," etc. will all properly adjust themselves with the advancement of the people in wealth, education, and forgetfulness of the unhappy past.

The hour is approaching when the laboring classes of our country, North, East, West and South, will recognize that they have a common cause, a common humanity, and a common enemy, and that therefore, if they would triumph over wrong and place the laurel wreath upon triumphant justice, without distinction of race or of previous condition they must unite! And unite they will, for "a fellow feeling makes us wond'rous kind." When the issue is properly joined, the rich, be they black or be they white, will be found upon the same side, and the poor, be they black or be they white, will be found on the same side.

Necessity knows no law and discriminates in favor of no man or race.

Preface to the American Edition of The Condition of the Working-Class in England

Frederick Engels[1]

Ten months have elapsed since, at the translator's wish, I wrote the Appendix[2] to this book, and during these ten months, a revolution has been accomplished in American society such as in any other country would have taken at least ten years. In February 1885, American public opinion was almost unanimous on this one point: that there was no working class, in the European sense of the word, in America; that consequently no class struggle between workmen and capitalists such as tore European society to pieces was possible in the American Republic; and that, therefore, Socialism was a thing of foreign importation which could never take root on American soil. And yet at that moment the coming class struggle was casting its gigantic shadow before it in the strikes of the Pennsylvania coal miners, and of many other trades, and especially in the preparations all over the country for the great Eight Hours' movement, which was to come off, and did come off, in the May following. That I then duly appreciated these symptoms, that I anticipated a working-class movement on a national scale, my Appendix shows,[3] but no one could then foresee that in such a short time the movement would burst out with such irresistible force, would spread with the rapidity of a prairie fire, would shake American society to its very foundations.

[2] The Appendix to the American edition of The Condition of the Working-Class in England was, except for the paragraph quoted in the next footnote, used by Engels as the basis of his preface to the English edition of 1892.

The fact is there, stubborn and indisputable. To what an extent it had struck with terror the American ruling classes was revealed to me, in an amusing way, by American journalists who did me the honor of calling on me last summer; the "new departure" had put them into a state of helpless fright and perplexity. But at that time the movement was only just on the start; there was but a series of confused and apparently disconnected upheavals of that class which, by the suppression of negro slavery and the rapid development of manufactures, had become the lowest stratum of American society.

[3] In this appendix Engels wrote: "There were two circumstances which for a long time prevented the unavoidable consequences of the Capitalist system from showing themselves in the full glare of day in America. These were the easy access to the ownership of cheap land, and the influx of immigration. They allowed, for many years, the great mass of the native American population to "retire" in early manhood from wage labor and to become farmers, dealers, or employers of labor, while the hard work for wages, the position of a proletarian for life, mostly fell to the lot of immigrants. But America has outgrown this early stage. The boundless backwoods have disappeared, and the still more boundless prairies are faster and faster passing from the hands of the Nation and the States into those of private owners. The great safety valve against the formation of a permanent proletarian class has practically ceased to act. A class of lifelong and even hereditary proletarians exists at this hour in America. A nation of sixty millions striving hard to become, and with every chance of success, too, the leading manufacturing nation of the world—such a nation cannot permanently import its own wage-working class, not even if immigrants pour in at the rate of half a million a year. The tendency of the Capitalist system towards the ultimate splitting-up of society into two classes, a few millionaires on the one hand, and a great mass of mere wageworkers on the other, this tendency, though constantly crossed and counteracted by other social agencies, works nowhere with greater force than in America; and the result has been the production of a class of native American wageworkers, who form, indeed, the aristocracy of the wage-working class as compared with the immigrants, but who become conscious more and more every day of their solidarity with the latter and who feel all the more acutely their present condemnation to lifelong wage toil, because they still remember the bygone days, when it was comparatively easy to rise to a higher social level."—Ed.

Frederick Engels, 1879

Before the year closed, these bewildering social convulsions began to take a definite direction. The spontaneous, instinctive movements of these vast masses of working people, over a vast extent of country, the simultaneous outburst of their common discontent with a miserable social condition, the same everywhere and due to the same causes, made them conscious of the fact that they formed a new and distinct class of American society, a class of—practically speaking—more or less hereditary wageworkers, proletarians. And with true American instinct this consciousness led them at once to take the next step towards their deliverance: the formation of a political workingmen's party, with a platform of its own, and with the conquest of the Capitol and the White House for its goal. In May, the struggle for the Eight Hours' working day, the troubles in Chicago, Milwaukee, etc., the attempts of the ruling class to crush the nascent uprising of Labor by brute force and brutal class justice; in November, the new Labor Party organized in all great centers, and the New York, Chicago, and Milwaukee elections. May and November have hitherto reminded the American bourgeoisie only of the payment of coupons of U.S. bonds; henceforth May and November will remind them, too, of the dates on which the American working class presented their coupons for payment.

In European countries, it took the working class years and years before they fully realized the fact that they formed a distinct and, under the existing social conditions, a permanent class of modern society, and it took years again until this class consciousness led them to form themselves into a distinct political party, independent of, and opposed to, all the old political parties formed by the various sections of the ruling classes. On the more favored soil of America, where no medieval ruins bar the way, where history begins with the elements of modern bourgeois society as evolved in the seventeenth century, the working class passed through these two stages of its development within ten months.

Still, all this is but a beginning. That the laboring masses should feel their community of grievances and of interests, their solidarity as a class in opposition to all other classes; that in order to give expression and effect to this feeling, they should set in motion the political machinery provided for that purpose in every free country—that is the first step only. The next step is to find the common remedy for these common grievances, and to embody it in the platform of the new Labor Party. And this—the most important and the most difficult step in the movement—has yet to be taken in America.

A new party must have a distinct positive platform, a platform which may vary in details as circumstances vary and as the party itself develops, but still one upon which the party, for the time being, is agreed. So long as such a platform has not been worked out, or exists but in a rudimentary form, so long the new party, too, will have but a rudimentary existence; it may exist locally but not yet nationally; it will be a party potentially but not actually.

That platform, whatever may be its first initial shape, must develop in a direction which may be determined beforehand. The causes that brought into existence the abyss between the working class and the capitalist class are the same in America as in Europe; the means of filling up that abyss are equally the same everywhere. Consequently, the platform of the American proletariat will in the long run coincide, as to the ultimate end to be attained, with the one which, after sixty years of dissensions and discussions, has become the adopted platform of the great mass of the European militant proletariat. It will proclaim, as the ultimate end, the conquest of political supremacy by the working class, in order to effect the direct appropriation of all means of production—land, railways, mines, machinery, etc.—by society at large, to be worked in common by all for the account and benefit of all.

But if the new American party, like all political parties everywhere, by the very fact of its formation aspires to the conquest of political power, it is as yet far from agreed upon what to do with that power when once attained. In New York and the other great cities of the East, the organization of the working class has proceeded upon the lines of Trades' Societies, forming in each city a powerful Central Labor Union. In New York the Central Labor Union, last November, chose for its standard-bearer Henry George, and consequently its temporary electoral platform has been largely imbued with his principles. In the great cities of the Northwest, the electoral battle was fought upon a rather indefinite labor platform, and the influence of Henry George's theories was scarcely, if at all, visible. And while in these great centers of population and of industry the new class movement came to a political head, we find all over the country two widespread labor organizations: the Knights of Labor[4] and the Socialist Labor Party,[5] of which only the latter has a platform in harmony with the modern European standpoint as summarized above.

[4] The Noble Order of the Knights of Labor was a working-class organization founded in Philadelphia in 1869. Existing illegally until 1878, it observed a semi-mysterial ritual. That year the organization emerged from the underground, retaining some of its secret features. The Knights of Labor aimed to liberate workers by setting up cooperatives. They took in all skilled and even unskilled trades, without discrimination on account of sex, race, nationality, or religion. The organization reached the highest point of its activity during the 1880s, when, under pressure from the masses, the leaders of the order were compelled to consent to an extensive strike movement. Its membership at that time was over 700,000, including 60,000 Negroes. However, on account of the opportunistic tactics of the leaders, who were opposed to revolutionary class struggle, the order forfeited its prestige among the masses. Its activity came to an end in the next decade.

[5] The Socialist Labor Party came into existence in 1876 as a result of the union of the American sections of the First International with other working-class

Of the three more or less definite forms under which the American labor movement thus presents itself, the first, the Henry George movement in New York, is for the moment of a chiefly local significance. No doubt New York is by far the most important city of the States, but New York is not Paris and the United States are not France. And it seems to me that the Henry George platform, in its present shape, is too narrow to form the basis for anything but a local movement, or at best for a short-lived phase of the general movement. To Henry George, the expropriation of the mass of the people from the land is the great and universal cause of the splitting up of the people into Rich and Poor. Now this is not quite correct historically. In Asiatic and classical antiquity, the predominant form of class oppression was slavery; that is to say, not so much the expropriation of the masses from the land as the appropriation of their persons. When, in the decline of the Roman Republic, the free Italian peasants were expropriated from their farms, they formed a class of "poor whites" similar to that of the Southern Slave States before 1861, and between slaves and poor whites, two classes equally unfit for self-emancipation, the old world went to pieces. In the Middle Ages, it was not the expropriation of the people from, but on the contrary their appropriation to the land which became the source of feudal oppression. The peasant retained his land, but was attached to it as a serf or villein, and made liable to tribute to the lord in labor and in produce. It was only at the dawn of modern times, towards the end of the fifteenth century, that the expropriation of the peasantry on a large scale laid the foundation for the modern class of wageworkers who possess nothing but their labor power and can live only by the selling of that labor power to others. But if the expropriation from the land brought this class into existence, it was the development of capitalist production, of modern industry and agriculture on a large scale, which perpetuated it, increased it, and shaped it socialist organizations in the United States. This party consisted mainly of immigrants, particularly Germans. Its activities were sectarian, and its leaders, because they refused to work in the trade unions, were incapable of heading the mass movement of the American workers.

into a distinct class with distinct interests and a distinct historical mission. All this has been fully expounded by Marx (Capital, Part VIII: "The So-Called Primitive Accumulation"). According to Marx, the cause of the present antagonism of the classes and of the social degradation of the working class is their expropriation from all means of production, in which the land is of course included.

If Henry George declares land monopolization to be the sole cause of poverty and misery, he naturally finds the remedy in the resumption of the land by society at large. Now, the Socialists of the school of Marx, too, demand the resumption, by society, of the land, and not only of the land but of all other means of production likewise. But even if we leave these out of the question, there is another difference. What is to be done with the land? Modern Socialists, as represented by Marx, demand that it should be held and worked in common and for common account, and the same with all other means of social production, mines, railways, factories, etc.; Henry George would confine himself to letting it out to individuals as at present, merely regulating its distribution and applying the rents for public, instead of, as at present, for private purposes. What the Socialists demand implies a total revolution of the whole system of social production; what Henry George demands leaves the present mode of social production untouched, and has, in fact, been anticipated by the extreme section of Ricardian bourgeois economists who, too, demanded the confiscation of the rent of land by the State.

It would of course be unfair to suppose that Henry George has said his last word once for all. But I am bound to take his theory as I find it.

The second great section of the American movement is formed by the Knights of Labor. And that seems to be the section most typical of the present state of the movement, as it is undoubtedly by far the strongest. An immense association, spread over an immense extent of country in innumerable "assemblies," representing all shades of individual and local opinion within the working class, the whole of them sheltered under a platform of corresponding indistinctness and held together much less by their impracticable constitution than by the instinctive feeling that the very fact of their clubbing together for their common aspiration makes them a great power in the country: a truly American paradox, clothing the most modern tendencies in the most medieval mummeries and hiding the most democratic and even rebellious spirit behind an apparent, but really powerless, despotism—such is the picture the Knights of Labor offer to a European observer. But if we are not arrested by mere outside whimsicalities, we cannot help seeing in this vast agglomeration an immense amount of potential energy evolving slowly but surely into actual force. The Knights of Labor are the first national organization created by the American working class as a whole; whatever be their origin and history, whatever their shortcomings and little absurdities, whatever their platform and their constitution, here they are, the work of practically the whole class of American wageworkers: the only national bond that holds them together, that makes their strength felt to themselves not less than to their enemies, and that fills them with the proud hope of future victories. For it would not be exact to say that the Knights of Labor are liable to development. They are constantly in full process of development and revolution, a heaving, fermenting mass of plastic material seeking the shape and form appropriate to its inherent nature. That form will be attained as surely as historical evolution has, like natural evolution, its own immanent laws. Whether the Knights of Labor will then retain their present name or not makes no difference, but to an outsider it appears evident that here is the raw material out of which the future of the American working-class movement, and along with it the future of American society at large, has to be shaped.

The third section consists of the Socialist Labor Party. This section is a party but in name, for nowhere in America has it, up to now, been able actually to take its stand as a political party. It is, moreover, to a certain extent foreign to America, having until lately been made up almost exclusively by German immigrants, using their own language and for the most part little conversant with the common language of the country. But if it came from a foreign stock, it came, at the same time, armed with the experience earned during long years of class struggle in Europe, and with an insight into the general conditions of working-class emancipation far superior to that hitherto gained by American workingmen. This is a fortunate circumstance for the American proletarians, who thus are enabled to appropriate, and to take advantage of, the intellectual and moral fruits of the forty years' struggle of their European classmates, and thus to hasten on the time of their own victory. For, as I said before, there cannot be any doubt that the ultimate platform of the American working class must and will be essentially the same as that now adopted by the whole militant working class of Europe, the same as that of the German-American Socialist Labor Party. So far, this party is called upon to play a very important part in the movement. But in order to do so, they will have to doff every remnant of their foreign garb. They will have to become out-and-out American. They cannot expect the Americans to come to them; they, the minority and the immigrants, must go to the Americans, who are the vast majority and the natives. And to do that, they must above all things learn English.

The process of fusing together these various elements of the vast moving mass—elements not really discordant, but indeed mutually isolated by their various starting points—will take some time and will not come off without a deal of friction, such as is visible at different points even now. The Knights of Labor, for instance, are here and there, in the Eastern cities, locally at war with the organized Trades Unions. But then, this same friction exists within the Knights of Labor themselves, where there is anything but peace and harmony. These are not symptoms of decay for capitalists to crow over. They are merely signs that the innumerable hosts of workers, for the first time set in motion in a common direction, have as yet found out neither the adequate expression for their common interests, nor the form of organization best adapted to the struggle, nor the discipline required to insure victory. They are as yet the first levies en masse of the great revolutionary war, raised and equipped locally and independently, all converging to form one common army, but as yet without regular organization and common plan of campaign. The converging columns cross each other here and there; confusion, angry disputes, even threats of conflict arise. But the community of ultimate purpose in the end overcomes all minor troubles; ere long, the straggling and squabbling battalions will be formed in a long line of battle array, presenting to the enemy a well-ordered front, ominously silent under their glittering arms, supported by bold skirmishers in front and by unshakable reserves in the rear.

To bring about this result, the unification of the various independent bodies into one national Labor Army, with no matter how inadequate a provisional platform, provided it be a truly working-class platform—that is the next great step to be accomplished in America. To effect this, and to make that platform worthy of the cause, the Socialist Labor Party can contribute a great deal, if they will only act in the same way as the European Socialists acted at the time when they were but a small minority of the working class. That line of action was first laid down in the Communist Manifesto of 1847 in the following words:

> The Communists [that was the name we took at the time and which even now we are far from repudiating] do not form a separate party opposed to other working-class parties.
> They have no interests separate and apart from the interests of the whole working class.
>
> They do not set up any sectarian principles of their own, by which to shape and model the proletarian movement.
>
> The Communists are distinguished from the other working-class parties by this only: 1. In the national struggles of the proletarians of the different countries, they point out, and bring to the front, the common interests of the whole proletariat, interests independent of all nationality; 2. In the various stages of development which the struggle of the working class against the capitalist class has to pass through, they always and everywhere represent the interests of the movement as a whole.
> The Communists, therefore, are on the one hand practically the most advanced and resolute section of the working-class parties of all countries, that section which ever pushes forward all others; on the other hand, theoretically, they have over the great mass of the proletarians the advantage of clearly understanding the line of march, the conditions, and the ultimate general results of the proletarian movement.
> Thus they fight for the attainment of the immediate ends, for the enforcement of the momentary interests of the working class, but in the movement of the present, they represent and take care of the future of the movement.

That is the line of action which the great founder of Modern Socialism, Karl Marx, and with him I and the Socialists of all nations, who worked along with us, have followed for more than forty years, with the result that it has led to victory everywhere, and that at this moment the mass of European Socialists in Germany and in France; in Belgium, Holland, and Switzerland; in Denmark and Sweden as well as in Spain and Portugal are fighting as one common army under one and the same flag.

Speeches at the Founding of the Industrial Workers of the World

Lucy Parsons

I can assure you that after the intellectual feast that I have enjoyed immensely this afternoon, I feel fortunate to appear before you now in response to your call. I do not wish you to think that I am here to play upon words when I tell you that I stand before you and feel much like a pygmy before intellectual giants, but that is only the fact.

I wish to state to you that I have taken the floor because no other woman has responded and I feel that it would not be out of place for me to say in my poor way a few words about this movement. We, the women of this country, have no ballot even if we wished to use it, and the only way that we can be represented is to take a man to represent us. You men have made such a mess of it in representing us that we have not much confidence in asking you, and I for one feel very backward in asking the men to represent me. We have no ballot, but we have our labor. I think it is August Bebel, in his Woman in the Past, Present and Future—a book that should be read by every woman that works for wages—Bebel says that men have been slaves throughout all the ages, but that woman's condition has been worse, for she has been the slave of a slave.

There was never a greater truth uttered. We are the slaves of the slaves. We are exploited more ruthlessly than men. Wherever wages are to be reduced, the capitalist class use women to reduce them, and if there is anything that you men should do in the future it is to organize the women. And I say that if the women had inaugurated a boycott of the State Street stores since the teamsters' strike, the stores would have surrendered long ago. I do not stand before you to brag. I had no man connected with that strike to make it of interest to me to boycott the stores, but I have not bought one penny's worth there since that strike was inaugurated. I intended to boycott all of them as one individual at least, so it is important to educate the women.

Now, I wish to show my sisters here that we fasten the chains of slavery upon our sisters, sometimes unwittingly, when we go down to the department store and look around so cheap. When we come to reflect, it simply means the robbery of our sisters, for we know that the things cannot be made for such prices and give women who made them fair wages. I wish to say that I have attended many conventions in the twenty-seven years since I came here to Chicago a young girl, so full of life and animation and hope. It is to youth that hope comes; it is to age that reflection comes. I have attended conventions from that day to this, of one kind and another, and taken part in them. I have taken part in some in which our Comrade Debs had a part. I was at the organization that he organized in this city some eight or ten years ago. Now, the point I want to make is that these conventions are full of enthusiasm. And that is right: we should sometimes mix sentiment with soberness; it is a part of life.

But when you go out of this hall, when you have laid aside your enthusiasm, then comes the solid work. Are you going out of here with your minds made up that the class which we call ourselves, revolutionary Socialists so-called—that class is organized to meet organized capital with the millions at its command? It has many weapons to fight us. First, it has money. Then, it has legislative tools. Then, it has armories, and last, it has the gallows. We call ourselves revolutionists. Do you know what the capitalists mean to do to you revolutionists? I simply throw these hints out that you young people may become reflective and know what you have to face at the first, and then it will give you strength. I am not here to cause any discouragement, but simply to encourage you to go on in your grand work.

Now, that is the solid foundation that I hope this organization will be built on—that it may be built not like a house upon the sand, that when the waves of adversity come it may go over into the ocean of oblivion, but that it shall be built upon a strong, granite-hard foundation, a foundation made up of the hearts and aspirations of the men and women of this twentieth century, who have set their minds, their hands, their hearts, and their heads against the past with all its miserable poverty, with its wage slaves, with its children ground into dividends, with its miners away down under the earth and with never the light of sunshine, and with its women selling the holy name of womanhood for a day's board. I hope we understand that this organization has set its face against that iniquity, and that it has set its eyes to the rising star of liberty that means fraternity, solidarity, the universal brotherhood of man. I hope that while politics have been mentioned here—I am not one of those who, because a man or woman disagrees with me, cannot act with them—I am glad and proud to say I am too broad-minded to say they are a faker or fool or a fraud because they disagree with me.

My view may be narrow and theirs may be broad, but I do say to those who have intimated politics here as being necessary or a part of this organization, that I do not impute to them dishonesty or impure motives. But as I understand the call for this convention, politics had no place here; it was simply to be an economic organization, and I hope for the good of this organization that when we go away from this hall, and our comrades go some to the west, some to the east, some to the north, and some to the south, while some remain in Chicago, and all spread this light over this broad land and carry the message of what this convention has done, that there will be no room for politics at all.

There may be room for politics—I have nothing to say about that—but it is a bread-and-butter question, an economic issue, upon which the fight must be made. Now, what do we mean when we say revolutionary Socialist? We mean that the land shall belong to the landless, the tools to the toiler, and the products to the producers. Now, let us analyze that for just a moment, before you applaud me. First, the land belongs to the landless. Is there a single landowner in this country, who owns his land by the constitutional rights given by the constitution of the United States, who will allow you to vote it away from him? I am not such a fool as to believe it. We say, "The tools belong to the toiler." They are owned by the capitalist class. Do you believe they will allow you to go into the halls of the legislature and simply say, "Be it enacted that on and after a certain day the capitalist shall no longer own the tools and the factories and the places of industry, the ships that plow the ocean and our lakes?"

Do you believe that they will submit? I do not. We say, "The product belongs to the producers." It belongs to the capitalist class as their legal property. Do you think that they will allow you to vote them away from them by passing a law and saying, "Be it enacted that on and after a certain day Mr. Capitalist shall be dispossessed?" You may, but I do not believe it. Hence, when you roll under your tongue the expression that you are revolutionists, remember what that word means. It means a revolution that shall turn all these things over where they belong—to the wealth producers.

Now, how shall the wealth producers come into possession of them? I believe that if every man and every woman who works, or who toils in the mines, the mills, the workshops, the fields, the factories, and the farms in our broad America should decide in their minds that they shall have that which of right belongs to them, and that no idler shall live upon their toil, and when your new organization, your economic organization, shall declare as man to man and woman to woman, as brothers and sisters, that you are determined that you will possess these things, then there is no army that is large enough to overcome you, for you yourselves constitute the army. Now, when you have decided that you will take possession of these things, there will not need to be one gun fired or one scaffold erected.

You will simply come into your own, by your own independence and your own manhood, and by asserting your own individuality, and not sending any man to any legislature in any State of the American Union to enact a law that you shall have what is your own—yours by nature and by your manhood and by your very presence upon this Earth. Nature has been lavish to her children. She has placed in this Earth all the material of wealth that is necessary to make men and women happy. She has given us brains to go into her storehouse and bring from its recesses all that is necessary. She has given us these two hands and these brains to manufacture them on a parallel with all other civilizations.

There is just one thing we lack, and we have only ourselves to blame if we do not become free. We simply lack the intelligence to take possession of that hope, and I feel that the men and women who constitute a convention like this can come together and organize that intelligence. I feel that you will at least listen to me, and maybe you will disagree with it.

I wish to say that my conception of the future method of taking possession of this Earth is that of the general strike; that is my conception of it. The trouble with all the strikes in the past has been this: the workingmen, like the teamsters of our cities, these hardworking teamsters, strike and go out and starve. Their children starve. Their wives get discouraged. Some feel that they have to go out and beg for relief, and to get a little coal to keep the children warm, or a little bread to keep the wife from starving, or a little something to keep the spark of life in them so that they can remain wage slaves. That is the way with the strikes in the past.

My conception of the strike of the future is not to strike and go out and starve, but to strike and remain in and take possession of the necessary property of production. If anyone is to starve—I do not say it is necessary—let it be the capitalist class. They have starved us long enough, while they have had wealth and luxury and all that is necessary. You men and women should be imbued with the spirit that is now displayed in far-off Russia and far-off Siberia, where we thought the spark of manhood and womanhood had been crushed out of them. Let us take example from them.

We see the capitalist class fortifying themselves today behind their Citizens' Associations and Employers' Associations in order that they may crush the American labor movement. Let us cast our eyes over to far-off Russia and take heart and courage from those who are fighting the battle there, and from the further fact shown in the dispatches that appear this morning in the news that carries the greatest terror to the capitalist class throughout the world—the emblem that has been the terror of all tyrants through all the ages, and there you will see that the red flag has been raised.

According to the Tribune, the greatest terror is evinced in Odessa and all through Russia because the red flag has been raised. They know that where the red flag has been raised, whoever enroll themselves beneath that flag recognize the universal brotherhood of man; they recognize that the red current that flows through the veins of all humanity is identical, that the ideas of all humanity are identical, that those who raise the red flag, it matters not where, whether on the sunny plains of China or on the sun-beaten hills of Africa or on the far-off snowcapped shores of the north, or in Russia or America, that they all belong to the human family and have an identity of interest. That is what they know.

So when we come to decide, let us sink such differences as nationality, religion, politics, and set our eyes eternally and forever towards the rising star of the industrial republic of labor, remembering that we have left the old behind and have set our faces toward the future. There is no power on Earth that can stop men and women who are determined to be free at all hazards. There is no power on Earth so great as the power of intellect. It moves the world and it moves the Earth.

Now, in conclusion, I wish to say to you—and you will excuse me because of what I am going to say and only attribute it to my interest in humanity. I wish to say that nineteen years ago on the fourth of May of this year, I was one of those at a meeting at the Haymarket in this city to protest against eleven workingmen being shot to pieces at a factory in the southeastern part of this city because they had dared to strike for the eight-hour movement that was to be inaugurated in America in 1886.

The Haymarket meeting was called primarily and entirely to protest against the murder of comrades at the McCormick factory. When that meeting was nearing its close someone threw a bomb. No one knows to this day who threw it except the man who threw it. Possibly he has rendered his account with nature and has passed away. But no human being alive knows who threw it. And yet in the soil of Illinois, the soil that gave a Lincoln to America, the soil in which the great, magnificent Lincoln was buried, in the State that was supposed to be the most liberal in the union, five men sleep the last sleep in Waldheim under a monument that has been raised there because they dared to raise their voices for humanity. I say to any of you who are here and can do so, it is well worth your time to go out there and draw some inspiration around the graves of the first martyrs who fell in the great industrial struggle for liberty on American soil.

I say to you that even within the sound of my voice, only two short blocks from where we meet today, the scaffold was erected on which those five men paid the penalty for daring to raise their voices against the iniquities of the age in which we live.

We are assembled here for the same purpose. And do any of you older men remember the telegrams that were sent out from Chicago while our comrades were not yet even cut down from the cruel gallows?

"Anarchy is dead, and these miscreants have been put out of the way."

Oh, friends, I am sorry that I even had to use that word, anarchy, just now in your presence, which was not in my mind at the outset.

So if any of you wish to go out there and look at this monument that has been raised by those who believed in their comrades' innocence and sincerity, I will ask you, when you have gone out and looked at the monument, that you will go to the reverse side of the monument and [read] there on the reverse side the words of a man, himself the purest and the noblest man who ever sat in the gubernatorial chair of the State of Illinois, John P. Altgeld. On that monument you will read the clause of his message in which he pardoned the men who were lingering then in [prison in] Joliet.

I have nothing more to say. I ask you to read the words of Altgeld, who was at that time the governor, and had been a lawyer and a judge, and knew whereof he spoke, and then take out your copybooks and copy the words of Altgeld when he released those who had not been slaughtered at the capitalists' behest, and then take them home and change your minds about what those men were put to death for.

Now, I have taken up your time in this because I simply feel that I have a right as a mother, and as the wife of one of those sacrificed men, to say whatever I can to bring the light to bear upon this conspiracy and to show you the way it was. Now, I thank you for the time that I have taken up of yours. I hope that we will meet again some time, you and I, in some hall where we can meet and organize the wageworkers of America, the men and women, so that the children may not go into the factories, nor the women into the factories, unless they go under proper conditions.

I hope even now to live to see the day when the first dawn of the new era will have arisen, when capitalism will be a thing of the past, and the new industrial republic, the commonwealth of labor, shall be in operation. I thank you.

Thanks to Audrea Lim for assembling and presenting the texts by Marx, Lincoln and others. The writings of both Karl Marx and Abraham Lincoln are voluminous and available in many forms. Those reprinted here are just a small sample to explain the onset and course of the Civil War in the United States. To these we have added a few writings by others who contributed to America's postwar social radicalization, but without attempting to duplicate the extensive and important documentation of the black experience of the war or of Reconstruction.

All the Lincoln speeches can be found on the US Library of Congress website, www.loc.gov.

Marx's "The North American Civil War" and "The Civil War in the United States" were taken from Marx's Political Writings, Volume 2, Surveys From Exile (Verso, 2010). PREFACE

THE WORLD OF THE JEWISH CONFEDERATES is a lost world. Although in the long history of the Jewish people 140 years is but the blink of an eye, both the South and American Jewry have undergone such monumental changes since 1861 that one traveling back in time must be prepared to visit a very different land populated by very different people.

My interest in this subject grew out of my curiosity about Charleston Jewry and the Civil War. In writing Confederate Charleston, I was determined to tell the story of African Americans, the Irish, and the Jews as well as the traditional story of the war. I knew that the old Jewish families had supported the Confederacy, but I was struck by the depth of their commitment to the cause. I wanted to understand why Southern Jews—most of whom were recent immigrants who at Passover each year celebrated the Exodus from their own enslavement in Egypt—were so committed to the Confederate States of America. Like most contemporary Jews, I was struck by the apparent irony of their story. I also believed I was in familiar territory, as the focal points, I thought, would be Charleston, Savannah, and Richmond.

What I discovered was much more complex. Jewish Confederates were, for the most part, not "old families" at all, but German, Polish, Hungarian, and Russian Jews. There were, to be sure, many prominent old Sephardic and Americanized Jewish Confederates from South Carolina and Virginia, but the typical "Hebrew" or "Israelite" soldiers, as they then called themselves, were German-speaking immigrants from Louisiana, a state that was home to approximately one-third of all Jews in the South in 1861. There were also large communities of these immigrants in Memphis, Nashville, Mobile, and Shreveport, as well as scattered communities in Arkansas and Mississippi. But Louisiana was a phenomenon. In 1861, Judah P. Benjamin was one of the state's U.S. senators; Henry M. Hyams, his cousin, served as lieutenant governor of Louisiana during the Civil War; and Edwin W. Moise had just retired as Speaker of the Louisiana House to become the Confederate district judge.[1] Here was an unusual—and unknown—moment in American Jewish history. When the war ended, Louisiana sent a former Jewish Confederate soldier, Benjamin Franklin Jonas of Fenner's Battery, to the U.S. Senate to lead its fight against Reconstruction. He was the first practicing Jew in the Senate, yet no historian had ever written about him.

The Jews of the South were committed to the cause of Southern independence because they were committed to their homeland, their new fatherland. The immigrants from Bavaria, Prussia, and Central Europe, struck by the freedom they now enjoyed, repaid that gift with patriotic fervor. While Gratz Cohen of Savannah bemoaned prejudice against the Jews in the South in 1864—"intolerance & prejudice cast their baneful seed throughout the land," he wrote his father—Cohen did not hesitate to give to the Confederacy, in Rabbi Bertram Korn's poignant words, "the greatest service in his power to offer—his life."[2] It will surprise many to know that, although there was anti-Semitism in the South, there was little anti-Semitism in the armies of Robert E. Lee and Joseph E. Johnston, or in Jefferson Davis's executive offices—while Ulysses S. Grant and William Tecumseh Sherman issued blatantly anti-Jewish orders and proclamations. Although there were anti-Jewish outbursts in the South during the war, the Confederate South was, contrary to popular belief, the exact opposite of the image of the Old South held by most contemporary Americans.

Until recent years, the Jewish Confederates' story has not been told for a variety of reasons. After the war, the South was devastated and the small Jewish population failed to adequately write its own history. More importantly, Jewish historians have focused on the "bigger" issues in American history—immigration, anti-Semitism, political and economic success, and the large centers of Jewish population, primarily in New York and the Northeast. Political correctness is also a culprit. Typical is this statement by Lawrence Fuchs: Jews have been "Tories, Confederates, and Know-Nothings as well as Socialists, Progressives and liberal Democrats," as if being a Confederate equated to disloyalty in the American Revolution and being a radical nativist in the 1850s.[3] Nathaniel Weyl summarized the point quite colorfully in The Jew in American Politics: "The prominent role of Jews in the Confederacy is generally either ignored or condensed into shamefaced footnotes by those historians of American Jewry whose opinions conform to the liberal-leftist stereotype. While these writers are happy to expatiate on the deeds of comparatively insignificant Jewish Socialists and needle trade organizers, the most pertinent thing they have to say about Judah P. Benjamin is that he did not believe in the tenets of Judaism. By this criterion, Benedict Spinoza, Karl Marx, Sigmund Freud and Albert Einstein would also have to be denied inclusion in the ranks of Jewry."[4]

I have tried to bring this lost Southern Jewish world back to life, to reintroduce old names and families to today's readers, and to do so without apologies. This is not without its difficulties. Modern-day Jews are very uncomfortable with the notion that antebellum Southern Jews owned slaves and that a few were in the business of slave trading. After all, Jews are unique among people in telling the story of their own enslavement.[5] Tony Horwitz writes of Charleston in Confederates in the Attic that the "image of Southern Jewish foot soldiers discomfitted me. I thought of my draft-dodging great-grandfather and of the Passover service, with its leitmotif of liberation from slavery in Egypt. Yet here were young Jews—a rabbi's son, even, who had perhaps recited the four questions at his family's Seder—going off to fight and die in defense of the South and its Pharaonic institution."[6] Of course, given the horror of slavery and the terrible damage and injustice it inflicted on millions of innocent people, Jewish Americans are understandably ill at ease at the mention of "Israelites with Egyptian principles," as Sen. Benjamin Wade once described Judah P. Benjamin.

Few Jewish Confederate soldiers owned slaves. Indeed, the great majority of Jewish soldiers were relatively poor clerks, peddlers, artisans, tailors, shopkeepers, and petty merchants who not only never owned a slave but had no realistic hope or ambition to do so. Being from the German states, some likely opposed slavery in private, although it cannot be said that Southern Jews were any different from their neighbors in matters of race and slavery. And while clearly the Civil War was brought about by the controversy over slavery, Confederate soldiers did not necessarily fight for slavery.

Jewish soldiers, as we shall see, fought for the South for many reasons, but the chief reason was to do their duty as they saw it.[7] It was a cardinal belief of anti-Semites and others in the nineteenth century that "the Wandering Jew" was a citizen of no country, that they were cowards and they were disloyal. This had been a staple of Judeophobia in Europe since the Middle Ages. Thus, like African American soldiers who fought for the Union army to prove they were men and equals, many a Jewish soldier enlisted to prove he was a man and a worthy citizen. Fighting for the Confederacy did not equate to fighting for slavery. Many who opposed secession and had misgivings about slavery fought for the South, Robert E. Lee being the foremost example. "You are all now going to the devil," one South Carolina unionist said, "and I will go with you. Honor and patriotism require me to stand by my state, right or wrong."[8]

The purpose of this book is to describe the Jewish Confederates in the context of their time and to give the reader a picture of them, warts and all. They neither need, nor would they want, a defense from a historian writing more than 130 years after an event and a cause to which they so willingly gave their energy, their property, and their lives.

Because, as Hasia Diner wrote, it is fashionable today to make a "public statement of the baggage one brings to a project," I confess to being a native third-generation Southerner whose grandparents were all immigrants or the children of immigrants. I have no Confederate ancestors. As a Southerner, however, I feel a kinship to the Southern Jews of the 1860s. It is hard to sit at Beth Elohim in Charleston and not feel a connection with the congregation's past members. And, because the South has been so deeply misunderstood, especially in relation to its Jewish citizens, I feel obliged to try to correct this misperception. Near the end of his life, Robert E. Lee told a visitor, “Doctor, I think some of you gentlemen that use the pen should see that justice is done us.”[9]

In 1820 James Madison wrote Dr. Jacob De La Motta of Savannah to thank him for the doctor’s speech at the dedication of Mikva Israel. “The history of the Jews,” Madison wrote, “must for ever be interesting. The modern part of it is at the same time so little generally known, that every ray of light on the subject has its value.”[10] This one ray of light will hopefully illuminate and allow us to glimpse again the Jewish Confederates.

THERE ARE SIX PEOPLE WITHOUT whose help this book could not have been written. First and foremost is my wife, Susan, who, like Robert E. Lee, persevered when others would have surrendered. She has cajoled, argued, typed, and helped me in every way possible. I have been extremely fortunate in having had the generous assistance of two experts on Jews in the Civil War: Mel Young of Chattanooga, Tennessee, and Robert Marcus of Springfield, Virginia. I called Mel out of the blue eight years ago, and he pledged his help, saying in Hebrew, "La dor, Va dor" ("from generation to generation"). Bob Marcus has been equally generous and kind, sharing his extensive collection of photographs, research, and knowledge with me and correcting my many errors. Not being a military historian, I could not have deciphered the military records without the expertise and intellectual curiosity of Lt. Col. James A. Gabel, U.S. Air Force (Ret.). Without his meticulous attention to detail, dedication to accuracy, and hard work, I would have fallen into even more errors. Dr. Belinda Gergel of Columbia College was my personal historical tutor. Claudia Kelley, my administrative assistant, has gone far, far above and beyond the call of duty. Without her time, patience, hard work, and generosity, this book would not have been finished.

Andrea Mëhrlander of Berlin was of inestimable help in giving me perspective and technical assistance on German immigrants, as well as encouragement from a brilliant historian. My editor, Alex Moore, of the University of South Carolina Press, pulled this overloaded literary cart out of the ditch, and Barbara A. Brannon gave it a final push. Dr. Moore's sympathetic and tactful suggestions have been critical. Solomon Breibart, my high school history teacher, has not only used his red pencil on my work, but has given me something more important—the encouragement of a respected mentor. Mark Greenberg of the Museum of the Southern Jewish Experience read the manuscript and offered expert advice. Tim Belshaw made the maps. A special thanks to my publisher, Catherine Fry, who always believed fervently in this project when I doubted it and held onto that belief for five long years.

Numerous people have helped me in my research. Cathy Kahn was a most hospitable host in New Orleans and shared her vast knowledge of Louisiana Jewry; her family photographs and documents; Cecile Levin, her cousin; and Fred Kahn, her knowledgeable husband. Eric Brock was extremely generous with his excellent work on the Jewish community of Shreveport as well as his personal photograph collection. Herbert Heltzer of Richmond opened many doors for me in Richmond, to important archives as well as good restaurants. Dale Rosengarten of the College of Charleston has been a helpful and patient colleague. Richard Gergel of Columbia has been a friend as well as a constant advisor and excellent listener.

I particularly want to thank the American Jewish Archives in Cincinnati. This book would not have been possible without the AJA. Kathy Spray and the entire staff has responded efficiently to my numerous and, at times, amateurish requests. The AJA is a precious resource for American Jewish history and deserves the support of all who care about American history.

I was fortunate over the years to have had the assistance of hardworking and intelligent research assistants, especially Karen Reilly, Jennifer Cohen, Suzanne Krebsbach, and Ben Steele. My lifelong friend, Michael Levkoff, patiently took numerous photographs of historical sites in Charleston and Savannah while listening to my many complaints.

I also wish to express my gratitude to the following for their assistance, advice, counsel and material: Elliott Ashkenazi of Washington, D.C., who shared his wisdom, his time, and his files; Tony Horwitz (who told me “a book is never finished; it is abandoned”); Moise Steeg, Esq., of New Orleans; Sandy and Chuck Marcus, Tom Houck, Beryl Weiner, Esq., and Jacob Haas of Atlanta; Kay Kole and Harriet Meyerhoff of Savannah; Nancy Greenberg and Rabbi Arnold Task of Alexandria, Louisiana; Michael D. Robbins, Esq., of San Antonio, Texas; Mary Ann F. Plaut of El Paso, Texas; Juliet George of Dallas, Texas, for sharing her outstanding thesis; Jack Steinberg of Augusta, Georgia, for his history of Children of Israel; Tom Brooks of Ontario, Canada (for the Max Neugas material); Stephen Paulovitch; Lynn M. Berkowitz; Rachel Hamovitz; Andrew Felber; Van Hart of Montgomery and Carol Hart, Esq., of New Orleans; Robert I. Zeitz of Mobile; the Felsenthal family of Tennessee; Ken Libo and Eli Evans of New York; and Barbara Stender, Bob Schindler, Carolyn Rivers, Leah Chase, and Elizabeth Moses of Charleston, South Carolina. Many, many others have kindly sent me family records and photographs, and I have acknowledged their kindness and generosity in endnotes and illustration credits. Without the help of the descendants of Jewish Confederates and local historians of the Southern Jewish experience, the story of Jewish Confederates could not be told.

I have had the pleasure of working at many archives, libraries, historical societies, and museums. The staff of the Charleston County Library has been both efficient and courteous. I wish to thank Shannon Glasheen, Claudia Kheel-Cost, and Katherine Page of the Louisiana State Museum in New Orleans; Wilbur Menerary and the staff of the Special Collections Department at Tulane University; the efficient staff of the Williams Research Center of the Historic New Orleans Collection; the staff at the Georgia Historical Society in Savannah; Sandra Berman and the Atlanta Jewish Federation

Archives; Shirley Berkowitz and Lynn Kelsey of the Beth Ahabah Archive in Richmond; John Coski and Terri Hudgins of the Museum of the Confederacy; Miriam K. Syler of the Cob Memorial Archives, Valley, Alabama; the staffs of the Library of Virginia, the Virginia Historical Society, the South Carolina Historical Society (especially Pat Hash), and the Library Society of Charleston; and the American Jewish Historical Society.

I particularly want to thank Jennifer Gregory Priest, the splendid archivist at Ohef Sholom in Norfolk.

I never met Rabbi Bertram Korn or Dr. Jacob Rader Marcus, but I wish to acknowledge their pioneering works in this field. Rabbi Korn had planned to write the history of Southern Jewry. “If God spares me,” he wrote in The Early Jews of New Orleans, “I still hope to move on to an evaluation of the nature of Jewish life in the South prior to the outbreak of the Civil War.” God did not spare him. He died too young at age sixty-one. All students of American Jewish history owe both of these “teachers in Israel” a great debt.

Edward McCrady, a Charleston lawyer, wrote in his introduction to his magisterial The History of South Carolina (1897) that his study had been made “amidst the engagements of a busy professional life, in hours snatched from that jealous mistress—the law.” My fellow shareholders, associates, paralegals, and staff at Rosen, Goodstein & Hagood know firsthand what Mr. McCrady meant, and I deeply appreciate their support.

No one can write a book without imposing upon his family, friends, and associates. My gratitude to my daughters, Annie and Ali, who have lived with Jewish Confederates for eight years; and to my son, Will, who was born after the search for Jewish Confederates began, thereby making this, for him, a lifelong project; to my ever-supportive father, Morris Rosen; Betty Palmer; Richard, my brother, and Marianne Rosen; Debra Rosen, my sister; my mother-in-law, Joyce Ann Corner (for the best writer’s retreat in the world, Bald Peak Colony Club); and my in-laws, Alison and Bob Adkins and Sue and Buzz Corner, for putting up with all this. I also wish to thank Dutch and Mortie Cohen; Marvin and Julie Cohen; Carolyn Cohen and Alan Dershowitz; Alan Rosen; Franklin and Dottie Ashley; Steve and Harriett Steinert; Diane and Arnold Goodstein; Dr. Charles Peery; Senator Ernest L. Passailaigue; James Quackenbush, Esq.; Marty Perlmutter; Zoe and Alexander M. Sanders; Peter Fuge; Barbara Rice; Donald B. Clark; Sabrina R. Grogan; Alexandra D. Varner; Lisa D. Magnan; Marcia F. Jones; and Barbara M. Dear for being good listeners; and Dottie Frank, a world-class author.

I am extremely grateful to the many descendants of Jewish Confederates and their families for allowing me to utilize their records and family photographs. I am indebted to Alice Dale Cohan of New York for the Solomon photographs; Anne Jennings of Charleston for the Moses photograph; Max and Marcelle Furchgott; Eric Brock of Shreveport; Julian Hennig Jr. of Columbia for the Kohn photographs; Caroline L. Triest and Larry W. Freudenberg of Charleston; as well as Jane Meyerson, Gloria Felsenthal, and Betty Santandrea; Joan and Thomas Gandy of Natchez; Mrs. P. A. Silverstein; and last, but hardly least, Robert A. Moses of Sumter.

Our Sons Will Defend This Land

To every thing there is a season and a time to every purpose under the heaven: … A time to love, and a time to hate; a time of war, and a time of peace.

Eccelsiastes 3:1–8

ON MARCH 19, 1841, one of the oldest Jewish congregations in the United States, Kahal Kadosh Beth Elohim (Holy Congregation House of God) in Charleston, invited the entire community to the consecration of its new synagogue on Hasell Street. Constructed so that worshipers faced Jerusalem, the handsome neoclassical building, the first in the city to be constructed in the form of a Greek Doric temple, overflowed with Charlestonians of many faiths. "The public spirit of the Israelites of our city," the Courier wrote, "is worthy of the highest praise in rearing a temple of such classical mode." It was likely the most imposing synagogue building in America. The trustees, six of the oldest congregants, the parnass (president), and rabbi carried the sacred Torah (scrolls containing the Five Books of Moses) from the tabernacle next door to the new building. The ancient shofar (ram's horn) was sounded four times. The rabbi, Gustavus Poznanski, spoke for generations of Jewish Charlestonians when he exclaimed that "this synagogue is our temple, this city our Jerusalem, this happy land our Palestine, and as our fathers defended with their lives that temple, that city and that land, so will their sons defend this temple, this city, and this land."[1]

Twenty years later, on April 12, 1861, the Civil War began in Charleston harbor. Charleston Jewry, proud of their history and patriotism dating from the Revolution, rallied to the cause. Lt. Jacob Valentine commanded one of the chief artillery batteries in the bombardment of Fort Sumter. After the fort surrendered, Moses Cohen Mordecai's steamship, the Isabel, named for Mrs. Mordecai, transported Maj. Robert Anderson and his garrison to the waiting federal fleet. The Jews of Charleston enlisted in various units, and Rabbi Poznanski's son, Gustavus Jr., joined the Sumter Guard of the Charleston Battalion.[2]

Eight days after the bombardment of Fort Sumter and 275 miles away in Columbus, Georgia, a nineteen-year-old boy named Albert Luria sat with his family around the breakfast table when a message came that his company was to leave for Norfolk, Virginia, in two hours. Albert buttoned up his Confederate uniform, packed his trunk, and said his good-byes. He set out for town and stopped at his cousins' house, where he bid them an affectionate farewell.

Albert joined his company, the Columbus City Light Guards, Company A, 2d Georgia Infantry Battalion, and marched to the depot, where, amidst the crowd, were young Albert's family. His aunts, uncles, and cousins had walked to Columbus to send young Albert off to fight, although they were all prosperous planters accustomed to riding horseback or in carriages. It was Saturday, and, after all, the family members were Orthodox Jews. "I did not anticipate seeing them," the young soldier wrote in his journal, "for as it was Saturday I knew they could not ride & hardly expected they would pay me the compliment of walking in."[3]

Lt. Albert Luria. Luria served in the City Light Guards of Columbus, Georgia. He later was commissioned as a second lieutenant, Company I, 13th North Carolina Volunteers/23d North Carolina State Troops. In this photograph, he is seventeen years old and at military school in North Carolina. (Courtesy of Raphael J. Moses of Boulder, Colorado.)

His parents, Eliza and Raphael J. Moses, were born and raised in observant Jewish homes in Charleston and descended from a long line of Jewish Southerners. Raphael Moses was so proud of his Sephardic ancestry that, not wanting his old family names to die out, he named one son, Albert, "Luria" and another son, Israel, "Nunez" to carry on those old Sephardic names. A successful lawyer and planter in Columbus, Moses also volunteered for the Confederate army and achieved the rank of major as Gen. James Longstreet's chief of commissary. In addition to Albert Luria, two other sons of Raphael J. Moses served in the Confederate armed forces.

Albert Luria saw action with his company on May 19, 1861, at Sewell's Point, near Norfolk, Virginia. There, he picked up a live bombshell that had been lobbed into the Confederate fort by a Union gunboat in Hampton Roads, and he threw it over the works before it could explode. He saved the lives of many men but refused a promotion. Had he been a British soldier, his regimental history stated, his heroic act "would have brought him the Victoria Cross and caused the world to ring his name."[4] He may have given thanks to God at synagogue B'nai Jaacov in Norfolk.

Albert's thirteen-year-old cousin Eliza, nicknamed "Lize," wrote in her journal in July 1861, "now he expects to go to Manassas junction, where he has longed to be ever since he left it. Why?—because it is the most dangerous place. He is now among all his friends that are left from that large battle…. If his precious life could be insured I would be sorry that he had not an opportunity to distinguish himself again; but everything happens for the best." On May 27, 1861, Albert had asked another cousin, Julia, to remember him to Lize and to thank her for her assistance in communicating his romantic feelings toward her, "even though I should never return to thank you in person."[5]

On May 31, 1862, Albert Luria, now a second lieutenant in the 23d North Carolina, was severely wounded as he led his men over the enemies' works at the Battle of Seven Pines in the Peninsular Campaign. Major Moses, his father, was stationed in Richmond and set out to find his son. Moses went to the hospital where the ambulance had carried Albert. He saw a group of ladies standing by a cot and heard one of them say: "What a handsome young man!" Major Moses recalled in his memoir: "I crossed over to the cot, and my shock was beyond my power of expression when I saw my son Albert lying unconscious with a wound to his head." His father took him to a relative's home, where he died. And thus, his father later wrote, "passed away a bright, promising youth of nineteen."[6]

Mary Chesnut, the wife of South Carolina Sen. James Chesnut, knew the Moses family well. She wrote in her famous diary:

> Miriam's Luria—and the coincidence of his life. Luria (born Moses) and the hero of the bombshell. His mother was at a hotel in Charleston. Kind hearted Anna DeLeon Moses went for her sister-in-law, gave up her own chamber to her, that her child might be born in the comfort and privacy of a home. Only our people [that is, Southerners] are given to such excessive hospitality. So little Luria was born in Anna DeLeon's chamber. After Chickahominy, when this man was mortally wounded—again Anna, who is now living in Richmond, found him, and again she brought him home—her house being crowded to the doorsteps. Again she gave up her chambers to him—and as he was born in her room, so he died.[7]

Albert Luria was buried at his family's plantation, The Esquiline, in Columbus. His cousin Eliza, the young girl Albert left behind, found comfort in her ancient faith: "God, who knows and does all things for the best, has seen fit to deprive me of my greatest treasure, so I must bow in submission to his will…. God knows he did his duty to his country, and he died as he said he wanted to die—on the field of battle."[8]

Gustavus Poznanski Jr.'s tomb at the Coming Street Cemetery, Charleston. (Author's collection. Photograph by Michael Levkoff.)

Albert Luria's story was repeated many times during the war. On June 21, 1862, three Jewish boys were killed at the Battle of Secessionville on James Island defending Charleston. They were Pvt. Robert Cohen, Cpl. Isaac D. Valentine, and the former rabbi's son Pvt. Gustavus Poznanski Jr. "Thus has fallen," the Charleston Mercury said of young Poznanski, "a gallant youth, of singular promise." The Charleston Daily Courier wrote, "No one more willingly gave a life to free the soil from the invader."[9] Like Albert Luria, Gustavus Poznanski was "a bright, promising youth of nineteen." And, like Albert Luria, Gustavus Poznanski Jr. died defending his temple, his city, and his land, just as his father said he would from the pulpit of Kahal Kadosh Beth Elohim on Hasell Street twenty-one years before.

FREEDOM AND EQUALITY IN THE OLD SOUTH

In a free and independent country like America, where civil and religious freedom go hand in hand, where no distinctions exist between the clergy of different denominations, where we are incorporated and known in law; freely tolerated; where in short we enjoy all the blessings of freedom in common with our fellow citizens, you may readily conceive we pride ourselves under the happy situation which makes us feel we are men, susceptible of that dignity which belongs to human nature, by participating in all the rights and blessings of this happy country.

Letter of Beth Elohim to London’s Sephardic community (1806), quoted in Faber, The Jewish People in America

The Free Air of Dixie

FROM ABRAHAM LINCOLN'S ELECTION as president of the United States in November 1860, through the secession winter of 1860, to the bombardment of Fort Sumter in April 1861, Jewish Southerners from Virginia to Texas weighed their devotion to the Union and to their states. "A storm, vast and terrible, is impending," Rabbi James K. Gutheim of New Orleans told his congregation.[1] Some were the sons and daughters—indeed, the grandsons and the granddaughters—of Southerners born and bred in Dixie. Some were slaveholders. A very few were planters. Some were descended from Sephardic Jews whose ancestors had been expelled from Spain and Portugal in the year Columbus set sail for the Orient.

Most Jewish Southerners, however, were Ashkenazi immigrants who in the 1840s and 1850s had fled Bavaria, Prussia, Alsace, Hesse, Baden, Swabia, Westphalia, Hungary, Poznan (Posen), and Silesia in Prussian Poland and Russian Poland to America, the fabled land of freedom.[2] "There is," one Hessian Jew wrote his brother in America, "only one land of liberty, which is ruled according to natural, reasonable laws, and that is the Union."[3] Rabbi Gutheim, himself an immigrant, reminded his congregation in a Thanksgiving sermon in 1860 that in the Old Country, the Jewish people endured "a life of tribulation and misery." But now, in America, the blessings of Providence "have been showered upon us."[4] They were peddlers and clerks, shopkeepers and saloon keepers, businessmen, liquor dealers, tobacco merchants, watchmakers, tanners, tailors, bakers, auctioneers, innkeepers, music teachers, grocers, and apothecaries. Thousands were young men who had fled their German fatherlands to avoid serving a tyrannical government in brutal, anti-Semitic armies. "Whatever you and many others may say about America," teacher Charles Mailert wrote, "you do not know European slavery, German oppression, and Hessian taxes."[5] Ludwig Börne exclaimed: "[B]ecause I was born a bondsman, I therefore love liberty more than you. Yes, because I have known slavery, I understand freedom more than you. Yes, because I was born without a fatherland my desire for a fatherland is more passionate than yours."[6]

Now they had to choose, the Sephardic grandee and the German peddler; the shipping tycoon Moses Cohen Mordecai, who lived in a great mansion south of Broad Street in Charleston and had served as parnass of Beth Elohim, and Henry Gintzberger, the immigrant peddler who had arrived penniless in Salem, Virginia, in 1860. They had chosen freedom over tyranny and now they had to choose between two versions of freedom—one Union and one Confederate.[7]

Judah P. Benjamin in 1860. (Battles and Leaders of the Civil War.)

On December 31, 1860, the senior senator from Louisiana rose in the Senate Chamber to defend the right of the Southern states to secede from the Union. It was the Christmas season, and the Senate galleries were thronged with a crowd in high spirits. The senator wore a simple black suit. A pocket watch with a long chain hung across his vest. He was a short portly man with black curly hair and black eyes. He was an affable and cosmopolitan man, a popular senator, a dapper dresser, an inveterate gambler whose unusual voice was "silvery [and] sweet and beautifully modulated." He privately felt that secession would be a disaster, but in a few months he would become the Confederacy's lawyer. Over the course of the war, he would become its spymaster.

He spoke for more than an hour. His voice, Mrs. Jefferson Davis recalled in later years, "rose over the vast audience distinct and clear … he held his audience spellbound … so still were they that a whisper could have been heard." He reminded his colleagues that incessant attacks upon "the feelings and sensibilities of a high-spirited people by the most insulting language and the most offensive epithets" would lead to secession. He ridiculed Republican suggestions of coercion without war.

As he reached the end of his remarks, one hand was in his pocket, the other toying with his watch chain. "And now, senators," he said softly, "within a few weeks we part to meet as senators in one common council chamber of the nation no more forever. We desire, we beseech you, let this parting be in peace…. What may be the fate of this horrible contest, no man can tell, none pretend to foresee; but this much I will say: the fortunes of war may be adverse to our arms; you may carry desolation into our peaceful land, and with torch and fire you may set our cities in flames … you may, under the protection of your advancing armies, give shelter to the furious fanatics who desire, and profess to desire, nothing more than to add all the horrors of a servile insurrection to the calamities of civil war; you may do all this,—and more, too, if more there be—but you never can subjugate us."

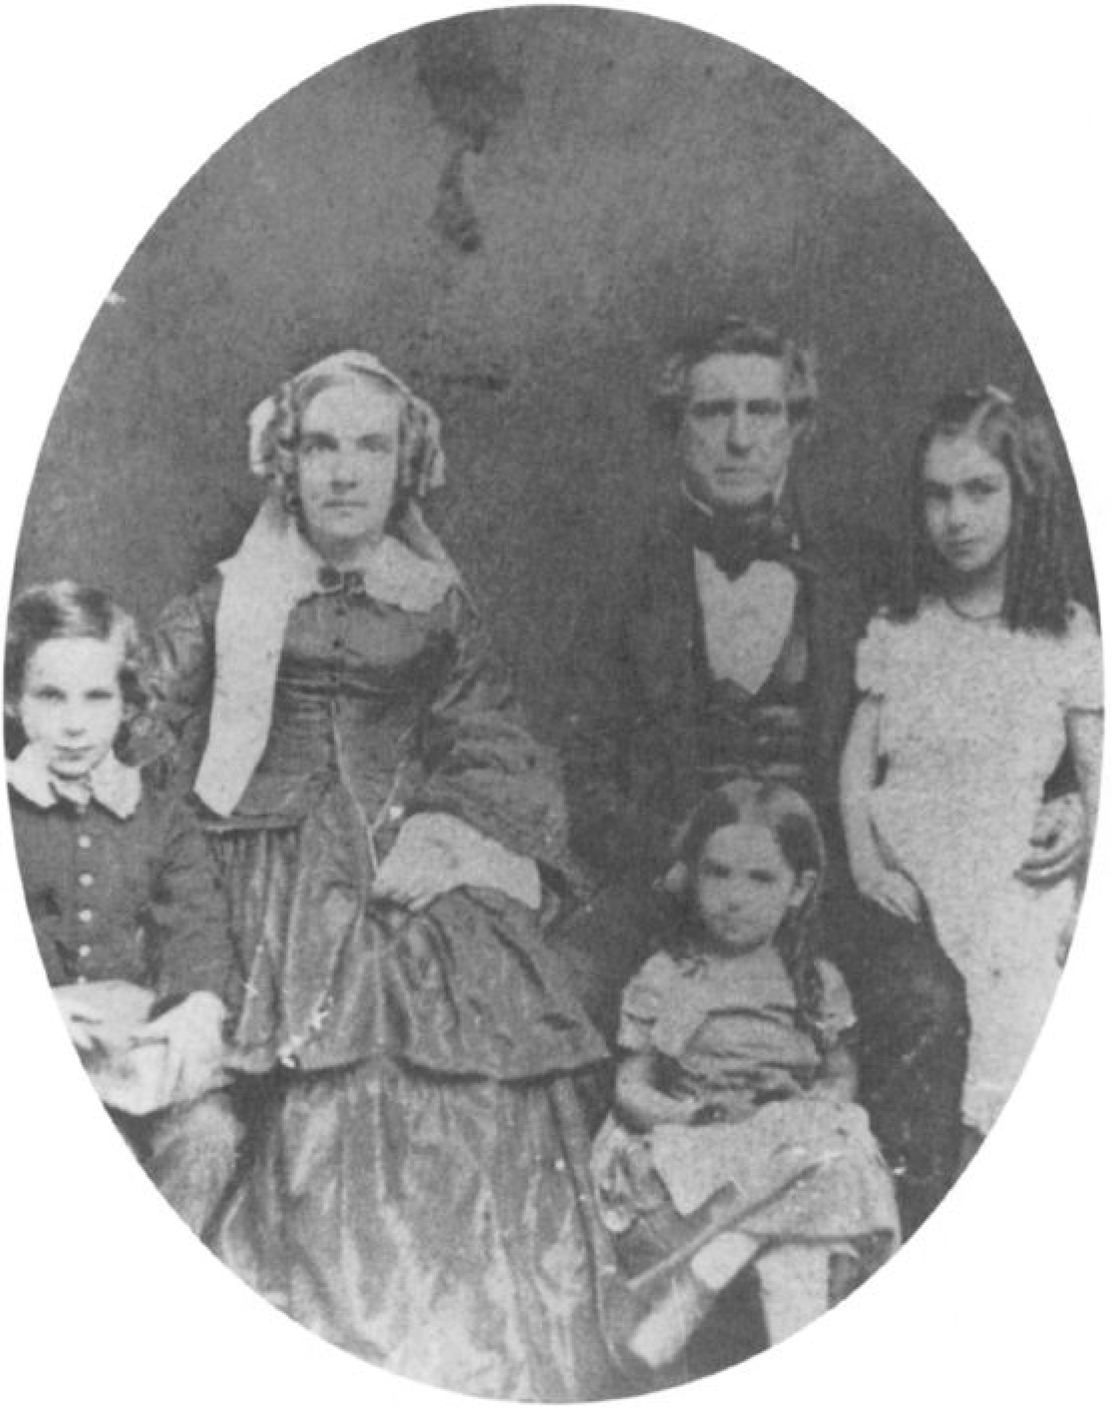
Here, the senator released his grasp of his watch chain, as if the chains which held the South to the Union were now severed. He put his other hand in his pocket, and as he turned to take his seat, he added, "An enslaved and servile race you can never make of us—never! never!"[8] The whole gallery burst into uncontrollable applause so loud that the presiding officer, Sen. James M. Mason, attempted to clear the galleries. But the crowd was wild with enthusiasm.

It was one of the most dramatic moments in the history of the U.S. Senate. The senator was Judah P. Benjamin, the brilliant lawyer from New Orleans and the first senator of acknowledged Jewish descent in American history. Benjamin was a Southerner who lived by the Southern code of honor. In 1858, he clashed with Mississippi Sen. Jefferson Davis on the floor of the Senate. Davis declared in a stage whisper that he had “no idea that he was to be met with the arguments of a paid attorney in the Senate chamber.” Benjamin challenged Davis to a duel without asking for a withdrawal or explanation. To his credit, Davis apologized publicly the next day.[9]

On December 31, 1860, Judah Benjamin was at the height of a remarkable career. He was married to a beautiful Louisiana Creole lady. He possessed great wealth, a successful legal practice, and the admiration of the people of Louisiana and the South. He had even declined a seat on the U.S. Supreme Court. He was now about to give up everything he held dear, including the company of his beloved sisters, nieces, and nephews, to support the South, to become the Confederacy’s lawyer and counselor, the friend and ally of Jefferson Davis, and ultimately, to become the chief of espionage operations. Judah Benjamin made his choice.

On January 5, 1861, after South Carolina had seceded, eleven influential Southern senators, including Jefferson Davis, met in Washington. Two of them, Judah Benjamin and David Levy Yulee of Florida, were Southerners of Jewish origin. Most of them had long resisted secession, but now they had all made the fateful choice. They prepared resolutions calling for the secession of the Southern states and a convention in Montgomery, Alabama, in February to create a new government.

Judah Benjamin soon left Washington for New Orleans. He made arrangements to leave his family, his friends, his law practice, and all of his business interests. He made his last public address in New Orleans on February 22 and left for Montgomery. He would never return or see his brothers or sisters again. On February 25 he was unanimously confirmed as attorney general of the Confederacy. David Yulee stayed in Washington hoping to save the Union but also to gather information on the military situation in Florida in the event of secession. He arrived in Fernandina in early February and reported to Jefferson Davis, whom he had known for years. “Everywhere along the route I found among all classes a warm response to [your election which] has quieted concern and raised the popular heart in hopefulness. I doubt if Washington in his day had more entire hold upon public confidence.”[10] A few weeks later he wrote Davis: “I hope you will not have occasion to take the field, but if there is a war … you have the example of Napoleon before you.”[11]



The Solomon Cohen family of Savannah in 1851. Young Gratz Cohen is on the left. (From the collection of Louis Schmier, Valdosta, Georgia.)

Abraham Charles Myers, the great-grandson of Moses Cohen, the first rabbi of Charleston, a career soldier, and a graduate of West Point, surrendered the Federal supply depot in New Orleans to the Louisiana authorities and resigned his hard-earned commission the same day. “South Carolina, the State where I was born,” his letter read, “and Louisiana, the State of my adoption, having in convention passed ordinances of secession from the United States, I am absolved from my allegiance to the Federal government."[12]

"Now we of the South," Solomon Cohen of Savannah wrote his aunt in Philadelphia, "seeing that public opinion, the law of the land in the North, is against all that we hold valuable … and that the government is about to pass into the hands of those who hate us and our institutions, feel that prudence and self-defense demand that we should protect ourselves." Samuel Yates Levy, also from Savannah, joined the City Light Guard and was stationed on Tybee Island. His nephew, seventeen-year-old Octavus Cohen, volunteered for the Savannah Artillery. Isaac Hermann, a French immigrant, had arrived at Castle Garden in New York in 1859 and settled in Sandersville, Georgia. He joined the Washington Rifles, 1st (Ramsey's) Georgia Infantry in June.[13]

Young Jewish Southerners flocked to the Confederate banner. Haiman Kaminski, from Posen, and Solomon Emanuel, also an immigrant, both now living in Georgetown, South Carolina, joined Company A, 10th South Carolina.[14] In May, Adolph Proskauer, the son of a Prussian immigrant from Breslau, enlisted in Capt. Augustus Stikes's company, the Independent Rifles of Mobile, Alabama, which became Company C, 12th Alabama. He was appointed first corporal. A Polish immigrant to Texas, Herschell Kempner (now called Harris Kempner), joined the Ellis County Blues, a local militia unit that eventually became Company H of William H. Parsons's 12th Texas Cavalry. Lewis Leon, a recent immigrant from Germany, left his parents' home on Norfolk Street on the lower east side of New York City in 1858 at the age of seventeen. He settled in Charlotte, North Carolina, and when the war came he enlisted in the Charlotte Grays, 1st North Carolina Volunteers. Eugene Henry Levy of New Orleans enlisted as a private in Dreux's Battery. Two of his brothers, Joseph Calhoun and Julian, also volunteered.[14]

When the Richmond Light Infantry Blues left the capital of Virginia for battle in April 1861, fifteen of its ninety-nine members were Jews, including Ezekiel ("Zeke") J. Levy, its fourth sergeant. There was a Jewish contingent in the Richmond Grays. Myer Angle, the president of Beth Ahabah, the German synagogue, eventually had six sons in the Confederate army. Recent German Jewish immigrants from all over Virginia enlisted: Max Guggenheimer Jr. of Lynchburg, a native of Hurben, Bavaria, in the 11th Virginia; Aaron and Isadore Reinach of Petersburg in the 12th Virginia; and Leopold and Sampson Levy, natives of Altenstadt, Bavaria, in the 1st Virginia Cavalry. Fellow Bavarian Emanuel Gerst of Halifax County joined the 6th Virginia Cavalry.[15]

Thus, overwhelmingly, almost unanimously, some with fear and trepidation, others with courage and enthusiasm, some with reservations, others with a firm unflinching resolve, Southern Jewry cast its lot with the Confederate States of America. Many, like "Ike" Hermann, had found the land of Canaan. Others, like Gustavus Poznanski, had found their Jerusalem, their Palestine. Still others, like Marcus Baum, Jacob Samuels, Adolph Proskauer, and Herschell Kempner, had finally found their fatherland.

When in March 1865 Eugenia Levy Phillips's brother, Capt. Samuel Yates Levy, wrote his father from Johnson's Island, a Union prisoner of war camp, he spoke from his heart: "I long to breathe the free air of Dixie."[16]

Southern Jews had been breathing the free air of Dixie for two hundred years. No one knows who the first Southern Jews were. Elias Legardo has been said to be America's first known Jew, arriving in Virginia on the Abigail in 1621. The first confirmed documentation of a Jew living in Carolina was in 1695. John Locke's Fundamental Constitution of Carolina granted freedom of religion to "Ye Heathens, Jues [sic] and other Disenters." It was the first constitution in history to guarantee religious freedom to Jews. South Carolina was, according to Leonard Dinnerstein, the colony "most hospitable to Jews." It was little wonder, then, that the persecuted Jew, like the persecuted Huguenot and German Palatine, emigrated to South Carolina "to find a haven of rest."[17] When the planter Francis Salvador, an immigrant from England, was elected to the provincial Congresses of South Carolina between 1773 and 1776, he became the first Jew in modern history anywhere in the world to be elected to a popular assembly.[18]

The small Jewish community of Charles Town grew rapidly. Beth Elohim was founded in 1749. By 1820, there were 700 Jews in Charleston and 550 in New York City. In 1820 South Carolina boasted the largest Jewish population in the United States, and Charleston was the foremost Jewish community in the nation.[19] London Jewry sent a group of Jews to Georgia aboard the William and Sarah, which arrived in Savannah on July 11, 1733. In 1735 they founded K. K. Mikve Israel (Holy Congregation Hope of Israel), the third congregation in America, after New York and Newport, Rhode Island. Richmond's Jewish community established K. K. Beth Shalome (House of Peace) in 1789. By the 1820s, the immigrant Jews of Petersburg, Virginia, organized an informal congregation, and in 1858 Rodef Shalom was organized on Sycamore Street. There were Jewish families and merchants in Charlottesville, where David Isaacs sold goods to Thomas Jefferson, including, so the story goes, the ball of twine Mr. Jefferson used to lay out the first building of the University of Virginia.[20] Jacob De La Motta, a physician, spoke for Southern Jewry when he exclaimed at the dedication of Mikve Israel in Savannah in 1820: "On what spot in this habitable Globe does an Israelite enjoy more blessings, more privileges, or is more elevated in the sphere of preferment and more conspicuously dignified in respectable stations?"[21]

In the 1820s, New Orleans Jews organized Shangarai Chased (Gates of Mercy), the city's first synagogue, located in the French Quarter, where many Jews lived and worked. A New Yorker, Jacob de Silva Solis was in New Orleans on business during Passover in 1826 and was unable to buy matzo, the unleavened bread used during the Passover Seder. He determined to remedy the situation and, together with a number of German and French Jews, organized the first congregation.[22]

The Jews of the South lived in a slaveholding society, and they accepted the institution as part of everyday life. Living in cities and towns, those Jews who owned slaves utilized them as domestic servants, as workers in their trades, or they hired them out. "Acceptance of slavery was," Leonard Dinnerstein wrote, "an aspect of southern life common to nearly all its white inhabitants." Indeed, it was common to its free black inhabitants, who owned more slaves by far than Southern Jews. The free blacks of Charleston, for example, owned three times the number of slaves owned by Charleston Jewry.[23] Mark I. Greenberg points out that Jews adopted the Southern way of life, including the code of honor, dueling, slavery, and Southern notions about race and states' rights.[24]

In 1840 three-fourths of all heads of families in Charleston owned at least one slave, and the incidence of slaveholding among Jews likely paralleled that of their neighbors.[25] In Richmond, a few auctioneers sold slaves, and there was one Jewish slave dealer, Abraham Smith. Richmond's rabbis supported slavery. George Jacobs of Richmond hired a slave to work in his home, although he owned no slaves.[26] Reverend Max Michelbacher prayed during the war that God would protect his congregation from slave revolt and that the Union's "wicked" efforts to "beguile [the slaves] from the path of duty that they may waylay their masters, to assassinate and slay the men, women, and children … be frustrated." Reverend Michelbacher believed, together with the Christian clergy, that slavery was divinely ordained. "The man servants and maid servants Thou has given unto us," he prayed during the war, "that we may be merciful to them in righteousness and bear rule over them, the enemy are attempting to seduce … [and] invite … to insurrection. … In this wicked thought, let them be frustrated, and cause them to fall into the pit of destruction."[27]

Shearith Israel (Remnant of Israel) Synagogue, Wentworth Street in Charleston (between Anson and Meeting Streets). The Orthodox members of Beth Elohim seceded to build this synagogue in the 1840s when Beth Elohim installed an organ and liberalized the service. The building was shelled in the Union bombardment. Charleston Jewry could not support Beth Elohim, Shearith Israel, and Berith Shalome after the war. Shearith Israel was closed, and this building was demolished in the twentieth century. (Courtesy of K. K. Beth Elohim Archive, Charleston, South Carolina.)

The 1840s and 1850s brought a sea change to the Jewish population of the United States. Between 1800 and 1860, 100,000 Jewish immigrants arrived from Poland, Central Europe, and the German states such as Prussia and particularly Bavaria, which “stood first in the row of intolerant states,” infamous for “its Pharaoh-like registration laws,” its restriction of trade, marriage, and even the Jew’s right to reside in the place of his choice. Thus, while the Sephardim had been the earliest settlers, by 1860 Southern Jewry was overwhelmingly Ashkenazic, that is, German and Eastern and Central European. Some of these Ashkenazic Jews were “Anglicized,” or “Americanized,” Jews who had intermarried with and adopted the ways of the earlier Sephardim, who were masters of acculturation. These Ashkenazic Jews identified with Sephardic ideals, considered themselves Southerners, and looked upon the new German-Jewish immigrants as foreigners who needed to be taught local customs.[28]

The older established Southern Jewish families—whether Sephardic or Ashkenazic, German, Polish, English, assimilated, Reform, or Orthodox—were not prepared for this wave of German and Ashkenazic immigrants in the 1840s and 1850s. Their attitude toward the newcomers changed as the numbers increased. Some Sephardic families even said a Kaddish (prayer for the dead) when a Sephardi “intermarried” with a German Jewish immigrant. By 1860 there were few Sephardic Jews left in the South, most having intermarried with Gentiles and Ashkenazic Jews. Dr. Malcolm H. Stern concluded that “almost the entire early Sephardic community became completely absorbed by the Ashkenazic.”[29]

When the Civil War began, Southern Jewry was an integral part of the Confederate States of America. Louisiana boasted at least five congregations. New Orleans had the seventh largest Jewish population in the United States (Boston was sixth and Chicago eighth).[30] “In Charleston,” I. J. Benjamin wrote, “Israelites occupy the most distinguished places.” With the addition in 1855 of a Polish and German congregation, Berith Shalome, located in a house on St. Philip Street near Calhoun Street, there were now three synagogues in Charleston, as well as the Hebrew Orphan Society building on Broad Street and dozens of Jewish-owned businesses on King Street. There were sizable Jewish communities in Columbia, Sumter, and Georgetown. In 1846 the Shearith Israel (Remnant of Israel) congregation was formed in Columbia. The DeLeon family, Sephardim from Leon, Spain, lived in Charleston, Camden, and Columbia, and by 1860 had become one of the leading Jewish families of the state. Dr. Mordecai H. DeLeon served as mayor of Columbia and was a close friend of the controversial Dr. Thomas Cooper, president of South Carolina College. DeLeon’s sons, David Camden, Edwin, and Thomas Cooper (named for Dr. Cooper), were all to play a prominent role in the life of the Confederacy.[31]

There were Jewish communities throughout Georgia. In 1861, Mikve Israel was located near Chippewa Square, and Jewish businessmen prospered. There were 2,500 Jews in Savannah, Augusta, Macon, Atlanta, Columbus, and numerous small towns and villages throughout Georgia. Jews had lived in Augusta since 1802, and a large influx of German immigrants arrived in the 1840s. By 1846, B’nai Israel (Children of Israel) was founded when the “scattered Israelites of Augusta, Georgia and Hamburg, South Carolina, desirous of uniting as a band of brothers, with a view of publicly worshiping the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob,” formed a congregation.[32] In 1854 twenty Jewish families in Columbus founded Temple B’nai Israel. In 1859 they bought a house to use as a synagogue.[33]

Eleven German Jews organized Beth Israel (House of Israel) in Macon in 1859. By 1861 members of the congregation were active in the unfolding of events: R. Einstein was a delegate to the state Democratic Party convention, which supported the pro-Southern candidate for president. The Macon German Artillery, consisting of German immigrants, both Christian and Jewish, was ordered into state service in September 1861, and four Binswangers, two Sangers, and an Einstein, a Nordlinger, a Kahn, and other Macon Jews went with their company.[34]

Atlanta, that creation of cotton and the railroad, was a wilderness in 1836. But it grew dramatically after the railroad arrived in the 1840s and 1850s. From 20 families in 1845 it grew to 9,554 in 1860. Its population consisted of native Southern whites and a few immigrants. The first Atlanta Jews came for the same reason non-Jews came: economic opportunity. Jacob Haas and Henry Levi, peddlers from Hessendarmstadt, came in 1845 to open a dry goods store. They soon built one of the town's largest stores. Aaron Alexander, a Sephardi from Charleston, came in 1848 and operated a drugstore at the "Sign of the Negro and the Mortar," where he, like many Jewish merchants, sold medical and dental supplies, paint, window glass, perfume, and wine and liquor. Aaron Alexander's wife, Sarah Moses Alexander, established the first Jewish Sabbath school, which, as Henry Aaron Alexander wrote in 1954, "she conducted in the forest around her home with fallen logs for benches," stressing the Ten Commandments and how and when to say the Shema, then pronounced Shemang ("Hear, O Israel, the Lord our God, the Lord is One").[35]

Georgia Jewry reflected the variety of the Jewish experience in the South. Louis Merz from Durkheim, Bavaria, emigrated in 1853, arrived at Philadelphia, and went to live in LaGrange in westernmost Georgia for a time. A peddler, he eventually settled in the small town of West Point between LaGrange and Columbus when the railroad came to the town. He was a merchant, a quiet, intellectual man who became a part of small-town Georgia life. His sister Betty also came to America and settled in Cincinnati. She later married Herman Heyman, her brother's partner, and moved to West Point. Their brother Daniel also came to West Point, while Merz's parents and one sister remained in Bavaria. Merz was to enlist in the West Point Guards, Company D of the 4th Georgia.[36]

Not far from West Point in Columbus, Georgia, Raphael J. Moses, a fifth-generation Sephardic Jew, lived on his plantation, The Esquiline, named for one of the Roman hills. Moses had worked as a peddler, retail merchant, and a farmer, and eventually became a planter and a lawyer after speculating in land in Florida. One of the first Georgians to successfully grow and market peaches and plums, Moses is credited with shipping the first peaches from the South. His family was completely acculturated into Columbus society while remaining devout Jews. Moses became involved in politics and, being a South Carolinian by heritage and upbringing, was a committed secessionist.[37]

Moses had always been a strong supporter of states' rights. He had favored nullification in the 1830s, was opposed to popular sovereignty in the 1840s, and supported secession in the 1850s. When the war broke out, he had forty-seven slaves. Thus, it was natural that Raphael Moses was in the forefront of secession and war. Like many other Georgians, he and his son, Albert Luria, were in Milledgeville, Georgia, in January 1861 to show the delegates to the secession convention that the people were for it.[38]

Many Richmond Jews likely agreed with Raphael Moses's states' rights position. Richmond's Jewish community had grown so that by 1860 the capital of Virginia was home to three congregations and dozens of thriving Jewish-owned mercantile establishments. There were still a few Sephardic and Anglicized families, but the great majority were Ashkenazic Jews from Bavaria, the Palatinate (western Germany), and the North. Richmond's Jewry could look with pride on its success. In 1861, Beth Shalome, the old Sephardic synagogue, was located on Mayo Street near Franklin. The German Jews had established K. K. Beth Ahabah (House of Love) in 1841 and built a synagogue on Eleventh Street between Marshall and Clay (near the Valentine Museum) in 1848. A Polish congregation, Kenesseth Israel (Congregation of Israel) was established in 1856. As in other Southern communities, Richmond had had a Jewish mayor and Jews were active in civic and military affairs.[39]

The congregation was founded in 1789. In 1860 it was also called the Portuguese Synagogue. This photograph was taken in 1890. The building was demolished in 1935, and Mayo Street itself became a victim of urban growth. The site today is in the middle of a modern government complex. German immigrants also lived in Alexandria, Lynchburg, Harrisonburg, Staunton, Fredericksburg, and Norfolk, Virginia. A small congregation, Beth El, was organized in Alexandria in 1859. Norfolk's early Jewish community was revitalized by the German Jews in the 1840s. Jacob Umstadter, who had been trained as a shochet and hazzan (cantor), helped organize Chevra B'nai Jaacov (Association of the Sons of Jacob, or House of Jacob) in 1848. By 1859 they had built a synagogue on Cumberland Street.[40]

After Richmond and Appomattox, Manassas is the most well-known place-name in Virginia's Civil War history. It was named for a Jew who kept an inn there in the eighteenth century. In the Bible, Manasseh (Menasheh in Hebrew) was the name of Joseph's firstborn son and also one of the twelve tribes of Israel. There was an innkeeper named Manasseh who, according to the Richmond Enquirer in August 1861, was "a caterer for the traveling public, we believe a Jew, who for a long time had his house of entertainment there." The innkeeper was widely known and much esteemed for his good cheer, and many a horseman would travel a little longer "that he might spend the night with ‘Old Manasseh.’ … In short, he was as well known as his gap, and from him the latter caught its name of Manasseh’s Gap.”[41]

On the eve of the Civil War, there were approximately two thousand Jews in the Old Dominion. Most agreed with Edmund Myers, who wrote to his uncle, Sam Mordecai, “I am with [Virginia]—bound to her for the issue be it weal or for woe.”[42]

Native Jewish Southerners and German Jewish immigrants, like their fellow Southerners and Americans, went west during the antebellum period and helped settle Alabama, Mississippi, Tennessee, Louisiana, Arkansas, and Texas, the remaining states of the Confederacy. Many Jews from the German states and Central Europe settled in Mobile in the 1840s and 1850s. The first congregation in Alabama, Sha’arai Shomayim U-Maskil El Dol (Congregation of the Gates of Heaven and Society of the Friends of the Needy) was organized in the early 1840s. A synagogue on Jackson Street was dedicated in 1853. Protestant and Catholic clergy attended. “The synagogue is worthy in all respects the high character of our Jewish brethren for wealth, intelligence and character,” the Mobile Register exclaimed. “How proud must the enfranchised descendants of the patriarchs have felt yesterday who were some time since the slaves and serfs of Russia, Austria and Prussia.” A second synagogue on Jackson Street burned down in 1856, and a new synagogue was built on Jackson Street between St. Louis and St. Michael in 1858. There were congregations in Montgomery and other smaller Alabama towns.[43]

Mayer Lehman arrived in Montgomery, Alabama, at the age of eighteen from the village of Rimpar near Würzburg, Bavaria, in 1850. His older brother Chaim, who changed his name to Henry, had arrived four years earlier and became a peddler. Another brother, Emanuel, came in 1847. The brothers opened a shop on Commerce Street. Eventually, Henry Lehman & Brothers moved to 17 Court Square near the courthouse. As Montgomery and the cotton trade grew, so did the Lehmans' business. Montgomery became the state capital and a center of the booming cotton economy. Warehouses and cotton trading abounded. One traveler noted that the people "buy cotton, sell cotton, think cotton, eat cotton, drink cotton, and dream cotton. They marry cotton wives, and unto them are born cotton children." The Lehmans became cotton dealers as well as grocers, dry goods merchants, and suppliers to the cotton planters. Emanuel traveled to New York and Henry to New Orleans to buy goods and broker cotton. When Henry died of yellow fever in 1856, the two younger brothers, Mayer and Emanuel, carried on the family business.[44]

On the eve of the Civil War, Lehman Brothers was a large and successful cotton brokerage house with offices in New York City. Emanuel moved to New York. Mayer married Babette Newgass of New Orleans, also an immigrant from Würzburg, and they lived in Montgomery. The Lehmans were prominent citizens of Montgomery. Alan Nevins wrote that they lived in a house “roomy enough to permit the clerks in the general store to come in—after a general custom of the time—for meals. This was no great hardship to the young wife, for they had household slaves.” They traveled back and forth to New Orleans on business and for family and social occasions. Mayer Lehman was a typical Alabama merchant. A staunch Democrat, he was well connected in political circles. He was also a practicing Jew in a town with a small but active Jewish community.[45]

In Mississippi and Arkansas, German and Central European Jews settled in small towns and hamlets, opening stores and putting down roots. There were small Jewish communities in Woodville, Natchez, Vicksburg, Fayette, and Jackson. B’nai Israel in Natchez was organized in 1840, although no synagogue was built prior to the war. Typical of Mississippi Jewry, Aaron Beekman emigrated in the 1840s from Forets, Germany, opened a store on Franklin Street in Cotton Square, and helped oversee the Natchez Hebrew School with twenty-five children. Other congregations were also founded in Mississippi prior to the war. Gemiluth Chassed was organized in Port Gibson in 1859, and a congregation gathered upstairs at Bernard Yoste’s Levee Street building in Vicksburg. Congregation Beth Israel built a synagogue in early 1861 in Jackson on South State and South Streets, which was burned by Union troops during the war.[46]

Louisiana in 1860 was a phenomenon in American Jewish history. That keen correspondent for the London Times, William Howard Russell, the author of My Diary North and South, wrote: “It is a strange country, indeed; one of the evils which afflicts the Louisianians, they say, is the preponderance and influence of South Carolinian Jews, and Jews generally, such as [Edwin Warren] Moise, Mordecai, Josephs, and Judah Benjamin, and others. The subtlety and keenness of the Caucasian intellect give men a high place among a people who admire ability and dexterity, and are at the same time reckless of means and averse to labor. The Governor is supposed to be somewhat under the influence of the Hebrews.”[47]

Unfortunately, the city's epidemics made such an institution necessary. The building no longer exists. (Courtesy of the Louisiana State Museum, New Orleans.)

Judah Benjamin was the most famous of these "South Carolinian Jews." Lt. Gov. Henry M. Hyams was Benjamin's cousin, having come to Louisiana with Benjamin from Charleston in 1828. Edwin Warren Moise had served as Speaker of the Louisiana House and was to serve as a Confederate judge. When young Salomon de Rothschild, of the great French Jewish banking family, arrived in New Orleans in 1861, he was amazed at the success of the Jews of Louisiana. "What is astonishing here … is the high position occupied by our coreligionists, or rather by those who were born into the faith and who, having married Christian women, and without converting, have forgotten the practices of their fathers. Benjamin, the attorney general of the Confederate States, is perhaps the greatest mind on this continent. Hyams, the [lieutenant] governor of Louisiana, Moyse … [that is, Edwin W. Moise, the Speaker of the House], etc. And, what is odd, all these men have a Jewish heart and take an interest in me, because I represent the greatest Jewish house in the world."[48]

Estimates of the Jewish population are wholly unreliable, but in 1860 Louisiana was home to at least 8,000 Jews, and likely many more. The total number of Jews in the eleven states of the Confederacy was in the range of 20,000 to 25,000, which means that Louisiana was home to 25 percent to 40 percent of Southern Jewry. New Orleans in 1860, was the South's largest city by far. Its population of 168,675 dwarfed Charleston's (40,522), Richmond's (37,910), Mobile's (29,258), and Savannah's (22,292). Like the growing cities of the North and West, New Orleans beckoned to immigrants and they came.[49]

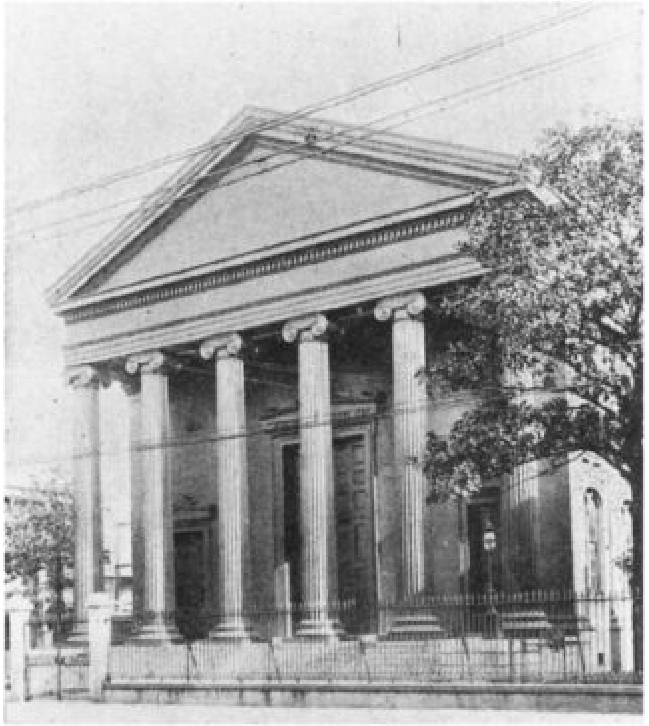
By 1850 New Orleans Jewry supported a number of Jewish institutions. In 1845 the small Sephardic community had organized its own congregation, K. K. Nefutzoth Yehudah (The Dispersed of Judah), rejecting an appeal to join with the German synagogue. In 1847, the philanthropist Judah Touro purchased an Episcopal church at the corner of Canal and Bourbon Streets in the French Quarter, renovated it, and presented it to the Dispersed of Judah congregation. In 1856, Dispersed of Judah built a larger facility on Carondelet near Julia Street. In 1851 Gates of Mercy moved to a new building on Rampart Street between St. Louis and Conti.[50]

In the 1850s Central European and German Jewish immigrants in the working-class suburb of Lafayette City, just up the river from downtown New Orleans, founded Shaarai Tefillah (Gates of Prayer). This area was populated by the Irish and the Jews and was later known as the Irish Channel, the Garden District, and part of Central City. Most members of this congregation worked in the clothing or dry goods business, or were petty merchants or peddlers who arrived from Bavaria and Alsace. In 1855, the congregation bought a little schoolhouse at the corner of St. Mary and Fulton Streets, known as the "Old Lafayette Schule." The last New Orleans synagogue to be founded before the Civil War was the "Polish Congregation," Temime Derech (the Right Way), organized in 1857.[51]

The Solomon family of New Orleans was typical of older Southern Jewish families. Solomon and Emma Solomon were born and raised in South Carolina. Sephardim, they traced their ancestry to England and possibly the British West Indies. They were part of the Jewish "haute bourgeoisie," who, according to Elliott Ashkenazi, "were reasonably successful financially, mixed well with the general white southern population, intermarried regularly, and adopted many southern customs, including slave ownership, but still retained a Jewish identity." Their teenage daughter, Clara Solomon, was very Americanized in her speech and writing, but occasionally used a Yiddish expression (such as ponum for "face"). She had many Christian friends and acquaintances. The Solomons belonged to Dispersed of Judah and attended services on Carondelet Street, within walking distance of their home on Hercules Street (now Rampart) in the lower Garden District.[52]

In 1861 the New Orleans Jewish community was the largest in the South by far, numbering an estimated four thousand souls. A 1905 history of the Jewish Orphan's Home puts the number of Jews at two thousand in 1854, the year after the yellow fever epidemic, which was the immediate cause of the creation of the home. If these figures are accurate, then the size of the Jewish community in New Orleans doubled in the seven years preceding the Civil War, a fact which is consistent with the city's general history.[53]

New Orleans Jewry, like the city's population in general, was a different mix from Charleston or Savannah. Like Macon and Mobile, it consisted largely of recent immigrants. There were relatively few old New Orleans Jewish families. While there were four congregations, most Jews had little identification with the Jewish community. The Jewish leadership did not necessarily influence the Jewish population. Unlike Charleston, Savannah, or Richmond, where Jewish families considered themselves a long-established part of the city, New Orleans's most successful Jews had completely assimilated and lost their Jewish identity. Thus, this large mass of immigrants lacked a strong link to the past and to the traditions of the city. And New Orleans was a different city from the other great Southern cities in the East. In 1850 one-fourth of the free population of Louisiana was foreign born, and this figure was undoubtedly much higher for New Orleans.[54]



K. K. Nefutzoth Yehudah (Holy Congregation of the Dispersed of Judah). This Sephardic or "Portuguese" congregation was organized in 1845, rejecting an appeal to join with the German synagogue, Gates of Mercy. By the Civil War, the synagogue was located on Carondelet near Julia Street. Gates of Mercy and Dispersed of Judah merged after the Civil War in 1881 to form the Touro Synagogue. The building is no longer in existence, although the Touro Synagogue congregation still exists in a handsome building on St. Charles Avenue near Napoleon. (Courtesy of the Touro Infirmary Archives, New Orleans. Photograph from The History of the Jews of Louisiana, likely taken in the early 1900s.)

Rural Louisiana was also home to many Jews. Many recent immigrants set out to make their living in the small towns, villages, and crossroads of rural Louisiana. By 1860 the number of Jews living in rural Louisiana equaled the Jewish population of New Orleans.[55] The experience of the Hyams family, although hardly typical, is illustrative.

A merchant family, the Hyamses were originally from Charleston, where they were members of Beth Elohim. In 1828, at the age of twenty-two, Henry Michael Hyams came to New Orleans with his cousin Judah P. Benjamin. Young Hyams had been a founding member of the Reformed Society of Israelites in 1825. He explored Louisiana looking for opportunities and began his career as a cashier at the Canal Bank in Donaldsonville in the early 1830s. He became a planter, amassing a fortune and becoming one of the largest landholders in Louisiana. In 1835 Hyams was active in anti-abolitionist activities and served on a vigilance committee whose mission was to stop antislavery propaganda in the area. In 1840 he owned forty-two slaves. Over the years, Hyams was involved in the railroad and insurance business, real estate, planting, politics, and law. In 1859 he became lieutenant governor of Louisiana, the first Jew elected to that office in American history. In 1861 the impressionable young Salomon de Rothschild found Hyams to be “a topnotch man … on whose shoulders rests all the work of the State of Louisiana.” Although he married outside the faith, Hyams always regarded himself as a practicing Jew and attended services at Dispersed of Judah. He was proud of his Jewish lineage, which was both Sephardic and Ashkenazic.

In 1860 the second largest Jewish community in Louisiana was in Shreveport, a town in northwestern Louisiana at the opposite end of Louisiana from New Orleans. Jewish immigrants from all over Europe came to Shreveport. By 1850 there were thirty Jews in the town, and in 1859 the Har El (Mountain of God) congregation was chartered. When the war came, at least seventy-eight Jews from Shreveport served in the Confederate armed services. Almost all of them were German, Polish, or Central European. The congregation resolved in May 1861 to “scorn and repel” the advice of the Jewish Messenger of New York to stand by the union and affirmed their devotion to the Confederacy.[56]

Jews settled up the Mississippi in Memphis, Tennessee. According to tradition, a Charleston Jew, Joseph J. Andrews, the son-in-law of the Revolutionary patriot Haym Salomon, was the founder of Memphis Jewry.[57] B’nai Israel (Children of Israel) was founded in 1853. Judah Touro bequeathed the small congregation $2,000, and in 1858 the former Farmers and Mechanics Bank Building on the corner of Main and Exchange Streets in Memphis was rented by the congregation and dedicated as the first synagogue in Tennessee. There had been individual Jews in and around Nashville since the late 1790s, but it was not until the late 1840s that services were held at the home of Isaac Garritson. In August 1852 Garritson wrote Isaac Leeser that the Hebrew Benevolent Society “is at present very small yet numbering only 5 families and about 8 young men.” This simple description illustrates the preponderance of young men in the new immigrant Jewish population of the South in the years leading up to the war. K. K. Mogen David (Shield, or Star, of David) was chartered by the legislature in 1854 and was located on North Market Street. Tradition has it that the name was chosen in honor of Davidson County, in which Nashville was located. A second Orthodox congregation, Ohava Emes, was founded in 1859 and was located over Fry’s store on South Market.

The Felsenthals of Tennessee came from Alsace. The family took its name from Fels und thal (“rock and dale”), and family tradition has it that Herz Felsenthal attended the historic Sanhedrin assembled by Napoleon in 1806. Jacob (“Jake”) Felsenthal left Munchweiler, in the Alseng, for America and settled in Brownsville, Tennessee. He was soon followed by his brother, Joseph. In 1856 they established a mercantile business that became Felsenthal Department Store. The brothers married two sisters in Germany. Joseph married Regina, and Jacob married Karolina. Cecilia Felsenthal, a descendant, wrote that “their home became a haven for other relatives. Two nieces lived with them and, in due time, there was to be a double wedding." Since Brownsville had no newspaper, Uncle Jake had handbills printed announcing "Double Jewish Wedding at the First Baptist Church."[58]

Texas was America's Southern frontier in the 1850s. "Thousands of acres of land can be bought, within settled portions of the state, for the small sum of from 25 cents to $1 per acre," Lewis A. Levy wrote a New York Jewish newspaper from Houston in 1850. He advised fellow Jews to come to Texas, "where a man can make his living to his liking, and [be] more independent than the Autocrat of Russia, or the Emperor of Austria." Beginning in the early nineteenth century, Jews began trickling into the Lone Star State. Spanish Jews came as well as Ashkenazic. Jacob De Cordova, for example, was born in Jamaica to a planter family and emigrated to New Orleans and then Texas. He arrived in Galveston in 1837 and became a merchant, served in public office, and eventually became an important land developer who publicized Texas in three books and through his land agency. In 1858 he wrote that, as Texas was an agricultural country, the "immigration of the children of Israel has been very limited." However, he continued, Texas "is a country where the poor man can easily obtain land." And while the state was indeed "a land flowing with milk and honey,' it is necessary to FIRST MILK THE COWS AND GATHER THE HONEY.” He moved to Houston, then to Bosque County near Waco, in the 1850s. During the war he was a tax collector.[59]

A typical Texas Jew in this era, Harris Kempner arrived in New York City in 1854, “another face in a boatload of Polish immigrants,” according to a descendant. He was seventeen, a German-speaking Pole escaping from the czar’s tyrannical rule of Russian Poland. “Harris” was the Americanized version of “Herschell,” his Hebrew name. A tall, muscular youth, ambitious and aggressive, Kempner began his career at twenty cents an hour as a bricklayer’s assistant, and, by dint of hard work, saved his money and moved to Texas. He settled in Cold Springs, San Jacinto County, a cotton-growing and timbering region in southeast Texas, which may have reminded him of his boyhood village. Beginning as a peddler, he built a general merchandise store and developed a good reputation.[60]

Texas had a small Jewish community in 1860. There were, for example, only 108 Jews in Houston in 1860, only one of whom had been born in Texas. Most had come from Germany, some from Poland and Eastern Europe. Many were single men from Bavaria and Poland.[61] Galveston was a bustling pioneer town in the 1850s. Michael Seeligson was elected mayor in 1853, but no synagogue was built until after the war. (The first synagogue in Texas, B’nai Israel, was built in Galveston in 1871.) Congregation Beth Israel in Houston was founded in 1854 and chartered in 1859.

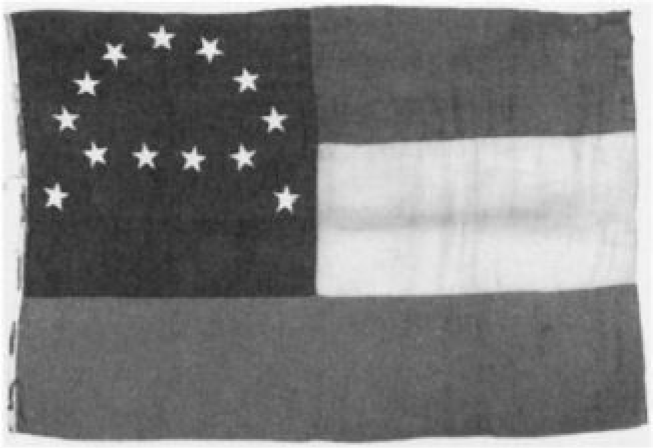
As we have seen, the Old South was remarkably free of prejudice against Jews. Historians, travelers, residents, newspapers, business leaders, and all contemporary observers agree that the Old South was a hospitable climate for Jewish Southerners. Historians of the American Jewish experience reached a consensus long ago that Jews were more accepted in the antebellum South than in the North. “For Southern Jews,” Howard M. Sacher wrote in A History of the Jews in America, “loyalty to the Confederacy often was a matter of intense personal gratitude. Nowhere else in America had they experienced such fullness of opportunity or achieved comparable political and social acceptance.”[62]

Joseph Kershaw, the founder of Camden, South Carolina, left “To God’s Anticent [sic] people the Jews [a lot] for a Burying ground and place of worship whenever they may incline to build upon the same.” In Savannah, the Gentile community helped fund the renovation of Mikve Israel in the 1850s. In 1859, an improbable journalist, Israel Joseph Benjamin, set out to emulate a famous medieval traveler, Benjamin of Tudela, who had made a circuit of the known world about 1170 “to describe the scattered remnants of the tribes of Israel.”[63] Benjamin, from the Turkish province of Moldavia, wrote his accounts from 1859 to 1862. He reached this conclusion about Southern Jewry: “The southern states, however, for natural reasons, outdid, in many respects, the northern states in hospitality. The white inhabitants felt themselves united with, and closer to, other whites—as opposed to the Negroes. Since the Israelite there did not do the humbler kinds of work which the Negro did, he was quickly received among the upper classes and easily rose to high political rank. For this reason, until now, it was only the South which sent Jews to the Senate. Benjamin came from Louisiana; Yulee from Florida; Louisiana has elected Hyams lieutenant governor.”[64]

I. J. Benjamin's belief that Jews, being white, were a welcome ally against blacks is simplistic. The Jews were in mercantile trade, which was more respectable than manual labor, and they were frequently more accepted in Southern society than the Irish.[65] The South attracted few immigrants, and white minorities were therefore more readily accepted. Most importantly, the planter elite and Southern aristocracy were more tolerant in matters of religion than of social class. Unlike New England in the eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries, where Puritanism spawned anti-Semitism, the Southern leadership tended to be Episcopalians, Presbyterians, and Methodists, the most tolerant of the Protestant denominations, and were cosmopolitan and educated people who appreciated those qualities in their Jewish neighbors. While the "mob calls him, 'Mr. Davis's pet Jew,' a King Street Jew," Mary Chesnut wrote of Judah P. Benjamin, her husband, Senator Chesnut, thought Benjamin "the very cleverest man we had in the Senate."[66] The Southern aristocrats were not threatened by Jews as competitors, and their quality of life was enhanced by the presence of Jewish teachers, musicians, innkeepers, lawyers, doctors, druggists, merchants, and men of learning. The planters certainly did not need the Jews as allies against the blacks. First, the Jews were an insignificant fraction of the population, and, second, the planters could have persecuted the Jews and kept the blacks enslaved as was amply demonstrated by the Ku Klux Klan in the twentieth century. The acceptance of the Jews in the Old South was a simple matter of a small, law-abiding, educated, and productive minority who brought diversity to Southern life, together with much-needed mercantile skills and loyalty to the existing order.



Gen. Robert E. Lee's headquarters flag. Lee's flag was flown at his headquarters when he encamped. According to Joseph H. Crute Jr. in Emblems of Southern Valor, its star pattern represents the Ark of the Covenant and was "symbolic of the Bread of Life which is the symbol of spiritual nourishment." Nineteenth-century Southerners identified Jews with the ancient Hebrews and were much taken with Old Testament symbols. Whether Lee's flag actually depicted the Ark of the Covenant or not, the imagery was consistent with Southerners' fascination with ancient Israel. Mary and James Chesnut of South Carolina were typical of aristocratic Southerners. The Jews they knew were cosmopolitan and educated, qualities Mary admired.[67] But Jews were different, and Mary was keenly aware of that difference. She referred to her friend Miriam ("Mem") DeLeon Cohen in her diary as "My Hebrew friend" or "Jewish angel." Mem was a practicing Jew, and Mary respected her friend's religion.[68] She wrote, "Mem is proud of her high lineage," and "Cohen is a high name among Jews."[69]

Southerners believed fervently in the God of the Old Testament and respected their Jewish neighbors' knowledge of the Bible. The learned Jew of a small Southern town often settled theological disputes among Christians. Isidor Straus's family came to Talbotton, Georgia, in the 1850s. "Our family was received with kindness and hospitality," Straus recalled. "My father, always a student and well versed in biblical literature and the Bible, which he read in the original, was much sought by the ministers of the various denominations, several of whom habitually dined at our house when in Talbotton on their circuit. At such times the discussion usually ran along theological lines. One of my earliest recollections is hearing my father take passages from the Old Testament and translate them literally for the information of these ministers."[70]

Southerners frequently used Jewish references from the Bible and saw the Jewish people of ancient times as noble and heroic. For example, David Clopton wrote to Sen. Clement C. Clay, "Delay is submission, 'to your tents O! Israel' and let the God of battles decide the issue."[71] Mary Chesnut likened the "stay-at-home men" working their plantations to "the old Jews while Noah was building the Ark," and compared Southerners to Jews for believing they were "the chosen people of God. And that he is fighting for us." Keenly aware of the differences in theology, Mary Chesnut wrote that Willie [William B.] Myers "was so angelically beautiful that at first they thought he must be their still expected messiah."[72] Stonewall Jackson was perceived by his men as Moses-like, leading the Southern people across the Red Sea. A well-known Civil War song, "Stonewall Jackson's Way," published in 1862, contained these lines:

Lay bare thine arm,

Stretch forth thy rod,

Amen.

That's Stonewall Jackson's way![73]

An 1861 Southern song, "The Southrons' Chaunt of Defiance" ("You Can Never Win Us Back"), contains these verses:

But the Battle to the Strong

Is not given,

While the Judge of Right and Wrong sits in heaven.

And the God of David still

Guides the Devil with his will.

There are giants yet to kill.[74]

Rev. J. William Jones remembered that General Lee's "orders and reports always gratefully recognized 'the Lord of hosts' as the 'Giver of victory.'"[75] Lee believed fervently in the God of the Old Testament, who was sometimes called the Lord of Hosts (Hebrew Yahweh Sabaoth actually means "God of Armies"). Because God was unconquerable, defeat in the eyes of the ancient Jews was caused by the faithlessness of the Israelites. In August 1863, after his defeat at Gettysburg, Lee issued an order recognizing August 21 as a day of prayer, and he reminded his soldiers that "we have sinned against Almighty God" and that, by confessing, "He will give us a name and place among the nations of the earth."[76]

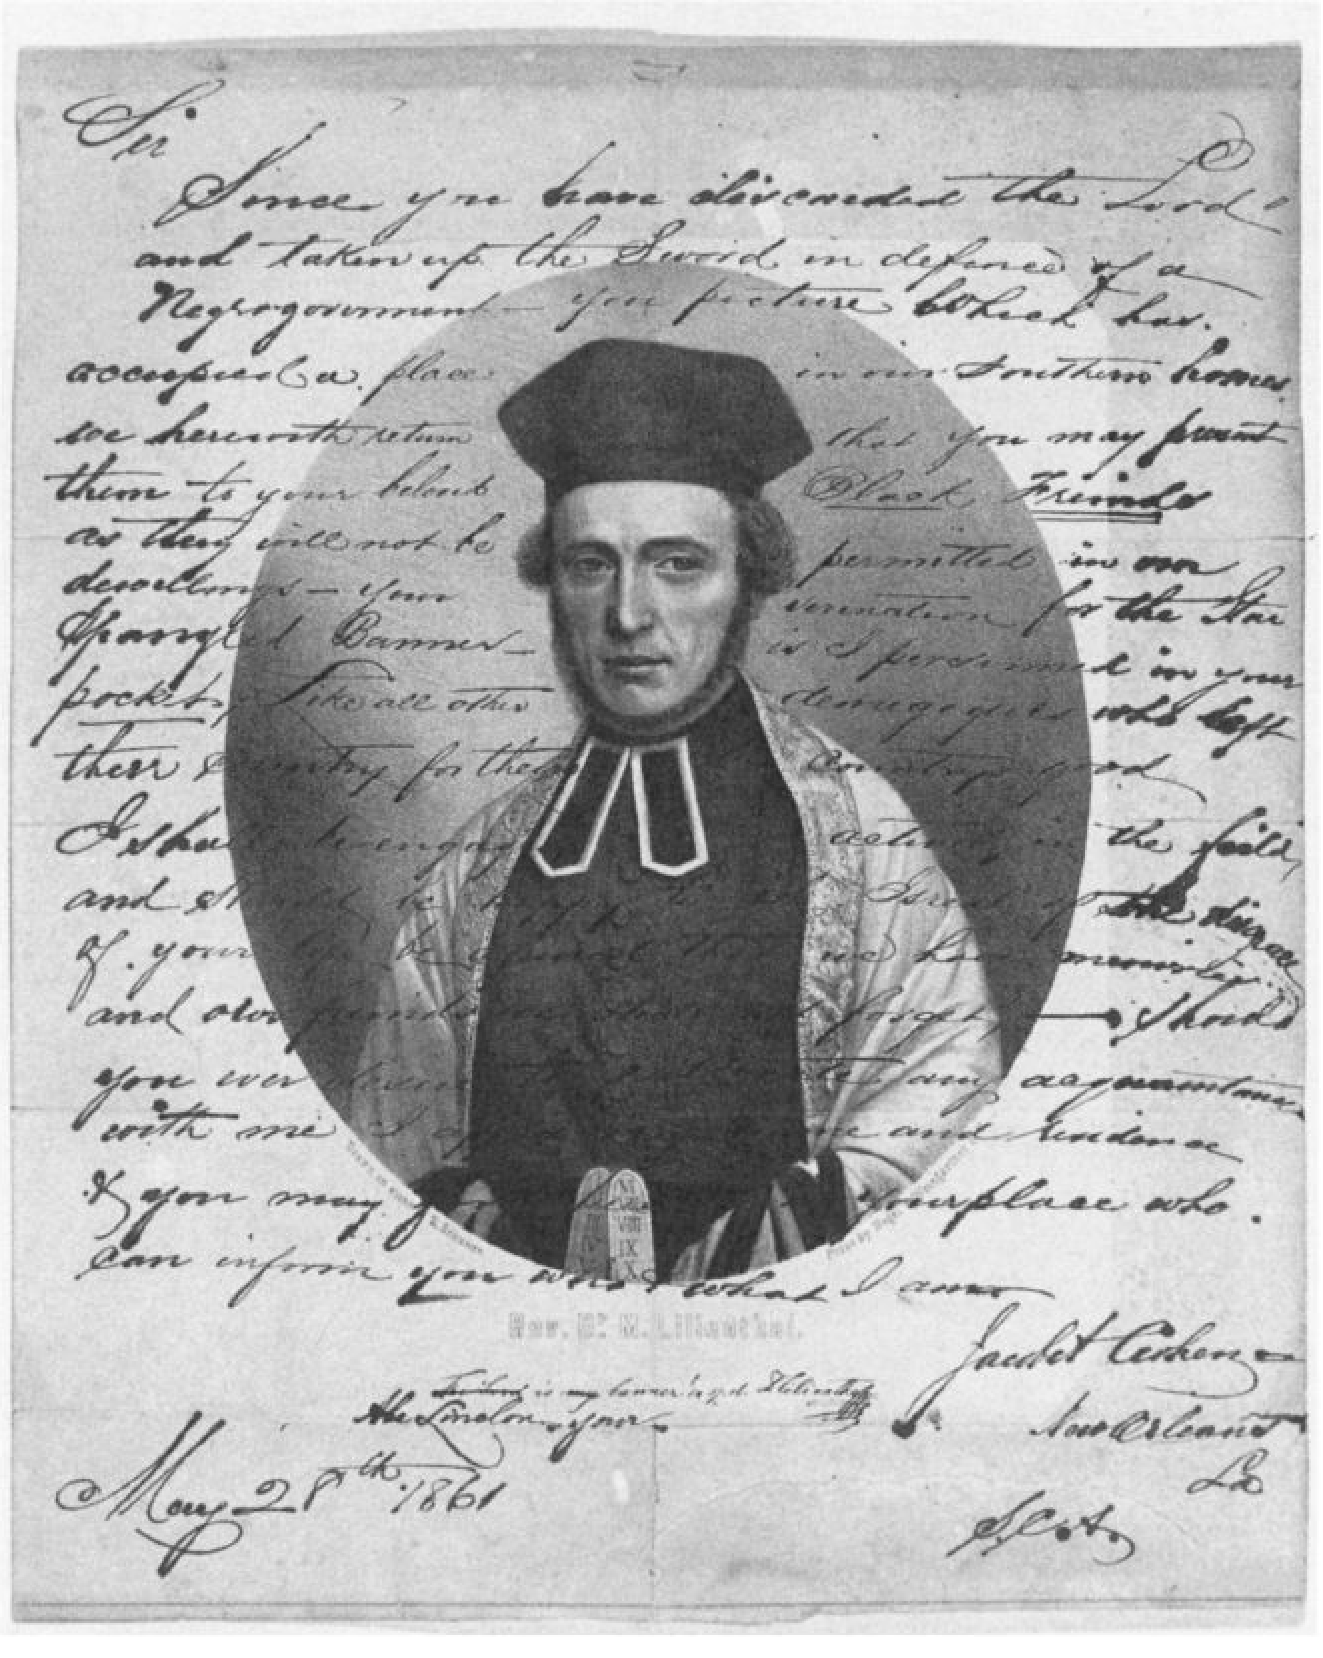
Thus, it is not curious at all that Yulee and Benjamin, the first senators of Jewish descent, were from the South. Nor is it surprising that of the six Jewish members of Congress elected before the Civil War, three were from the South and three were from the North, despite the fact that there were fewer than 25,000 Jews in the South and 120,000 in the North.[77] Numerous Southern Jews served in the state legislatures, city councils, and in other positions of authority. In 1850 a Richmond rabbi, Rev. Julius Eckman, gave the opening prayer at a session of the Virginia House of Delegates, the first time a rabbi had so officiated before a state legislature.[78] In the 1840s the Jews of South Carolina, angered that Gov. Henry Hammond had issued a Thanksgiving Day Proclamation addressed to Christians only, wrote the governor, "we do not sue for toleration, we un-mask it." Their audacity, Abraham J. Peck wrote, was unprecedented.[79] Hammond's successor, Gov. William Aiken, issued a new proclamation on his first day in office excising Christian passages. Aiken's close political relationship with M. C. Mordecai was at work. Even Hammond, who privately called Mordecai's brother "a miserable Jew," described Senator Mordecai as "a man of force and influence in Charleston." As Frederic Jaher has written, "Often descended from old clans that had grown up with the city, Charleston's Jews were rarely labeled alien upstarts or intruders."[80]

This is not to say that there was no prejudice against Jews in the antebellum South. Anti-Semitism was a fact of life in the nineteenth century. Emma Holmes of Charleston wrote in her diary that she disliked "Sumter very much from the prevalence of sand & Jews, my great abhorrences." By 1862 she blamed all of her ills on the Jews. Jews came into conflict with the majority Christian society on issues such as conducting retail businesses on Sunday. In many states, North and South, Jewish businessmen tested or refused to obey these Sabbatarian laws. And, of course, Southerners often found Jewish customs strange. Maria Bryan Connell of Hancock County, Georgia, had a Jewish houseguest. "I did not at all comprehend the trouble occasioned by their notions of unclean and forbidden food until I had a daughter of Abraham under the roof. She will not eat one mouthful of the finest fresh pork or the most delicate ham," she wrote. It was not, Maria concluded, "an unimportant consideration with her. Pray let this be entre nous, for I feel as if I am in some respect violating the duties of hospitality in speaking of it."[81]

The Northern states were not as hospitable as the South to the Jews prior to the Civil War. Colonial Massachusetts, for example, was a hotbed of anti-Semitism. The first known Jew in Boston was "warned out" in the 1640s.[82] Unlike in colonial Charleston, where Jews flourished, Jews were not allowed to live in early colonial Boston.[83] John Quincy Adams referred to David Yulee as the "squeaking Jew delegate from Florida," and Rep. Albert G. Marchand of Pennsylvania as "a squat little Jew-faced rotundity." Indeed, when the South seceded, the Boston Evening Transcript, a Brahmin publication, blamed secession on the Southern Jews. Calling Benjamin "the disunion leader in the U.S. Senate," and Yulee ("whose name has been changed from the more appropriate one of Levy or Levi") an ultra fire-eater, the newspaper claimed that "this peculiar race … having no country of their own," desired "that other nations shall be in the same unhappy condition."[84] The New York Times contended in May 1860 that Jonas Phillips Levy, Comdr. Uriah P. Levy's brother, was "laying pipes for a ticket to consist of Senators Benjamin and Yulee (representing Louisiana and Florida) as the President and Vice-President of a Southern Jerusalem." By 1864, the Times castigated the Democratic Party because its chairman, August Belmont, was "the agent of foreign jew bankers."[85]

Southern Jewry, more secure in their place in Southern society than their co-religionists in the North, accepted their responsibilities when war came. They had experienced a freedom unknown to Jews anywhere else in the world. They had been accepted by their fellow citizens of the Old South, more accepted as Jews than at any other time since the Golden Age of Jewry in medieval Spain. And they repaid that freedom and respect, that right to breathe "the free air of Dixie," by loyalty to their homeland.

It is difficult to determine the opinion of Jewish Southerners about secession. Edwin DeLeon was pro-secession, while his brother Camden DeLeon, an officer in the army, was clearly uncomfortable with disloyalty to his government.[86] Many were concerned about Lincoln's election and the elevation of an avowed opponent of slavery to the presidency. Simon Baruch, a Prussian immigrant and a medical student, carried a lantern in a parade to celebrate secession bearing the words, "There is a point beyond which endurance ceases to be a virtue."[87] Baruch's fellow South Carolinian, the poet Penina Moise, celebrated the Palmetto State's secession in a war ditty, "Cockades of Blue." Solomon Cohen wrote from Savannah that with Lincoln's election, "our enemies have triumphed," and he was worried about control of the Federal government by "those who hate us and our institutions."[88] His son, Gratz, believed the Union was at an end and it was the duty of every Southern state to secede.[89] Like all Southerners, they defended their homeland. "It was quite natural," A. E. Frankland of Memphis wrote, "they sided with the section that was their home."[90] They reacted with anger at Jewish periodicals and rabbis who took up the abolitionist cause. Jacob A. Cohen of New Orleans, soon to be an officer in the Confederate army, returned a lithograph of Rabbi Max Lilienthal of Ohio to him with this message written over the rabbi's face: "Sir, Since you have discarded the Lord and taken up the sword in the defense of a Negro government—your picture which has occupied a place in our Southern homes we herewith return that you may present them to your beloved Black Friends as they will not be permitted in our dwellings. … I shall be engaged actively in the field and should be happy to rid Israel of the disgrace of your life."[91]



Sir

Since you have discarded the Lord and taken up the Sword in defence of a Negrogovernment your picture which has occupied a place in our Southern homes we herewith return that you may present them to your black Black Friends as they will not be permitted in our dwellings — your veneration for the Star Spangled Banner is I presume in your pockets, like all other demagogues who left their country for their country's good

Lithograph of Rev. Doctor Max Lilienthal. By May 1861 Jacob A. Cohen of New Orleans was disgusted with Rabbi Lilienthal's abolitionist activities. He scrawled a highly critical message over Lilienthal's picture and sent it to him. Notice that Cohen gives his address as "S.C.A." rather than “U.S.A.” Cohen became a captain of the Shepherd Guards, Company A, 10th Louisiana, and was killed at Second Manassas in 1862. (Courtesy of the Western Jewish History Center, Judah L. Magnes Museum, Berkeley, California.)

Rabbi Simon Tuska of Memphis denounced “rabid” abolitionists. “The Jews of Memphis,” he said, “are ready, in common with their Christian brethren, to sacrifice their property and their lives in defense of southern rights.”[92]

Northern Jews perceived Southern Jewry as proslavery and pro-secession. In 1862 Bernhard Felsenthal, the abolitionist rabbi, wrote an article entitled “Die Juden und die Sclaverei” (The Jews and Slavery), in which he asserted that the “Israelites residing in New Orleans are man by man—with very few exceptions—ardently in favor of secession, and many among them are ‘sincere fire-eaters.’… The reason why these gentlemen take such interest in secession has always been a miracle to me.” Felsenthal explained this seeming anomaly by recalling the condition under which the Jews had lived in Germany: suppression, isolation, and persecution. Felsenthal also believed that because many Germans were “to their immortal honor… outspoken enemies of slavery,” some “Jewish Germans are in favor of it.” He also pointed to the Southern press in Richmond, Charleston, and New Orleans, which published articles entitled “The Jews Are for Us,” referring to Benjamin, Yulee, and some Northern proslavery rabbis. (Felsenthal, a Northerner, concluded that “despite stupidity, narrow-mindedness, and the efforts of a few demagogues the large majority of the American Jewry can be found on the side of freedom.”)[93]

The plain fact of the matter is that, as Rabbi Bertram Wallace Korn has written, “No Jewish political figure of the Old South ever expressed reservations about the justice of slavery or the rightness of the Southern position.”[94] Nor is there any evidence that Jews supported slavery as a result of intimidation or fear of reprisals. The Talmud taught the Jews that “the law of the land is the law,” and slavery was the law of the land. Opponents of slavery, Jewish or Gentile, were a distinct minority even in the North. While there were many Jews in the North who actively opposed slavery, few Jews were conspicuous as abolitionists. Indeed, Rabbi Morris J. Raphall of B’nai Jeshurun in New York City fiercely criticized abolitionists. “How dare you … denounce slaveholding as a sin?” he asked them. “When you remember that Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Job—the men with whom the Almighty conversed, with whose names he emphatically connects his own most holy name … all these men were slaveholders.”[95] Solomon Cohen wrote his aunt that “God gave laws to his chosen people for the government of their slaves, and did not order them to abolish slavery.”[96] Oscar Straus put it best when he wrote in his memoirs, “As a boy brought up in the South I never questioned the rights or wrongs of slavery. Its existence I regarded as matter of course, as most other customs or institutions."[97]

When in April 1861 the Jewish Messenger of New York City called upon American Jewry to "rally as one man for the Union and the Constitution," the Jews of Shreveport responded with a resolution denouncing the newspaper and its editor. "[W]e, the Hebrew congregation of Shreveport," the resolution began, "scorn and repel your advice, although we might be called Southern rebels; still, as law-abiding citizens, we solemnly pledge ourselves to stand by, protect, and honor the flag, with its stars and stripes, the Union and Constitution of the Southern Confederacy, with our lives, liberty, and all that is dear to us." The resolution, in true Southern fashion, condemned the newspaper "as a black republican paper" and deplored its editor's advice "to act as traitors and renegades to our adopted country," meaning the South. Max Baer, the president of the congregation, asked that newspapers friendly to the Southern cause publish their resolution.[98]

Jewish Southerners perceived New Englanders as abolitionists who were frequently anti-Semitic.[99] Theodore Parker, a leading abolitionist minister, believed Jews' intellects were "sadly pinched in those narrow foreheads," that Jews were "lecherous" and "did sometimes kill a Christian baby at the Passover."[100] William Lloyd Garrison, editor of the Liberator, once described Judge Mordecai Manuel Noah of New York as "the miscreant Jew," a "Shylock," "the enemy of Christ and liberty," and a descendent "of the monsters who nailed Jesus to the cross."[101] Similar sentiments came from Edmond Quincy, Lydia Maria Child, William Ellery Channing, and Sen. Henry Wilson of Massachusetts, all leading abolitionists. Child thought Judaism rife with superstition, claiming that Jews "have humbugged the world." John Quincy Adams opposed slavery and derided Jews.[102] It is little wonder then that there was no great love lost between Southern Jews, who were accustomed to being treated as equals, and New Englanders. Southern Jews had even more reason, if it is possible, to dislike the officious New Englanders than did other Southerners, and this undoubtedly influenced their view of secession.[103] Isaac Harby, the Charleston journalist and pioneer of the Reform movement, was typical in his denunciation of "the abolitionist society and its secret branches."[104] Isaac Scherck, a Prussian immigrant who settled in Summit, Mississippi, and enlisted as a private in Company E, 3d Mississippi Battalion, described the North as filled with "puritanic bigotry & humbug." It came as no surprise to South Carolina Jewry to see reprinted in their local newspaper in March 1861 the following from the Boston Journal: "The Jew, [Benjamin] Mordecai, at Charleston, who gave ten thousand dollars to the South Carolina Government, had just settled with his Northern creditors by paying fifty cents on the dollar. The ten thousand was thus a Northern donation to secession.” The Charleston Daily Courier called the story “a willful, unmitigated and deliberate falsehood.”[105]

Thus, when South Carolina seceded, its Jewish citizens went with their state. The DeLeons, typical of men with their background, stood by the Palmetto State. This was not an easy decision. Like Robert E. Lee, Maj. David Camden DeLeon was a career army officer. He had been a hero in the Mexican War. “Treason and patriotism are next door neighbors,” he wrote his younger brother Edwin, “and only accident makes you strike the right knocker. Revolution is treason even if right, if unsuccessful.” DeLeon agonized over the decision he knew was coming. “A Southern Confederacy seeming as near a fixed fact as human foresight can dive into the future. The wire pullers have fixed their line so that electricity has been infused into the masses.” Having spent his career as a surgeon in the army, Major DeLeon found it difficult to cast aside his loyalty. “I have loved my country. I have fought under its flag and every star and stripe is dear to me. I can forgive and forget.”[106]

Maj. David Camden DeLeon of South Carolina reluctantly resigned his commission in the U.S. Army to join the Confederate army. He became the first acting surgeon general of the Confederacy from May 6 to July 12, 1861. He served later as the medical director of the Army of Northern Virginia and then left the army for reasons unknown. His military career was undistinguished. (Portrait by Solomon Carvalho. Courtesy of Jacob Rader Marcus Center, American Jewish Archives, Cincinnati, Ohio and the Jewish Museum of New York.)

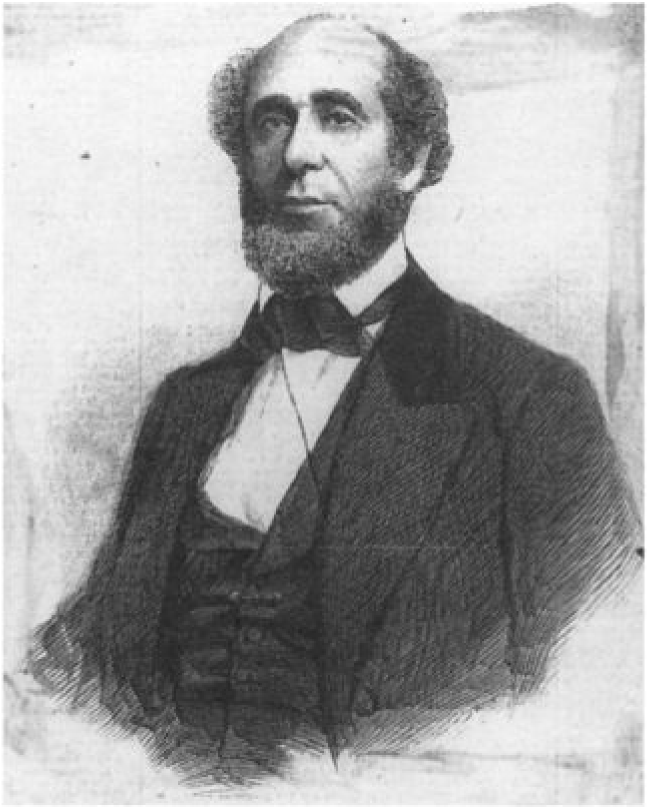
But events forced Major DeLeon to choose. “If time comes when war is inevitable,” he wrote his brother Edwin, “I know my sides, and they will find the difference between howling demagogues and the men of action. As long as I hold the commission I do, I make no promises. But when a Southern Confederacy is acknowledged or inaugurated, then I shall take my stand.” He took that stand a month later in February 1861 when he resigned. His letter of resignation went to Gen. Winfield Scott, his old friend and commander in the Mexican War. Scott pleaded with DeLeon, as he did with many senior Southern officers, to remain in the army and accept a post in the Northwestern frontier, far from his Southern homeland. He was even threatened with arrest if he resigned. “Camden DeLeon, M.D., called fresh from Washington,” Mary Chesnut recorded in February 1861, “says General Scott is using all of his power and influence to prevent officers from the South from resigning their commissions. Among other things, promising that they should never be sent against us in case of war.”[107] DeLeon fled South. Camden’s brother, the journalist Edwin DeLeon, also supported secession. “Of Secession, I may say with the Irish statesman, on a somewhat similar occasion, ‘I sat by its cradle, I followed its hearse,’” he recalled in his memoirs.[108]

State Sen. Moses Cohen Mordecai was not fervent for secession. He had been one of the owners of the Southern Standard, which was established in 1851 to oppose the immediate secession of South Carolina without the other Southern states. The majority of South Carolinians in the early 1850s opposed the secession of their state without the cooperation of other slave states. “The Resistance or Cooperation Party of the State was not divided as to her right to secede,” William L. King wrote in a history of Charleston’s newspapers, “but many were convinced that such a movement at that time, would be fatal.” The Standard represented these cooperationist views and was successful in bringing about a test vote in 1851 by the people of South Carolina which rejected separate secession. The newspaper flourished for a time but ceased publication in the summer of 1858. By then, most South Carolinians wanted to secede. Mordecai likely held his counsel if he still had doubts about secession.[109] Solomon Cohen of Savannah was a delegate to the Democratic Party’s national convention in Charleston in 1860. He was a member of the minority that stayed when the ultra-secessionists walked out. Avery wrote in his history of Georgia that Cohen was “a gentleman of high social standing and considerable speaking ability. He and his colleagues, while in sympathy with the seceders in principle, remained behind hoping that a better spirit might prevail and justice be done to the South by the Northern Democrats.”[110] Clearly, Cohen, like Mordecai, was a reluctant secessionist.

Moses Cohen Mordecai and Isabel Lyons Mordecai. M. C. Mordecai (pronounced "Mor de key" in the South at the time) was the most prominent Jewish Charlestonian of the 1850s and 1860s. He served as state senator from Charleston and owned the Mordecai Steamship Line. The Mordecais lived on Meeting Street, a prestigious address below Broad Street and near St. Michael's Church. (Author's collection.)

Some of Savannah's German Jews were among the city's German community who met at Armory Hall on May 15, 1861, to "show by words and acts that the German inhabitants of the city were ready with heart and hand to defend the home of their choice." Joseph Lippman called the assembly to order. Magnus Loewenthal served on the program committee and read his committee's resolution, which likened the Southern cause to the 1848 Revolution and the Venetians' hatred for Austrian rule. While they deplored "the necessity forced upon us of perhaps imbruing our hands in the blood of brothers of our dear old Fatherland, yet the cause of the South being our cause, we accept the gage of hostility." E. W. Solomons of Effingham County near Savannah was a delegate to the Georgia Secession Convention and signed the ordinance.[111]

There were at least two Jewish delegates to the Louisiana Secession Convention held in January 1861 in Baton Rouge: Isaac N. Marks, representing Orleans Parish, and Leon D. Marks, representing Caddo Parish (Shreveport). Samuel Hyams was nominated as the secretary to the convention, and a Mr. Leovy of New Orleans was nominated to be the official printer, but neither was elected. Governor Moore orchestrated the secession of Louisiana, and Lt. Gov. Henry Hyams, a loyal Moore ally, was undoubtedly active on its behalf although he was presiding over the Senate and was not a delegate to the convention. (The Daily Picayune reported on March 26, 1861, that Hyams "made a most beautiful and touching response" in the Senate to a resolution thanking him for his services.)[112]



Benjamin Mordecai was a patriotic Charleston merchant. He received a great deal of notoriety in both the Northern and Southern press for his "magnificent" donation of $10,000 to the State of South Carolina to be used by the governor "for such purposes as will best advance the interests and honor of our noble commonwealth." "This evidence of your devoted patriotism," the governor's aide-de-camp replied, "is most gratifying and is most highly appreciated by His Excellency Gov. Pickens." He was thanked by a resolution of the Secession Convention (Mordecai to Governor Pickens, January 1, 1861; Lucas to Mordecai, January 1, 1861, AJA). (Courtesy of South Carolina Historical Society).

Unlike the Hyamses, the Lemann family of Donaldsonville opposed the war. According to Elliott Ashkenazi in The Business of Jews in Louisiana, 1840–1875, Jacob Lemann's career was "a success story in the best tradition of Jewish immigrants to the American South." Lemann emigrated to Donaldsonville from the Duchy of Hesse in 1836, and he soon graduated from peddler to owner of a general store to commercial banker and real estate investor. He married Marie Berthelcor, a Gentile who converted and even formally adopted Judaism before a rabbinical court in New York in 1852. She changed her name to Miriam. He continued trading with the owners of sugar plantations, the wealthiest in Louisiana, right up to 1861. He also continued keeping his personal accounts in his native Yiddish, which also guaranteed secrecy. The Lemanns were living in New York, Newport, and Louisiana in the mid-1850s and apparently had no truck with the Southern cause. The family purchased a mansion in Newport in 1854 and lived in the North more than the South. The self-indulgent son of the Lemann family, Bernard, left Louisiana a month after Sumter for Europe. His diary, replete with references to historic sites, monuments, parties, and high society, never mentions the war being fought by the young men of his generation. Clearly, the family went to Europe to escape the conflict as Bernard returned to Donaldsonville in December of 1863 and declared his allegiance to the Union.[113]

In New Orleans, unlike Charleston, Richmond, and Savannah, some Jews questioned the wisdom of secession and were reluctant to fight in a war in which they perceived no stake.[114] "Secession was never as popular in Louisiana as in her sister States of the lower South," Ralph A. Wooster concluded, and its large immigrant population may have been one of the reasons.[115] Christian German immigrants were divided on the wisdom of the war. A leading German American, New Orleans attorney Michael Hahn, was an outspoken abolitionist, and many German immigrants were opposed to slavery. John Frederick Nau concludes in The German People of New Orleans, 1850–1900, that many German New Orleanians "looked upon the conflict as purely an American 'family' affair and did not take an enthusiastic or active part in it."[116] The same was true of other immigrant groups. And, of course, not every native Southerner favored secession.

Jake Weil, a German immigrant, veteran of the Mexican War, and a cotton factor in Montgomery, enlisted in the 4th Alabama Home Guard and enthusiastically endorsed secession as the only realistic alternative. He was at the capital in Montgomery when Jefferson Davis was inaugurated. He found Davis to be "a man both imposing and impressive," but, he wrote his brother Josiah, "I fear he has not the stomach nor the verstandt [understanding] to lead us through the struggle that ensues." Weil felt there was "no place left" for a man of reason; of "two evils I choose the one more familiar. This land has been good to all of us," he wrote his brother Josiah in Prussia. "We shall not be deprived of rights or property.… I shall fight to my last breath and to the full extent of my fortune to defend that in which I believe." Weil was not a proponent of slavery. He and his brother Henry had set their slaves free, except for their household servants, when there were enough settlers in Montgomery to lease their lands. "In truth one man never has right another man to own," he wrote Josiah. "But," he continued, "one man has no right to sell property to another and after he has invested the proceeds claim that the buyer is evil and should divest himself of his property."[117]

The Jews of Richmond favored secession but hoped for peace. Both Reverend Jacobs of Beth Shalome and Reverend Michelbacher of Beth Ahabah published prayers in the newspapers in January 1861 in response to President Buchanan's request for prayers of national unity. Likening Southerners to the Children of Israel crossing the Red Sea, Michelbacher asked that if "union and peace may not be preserved, because of perpetual and opposing interests," then "grant, Father of all, that a way may be opened whereby we, the people of the South, may pass with dry feet safely to the position of peace and plenty, attended with the Protection which Thou gavest to thy chosen people of old." Jacobs asked that God instill in "the hearts of all classes the knowledge that, as brethren how good and how beautiful it is for us to dwell together in unity." But that "if it be Thy will, O Lord! Who weighest the destinies of all nations," that secession was to come, then let it come without “the horrors of civil warfare … [and] that brother shall not lift up hand against his brother, but that an equitable and peaceful separation may take place.”[118]

Both Jacobs and Michelbacher soon became ardent supporters of the Confederate cause. The Mordecai family of Virginia and North Carolina was sorely divided. Major E. T. D. Myers, whose mother was a Mordecai, wrote his uncle Samuel Mordecai from Georgetown near Washington, D.C., that “impending ruin frowns heavily here…. I … can truly sympathize with Mr. Hunter of the State Department who assured me the other day that he was ashamed to look the delegates of foreigners in the face!” But, he would go with his state. Capt. Alfred Mordecai, Samuel Mordecai’s brother and the most respected Jewish officer in the U.S. Army in 1860, agonized over his future course. He declined an offer of a commission from Jefferson Davis, but his older sister Ellen, who lived in Richmond, begged him to fight for the South: “I avail myself of a private opportunity,” she wrote him in May 1861, “to express to you the anxiety I feel with every member of our family and all our friends that you should come where you are not only desired but needed in directing the military affairs of your native state. All eyes of the south are turned towards you, and from various places, wishes expressed that you should come.” Mordecai was married to a Northern woman and his son was raised in Pennsylvania. He resigned his commission and spent the war years in Philadelphia, unable to lift his sword against his native South or his Northern family. His son, Alfred Mordecai Jr., became an officer in the Union army. This infuriated the family that had sent four young Mordecais to serve in the Confederate army. Dr. Solomon Mordecai of Mobile, another brother, wrote Ellen: “I do not see how he could conscientiously have acted otherwise…. Yet how deeply this is to be regretted! His services in our cause would have been invaluable.”[119] Mordecai was not alone. Other Southern Jews had serious reservations about secession. Edwin Warren Moise, a Charlestonian living in Columbus, Georgia, opposed secession, while his employer, Raphael J. Moses, supported it.

Eugenia and Philip Phillips of Mobile disagreed about slavery and secession. As in many marriages, the partners differed markedly in their temperament. Philip, one of the most respected Jewish lawyers in America, was calm and moderate, a conservative who supported the Union. Eugenia, the daughter and friend of Southern aristocrats, was an ardent Southern partisan. Her entire family supported the war. Sister Phoebe recalled that the "women of the South had been openly and violently rebellious from the moment they thought their states' rights touched. They incited the men to struggle in support of their views, and whether right or wrong, sustained them nobly to the end. They were the first to rebel—the last to succumb." Philip thought secession foolhardy and slavery an impediment to the South's progress. He even attempted a mission to the South on behalf of President Buchanan to stem the tide of secession. Phillips knew that the South would never give up slavery or that "the spirit of abolitionism which now dominated the North would be content with anything less." Yet, like many Southerners, he did not believe that Lincoln's election justified secession. "I looked with profound amazement," he later recalled, "upon the efforts made by many of the Southern leaders to induce the South to believe that secession would be peacefully acquiesced in by the North.… What little influence I possessed was exerted to prevent the proposed action of the Southern states."[120]

Maj. Robert Anderson, the Union commander at Fort Sumter in Charleston harbor, did all he could to avert war, but in April President Lincoln sent a relief expedition to the beleaguered fort. Jefferson Davis ordered an attack on Fort Sumter before it could be reinforced. In the early morning hours of April 12, 1861, a heavy mist covered Charleston harbor and the nearby islands. Through the gloom came “the brilliant flash of exploding shells from the batteries all around the bay, while the deep hoarse tones of talking cannons echoed over the waters.”

In that mist and gloom, among the soldiers ringing Fort Sumter were Jewish Confederates from Charleston. Moses E. Lopez served as a private in the Palmetto Guards. He was assigned to the Ironclad Battery on Morris Island on this fateful day. A Jewish physician, Columbus DaVega, apparently designed and served in a ten-bed hospital attached to a floating battery used in the attack on Sumter. Also in that mist and in command of a few of those “talking cannons” was Lt. Jacob Valentine of Company K, 1st South Carolina, a veteran of the Mexican War who had been wounded at Churubusco. There were four Valentine boys—Emanuel, Jacob, Isaac, and Hertz. Their ancestors had, according to family legend, served “with credit” in the Prussian army during the Napoleonic Wars. Valentine commanded the enfilade battery at the end of Sullivan’s Island nearest Charleston and overlooking Fort Sumter. It was the mission of this battery, consisting of four cannons, to rake the enemy line.[121]

The bombardment was furious and constant for the first two and a half hours. “There stands the bold defiant fort,” one observer wrote, “as quiet as death.” After daybreak, Sumter fired back. “The firing from Fort Sumter against our battery was heavy,” Valentine reported to Lt. Col. Roswell S. Ripley, “but, I am happy to say ineffective, and resulted in neither injury to the battery or to the men.” The bombardment had commenced at 4:30 a.m. and firing became general at 5:00 a.m. from the ring of forts and batteries on Sullivan’s Island, Morris Island, and James Island. Fort Sumter returned fire at 7:00 a.m. with a vigorous assault on Cummings Point. “The enemy next directed his fire upon the enfilade battery on Sullivan’s Island,” the official report continued.[122]

The bombardment continued into Saturday, April 13. Thousands of people watched, including Eleanor Cohen, a young Jewish girl from Charleston, and Perry Moses of Sumter, who was a student at the Citadel. Sumter was firebombed, and the officers' quarters and barracks caught fire. Beauregard was concerned that Maj. Robert Anderson, his old instructor at West Point now facing him as his enemy, would be injured by an explosion of the fort's magazine before he could surrender. Beauregard therefore sent a boat with a fire engine over to Sumter under the direction of M. H. Nathan, chief of the fire department, to put out the fire. Prominent in the Jewish community, Nathan served as a commissioner of markets in the 1850s.[123]

Fort Sumter surrendered on Sunday, April 14, while the Federal fleet floated outside the bar of Charleston harbor. At 11:00 a.m., a Mordecai Lines steamer, the Isabel, arrived at Sumter's wharf. Major Anderson stood on the deck of the Isabel while his cannon fired a salute to the American flag. Two of Anderson's men were accidentally killed in the salute, the first casualties of the Civil War. They were laid in a grave in the middle of the parade ground, "after the earth had been heaped upon the sacred spot, a volley was fired, the drum beat its solemn roll, and the garrison was transferred to The Isabel." The steamer took the small Union garrison out to the Federal fleet waiting off the bar. The Palmetto flag was raised over the fort by Franklin J. Moses Jr. and J. L. Dearing of the governor's staff. Fire Chief Nathan was sent to put out the fires.[124]

The war no one believed would happen, the war Solomon Cohen and M. C. Mordecai dreaded and Eugenia Phillips and Raphael J. Moses welcomed, was under way, and the Jewish Confederates made their choice—to go to war.

Why did Southern Jewish boys and men flock to the Confederate banner? What was their motivation? Why did men who, in many cases, had only recently come to the South risk their life and limb for the Southern cause? It is a truism that the Civil War was brought about by the dispute over slavery. One need only consult the secession conventions' resolutions to ascertain their reasons for seceding or, in the South's view, declaring independence. The South Carolina Declaration of the Immediate Causes of Secession rests the case for secession on slavery: "The Northern states 'have denounced as sinful the institution of slavery,' they have encouraged abolitionist societies, and have incited 'servile insurrection.' Lincoln has declared himself an enemy of slavery and the Republican Party 'announced … that a war must be waged against slavery.'"[125] And this resolution, together with the convention's address to the slaveholding states, constituted South Carolina's official reasons for seceding from the Union. Texas adopted a "declaration of causes," which included the election of Lincoln and the lack of protection of slavery in the territories.[126] Gov. Thomas O. Moore of Louisiana called for a secession convention because he did not feel that "it comports with the honor and self-respect of Louisiana, as a slaveholding state to live under the government of a Black Republican."[127] Solomon Cohen of Savannah perceived early on that the war was about slavery. "I fear," he wrote his aunt, "that the epitaph long since written for us is about to be engraved upon the tomb of the Union: 'Here lies a people who in seeking the liberty of the Negro, lost their own.'"[128]

Some Jewish Confederates, like many of their Gentile comrades, fought for what they termed their "liberty" and freedom, which included the right to own slaves. Pvt. Eugene Henry Levy of New Orleans reflected the sentiments of many a Johnny Reb when he wrote in his diary in October 1864 that he objected to a proposal made by Judah P. Benjamin that slaves who fought for the Confederacy be freed. The principle "that slaves are in their proper sphere as they are at present situated within the boundaries of the Confederacy is one of the grand incentives to the waging of war against the United States."[129] Like their fellow Johnny Rebs, a small percentage of Jewish Confederates owned slaves themselves, although many came from slaveholding families, and all came from slaveholding communities where relatives, friends, business associates, and customers owned slaves. And even those who owned no slaves had a stake in the South's racial caste system.

Pvt. Simon Mayer of the Natchez Southrons detested the Yankee invaders and believed them to be a gang of abolitionists. "I sympathize," he wrote his family with "the poor victims of abolition despotism." He accused the "damnable followers & supporters of Abraham Lincoln" of "making war upon decrepit old age, defenseless women & helpless infancy," of "rapine, destruction & murder," of burning Southern homes and of "starving our people" into subjugation and even "their new doctrine of 'miscegenation.'" "I doubt not," he concluded, "that the amalgamation doctrine would be of benefit to the Yankee race."[130]

It is also true, however, that individual Confederate soldiers had their own reasons for fighting which did not include slavery or race. In fact, most Jewish Johnny Rebs, like their fellow countrymen, believed they were fighting for their own liberty and in defense of their homes. They believed they were patriots fighting for independence, life, liberty, and property as the soldiers of 1776 had done.[131] Gustavus Poznanski Jr., the son of the former rabbi at K. K. Beth Elohim in Charleston, came back to his native Charleston from Canada to join his comrades in the defense of his native city. At "the breaking out of the war," his obituary reads, Poznanski "was temporarily residing at the North where his parents were forced to spend much of their time on account of impaired health.… His parents are still in Canada having been unable to obtain the requisite passes to come South." Obviously, neither he nor his parents, who were residing in Canada, owned slaves. And it strains credulity that Poznanski returned to South Carolina and gave his life at the age of nineteen to defend the institution of slavery. "No one more willingly gave a life," another Poznanski obituary read, "to free the soil from the invader. In giving it away, he had that glorious consolation that has cheered the dying moments of so many who have fallen for liberty."[132]

Jewish Johnny Rebs were also motivated by a sense of duty and honor, powerful emotions in Victorian America. "Victorians," McPherson wrote, "understood duty to be a binding moral obligation involving reciprocity: one had a duty to defend the flag under whose protection one had lived." A fallen Jewish Confederate, Cpl. Isaac Valentine, mortally wounded in the same battle as his comrade Poznanski, said on his deathbed that he had done his duty and died for his country.[133]

Moses Ezekiel of Richmond at the age of twelve. Ezekiel was too young to enlist when the war began, but he saw action later as a VMI cadet and participated in the famous Battle of New Market. After the war, with the encouragement of Robert E. Lee, he pursued his dream of becoming a sculptor. This photograph was taken in 1856. Letters, memoirs, and obituaries reflect the Jewish soldiers' chief reasons for fighting: To do their duty, to protect their homeland, to protect Southern rights and liberty and, once the war began, loyalty to their comrades in arms. Philip Rosenheim of Richmond had just returned home from marching to the Chickahominy and had "fallen into sweet slumber" when his sister Rebecca awoke him. The bells had tolled, informing his militia company to gather. "I was very weak and had a severe headache," he wrote his family, "but still I dressed myself buckled on my accouterments, thinking I would not shrink from my duty and would follow the company wherever it goes, as our Flag says, when duty calls tis ours to obey."[134] Julius Yaretzky, a Polish immigrant who lived in Shuqualak, Mississippi, and served as first sergeant in Company A, 33d Alabama, spoke for many of his fellow Jewish Confederates when he wrote his son after the war, "The war between the states was for principles of states' rights."[135] "We were thoroughly imbued with the idea," Moses Ezekiel of Richmond wrote in his memoirs, "that we were not fighting for the perpetuation of slavery, but for the principle of State's rights and free trade, and in the defense of our homes, which were being ruthlessly invaded."[136]

Slavery was an evil that Virginia had inherited, and "we wanted to get rid of … [Virginia] tried to arbitrate for peace … but it failed. No slavery question entered the matter at all, but when [Lincoln] called upon Virginia to furnish her quota of troops to help subjugate her sister Southern states … Virginia … seceded from the Union."[137] Isaac Hirsch of Fredericksburg, a soldier in the 30th Virginia, visited the battlefield at Second Manassas, where Stonewall Jackson defeated General Pope's army. "It is bad," he wrote in his diary, "that the dead Yankees could not be buried as I don't like to see any human being lay on the top of the earth and rot, but it is a fit emblem for the invader of our soil for his bones to bleach on the soil he invades, especially of a people that wish to be left alone and settle down to their own peaceful pursuits."[138] J. Gottlieb wrote from Corinth, Mississippi, in June 1861 on stationery decorated with the Stars and Bars that he wished "to face the Lincolnites as soon as possible. Our cause is a right one & we will be victorious."[139]

Jewish men, like other Southern men, were encouraged to fight by their mothers and sisters. At the start of the war, Catherine Ezekiel, Moses's mother, said "she would not own a son who would not fight for his home and country."[140] Mary Chesnut wrote of her friend "Mem" Cohen's dedication to the cause. "Our soldiers, thank God, are men after our own heart, cries Miriam of the house of Aaron," Mary wrote in her diary in May 1862.[141] Phoebe Pember recalled that the women of the South had urged their men to resist the enemy with force if necesary[142]; see page 44.

It speaks volumes about the South that many a Jewish youth left the German fatherland to avoid military service only to voluntarily enlist in the Confederate army soon after arriving in Dixie. Myer Schwabacher left Germany to avoid military service and arrived in Richmond just as the war began. He enlisted, although as a foreigner he had no obligation to do so. Charles Wessolowsky's parents sent him to America in 1858 because they dreaded his being forced into the Prussian army. His older brother, Asa, had settled in Georgia, a place, he said in letters home, which was a land of freedom and opportunity. When Charles arrived, his brother sent him off to peddle goods in the "wilds" of rural Georgia. Given his experience with anti-Semitic Prussians, Charles was afraid to go out into this strange land. But he found, to his surprise, that his customers, the rural farmers of Georgia, were definitely not prejudiced Prussians. Instead, he was warmly received. Asa and Charles had the respect of their countrymen and they enlisted on May 7, 1862, in Company G, 57th Georgia (later Company E, 32d Georgia).[143]

Pvt. Theodore Kohn was a young immigrant from Fürth, Bavaria, who settled in Orangeburg, South Carolina. When war was imminent, his father, who lived in New York, practically ordered him to leave the South and come live with him so that he would not have to "serve as a soldier-slave for an unjust cause." Kohn, however, enlisted in the Edisto Rifles, Company A, of Hagood's 1st South Carolina Volunteers. (Courtesy of Julian Hennig Jr. of Columbia.)

Theodore Kohn of Orangeburg, South Carolina, came from Fürth, Bavaria, to live with his uncle. His parents settled in New York. In February 1861 Theodore's mother wrote that she hoped "no civil war will break out," but if it did, the "ones guilty of high treason will be all hanged." When war was imminent, Philip Kohn wrote his son, Theodore, in German: "I want to tell you my very desire, that you leave this un-happy country [South Carolina] as soon as possible, because it will be ruined within a few years. … I got [you] away from the old world, from the old ‘rust’ fatherland, so that [you would not have] to serve as a soldier-slave for an unjust cause. For what? … the Lord make your mind clear and lead you as soon as possible!” Ignoring his father’s earnest entreaties, Theodore enlisted enthusiastically in Company A, Hagood’s 1st S.C. Volunteers, the Edisto Rifles, one of the first to volunteer. His sergeant, William V. Izlar, recalled Kohn in his company history as being “thoroughly Southern in sentiment and principle,” and that he had been among the first to heed the call to arms. He served throughout the war, rising to the rank of corporal in Company G, 25th South Carolina, the Eutaw Regiment, and saw action in Charleston, North Carolina, and Virginia. Kohn fought at First Manassas, Battery Wagner, Petersburg, Cold Harbor, and Drewry’s Bluff, where he was wounded. Holding up his hand he told his sergeant, “Look here, Willie, what the d—d Yankees have done to me.”[144]

The social pressure to enlist was also a strong factor in many a young Confederate’s decision to join the army. According to Gary W. Gallagher, 75 to 85 percent of the Confederacy’s available draft-age white population served in the military.[145] And a young Southern male had a difficult time in 1862 and 1863 explaining why he was not in uniform. Simon Baruch, a Prussian from Schwersenz, immigrated to Camden, South Carolina, as did his younger brother Herman. When Simon enlisted he admonished Herman to stay out of the war. But Herman joined the cavalry because, as he told Simon, “I could no longer stand it. I could no longer look into the faces of the ladies.”[146]

There was also the adventure of war and the bounty paid in advance. Young men who worked at jobs they disliked, such as peddlers, mechanics, and store clerks, saw a chance to escape. Lewis Leon was such a clerk. An unmarried immigrant who spoke German as well as English, he enlisted for six months at the age of nineteen in the Charlotte Grays, Company C, 1st North Carolina. (In six months, most Southerners believed, the war would be over.) He was issued a fine uniform. “We were all boys between the ages of eighteen and twenty-one…. Our trip was full of joy and pleasure, for at every station where our train stopped the ladies showered us with flowers and Godspeed. We marched to the Fair Grounds. The streets were lined with people, cheering us.” But Leon also believed he was right. “I still say,” he concludes in his diary, “our Cause was just, nor do I regret one thing that I have done to cripple the North.”[147] Asa and Charles Wessolowsky enlisted in the 57th Georgia in May, 1862, hoping to avoid the battlefield, but glad of the fifty-dollar sign-up bounty. Asa’s daughter recalled that the bonus “looked mighty inviting and was a lot of money for doing nothing.”[148] The 57th was redesignated the 32d, and the Wessolowsky brothers found themselves doing hard fighting at Secessionville, at Morris Island, and in Florida. Charles participated in the defense of Atlanta in 1864 and was captured.

Another young Jewish volunteer, Isaac (“Ike”) Hermann, sounded the same theme: “I found in this country [the South] an ideal and harmonious people; they treated me as one of their own; in fact for me, it was the land of Canaan where milk and honey flowed.” Hermann believed his fellow countrymen were imposed upon by their Northern brethren, and that is why he joined in their defense. Hermann, like Leon, was an immigrant. He arrived from Alsace-Lorraine in 1859 in a four-masted schooner at Castle Garden, a massive structure at the tip of Manhattan, and settled in Sandersville, Washington County, Georgia. His cousin Abe Hermann was a merchant and ran a store at Fenns Bridge. From the beginning of the war to the end of his life, Hermann believed in the righteousness of the Southern cause. The “Slave States … had a perfect right” to secede, he argues in his 1911 Memoirs of a Veteran, Who Served as a Private in the 60s in the War between the States.[149]

Jewish Confederates, like other immigrants and African Americans, had a special burden during the war. They had to prove that Jews would fight. One of the staples of nineteenth century anti-Semitism was that the Jews were citizens of no country except the Jewish Nation. The “Wandering Jew” was a staple of folk anti-Semitism, found in prose, poetry, music, and even in names of plants and birds. Jews were said to be disloyal, unpatriotic, and cowardly They had lived in ghettos in Europe, kept to themselves, refused to intermarry or assimilate with their neighbors, and had fled Europe to avoid military service.[150] Many a Southern Jewish boy set out to disprove these calumnies.

Simon Mayer was as fervent in his support of the Confederate cause in 1864 as he was when the war began. In a letter to his family in April 1864, he unsuccessfully urged his brother Henry, who had not enlisted, to join his unit, the “Natchez Southrons” or, failing that, > to at least join the Army now battling for our rights and independence. I hope he has awakened to the realities of the situation, & no longer can remain passive to the scenes that are daily enacted in the grand drama now in full play upon this continent, but that he sees that he too has a part to play, and will with light heart & strong arm, backed by a determination to do or die, come forth and take his place on the broad arena. I am in full earnest in regard to the course I have marked out for him, and I do not want it said, when Peace shall once more gladden our hearts, that a brother of mine, who had nothing to keep him back, acted the coward, and was afraid to come out & meet his would be masters, and subjugators. I hope that my pleadings in the last few letters that I have written are not in vain.[151]

Marx Mitteldorfer of the 1st Virginia Cavalry, on hearing the remark that the Jewish soldiers were in the habit of firing and falling back, invited the accuser to follow him.

“Mitteldorfer rode so far to the front (needless to say, alone) that his captain had to send him word to return to the ranks or he might be shot by his comrades,” wrote Herbert T. Ezekiel and Gaston Lichtenstein in The History of the Jews of Richmond, published in 1917.[152]

Other Jews fought to make a place in Southern society for the Jews who would come after them. Philip Whitlock wrote in his memoir that “especially when I was of the Jewish Faith I thought that if I am negligent in my duty as a citizen of this country, it would unfavorably reflect on the whole Jewish race and religion.”[153] Charles Wessolowsky said after the war that “sometimes he felt like a Jewish missionary among the Gentiles to show the way for other Jews to follow.” Early-twentieth-century Jewish historians were anxious to defend the courage and bravery of the generation that preceded them. “There existed no occasion to threaten the young or, for that matter, the middle-aged, with the white ‘feather,’” Ezekiel and Lichtenstein wrote. “None held back or hesitated…. The Jewish youth were no different from the others. Virginia needed them—that was sufficient…. That they did their duty is a matter of such common note as to excite no comment.”[154]

Finally, Jewish tradition also played a part. From the Book of Esther and from Jeremiah (“Seek the welfare of the city to which I have exiled you,” Jer. 29:7) to rabbinical law, Judiaism taught respect and obedience to the established goverment. Jews had traditionally aligned themselves with monarchs and conservative regimes for self-protection from the masses. The traditional Jewish prayer for the government, dating to the sixteenth century, called upon God to “bless, guard, protect, help, exalt, magnify, and highly aggrandize” the king and the royal family and inspire them with benevolence “toward us and all Israel our brethren.” In short, as the new Confedracy was now their lawful government, Jewish tradition demanded loyalty and obedience to it.[155]

Thus, Jewish Johnny Rebs went off to war for a variety of reasons: Patriotism and love of country; to defend their homeland, their yearning for a fatherland they could believe in; Jewish tradition as they understood it; to demonstrate to the North that their rights, liberty, and property, including slaves, could not be assailed; hatred for the Yankees; social and peer pressure; being caught up in the frenzy of secession and war; to escape from home and everyday work and see the world; for adventure, pay, and excitement; and to prove that Jews would fight. “The Jews of the Confederacy had good reason to be loyal to their section,” Rabbi Korn concluded. “Nowhere else in America—certainly not in the ante-bellum North—had Jews been accorded such an opportunity to be complete equals as in the old South.”[156]

Jewish Southerners would not seek shelter nor would they escape from this storm, no matter how “vast and terrible.” They had grown accustomed to breathing the free air of Dixie and were determined, like the Jews of Shreveport, to stand by, protect, and honor the flag of the Confederacy.

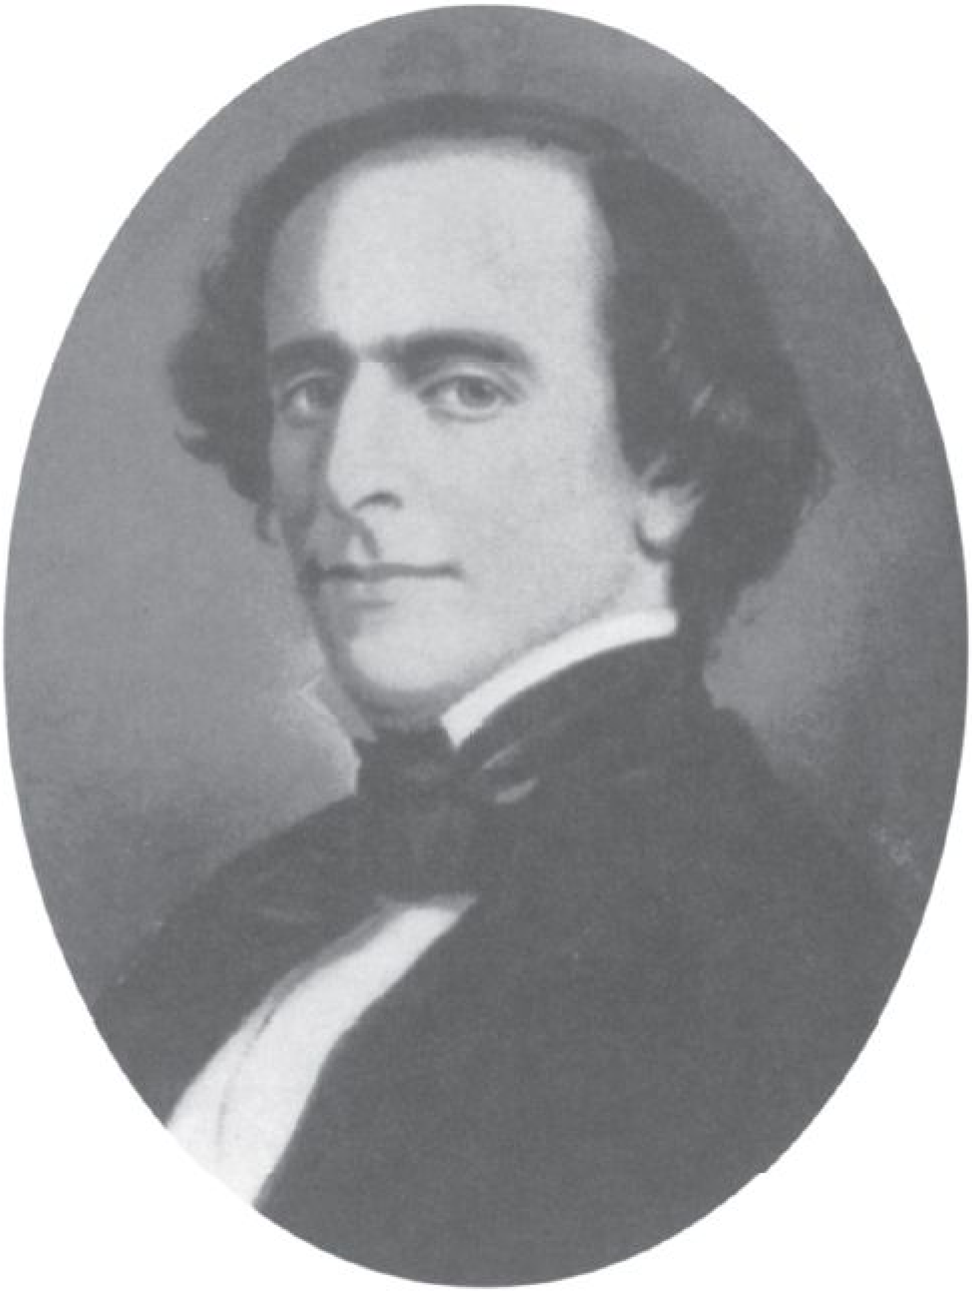
Two Sephardic Senators

BOTH JUDAH PHILIP BENJAMIN and David Levy Yulee were Sephardic Jews born in the West Indies, were raised in the South, and were U.S. senators on the eve of the Civil War. Both played a prominent role in secession. Benjamin became a Confederate cabinet officer. Yulee returned to Florida to protect his business interests. But each supported the Confederacy in his own way. Benjamin was born a British citizen on August 11, 1811, in St. Croix in the Virgin Islands, and Yulee (born David Levy) on the island of St. Thomas, then a Danish colony. Benjamin's mother, Rebecca de Mendes, claimed descent from one of the most prominent Jewish families of Spain, although her mother was of Ashkenazic ancestry.[1] The family left the Iberian Peninsula for London and thence to the West Indies. Judah's father, Philip Benjamin, was less illustrious. The elder Benjamin was described by one historian as "a Talmudic scholar, naïve, lackluster, far more concerned with study than with making a living." Pierce Butler was less kind. He described the senior Benjamin as "that rara avis, an unsuccessful Jew."[2]

Rebecca, Philip, and their young children moved to North Carolina in 1813 and then in 1821 to Charleston, South Carolina. Philip Benjamin became an American citizen in Charleston in 1826. It was a large family by 1821 with eight children: Rebecca ("Sis" or "Penny"), Solomon, Judah, Joseph, Hannah (whom Philip called "Harriet" or "Hatty"), Julia, Penina, and Jacob.[3] Life was not easy in Charleston. Although free to practice their religion and participate in the life of the community, the Benjamin family were poor. Judah's parents owned a small and not particularly profitable fruit stand on King Street. Mrs. Benjamin kept it open on Saturday, the Jewish Sabbath, much to the dismay of the Jewish community. As a boy, Judah worked in the shop.

For a time, Judah's father was active in the affairs of Beth Elohim. He joined a group of co-religionists in 1824 in their attempt to "reform" and Americanize the orthodox Jewish service by shortening the service and increasing the use of English. While the early records of Beth Elohim have been lost, Benjamin's modern biographer, Eli N. Evans, believes that "it is probable that Judah was one of the first children confirmed in the new Reformed Society." According to Rabbi Malcolm H. Stern, Benjamin's father had the distinction of being the only member expelled, apparently on account of his failure to pay his dues. Judah was educated at the Hebrew Orphan Society and was probably sent to Yale College by Moses Lopez, a prominent Jewish merchant. He may have taken a Hebrew psalter (prayer book) with him when he left for New Haven.[4]



David Yulee as a young man. (Courtesy of the Jacob Rader Marcus Center, American Jewish Archives, Cincinnati, Ohio.)

David Yulee had a more affluent boyhood. He was known as David Levy from the day of his birth until 1845, when he changed his name to David Levy Yulee, apparently to suit his new bride, Nancy Wickliffe, the daughter of a former governor of Kentucky.[5] (In the interest of clarity, he is referred to in this work as “David Yulee.”) His family claimed an even more exotic ancestry than the Benjamins. Yulee's father, Moses Elias Levy, was born in Mogador, Morocco, in 1782, reputedly the son of the grand vizier (counselor) of the emperor of Morocco. Levy told a friend, Maj. George R. Fairbanks, that his father had discovered a conspiracy on the part of the heir to the throne, and the grand vizier caused the young pretender to be imprisoned. When the emperor died and the son came to the throne, the vizier was, in Fairbank's version, forced to flee, taking his family to Gibraltar. In fact, Yulee's grandfather was one of a number of courtiers to the sultan.[6]

Moses Levy left home at a young age and settled in St. Thomas by 1800. A variety of business interests made him wealthy. Judah Benjamin's father or uncle and Moses Levy may have been in business together on St. Thomas in the firm of Levy, Benjamin and Robles.[7] Florida was still a part of the Spanish empire and was governed from Cuba, but he realized that it was only a matter of time before Florida became a part of the United States. Moses Levy purchased a large tract of land in North Florida and in and around St. Augustine, which he intended to turn into a colony for European Jews. With his family, and possibly co-religionists, he became an American citizen. By all accounts Moses Elias Levy was a highly educated, observing Jew, actively involved in Jewish affairs.[8]

Thus, young Yulee grew up in an affluent, cosmopolitan, educated Jewish family. On one of his many trips to the United States, Moses Levy brought his son, David, age nine, not to Florida, which was then a rural backwater, but to Norfolk, Virginia, where he placed him with his good friend Moses Myers, the great merchant. Young David lived with the Myers family in Norfolk for eight years, from 1819 until 1827, when he turned seventeen. According to Yulee's son, C. Wickliffe Yulee, Yulee attended the prestigious Norfolk Academy. These early years were spent in one of the most venerable cities of the Old South, and Yulee's values, beliefs, and social outlook were influenced by antebellum Virginia.[9]

Unlike Yulee, Benjamin had few advantages. As he grew to young manhood, Judah Benjamin built his career on intellectual prowess and a legendary capacity for hard work. He studied at Yale from the age of fourteen to seventeen but left under mysterious circumstances. His enemies later charged him with theft. Benjamin denied it, and the record is inconclusive. After leaving Yale, young Judah and his older cousin Henry M. Hyams moved to New Orleans to seek their fortunes. New Orleans in 1828 was booming. Purchased by the United States in 1803, Louisiana was still very much a multinational and multicultural state. The population was exploding; shipping, trade, and sugar production were rapidly expanding. It was a place where a young Jewish man with talent and determination could succeed.[10]

Judah Benjamin's rise in New Orleans was meteoric. He made friends rapidly, learned French, and studied law in his spare time. He was admitted to the bar in 1832 and began a remarkable legal career. He coauthored a legal digest with a Yale classmate, Thomas Slidell, the brother of John Slidell, the leading politician of antebellum Louisiana. Benjamin perfected his skills in the courtroom, especially as an appellate lawyer. By the early 1840s, Benjamin was widely recognized as an outstanding attorney. A little volume published in 1846, Sketches of Life and Character in Louisiana, stated that he was "emphatically the Commercial Lawyer of our city, and one of the most successful advocates at our bar. … To his many scholarly acquirements he adds the French language, which he speaks with fluency and elegance." He was admitted to the bar of the Supreme Court of the United States at the same term as Abraham Lincoln.[11]

Judah P. Benjamin's townhouse at 327 Bourbon Street in New Orleans. This house has been identified as Benjamin's townhouse in the Julius Bisno manuscript collection. Benjamin practiced law in New Orleans before the war and could walk up Bourbon Street to his law office across Canal Street at 37 Camp Street, now demolished. Henry Hyams's law office was nearby, at 165 Canal Street. (Author's collection. Photograph by Susan Rosen.)

Unfortunately, Benjamin could not depend upon his wife for support of any kind. In 1833, when he was twenty-one, he had married Natalie St. Martin, a beautiful, witty, vivacious sixteen-year-old Creole from a prominent Catholic family. One daughter, Ninette, was born ten years later. The match was not a good one. Although in the early years the Benjamins lived with the St. Martins and Judah was close to the St. Martin family all his life, his wife did not want to share his life. When he purchased a sugar plantation, Belle Chasse, Natalie found it dull and left for France in 1845, taking their only child with her. Yet he supported her and his daughter for the rest of his life. He visited them in Paris, and on his death left them the bulk of his estate. After his wife left him, Benjamin invited his mother, by then separated from his father, to live with him.[12]

Benjamin climbed the political ladder the old-fashioned way as campaign worker, manager, lawyer, and finally as a candidate for office. He was "a veritable dynamo in the Whig organization in Louisiana," according to Louis Gruss. He was elected to the Louisiana House of Representatives from New Orleans in 1842 and was an active participant in the constitutional conventions of 1844-45 and 1852, called to rewrite the state constitution. His brilliant performance at the 1852 constitutional convention won him many supporters, and he was elected to the Louisiana Senate as a Whig that same year. At the right place at the right time—and with the right connections—Benjamin was elected to the U.S. Senate, a vacancy having coincidentally occurred around the same time.[13]

When he was elected, Benjamin was the first acknowledged Jew in the Senate. Yulee was the first American of Jewish descent to be elected to the Senate, but Yulee denied his connection to Judaism. Benjamin, according to Eli Evans, "acknowledged his Judaism." He was never a member of a synagogue but never renounced Judaism or converted to Christianity (although, on his deathbed, his wife had the last rites of the Catholic church performed). Benjamin was keenly aware of his Jewish appearance. "I first met him at dinner at President Pierce's house." Varina Howell Davis later wrote, "His type was decidedly Hebrew; he had not a marked line in his face which was boyish in the extreme … [He] had rather the air of a witty bon vivant than that of a great Senator." On one occasion Benjamin went before a justice of the peace to secure an affidavit. The judge inserted the name "Judas" where "Judah" should have been, whereupon Benjamin was said to have grabbed the paper, thrown it down on the desk, and exclaimed, "My God, man, is not Judah Jew enough?"[14]

On the other hand, Benjamin was a close friend to Jews in his political circle. He was close to David Yulee while they served together in the Senate, and Gustavus Myers, the leading Jewish lawyer in Richmond while Benjamin served there in the Confederate cabinet. He always welcomed Jewish visitors and made no pretense of being anything other than Jewish. Young Pvt. Eugene H. Levy of New Orleans visited Benjamin in wartime Richmond and brought regards from his father, “old Jack Levy,” whom Benjamin knew.[15] The 1846 Sketches of Life and Character in Louisiana told its readers what they were undoubtedly curious about: “Mr. Benjamin is by birth, and as his name imports, an Israelite. Yet how far he still adheres to the religion of his fathers, I cannot tell, though I should doubt whether the matter troubled him much.” The New Orleans Courier stated in 1844, “Of Mr. Benjamin’s religious views we know nothing.”[16]

In point of fact, Benjamin was completely unconcerned about religion. Pierce Butler, Benjamin’s first biographer, accurately described Benjamin’s feelings: “He did not forswear Judaism or conceal his Jewish origin; he remained always … a firm believer in immortality and in a personal Divinity; he was not ashamed, rather justly proud, of his lineage, and in temperament always retained much of the best of the traits of his people; but he had ceased to hold any active communion with Judaism.” Substitute Christianity for Judaism and this would be an accurate description of Abraham Lincoln’s and Thomas Jefferson’s religious views. Benjamin “had no positive or active interest in Jews or in Judaism,” Rabbi Korn concluded.[17]

Benjamin’s Jewishness, although always an impediment to his political career, was not a major stumbling block. He had no public connection to Judaism, and organized religion played no role in his life. And he had married into a Creole Catholic family. He had strong promoters in his law partners and friends at the bar. He was a close friend of the powerful Slidell clan and a protégé of John Slidell. Louisiana in the 1850s was an extraordinarily fluid society with a variety of religious, national, and ethnic groups, unlike any other American state at that time. These factors combined with Benjamin’s personality and his urban and plantation ties, to make his candidacy a logical one in the Louisiana of the 1850s.[18]

Like Judah Benjamin, David Yulee had a poor relationship with his father. In 1827 David and his older brother, Elias, were embroiled in some sort of controversy with their father. The disagreement led the elder Levy to terminate his sons’ education. Elias was forced to leave Harvard and David left Norfolk. Both returned to one of their father’s sugar plantations in Alachua County, Florida, which they managed for several years. Although he lived in relative isolation, David visited St. Augustine often and clearly had his mind set on bigger and better things than farming. Bright and energetic, Yulee decided on a career in law. He studied with Judge Robert R. Reid, later territorial governor of Florida, was admitted to the bar in 1832 at age twenty-one, and practiced in St. Augustine for a few years.[19] Yulee had a natural aptitude for politics. He became clerk to the Territorial Legislature before Florida became a state. In 1837 he was elected to the Florida legislature and in 1838 was a delegate to the convention which wrote Florida’s constitution. In 1841 Yulee campaigned for the office of Territorial Delegate from Florida to the U.S. Congress. He and his fellow Jacksonian Democrats denounced the “Federal, Aristocratic, Bank Paper, Stock Jobbing Party”—that is, the Whigs. The Whigs denounced Yulee as a Jew. He was elected anyway and served in that capacity until 1845, when he was elected Florida’s first U.S. senator.[20] Before Moses Levy died in 1854, father and son, who were completely estranged, attempted a reconciliation, but David’s commitment to his Christian religious beliefs and Moses Levy’s desire to control not only his son’s but his daughter-in-law’s religious beliefs made that impossible. In a loving but firm December 1842 letter to his father, Yulee wrote that he deplored but understood his father’s refusal to address him as his son, reflecting the Orthodox Jewish custom of treating those who convert or marry outside of the faith as dead. “I cannot but pray that time and circumstances will gradually lessen the breach which has divided you from your child,” he told his father.[21]

Yulee devoted his time as Territorial Delegate to what we would now call constituent service. Wheeling and dealing in Washington was his forte. He led the drive to bring Florida into the Union and was the Father of Florida statehood. He was an early advocate of Southern rights. The Southern bloc embraced him, and he was well hated by some New Englanders. John Quincy Adams, the former one-term president, was a member of Congress when Yulee (then called Levy) served as Territorial Delegate from Florida. He disliked Levy intensely on account of his being Jewish. Adam’s diary mentions Levy often: “I found Levy, the Jew Delegate from Florida, making a red hot speech against the President’s message declaring his intention to put an end to the Florida war.” On another occasion Adams refers to Levy as “the alien Jew Delegate from Florida,” and by 1843 he wrote: “Weller moved a reconsideration to let Levy make another hour speech, which he did. I was provoked to the boiling point, but made no reply.”[22]

Once Florida was in the Union, Yulee embarked on a campaign to be elected to the U.S. Senate. It was a bitter campaign complete with the now familiar anti-Semitic slurs. But Yulee prevailed. He served two terms in the Senate, the first from 1845 to 1851 and the second from 1856 until he resigned in 1861. The year 1845 was momentous for Yulee. On March 10, the state of Florida named Levy County in his honor. On July 1, he was sworn in as a senator, and, on December 29, he had his name changed by act of the Florida legislature to David Levy Yulee. It was his grandfather’s name (or one of them) and it was a well-known Jewish name. Soon after, he married Nancy Wickliffe, a great beauty whom he probably met at the White House during John Tyler’s administration. Julia Tyler, the president’s daughter, and Nancy Wickliffe were friends, and Nancy’s father, Charles A. Wickliffe, was postmaster general. Nancy’s brother Robert C.

Wickliffe served as governor of Louisiana from 1856 to 1860. She was a devout Christian and was known to her contemporaries as the “Wickliffe Madonna.”[23]

We do not know what went on in Yulee’s mind with regard to his name change. We do know that he had left the practice of Judaism and had now embraced Christianity, although he apparently never formally converted. His marriage seemed to precipitate his name change, and he may very well have agreed to embrace Christianity in deference to his wife’s wishes. Yulee also began to identify with his grandfather Yulee rather than his father.[24]

Yulee became a Presbyterian, as his letters to his wife of many years attest, but he did not regularly attend church. It was, his daughter recalled in the 1930s, “an event in the Yulee household when he did.” But he was fervent in his religious beliefs. Yulee continued to associate and befriend Jews. He was close to Judah Benjamin when they served together in the Senate, and it was Yulee who convinced Benjamin not to resign from the Senate during Benjamin’s travails with his promiscuous wife. Yulee certainly could never escape being called a Jew. It was an issue in all of his elections. Even though their parents were Presbyterians, the Yulee children—Wickliffe, Margaret, Nancy (or Nannie Christian), and Florida—were brought up as Episcopalians, and Yulee’s son claimed that his grandfather, Moses Elias Levy, was a “Mahometan” and was not Jewish at all. The grandson, who may never have known his grandfather, simply ignored the pioneering efforts Moses Levy made to settle and develop the state of Florida.[25]

Yulee’s service in the Senate was workmanlike. His son accurately described his father’s contribution as giving his time “to that valuable work which is called routine, because there is nothing spectacular about it.” Yulee was a practical man. During his senatorial career, he was a friend to Stephen A. Douglas and a protégé of John C. Calhoun. He represented the views of his constituents and defended the institution of slavery. He was a slaveholder and planter as well as a businessman, lawyer, real estate developer, and railroad promoter. He thus appealed to a wide spectrum of Florida’s electorate, knowing firsthand the feelings of planters and farmers, businessmen and entrepreneurs.[26]

Although Yulee’s father had long been an advocate of the abolition of slavery, Yulee was in the forefront of the defense of the peculiar institution. According to Yulee’s son, the senator was “always solicitous as to the happiness of those dependent upon him,” and would never sell a slave nor buy one if it meant separating families. He did break this rule once, when, according to young Yulee, the slave husband of a shrewish wife insisted on the sale, saying, “Massa, please don’t put yoself out ‘bout dat.” Yulee “became an associate and an ardent admirer of Calhoun,” Dorothy Dodd wrote, “who occasionally honored him by utilizing him as an instrument for the expression of his own views." Yulee deserves much of the credit for the development of the Southern position on the issue of slavery in the territories, arguing long before the Dred Scott decision that the territories belonged to all of the people and therefore slaveholders had a right to take their property wherever they wished. Yulee was an early supporter of Southern rights, was a member of the Congressional caucus which adopted Calhoun's famous 1849 address, and prepared a detailed memorandum on the proposal for a Southern convention, which ultimately materialized in the Nashville Convention of 1850.[27]

Yulee's views on secession were initially radical but, within the context of Southern political thought, became more moderate the closer the nation drew toward civil war. Like all Southern senators, he insisted on the constitutional right of slaveholders to take slaves into the territories. He felt that the North had violated the Missouri Compromise by even proposing the Wilmot Proviso. He signed Calhoun's Address to the Southern People. In the absence of a constitutional amendment protecting Southern rights, Yulee argued for immediate secession. He wrote to Calhoun in 1849 that, absent such an amendment, "the best policy [would be] to take steps at once for a separation." He was intensely involved in the debate on the admission of California as a free state, which he opposed; he voted against the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia; and he opposed the Compromise of 1850 in any form. Newspapers called him the "Florida Fire Eater."[28]

Yulee's views, as it turned out, were too radical for the Florida of the early 1850s. In 1851, Yulee was defeated in an extremely close reelection bid to the senate. Yulee's father-in-law, Governor Wickliffe, wrote Mrs. Yulee, "Mr. Yulee can now devote himself to his own affairs for a few years." And Yulee did turn his attention from politics to his own affairs—namely, developing Florida's railroads.[29]

Judah Benjamin served in the Senate continuously from 1853 to the eve of war. He was on friendly terms with Franklin Pierce, who entertained Benjamin at the White House. Indeed, Benjamin had a national reputation even before his senatorial career. In the late winter of 1852-53, Benjamin was nominated by President Millard Fillmore to the U.S. Supreme Court, an honor he declined. He was, therefore, the first Jew nominated to the Court.[30]

In the Senate, the Whig Benjamin actively promoted Louisiana's commercial interests. He involved himself in trade, treaties, and the development of the railroad. The 1850s, however, were not ordinary times, and slavery, the territories, and sectional conflict dominated the Senate. As the political temperature rose, Benjamin, like his fellow Southern senators, warmed to the subject of the South's right to hold slaves and expand the institution to Kansas, Nebraska, and beyond. Benjamin ably defended slavery and Southern rights in debate. He once replied to Henry Wilson of Massachusetts by pointing out that the Pilgrims enslaved the Indians and sold them as slaves in the West Indies. He was one of the few senators who could stand his ground against Charles Sumner of Massachusetts, one of the Senate's most scholarly members. Yet he was widely respected by all factions and was his own man. Alone of the Southern senators, he publicly disapproved when South Carolina Rep. Preston S. Brooks assaulted Sen. Sumner and beat him with a cane.[31]

Benjamin was a slave owner who, by all accounts, treated his slaves decently. "Some few of his slaves were still living a year or two since," Butler wrote in 1907, "and would tell visitors all sorts of tales of the master of long ago;—none but kindly memories, and romantic legends of the days of glory on the old place."[32] Benjamin thought of slavery as a necessary evil much as Thomas Jefferson did. He was not, like Calhoun or Jefferson Davis, a proslavery ideologue. In 1860, for example, as chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, he reported a bill allowing the Federal government to contract with such organizations as the African Colonization Society to return Africans captured by slave traders engaged in illegal slave trading. Benjamin opposed all of the prominent leaders of his own party to vote for the bill. Benjamin was among the first to propose a Confederate emancipation plan toward the end of the Civil War. He believed slavery to be contrary to natural law.

Benjamin foresaw, as many could not, the ultimate end of the debate over the extension of slavery. In 1854, seven years before the firing on Fort Sumter, he wrote to a fellow Southern Whig: "I am sorry, my dear Sir, that I cannot take quite so hopeful a view of the future as you seem to anticipate." Arguing that the Whigs would divide on sectional lines, Benjamin wrote, "If I be right in this prediction, God knows what awaits us.… What becomes of the Union?"[33]

His responsibilities as a senator were not as time-consuming as those of his modern counterparts in Congress, and Benjamin continued to practice law. Living in Washington allowed him to practice before the Supreme Court, which was then conveniently located in the basement of the Capitol. He continued to negotiate contracts and to represent major commercial clients traveling to distant places. His ability to speak and write fluently in Spanish and French and his encyclopedic knowledge of international law and the law of foreign countries added to his reputation. He was, however, always thought of as a Jew. Once, after making an eloquent argument before the Supreme Court, a justice told his adversary, "You had better look to your laurels, for that little Jew from New Orleans has stated your case out of court."[34]

For a variety of reasons, including the rise of antislavery sentiment in the northern states, the Whig Party fell apart during the 1850s, just as Benjamin predicted it would.

Former Whigs were forced to choose a new party. Benjamin joined the Democratic Party. In 1856, he announced his decision while speaking on the Kansas issue. He argued that the South, which the North perceived as “so excited, so passionate, so violent,” was willing to submit the issue of the extension of slavery into Kansas to the Supreme Court; whereas the “calm, cold, quiet, calculating North” refused to be bound by the Constitution. Sen. John P. Hale of New Hampshire lamented Benjamin’s eloquence. “I have listened,” Hale told the Senate, “with great pleasure, as I always do, on account of [Senator Benjamin’s] acknowledged ability, his great eloquence, his very persuasive powers, his mellifluous voice, his winning and graceful manner. All this only makes me regret that he is in a wrong position.”[35]

Not all of Benjamin’s colleagues were so kind. Sen. Benjamin Wade of Ohio, a violent opponent of slavery, said: “Why, sir, when old Moses, under the immediate inspiration of God Almighty, enticed a whole nation of slaves, and ran away, not to Canada, but to old Canaan, I suppose that Pharaoh and all the chivalry of old Egypt denounced him as a most furious abolitionist … there were not those who loved Egypt better than they loved liberty…. They were not exactly Northern men with Southern principles; but they were Israelites with Egyptian principles.”[36]

Meanwhile, Yulee, out of office, continued to build his railroad empire. He bought a fleet of steamships to complement the railroad. A trunk line was built and the town of Fernandina, owned by the company and located just south of the Georgia line, began to grow into an important port. Floridian boosters saw Fernandina as an eventual rival of New Orleans. Yulee was able to convince northern shipping and railroad interests to invest in the company, and his support and that of his wife’s family for Stephen A. Douglas won him important friends at the Illinois Central Railroad, with which all new railroads hoped to connect.

Yulee, however, could not get politics out of his blood. He had continued to be active in politics and was a leader in Democratic Party politics. Fortunately for his career, the Whig Party collapsed and Florida became solidly Democratic. Thus, in 1855, when a senate seat was once again open, Yulee perceived that the political landscape had changed. Floridians now saw danger in the growing Republican Party, and Yulee’s positions, considered radical in 1850, now drew considerable support. Yulee had also moderated his positions, bringing him closer to the mainstream.

Like all Southern leaders, Yulee was deeply concerned about the growth of the abolitionist movement and the Republican Party. Because of his defeat in 1851, or because he now realized the catastrophe disunion would bring—especially to the railroad industry—Yulee took a more pro-Union stance. He was seen as a political power broker with too much power as well as a candidate and elected official. His enemies campaigned against what they called the “Jew Dynasty” and portrayed Yulee as an “alien, traitor, and proselyte.” But Yulee was an archetypal Jacksonian Democrat who wanted to open up economic opportunities, for the small businessman, the artisan, and the small farmer. He was the embodiment of what Edward Pessen has called the Jacksonian politician: an “astute realist … ambitious for material gain, worldly success and prestige.” Yulee was immensely well liked at this stage of his career. “Although frequently denounced as an alien and a Jew,” Adler concludes, “Yulee became the most popular man in Florida.”[37]

During his second term as senator, Yulee was more interested in building the Florida Railroad Company than in the great issues of the day. As chairman of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Routes, he helped his brother-in-law Joseph Holt (Holt and Yulee had both married Wickliffe sisters) become postmaster general and influenced the awarding of postal contracts to steamship companies. One postal route, for example, was changed from Charleston/Key West to Charleston/Fernandina, where Yulee and Holt had substantial real estate holdings. It is likely that Yulee saw to it that Holt had an economic interest in Fernandina. He secured a mail contract between Charleston and New Orleans for the Florida Railroad, which was worth $160,000 annually. In the battle over the funding of the post office department late in the Buchanan administration, Holt and Yulee had a falling-out.[38]

Yulee opposed the withdrawal of the Southern delegates from the Democratic Party national convention in Charleston in 1860, but he was still adamant that the South never compromise on the issue of slavery in the territories. “I have never,” he wrote the editor of the Tallahassee Floridian, “in any form, nor to any degree … [countenanced] … the idea that the inhabitants of a territory have any power to exclude slave holders.” He urged the South never to abandon that right, or “as I once expressed it, the Liberty of Growth.” He nevertheless urged his fellow Democrats not to send delegates to the ultra-Southern breakaway faction of the party meeting in Richmond, but instead endorsed the action of the regular party convention which was then meeting in Baltimore. This was an unpopular position for a Southern senator at the time. Yulee only broke with Douglas when all was lost and Douglas repudiated the right of secession. Yulee ended up supporting John C. Breckinridge for president in 1860, but his heart was not in it.[39]

Yulee opposed immediate secession in the months leading up to the presidential election. As late as October 1860 he was in favor of preserving the Union. While his fire-eating stance ten years earlier has caused him to be grouped with the radicals, in fact Yulee did not wholeheartedly support secession until after the election of Lincoln. He was actually a “cooperationist”; that is, he favored a solution short of secession until secession became inevitable. He was hopeful a crisis could be averted in November and December, although he notified the legislature in November that he intended to “promptly and joyously” return to Florida if the state seceded. Yulee encouraged Jefferson Davis to serve on the Committee of Thirteen, a group of senators dedicated to compromise. But by January 1861 Yulee had made up his mind to go with his state. He began planning for the secession of Florida. He wrote a blunt letter to the Florida state authorities advising them to seize and occupy Federal forts and arsenals in his state. “The Naval Station and forts at Pensacola are first in consequence. For this a force is necessary,” he wrote, adding that Gov. Joseph E. Brown of Georgia would send a sufficient force to take these facilities if need be. “Lose no time,” he urged, “for my opinion is, troops will be very soon despatched to reinforce and strengthen the forts in Florida." He urged the organization of a Southern government:

> What is advisable is the earliest possible organization of a Southern Confederacy and of a Southern Army. The North is rapidly consolidating against us upon the plan of force. A strong government, as eight States will make, promptly organized, and a strong army with Jeff. Davis for General in Chief, will bring them to a reasonable sense of the gravity of the crisis…. I shall give the enemy a shot next week before retiring. I say enemy. Yes. I am theirs and they are mine….
> Yours in haste,
> D. L. YULEE

This letter would come back to haunt him.[40]

On January 7, he wrote another letter which enclosed copies of resolutions drawn by a group of Southern senators and explained that "the States should go out at once" and organize "a Confederate Government" no later than February 15. Florida seceded on January 10, 1861, and Senator Yulee was one of the first of the Southern senators to announce the secession of a Southern state on the floor of the U.S. Senate.[41] It was a dignified—and sorrowful—farewell.

Yulee was always remembered as an ardent secessionist because of his original support for it. Just a month before, in December 1860, Sen. Andrew Johnson had attacked Yulee and the State of Florida as unappreciative of being a part of the United States. He chastised Yulee and his fellow Floridians, pointing out that $100,000 had been spent by the United States in negotiating for Florida; $6 million to purchase the state; and $25 million to fight and relocate the Seminole Indians. Was Florida going back to Spain, Johnson asked, or to the Seminoles? But Yulee's views had moderated. Even when secession was an accomplished fact, he urged caution. He counseled against the firing on Fort Sumter. Even as war began, Fernandina remained a stronghold for peace.[42]

By a stroke of bad luck, Joseph Holt, Yulee's estranged former brother-in-law (Holt's wife had died), became secretary of war just as the Union was breaking apart. It was said that within five minutes of his appointment, Holt made plans to provision Fort Sumter and set in motion the sailing of the Star of the West for Charleston harbor. Holt, a Kentuckian who had lived in Mississippi, remained fiercely loyal to the Union and convinced President Buchanan to reinforce the Pensacola forts and take a more aggressive stand for the Union. Holt's actions were an affront to the state of Florida and obviously affected Yulee. It was around this time in early January that Yulee wrote his pro-secession letters. It was also around this time that both Yulee and his fellow Florida senator, Stephen R. Mallory, attempted to procure from Holt information on munitions, equipment, and the Florida arsenals. Holt refused to provide the requested information and undoubtedly resented the request, made twice by Mallory and Yulee. All semblance of a relationship between Yulee and Holt ended.[43]

Before leaving Washington, Yulee participated in the Peace Conference called by the governor of Virginia. (His father-in-law, Charles Wickliffe, was chairman of the rules committee.) He also kept his friends informed about the movement of troops and ships. On January 28, 1861, he sent this telegram home: “The Brooklyn is bound to Pensacola. Two companies on board.” [44]

Yulee’s controversial personality has, with some justification, colored history’s view of him. His role in the Civil War was hardly heroic, and his motives in supporting secession have been questioned. Robert L. Clarke argues that it was most likely Yulee’s substantial financial interest in the Florida Railroad Company that caused him to “quickly and heartily” endorse secession. The Florida railroad was heavily in debt to northern banks. This was a contemporary charge in the northern press. The New York Times in an anti-Semitic outburst charged that Yulee was no longer getting the “fat mail contracts and subsidies” he had received and “it is well known that it was because his Jew heart did not get all it craved that he urged the secession of Florida—and like the base Judean, threw away a pearl richer than all his tribe.” (The Northern Jewish press took great umbrage at this slur, as Yulee was no longer a Jew but “had been an Israelite, long, long ago.”)[45]

But, it can just as well be argued that Yulee’s investment in the railroad was a reason to oppose secession, which, in fact, his son suggests in his biography. Adler argues flatly that “economic factors [that is, the railroad] were primarily responsible” for Yulee’s change of heart. In any event, Yulee was and always had been in favor of the right of secession, and many Southerners saw the creation of a Southern confederacy as an opportunity to establish economic independence from the North, to create new wealth, and even to repudiate debts.[46]

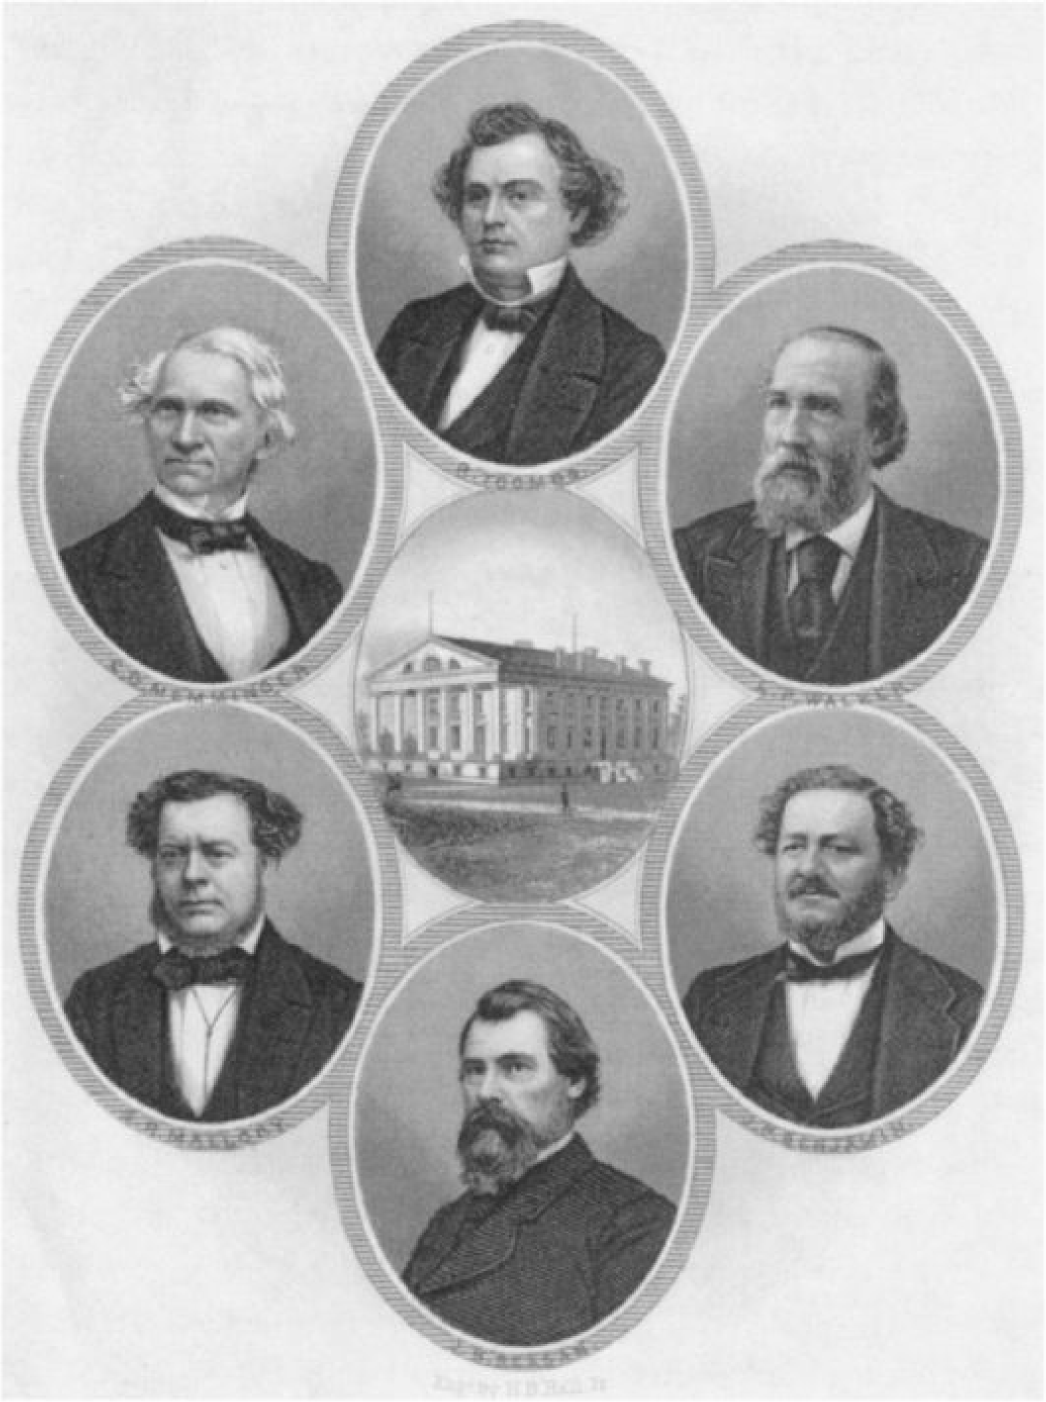
The Lincoln-Douglas debates, the Dred Scott decision, and John Brown's raid on Harpers Ferry polarized public sentiment on slavery and secession. Feelings reached a fever pitch by early 1860. Judah Benjamin disagreed with both Lincoln and Douglas: "I have no stomach for a fight in which I am to have the choice between the man who denies me all my rights, openly and fairly [Lincoln], and a man who admits my rights but intends to filch them [Douglas]." Unlike some other Southern politicians, he never underestimated Lincoln and in fact stated frankly that "it is impossible not to admire [his] perfect candor and frankness."[47]

Benjamin, though ultimately a secessionist, was not a leader in the movement.[48] Like many Southern politicians, Benjamin failed to grasp the popularity of secession. From August to November of 1860, Benjamin was involved in a trial in California. By October it was clear that Lincoln could be elected, but opinion in Louisiana was divided on secession. The emotion sweeping westward from South Carolina, however, was overwhelming. According to one historian, the Louisiana leadership, including Benjamin, now "thought it wise to fall in line and even when possible to lead the fast-growing parade … lest their office-holding futures and reputations as loyal Southerners be seriously impaired."[49]

On December 14, 1860, Benjamin signed the "Address of Certain Southern Members of Congress to Our Constituents" urging secession and on December 31 made his eloquent speech defending the right of secession. Louisiana seceded on January 26, 1861, and Benjamin bade farewell to the Senate on February 4. "We are told," he said, "that … the South is in rebellion without cause and that her citizens are traitors. Rebellion. The very word is a confession.… When, sir, did millions of people as a single man rise in organized, deliberate unimpassioned rebellion against justice, truth and honor?"[50] As if to illustrate what the future held, he wore a pistol.



The first Confederate cabinet. Clockwise from top center: Robert A. Toombs of Georgia, secretary of state; Leroy Pope Walker of Alabama, secretary of war; Judah P. Benjamin of Louisiana, then attorney general; John H. Reagan of Texas, postmaster general; Stephen R. Mallory of Florida, secretary of the Navy; and Christopher G. Memminger of South Carolina, secretary of the Treasury. Stephen Mallory of Florida was a close friend of Eugenia Phillips. Robert Toombs was a close friend of Raphael J. Moses of Columbus, Georgia. (Author's collection.)

On Washington's birthday, February 22, he gave the main address to 20,000 people in New Orleans, where he noted soberly that "our independence is not to be maintained without the shedding of our blood." This was the last public speech he would ever make in his adopted home. He made provisions for his sisters, who were living in his New Orleans residence, urging them to stay there if war came. He then left for Montgomery, Alabama, where the new Confederate Congress was in session. He never saw his sisters, his nephews and nieces, or the Crescent City again.[51]

On February 25, 1861, Judah P. Benjamin was confirmed as attorney general of the Confederate States of America. "A Hebrew of Hebrews, for the map of the Holy City was traced all over his small, refined face, the attorney-general was of the highest type of his race," Thomas Cooper DeLeon recalled in Belles, Beaux, and Brains of the '60s. "Small and rotund, he was yet of easy grace in manner, and his soft voice was not only pleasant of sound, but always carried something worth hearing. That he was a great and successful lawyer all knew, and that he was an omnivorous devourer of books and of wonderful assimilative capacity." His high profile as a former Southern senator and a Southern Jew sparked blatantly anti-Semitic criticism. Henry Wilson, senator from Massachusetts, exclaimed that Benjamin was part of a "foul and wicked plot to … overthrow the government of his adopted country which gives equality of rights even to that race that stoned prophets and crucified the Redeemer of the world."[52] Andrew Johnson referred to him as a "Jew—that miserable Benjamin!" and attacked Benjamin for belonging "to that tribe that parted the garments of our Savior and for his vesture cast lots" and as "a sneaking, Jewish, unconscionable traitor."[53] A Boston newspaper in a reference to Benjamin hissed: "We ask whether the Jews, having no country of their own, desire to put other nations in the same unhappy condition."[54] A Jew in the spotlight of national politics was rare in the nineteenth century, Benjamin Disraeli notwithstanding. William H. Russell, correspondent of the London Times, in his famous Civil War memoir, My Diary North and South, wrote of the new attorney general that he was a "short, stout man, with a full face, olive-colored, and most decidedly Jewish features, with the brightest large black eyes, one of which is somewhat diverse from the other, and a brisk, lively, agreeable manner, combined with much vivacity of speech and quickness of utterance." He also described Benjamin as "the most brilliant perhaps of the whole of the famous Southern orators," and the most "open, frank, and cordial" as well.[55]

Judah Benjamin was not a close personal friend of Jefferson Davis before the war. He was chosen for his new post because he was one of the South's leading constitutional and commercial lawyers, and Davis wanted each state to have a place in his cabinet. All of Benjamin's biographers agree that it was a waste of talent. Meade writes that Benjamin was unsuited for the position because "it was too unimportant a place for a man of his ability."[56] The Confederacy, after all, had no courts and when war came, there was little litigation. Inter arma silent leges (In time of war, the laws are silent).

His good humor and his grasp of the situation at hand commended him to the president, the members of the cabinet, and the leadership of the new nation. While the capital of the Confederacy was still temporarily in Montgomery, Benjamin was addressing the practical problems of the new nation. Leroy P. Walker, the first Confederate secretary of war, noted Benjamin's foresight in an anecdote: At the time, Mr. Walker said, he believed there would be no war. In fact, he had gone about the state promoting secession and promising to "wipe up with my pocket-handkerchief all the blood that would be shed." Walker recalled that when the Confederate cabinet met, there was only one man who grasped the real situation, and that was Benjamin. Benjamin proposed that the government purchase as much cotton as it could, at least 100,000 bales, and ship it to England. With the proceeds of a part of it he advised the purchase of arms and munitions. The rest of the cotton was to be held for credit. "'For,' said Benjamin, 'we are entering on a contest that must be long and costly.' All the rest of us fairly ridiculed the idea of a serious war," Walker concluded. "Well, you know what happened."[57]

While Benjamin's talents were wasted in the attorney general's office, his energetic and affable personality were well suited to Confederate Richmond. He became a popular member of Richmond society. Thomas Cooper DeLeon recalled that Benjamin was highly sought after at social occasions. He was that "polished and smooth brevet bachelor … with the plus sign. There was no circle, official or otherwise, that missed his soft, purring presence, or had not regretted so doing…. He moved into and through the most elegant or the simplest assemblage on natural rubber tires and well-oiled bearings, a smile of recognition for the mere acquaintance, a reminiscent word for the intimate, and a general diffusion of placid bonhomie."[58]

Jefferson Davis began to rely on his attorney general for advice and support. When Secretary Walker resigned, Davis asked Benjamin to serve as acting secretary of war. Davis, early in the war, perceived in Benjamin a capacity for hard work and personal loyalty that was lacking in other subordinates. Benjamin proved efficient as well as devoted to Davis personally. He served as acting secretary of war from September 17, 1861, to November 21, 1861, when he was confirmed as secretary of war by the Confederate Senate.[59]

His appointment was greeted with favor by the press and the public. The Richmond Examiner mentioned the new secretary as a possible candidate for vice president. Benjamin inherited severe problems. His predecessor resigned for many reasons, but the most obvious were a lack of supplies and transportation and of organizational ability. The plan to purchase arms, for example, had foundered. Unfortunately, the new secretary was not a military strategist, and this was not a propitious time to learn how to communicate with military men. Benjamin had written a note to General Beauregard in which he acknowledged that he was only a civilian "who knows nothing of war." One

Confederate soldier agreed: “Mr. Benjamin was a brilliant lawyer, but he knew as much about war as an Arab knows of the Sermon on the Mount.” In fact, Jefferson Davis acted as his own secretary of war. “In Judah Benjamin,” Evans concludes, Davis “developed the perfect alter-ego and technician.” To some degree, Benjamin was the lightning rod for Davis, but this was also true of other cabinet members.[60]

Benjamin brought to the War Department his well-known capacity for hard work and his organizational abilities. He made the department more efficient; he recognized the problems of inadequate railroads, communication, equipment, arms, ordnance, ammunition, and a lack of trained officers and troops, and he did his best to remedy them. He worked closely with Col. Josiah Gorgas, the chief of ordnance in the War Department, but he failed in his relationships with generals and eventually with the Congress. Early on he earned the enmity of Joseph E. Johnston and P. G. T. Beauregard, two of the Confederacy’s highest-ranking generals and foes of Jefferson Davis. He also quarreled with the heroic but dour Stonewall Jackson and lost the encounter when Jackson threatened to resign. Benjamin did, however, have a consistently pleasant relationship with Robert E. Lee.[61]

Benjamin was bombarded with requests for reinforcements of the defenses of Roanoke Island. The North Carolina coast guarded a water route from Norfolk, Virginia, and the railroad, an important link with Richmond, was nearby. The defense of Roanoke Island was in the hands of an aristocratic but not particularly competent Charlestonian, Maj. Gen. Benjamin Huger. On January 7, 1862, a former governor of Virginia, Brig. Gen. Henry A. Wise, was in charge of the island and reported to Huger. Wise wanted more men. Benjamin looked to General Huger, who demurred. Wise went out of the chain of command and spoke directly to the secretary of war, a gross violation of military law. Benjamin ordered Wise back to his post. When Roanoke Island fell to the Union army and navy in February 1862, 2,500 Confederates, including many prominent Richmonders, were taken prisoner. Governor Wise’s popular young son was killed, and the new secretary of war was held accountable for the debacle. There was bitter criticism of Benjamin, Huger, and President Davis as well. Benjamin had relied on Huger, a graduate of West Point, but his reliance was misplaced.[62]

The Roanoke Island defeat hurt Benjamin’s reputation in Richmond. Not only could it have been avoided, but the soldiers involved were Virginians from the capital city itself. There was constant criticism of the secretary, who, after all, was in charge of the war department. “Laws,” Benjamin remarked, “cannot suddenly convert farmers into gunsmiths.”[63] There was a clamor for Benjamin’s resignation when the news arrived that Brig. Gen. Ulysses S. Grant captured Fort Henry and Fort Donelson in Tennessee, and Gen. Albert Sidney Johnston’s retreat from Nashville confirmed low opinions of his military judgment.

A no-confidence resolution was introduced in the Confederate Congress in March 1862, which unleashed a torrent of anti-Benjamin, anti-Semitic rhetoric. Congressman Henry S. Foote of Tennessee, a rabid anti-Semite and virulent opponent of Davis, referred to Benjamin as "Judas Iscariot Benjamin" and the "Jewish puppeteer" behind the "Davis tyranny." There was a congressional investigation, and the secretary of war told the committee repeatedly that he took personal responsibility for the defeat at Roanoke.[64]

Davis did not seek Benjamin's confirmation as secretary of war under the new, permanent constitution, but instead on March 17, 1862, appointed Benjamin secretary of state of the Confederate States of America, a promotion, as one contemporary observed, in "the very teeth of criticism." He had served six long months as secretary of war and was now among the highest-ranking officers of the Confederacy. John M. Daniel of the Richmond Examiner reacted to Benjamin's appointment as secretary of state by remarking that "the representation of the Synagogue is not diminished; it remains full."[65]

While Judah Benjamin labored in wartime Richmond, David Yulee protected his railroads in Florida. He held no political or military office during the war. Given Yulee's interest in politics, it is puzzling that he sought no appointed or elected position in the Confederate government. He was asked to run, and he would likely have been elected to the Confederate Senate. Perhaps his reasons were just what he said they were: He had tired of politics and wished only "to enjoy the relief of a home life" and tend to his business concerns. Unlike Judah Benjamin and many other politicians, Yulee had a happy marriage and did in fact wish to tend to his businesses. Service in Richmond, away from his family, had no allure for him, and he may have doubted the success of the South's war for independence. He had no military training and never served in the armed forces, although, according to his son, he paid the expenses of "a couple of companies of infantry" to protect his home county.[66]

His son, Wickliffe, saw a little fighting as a volunteer in a cavalry company but never joined the army. According to family tradition, Yulee's brother, Elias, became an officer in the Washington (Georgia) Rifles. Mrs. Yulee was an adamant Confederate. "I pity those who have no country to love or to fight for!" she wrote from her home in Florida. "It is this very country of yours and mine that induces me to write this letter…. Tax! tax! tax our people to half we have, if necessary, but let the world know we are paying! Ten victories will not give the Yankees such a blow as this fact… we are not discouraged. I have never felt a doubt of my country, but dark and painful trials are yet before us, perhaps!"[67] Yulee acted as a kind of unofficial ombudsman helping his former constituents with their problems, injecting his opinions about everything from military strategy to taxes, legislation, and the conduct of the war, and as an ambassador-at-large and roving counselor to the governor, to generals, and to the Confederate cabinet.[68]

Yulee used the war to wrest control of the Florida Railroad Company from its northern stockholders. While the Florida line, like most Southern railroads, remained local in nature, Yulee envisioned a Florida line tied into a national network. He also realized early that, as the irascible war clerk John B. Jones phrased it, “The iron was wanted more than anything else but men.” Yulee’s involvement with the railroad constitutes his most significant activity during the war. The northern stockholders may have had control before secession, but they were now “enemy aliens,” and Yulee, the largest Southern stockholder, was able to take over the company.[69]

War is beyond the control of businessmen, and the Union invasion of coastal Florida severely limited the use of the railroad. Yulee asked Gen. Robert E. Lee, who in the early days of the war was given the lackluster assignment of defending Florida, Georgia, and South Carolina, for assistance in protecting the line. Lee took a steamer to Fernandina in November 1861 to meet with Yulee and informed him that Brig. Gen. James H. Trapier, whose appointment Yulee had helped engineer, was under orders to establish himself at Fernandina and protect the harbor. But Lee politely declined to devote his limited resources to protecting Yulee’s railroad. This did not deter Yulee, who continued to try and convince anyone who would listen that the defense of Fernandina and the railroad were “vital for the defense of the entire Gulf States region.” He personally arranged for General Trapier to purchase a steamer, which he thought would make “a capital gun boat” to protect Fernandina, and then wrote his old Senate colleague Stephen Mallory, now secretary of the Confederate navy, to pay for it. “We have no boat, in Florida upon which a gun can be carried,” he wrote Mallory, “Georgia & So Ca have monopolized them & this is the only boat available.” Men were sent to defend Fernandina and Amelia Island as a result of his efforts.[70]

Yulee traveled to Richmond early in the war to take the measure of the Confederate government; influence the selection of military commanders in Florida; lobby for his railroad and for the defense of Fernandina; and to reinforce his contacts, particularly his relationship with his old friend Judah Benjamin, now acting secretary of war. He lobbied successfully for the appointment of General Trapier as commander of the Department of Eastern and Middle Florida. At times, it seemed to those in the state government that Yulee was running the Confederate military operation in Florida. He wrote Benjamin in October 1861 asking him to direct General Trapier to raise ten companies and bring “the post at Fernandina under better command.” Benjamin immediately complied. Lee continued to communicate directly with Yulee about the defense of the Florida coast sometimes to the exclusion of the Florida government. Lee tried to convince the state to protect itself and Yulee tried to convince Lee to send Confederate troops and a naval defense. Typical were Lee’s telegrams to Yulee of December 14 and 16, 1861: “I will reinforce all I can,” and “Call the Florida troops to Fernandina—they are not wanted [that is, not needed] elsewhere.”[71]

He tried his best to keep the railroad and port facilities in both Fernandina and Cedar Key operational, but the Union army and navy would not cooperate. Yulee continually implored the Confederate government to send men. In January 1862, he complained to Benjamin that Trapier's department was partly in Lee's command and partly in another's and that this was inefficient. He requested two more cannons and added a postscript: "General Lee is a capital commander." In January 1862, the Federal navy landed a small detachment at Cedar Key. They spiked cannons and burned eight ships, seven freight cars, the railroad depot, and a warehouse. Yulee sent a train to evacuate the women and children. In February 1862 he wrote Lee, "The line across the peninsula between Ferna[ndina] and C Key constitutes the necessary base of all military operations in Florida. I think the constant presence & vigilance of a competent head upon this line is indispensable." Lee replied that he had referred the matter to General Trapier, but that in his opinion the Yankees were unlikely to try to capture the entire railroad.[72]

By 1862 Yulee had moved his family from Fernandina to his Gulf Coast home, Margarita, on Tiger Tail Island at the mouth of the Homosassa River. There they remained safely for two years. Fernandina was captured in March of 1862, and Yulee was on the last train to escape. He was forced to remove his business operations to Gainesville, which remained his headquarters from 1862 to 1864. Yulee turned his attention to safeguarding the Cedar Key terminus and procuring a military presence. He could not visit his family very often on the Gulf Coast because the Union army and navy were looking for him and the area swarmed with Union gunboats. A letter from a captured Confederate soldier, who was an involuntary passenger on such a gunboat, confirmed that the Yankees wanted to arrest Yulee and that "when in possession of him, he would be hung as a traitor. They also said that they knew where his plantation was, & that they did not mean to let him make any more sugar for the rebels, as they styled us."[73]

Judah Philip Benjamin was the first attorney general, the second secretary of war, and the third secretary of state of the Confederate States of America. He was a lawyer who turned down a nomination to the U.S. Supreme Court and a slave owner who proposed freeing slaves to fight for the Confederacy. This photograph was taken early in the war by Charles Anthony. (Courtesy of Bob Marcus, Springfield, Virginia.)

Back in Richmond, Benjamin served as secretary of state from March 1863 until the last days of the Confederacy in April 1865. He was to the civilian government what Lee was to the military: a loyal, stalwart, indefatigable, and uncomplaining patriot. He was the most well-known Confederate official next to the president and vice president and third in order of succession.[74] Historians early on referred to him as the "brains of the Confederacy," and Varina Howell Davis called him her husband's "right arm."[75] Charles P. Roland described Benjamin as "the President's most intimate friend and counselor."[76] His office was located near Davis's in an executive office building, formerly the Federal customs house, in downtown Richmond, and the two men worked "like galley-slaves, early and late," according to Mrs. Davis. "Mr. Davis came home … perfectly exhausted," she added, "but Mr. Benjamin was always fresh and buoyant."[77] While the War Department had thousands of employees, the State Department had six clerks. His chief assistant was Lucius Quinton Washington, a distant relative of the first president.

Like his predecessors, the new secretary's main goals when he took office were to achieve foreign recognition of the Confederacy and to lift the Union blockade. Failing that, he hoped to preserve European neutrality, secure shipments of material, and borrow money from European bankers. He failed to obtain recognition but succeeded in borrowing money. The European powers were wary of recognizing a country that could not achieve military victory. The British and French governments, as opposed to the British and French people, hoped for the success of the Confederacy, and early in the war there may have been some chance of recognition. From the diplomatic point of view, the South's most optimistic moment probably came in the fall of 1862. In October, William Gladstone, then chancellor of the exchequer, said, "Jefferson Davis and other leaders of the South have made an army; they are making, it appears, a navy; and they have made what is more than either—they have made a nation." But Gladstone's oratorical flourish proved to be a political mirage.[78]

The opportunity quickly faded. After Gettysburg and Vicksburg in the summer of 1863, recognition was not a real option. From March 1862 until that fateful July 1863, however, Benjamin used all of his considerable energy in trying to convince, cajole, and even bribe the British and French governments.

and during the war. He was a close friend of the Phillips family in the 1850s. Judah P. Benjamin was his closest advisor, and according to Eli Evans, the beleaguered president's alter ego. This daguerreotype was taken prior to 1860. (Courtesy of the Chicago Historical Society, Chicago, Illinois.)

Benjamin's real value as secretary of state was a personal acquaintance with European political figures, lawyers, bankers, and businessmen. His wife and daughter lived in Paris, and John Slidell, his political mentor and former Senate colleague, was the Confederacy's emissary to France. Louisiana had considerable economic and social connections with France, and Benjamin was an experienced international lawyer. He was familiar with the court of Emperor Napoleon III and knew it to be corrupt. His strategy for obtaining French recognition was simple. Shortly after his appointment, he instructed Slidell to offer the emperor commercial concessions such as the duty-free importation of French products and 100,000 bales of cotton valued at $4.5 million or more if necessary. He would also support the emperor's military and political adventures in Mexico. Napoleon Ill's position was too insecure to allow him to take the offer. Indeed, the emperor tried in vain to convince the British and the Russians to propose an armistice and an end to the Union blockade. But the British could not be moved, and Napoleon felt that the risk of supporting the South—even for a $5 million bribe—was too great.[79]

Benjamin, however, continued to press the French connection because it appeared to have a greater potential for success than the British. The famous Erlanger loan, in which the Confederacy received $2.5 million in badly needed cash, was an outgrowth of foreign policy initiatives and previous efforts by the Confederacy to borrow money against Southern cotton crops. Benjamin personally negotiated the loan with Baron Emile Erlanger in Richmond. He hoped the involvement of the banking house of Erlanger & Cie and the Erlanger family, close friends and advisors of the emperor of France, would somehow bring the French government closer to the Southern cause.[80]

John Slidell's daughter was engaged to marry Baron Erlanger. The connection was obvious. (The Slidells were further connected to the Jewish community through the marriage of Slidell's niece to August Belmont, the well-known New York lawyer who represented the Rothschild family.) The Erlangers hoped to reap a substantial profit from the transaction, and the original plan called for a loan of $25 million to be repaid with bonds and the sale of cotton. The Erlangers wanted a 23 percent commission and various concessions for handling the bonds at 8 percent. Benjamin thought the terms usurious; but, because the Confederacy was so desperate for money, the government had agreed in principle to the terms requested by the Erlangers. After extensive face-to-face negotiations in Benjamin's office between the South's leading diplomat and France's leading banker, Benjamin was able to modify the arrangement in the Confederacy's favor. "The conflict of these two Jewish brains—Benjamin and Erlanger—caused modification very beneficial to the Confederate Government," Burton J. Hendrick concluded. The interest rate declined to 7 percent, and the Erlanger profits were reduced.[81]

Speculators and investors in Europe snapped up the bonds, and the Erlangers made a handsome profit. The Confederacy received a timely infusion of much-needed cash. The pro-Davis faction thought Benjamin brilliant. "Everything Mr. Benjamin said, we listened to," Mary Chesnut wrote, "bore it in mind, gave heed to it diligently." The anti-Davis faction thought Benjamin an enemy of the people: "On the occasion of the recent visit of Mr. Erlanger," Congressman Foote huffed and puffed, "Minister Plenipotentiary, Envoy Extraordinaire from his Highness, the Emperor of France, to his Highness the would-be Emperor of the Confederate States, Judas Iscariot Benjamin had spoke for two hours in French." In the end, European speculators lost a great deal of money on the transaction.[82]

None of it mattered. Napoleon III refused to risk recognition of the Confederacy without Great Britain, and Great Britain, under the cautious leadership of Lord John Russell, the foreign secretary, and Lord Palmerston, the prime minister, would not budge. Benjamin focused his diplomacy on Great Britain. In April of 1862, he drafted instructions to the Confederacy's ambassador arguing against the legality of the Union blockade and its ineffectiveness. Under international law, an ineffective blockade was not legally binding on neutral nations. He pointed out how Lord Russell had misunderstood, or deliberately misconstrued, applicable treaties which demonstrated his point—but to no avail. Cotton was not king after all. To Russell, the risk of war with the United States and the risk of alienating the great majority of the British public were too great. Judah Benjamin had to bow to these basic facts. By August 1863 Benjamin was thoroughly disenchanted with the British treatment of the Confederacy and its minister, James Murray Mason. He recalled Mason and asked for the recall of all British consuls in the Confederacy. Benjamin had exhausted his diplomatic arsenal.[83]

As the war dragged on, the Confederacy's options dwindled. On February 12, 1864, the Confederate Congress voted in secret session to create "bodies for the capture and destruction of the enemies' property." The Bureau of Special and Secret Service came into existence, and funding for these operations went to the State Department. Benjamin, as secretary of state, was the likely head of the bureau and chief of Confederate covert activities. Shortly thereafter, important agents of the Confederacy arrived in Montreal. "A few months later," Roy Z. Chamlee Jr. writes in Lincoln's Assassins, "John Wilkes Booth opened a bank account in the same Montreal bank used by the Rebels."[84]

Benjamin had now taken on the most dangerous assignment Davis had given him—and his last assignment for the Confederacy—that of spymaster. He established spy rings and sent political propagandists to the North and to Canada. He enlisted the seductive Belle Boyd, the “Cleopatra of Secession,” to travel abroad, rallying public opinion for the southern states. He sent emissaries and agents to Ireland to stem the tide of Irish volunteers entering the Union army. He planned the burning of Federal medical stores in Louisville and the burning of bridges and boats in strategic locations across the occupied South. He also oversaw the suppression of treason against the Confederacy. Special commissioners who investigated and arrested those disloyal to the government reported to Benjamin. For example, Col. Henry J. Leovy, a close friend of Benjamin from New Orleans, served as a military commissioner in southwest Virginia. His job was ferreting out traitors.[85]

Benjamin, like many other Confederate leaders, believed the Northern public would not support Lincoln indefinitely. Serious efforts were made to exploit the difference between the eastern and western states, to increase public disaffection in the North for the war, and to raid prisoner of war camps. Provocateurs attempted to capture Federal property in the far north. Confederate agents tried to disrupt the monetary system by urging people to convert paper money to gold. There was even an attempt—probably unknown to Benjamin but involving his agents—to set New York City on fire. Benjamin oversaw the most ambitious mission, a $1 million Canadian covert operation headed by Jacob Thompson. Canada was a potential Confederate ally. Its governor was friendly, and it provided a base for blockade-running, spy operations, and offensive military operations. In April 1864, the State Department requested $1 million from the Confederate treasury, an astronomical sum by the standards of the time. The warrant for the funds was issued pursuant to the Secret Service Act and signed by Davis “in favor of Hon. J. P. Benjamin, Secretary of State.”[86] Thompson reported to Benjamin.

Meanwhile, in Florida David Yulee continued to grow sugar, which was desperately needed by the Confederacy. In early July 1863, the Confederate army tried to purchase sixty-four hogsheads of Yulee’s sugar weighing 49,898 pounds, but would not pay the market price. The Confederate commissary officer, using a fixed schedule to pay for goods which fluctuated dramatically in price, then impressed—that is, took—the sugar, and years of litigation followed until Yulee recovered his right to fair compensation. The case was decided in the Florida Supreme Court.[87] In partnership with other investors, Yulee also engaged in blockade-running, exporting cotton and tobacco to Cuba, and bringing in rum, paper, quinine, and clothing.[88]

A year earlier, in March 1862, the Confederate army had become a bigger threat to the Florida Railroad Company than the Federals had been. Yulee’s friend Trapier agreed with the Confederate command that the rails were needed. “Railroads are,” he had said in December of 1861, “at one and the same time the legs and the stomach of an army.” The Confederacy, however, did not have the capacity to manufacture rails. According to Robert C. Black, not a single new rail was manufactured in the Confederacy after 1861, and the Confederate government proved incapable of coordinating the use of the Southern railroads. Existing lines became valuable as “iron mines,” as the Confederate government realized that its railroads could only be maintained by cannibalizing existing rails. After Fernandina fell, General Trapier ordered the taking up of the rails to a defensible point inland so that another line, the Lawton-Live Oak route, could be built further west.[89]

Yulee’s rail line ran east-west, but the Confederate government needed to ship Florida’s foodstuffs, particularly beef, north. Yulee had the rails. The Confederacy wanted them. Florida Gov. John Milton, who, unlike other Southern governors, prided himself on his cooperation with the Richmond government, ordered the arrest of anyone who interfered. He urged Yulee to support the cause of Southern independence “rather than engage in a neighborhood fight for a little railroad iron.” Yulee, however, not only refused to cooperate, he went into state court and obtained an injunction restraining the Confederate army from removing the rails. “I humbly trust,” he had previously informed Gov. John Milton, “I may not be wanting at any time in necessary & dutiful sacrifices & contribution to the great cause in which all citizens are engaged, and will gladly unite with yourself & other Trustees [of the Internal Improvement Fund] in liberal & patriotic devotion of our own means. But, I have not the right to make myself free with the property of others, nor to seek merit for a generous patriotism at another’s cost.” This angered the Confederate military, the governor, and Jefferson Davis.[90]

Yulee delayed the Confederate army for two years while Northern stockholders prodded the Union army to take every step possible to regain control of the line. The Battle of Olustee in February 1864 was the final straw for the Confederate government. “Had the gap between Lawton and Live Oak been filled by a line of railroad,” Gen. P. G. T. Beauregard complained, “the enemy would at once have been driven out of Florida.” In May 1864 a young Confederate lieutenant, J. M. Fairbanks, decided to ignore the state court injunction and take up Yulee’s rails. When he informed Yulee of his intention to do so, and also informed him that it was Confederate government policy to buy or replace the rails within six months after the end of the war, Yulee went back to court. Judge James B. Dawkins, incensed that the army did not obey his order, ordered Fairbanks to appear before him on contempt charges. Fairbanks escaped arrest only because his soldiers kept the local sheriff from carrying out Judge Dawkins’s order. Although he disagreed with the order, Governor Milton was angry that the army would not obey an order of a Florida court. The Confederate government then filed suit on behalf of the Sequestration Fund, claiming the assets of the company because it was owned by alien Northerners.[91]

Yulee was protecting his investment. In this, he was not alone. Black observes in The Railroads of the Confederacy, “The owners of companies designated as iron mines were normal men.” When war came, they committed their resources to the Confederate cause, but when asked to give up their rails, they offered pretexts, they got angry, and rallied to the banner of states’ rights. They soon resorted to litigation, going into state courts and obtaining injunctions against the Confederate government. Yulee fought off the Confederate lawyers just as he fought off the armies of both sides. He delayed the sequestration proceedings by various strategies, including muddying the facts about his own personal financial relationship with the company. The war ended before any of these issues were resolved, although some of the rails were taken up by the Confederate army.[92]

Wickliffe Yulee’s explanation for his father’s seemingly unpatriotic behavior was that he was protecting the assets of the railroad in his fiduciary capacity as president of the company and that he was protecting the interests of his Northern partners. His partners, however, did not see it that way. Neither did the Confederate government. Although it was untrue, Yulee believed that a warrant had been issued by the Confederacy for his arrest. The arrest incident led to a lifelong estrangement between Davis and Yulee. The Northern press seized on this incident in the spring of 1864 and reported that Yulee was in favor of abandoning the war and for reconstruction of the Union. Yulee vehemently denied these allegations and further denied that he had declined the office of Confederate senator because of a lack of commitment to the Southern cause. He said he wholeheartedly supported the Confederacy and the prosecution of the war “until the Sovereignty of the Confederate States is allowed.” But the combination of Yulee’s fight against the Confederacy for his railroad line, his failure to seek office, and the Fernandina area’s general desire for peace led many to believe he was a Union sympathizer.[93]

Preservation of the Florida Railroad Company and its rails was not just a matter of money to Yulee. He had dedicated his adult life to bringing Florida into the modern world, first by bringing it into the Union, and then by joining Florida to the Union by rail. Indeed, one historian concludes that “the completion of the Florida Railroad must rank as one of his most notable achievements,” and it became “his main ambition in life.”[94]

By 1864 Judah Benjamin was convinced that unless slaves could be drafted or persuaded to fight for the Confederacy, the South would soon exhaust its manpower. He privately argued for the use of black troops and granting freedom to slaves who would fight for the Confederacy. It was clear to Benjamin that slavery was at an end. That fact was less clear to most Confederate leaders and the great majority of white Southerners. Cooperating with Varina Davis and Robert E. Lee, both of whom agreed with his assessment, Benjamin finally convinced Jefferson Davis to act. The president authorized his secretary of state to send an emissary to the British government to offer gradual emancipation in exchange for recognition. Benjamin then began to work in earnest behind the scenes to convince the Confederate Congress and the public of the need to use black troops. It was an exhausting ordeal. Benjamin offered to give a public speech "to feel the pulse of the people," Mrs. Davis recalled.

On February 9, 1865, Jefferson Davis's lawyer argued his last public case for the Confederacy to more than ten thousand people assembled in and around the African Church near Capitol Square.[95] After the invocation, Jefferson Davis made an impassioned speech against Lincoln, Yankee rule, Grant, and Sherman, and pledged that the South would never return to the Union as "a conquered people." Sen. Robert M. T. Hunter of Virginia spoke vigorously in the same vein.[96] When it was Benjamin's turn, he appealed to the patriotism of the assembled crowd. He argued that Southerners should reject Lincoln's demands "that you should bend the knee, bow the neck, and meekly submit to the conqueror's yoke." The "fire of freedom burns unquenchably in your souls." But more was needed, he said. Cotton and tobacco must be sacrificed for the Confederacy. The crowd applauded. Cheers interrupted him. Men were needed, both black and white, he said. "I am going to open my whole heart to you," Benjamin confided to his audience. "Look to the trenches below Richmond. Is it not a shame that men who have sacrificed all in our defense should not be reinforced by all the means in our power?" He then spoke in exaggerated figures of the difference in manpower: 3,000,000 men fighting for the North; 1,644,000 for the South. More were needed. "Our resources of white population have greatly diminished," he thundered, but the South still had 680,000 black men of fighting age. Could "Divine prophecy have told us of the fierceness of the enemy's death grapple at our throats—could we have known what we now know, that Lincoln has confessed, that without 200,000 negroes which he stole from us, he would be compelled to give up the contest, should we have entertained any doubts upon the subject?" Benjamin then publicly advanced the proposition that slaves who fought for the Confederacy be freed: "Let us say to every Negro who wishes to go into the ranks on condition of being made free—'Go and fight; you are free.' If we impress [draft] them, they will go against us."[97]

Reactions varied to this radical proposal. Varina Davis believed that Benjamin had never been more eloquent. But a resolution in the Confederate Congress which stated that Benjamin was "not a wise and prudent Secretary of State" failed on a tie vote. Benjamin offered to resign, but Davis would not consider it. In early March, a month before Appomattox, the Confederate Congress passed a watered-down act allowing slaves to fight for the Confederacy if their masters "volunteered" them. Emancipation was not included. Benjamin had lost his last case for the Confederate States of America.

The Southern nation began to dissolve. Casualties were high in Lee’s army. Survivors deserted. Desperate, Davis and Benjamin considered their options. Surrender was not one of them. A plot to kidnap Lincoln and blow up the White House was. (For more on this episode, see chapter 8, pp. 314–15.)[98]

As the war came to an end in 1865, Judah Benjamin prepared to escape from Richmond with Jefferson Davis and the Confederate cabinet. David Yulee, his plantation, business, and railroads in shambles, prepared to face an uncertain future. These two former powerful Southern senators, these two Sephardic senators, had made their respective choices. Each now had to face the disastrous consequences and whatever fate had in store.

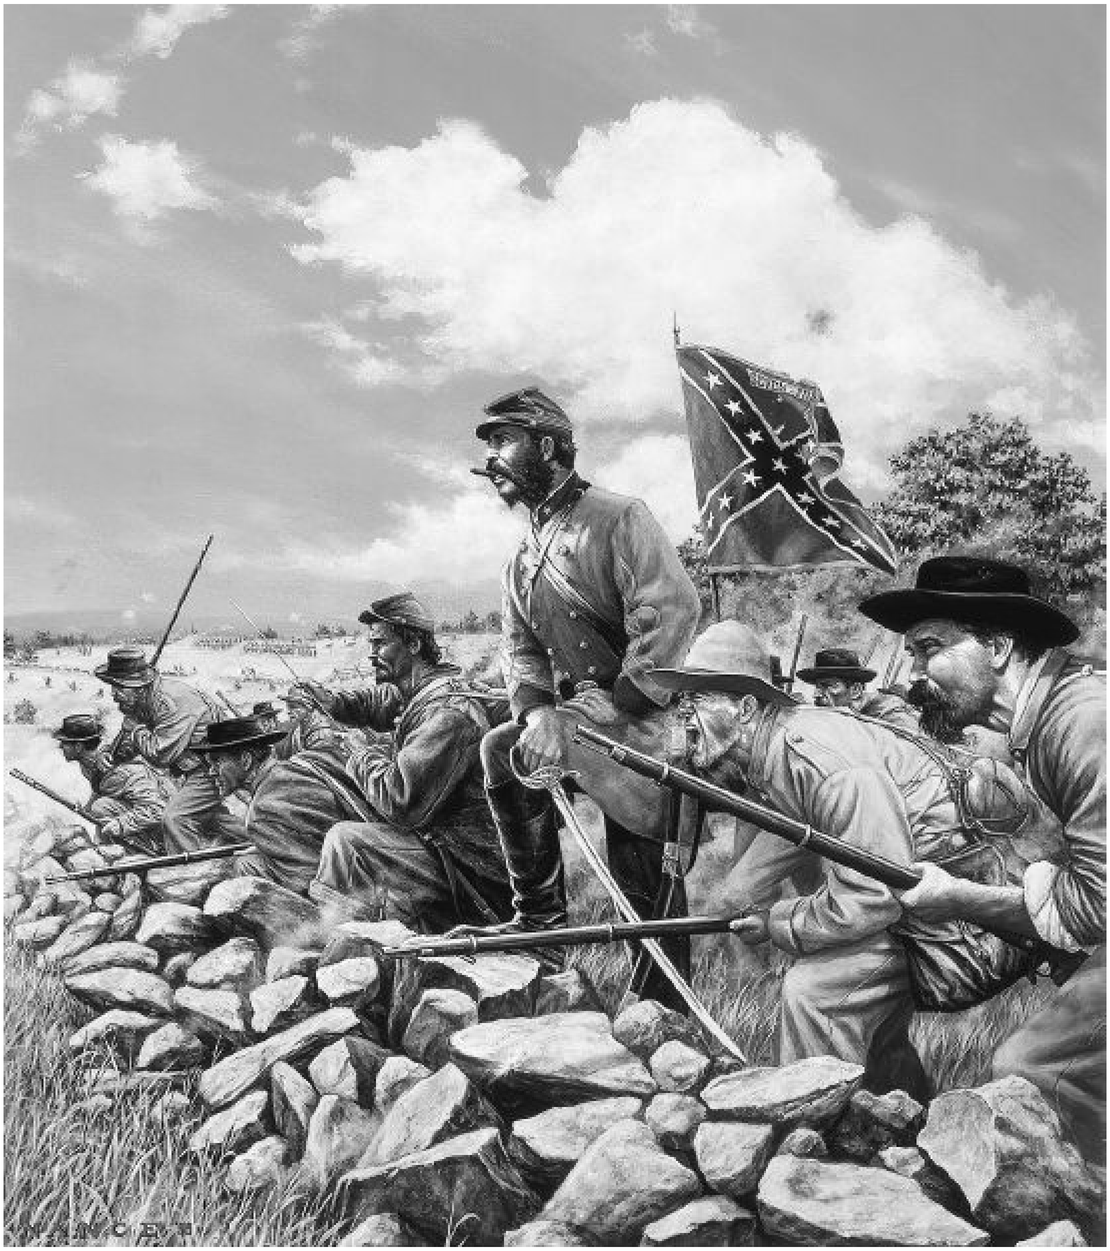
Hebrew Officers and Israelite Gentlemen

Like Judah P. Benjamin and David Yulee, the Jewish officers of the Confederate armed forces and officials of the government were part and parcel of Southern society. They accepted their responsibility to defend their homeland. Lt. Simon Mayer, an officer in the Mississippi brigade, implored his brother Henry to join the army, telling him he could "no longer… remain passive to the scenes that are daily enacted in the grand drama." He urged his brother to join "with light heart & strong arms, backed by a determination to do or die … to come out & meet his would be masters, and subjugators."[1] Some, like Maj. Raphael J. Moses of Columbus, Capt. Edwin Warren Moise of Charleston, Lt. James Madison Seixas of New Orleans, the DeLeons of Columbia, and Col. Samuel M. Hyams of Natchitoches Parish, were descended from old Sephardic families. Others, like Col. Leon Dawson Marks of Shreveport, Samuel Yates Levy of Savannah, and Abraham Charles Myers of Georgetown, South Carolina, were from old Southern families whose ancestors, both Ashkenazic and Sephardic, had settled in the South generations before Fort Sumter. Most had grown to manhood in the South even if their parents were the first of their family to become Southerners. Capt. Ezekiel J. Levy's father, Jacob A. Levy, had moved to Richmond from Holland as a young man, but "Zeke" was raised as a Richmonder.[2] Simon Mayer's father had settled in Natchez. These young Confederate officers, men in their twenties and early thirties, had grown up in the fiercely partisan decades preceding the war. Unlike their parents, the younger generation spent their formative years in a South defensive about slavery and hostile to what their generation perceived as Northern aggression and condescension toward the South.[3]

Some Jewish officers were first generation immigrants. Maj. Adolph Proskauer of Mobile came to America when his father Julius left Prussia after the failed 1848 Revolution. The name Proskauer was, in typical German Jewish fashion, taken from the small town of Proskau near Breslau. Young Proskauer had lived in Philadelphia and Richmond before settling in Mobile and becoming a merchant. By 1861 he was a

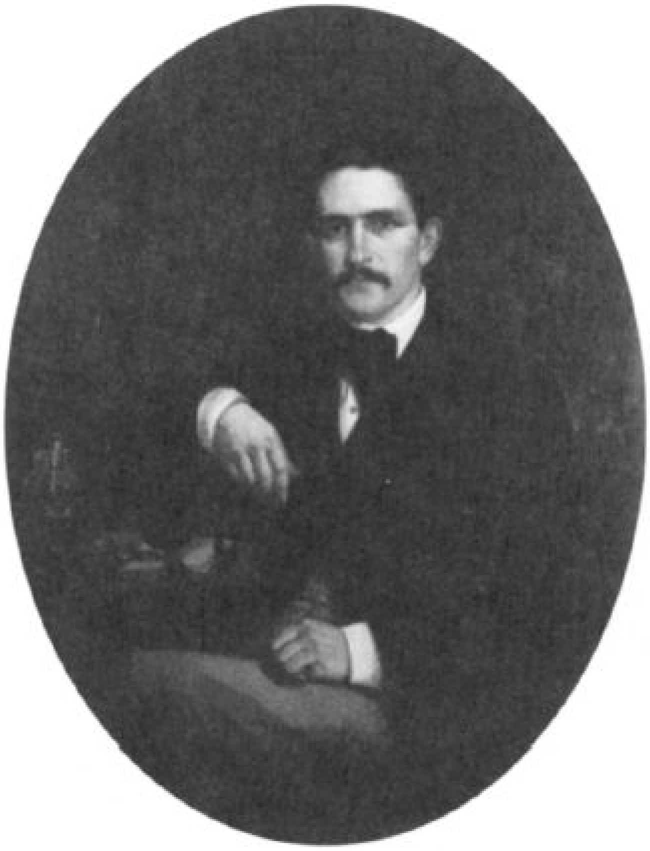
Southern partisan.[4] Maier Triest of Charleston was born in Bavaria, served as a militia captain in Charleston before and for the first year of the war, and enlisted in the South Carolina 24th as sergeant major. Simon Baruch from Posen in Prussia became a surgeon in the 3d South Carolina Battalion. Edwin Kursheedt, an immigrant from Jamaica, came to New Orleans in 1838 and rose to the rank of adjutant in the famed Washington Artillery. An Alsatian immigrant, Leon Fischel of Vicksburg enlisted in the cavalry even before the bombardment of Fort Sumter.[5]



Maj. Adolph Proskauer at Gettysburg. Major Proskauer, an immigrant from Prussia to Mobile, led the 12th Alabama Infantry at Culp's Hill during the Battle of Gettysburg. This 1999 painting re-creates the moment described in the history of the regiment by Capt. Robert Emory

Park, “Our gallant Jew Major smoked his cigars calmly and cooly in the thickest of the fight.” (Painting by Dan Nance of Charlotte, North Carolina. Author’s collection.)

Jewish officers were accepted into the Confederate ranks and were well respected by both their superior officers and their subordinates. Lt. Col. Samuel M. Hyams Sr. was beloved by his men. Proskauer successfully led his regiment at the Battle of Gettysburg. Ezekiel Levy became captain of the elite Richmond Blues, whose first wartime captain was the son of former Gov. Henry A. Wise. Jacob S. Valentine of Charleston was the commandant of Fort Moultrie. And there were dozens of young Jewish lieutenants like Octavus Cohen of Savannah, who fought at Secessionville; Ezekiel Levy, at the Battle of the Crater; and Joshua Lazarus Moses, at Fort Blakely near Mobile. When Lt. Albert Luria was killed at Seven Pines, the men of his company inscribed the bombshell he had thrown out of their earthworks at Sewell’s Point with the words, “The pride of all his comrades, the bravest of the brave.”[6] There are few cases of anti-Semitism directed at Jewish officers.[7]



Lt. James Madison Seixas, 5th Company, Washington Artillery. Born in Charleston in 1829, Seixas (pronounced “Sayshus”) moved to New Orleans in 1853. He was a cotton broker and law partner of Brig. Gen. Adley Hogan Gladden, also a native of South Carolina. Their firm was Gladden and Seixas at 55 Charles Street. Seixas enlisted as a private in the 5th Company (which served in the western theater), was promoted to lieutenant for gallantry on the field, later served as an agent for the War Department in Wilmington, and was promoted to captain. He married Julia Deslonde, sister of Mrs. John Slidell and Mrs. P. G. T. Beauregard. ("Information" sheet by a Gladden descendent, courtesy of Bruce S. Allardice, in the possession of the author. There were no Jewish Confederate generals and few colonels. This is not surprising given the small number of Jews in the "old army"; the lack of a military tradition among most nineteenth-century Jews; the paucity of Jewish West Point, Virginia Military Institute, and South Carolina Military Academy (Citadel) graduates; and the intensely political nature of the appointment of general officers. Confederate officers were successful, educated, and affluent. Many had important family connections. In the Army of Northern Virginia, for example, the majority of majors, lieutenant colonels, and colonels were lawyers, judges, planters, politicians, doctors, or teachers. One-half of the officers in the Army of Northern Virginia graduated from colleges and universities, 44 percent from Virginia institutions. Many Confederate officers were, like Robert E. Lee and Joseph E. Johnston, veterans of the Mexican War.[8]

Jewish officers fit this profile. Abraham Charles Myers served as quartermaster general of the Confederacy and was a career soldier. Myers graduated from West Point in 1833 and served in the Seminole Wars in Florida. In the Mexican War, he served under both Zachary Taylor and Winfield Scott and was breveted for meritorious conduct at the Battle of Palo Alto and at Resaca de la Palma in May 1846.[9] After the Mexican War, Myers served as a quartermaster at a number of Southern posts. He was chief quartermaster of the Department of Florida, where he married the daughter of Maj. Gen. David Emanuel Twiggs. In the late 1840s, Twiggs was in charge of the defense of Florida, which was plagued by Indian attacks. In 1850, in response to one such attack, he ordered the rebuilding of a fort on the Caloosahatchee River and named it Fort Myers in honor of his prospective son-in-law. The post to be called "Fort Myers, by order of Major General Twiggs," came into existence in February 1850. Thus, the city of Fort Myers, Florida, is named for Abraham Myers.[10]

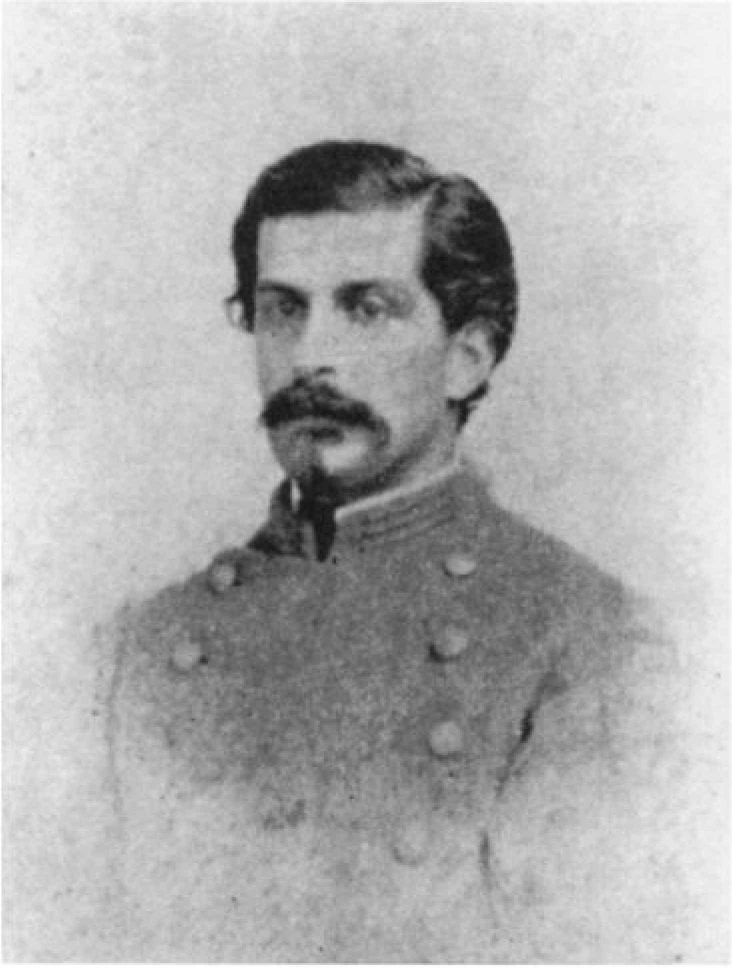
William B. Myers. Gustavus Myers's son, Will Myers, served as a lieutenant, as an engineer officer, and as an adjutant for Major Generals Samuel Jones and William W. Loring. DeLeon described him as "witty and full of quaint satire … a good and reliable soldier" (Crute, Confederate Staff Officers). DeLeon has him as an adjutant to General John C. Breckinridge (Belles, Beaux, and Brains of the '60s).

Jacob Valentine was also a veteran of the Mexican War, having fought at Churubusco.[11] William Mallory Levy, originally from Isle of Wight County, Virginia, graduated from William and Mary and was a lieutenant with the Virginia Volunteers in the Mexican War.[12] David Camden DeLeon of South Carolina graduated from South Carolina College in 1833 and obtained a medical degree from the University of Pennsylvania in 1836. He, too, fought the Seminole Indians in Florida and served with Gen. Zachary Taylor's army from Matamoros to Vera Cruz.[13]

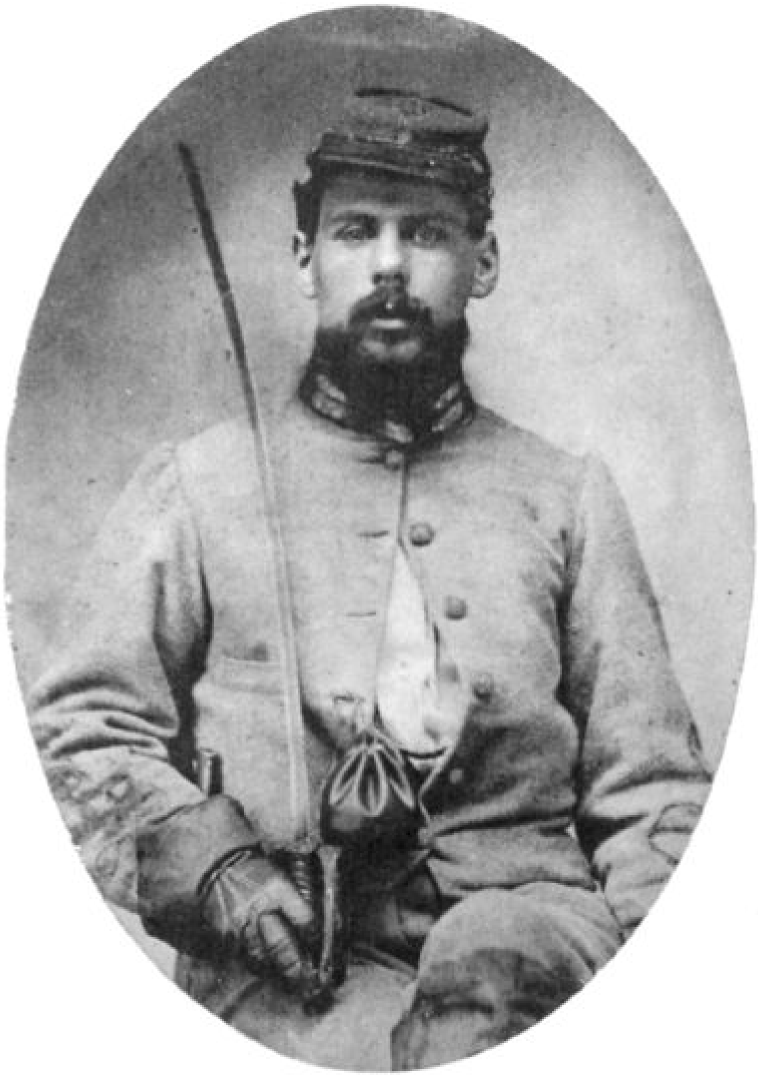


Capt. Isaac L. Lyons. Rachel Lyons's brother and the nephew of Henry Lyons, mayor of Columbia, South Carolina, Lyons commanded Company A (Shepherd Guards), 10th Louisiana. His predecessor as captain of the company was Jacob A. Cohen, who was killed in battle. Lyons settled in New Orleans after the war. (DeLeon, Belles, Beaux, and Brains of the '60s.)

As the infantry was the largest branch of the army, it had the largest number of officers. There were dozens of Jewish Confederate infantry lieutenants, and according to Mel Young, sixteen Jewish infantry lieutenants were killed in battle.[14]

Typical of young Jewish officers was Michael Levy of Arkansas. He and his brother, Julius, enlisted as privates. Michael enlisted for one year with Capt. Samuel G. Smith's Company E, the "Dixie Grays" of the 6th Arkansas. Julius likely enlisted at the same time in Company A, the "Capitol Guards" of the same regiment.[15] Julius was killed at the Battle of Shiloh (Pittsburgh Landing) near the border of Tennessee and Mississippi in early April 1862. At least nine other Jewish Confederates were killed at Shiloh.[16] Michael Levy survived and was promoted to fourth corporal, then sergeant. He was detailed to the ordnance department. By July 8, 1862, Levy was promoted to lieutenant and reported to the chief of ordnance at the depot at Okalona, Mississippi. He continued to serve in the Artillery Corps but was detailed as an ordnance officer.[17]

The career of Octavus Cohen demonstrates how a young man from a prominent Jewish family became a lieutenant. At the age of seventeen, this son of a successful and acculturated Savannah family volunteered as an artilleryman, even though underage for military duty. His father used his family connection with Eugenia Phillips, his sister-in-law, in his attempts to secure a cadetship in the Confederate army for his son. (Eugenia, in turn, used her feminine wiles on her friend, Stephen R. Mallory, secretary of the navy.) Brigadier General Lawton wrote a letter of recommendation citing Cohen's service at Fort Pulaski and stating that he would "be gratified to have him appointed … and attached to my command." Octavus Cohen Sr. wrote directly to Judah Benjamin seeking his assistance. When the campaign to secure a cadetship failed, Cohen's family used its political clout to secure a lieutenant's commission for him. Meanwhile, Cohen served in the Signal Corps in Savannah. His family's efforts continued into 1863 with letters from all of his superior officers, including the endorsement of Brig. Gen. Hugh Mercer, commander of the District of Georgia, who wrote, "From his experience in the service both in the line & the staff & his unexceptionable private character, I consider him eminently worthy to wear a sword in the service of the Confederacy."[18]



Lt. Michael Levy enlisted, as did his brother Julius, as a private. Levy served with "the Dixie Grays" of the 6th Arkansas and later became first lieutenant of artillery. This photograph shows him with the two collar stripes of a first lieutenant. His brother, Julius, was killed at Shiloh. (Courtesy of Mrs. Jay [Pearl Anne] Silverstein, Chattanooga, Tennessee.)

In June 1862 Cohen fought at Secessionville while serving as a volunteer aide to Gen. William Duncan Smith, second in command to Brig. Gen. Nathan "Shanks" Evans. Cohen was on Smith's staff, in combat and on picket duty. He brought his body servant, George, along. The Union forces shelled James Island day and night. "We have a pretty hard time riding all day without eating anything & at night sleeping on the hard floor. I must say that soldiering is a hard life sleeping [in] our clothes all night, etc." He added a postscript: "If you hear of anyone writing [his first cousin] Gratz [Cohen] please ask them to tell him that I will be happy to hear from him but have not time to write him. I tell you what that we are in a Yankee nest on this Island."[19]

He served with Smith on James Island from June to October 1862. In July he was able to go to Charleston on a furlough to see his father and his uncle Solomon Cohen, and he enjoyed a cocktail at his Uncle Jack's. Cohen was detailed to the Signal Corps in October 1862 and served in that assignment until June 1863.[20]

On June 5, 1863, Cohen was finally appointed to second lieutenant, Company G, 32d Georgia. This regiment, which was to distinguish itself throughout the war, was sent to Charleston at the urgent request of General Beauregard in the summer of 1863 to defend Charleston.[21]

The Union army under Gen. Quincy Gillmore was preparing a major assault, and men were badly needed on James Island across the Ashley River from Charleston to free up other units to man Battery Wagner at the tip of Morris Island. Cohen arrived on James Island in June 1863 with his body servant, George, and spent a hot few weeks on picket duty. He was superseded in command of his company by a more experienced and senior Lt. Morris Dawson. Despite all the trouble his father had gone to secure his position, Cohen did not object to being relieved of command of one of the advanced posts in the Confederate line of defense, "as I thought myself too young for the position."[22] He wrote his mother, "We expect to leave for Morris Island in a few hours & have but a little time to write. This is no play soldiering."[23] Morris Island was difficult duty and George could not accompany him.

In July 1863 Morris Island was to become, in Bruce Catton's words, "the deadliest sandpit on earth." The Union army, in a surprise attack on July 10, captured the southern half of Morris Island, but Batteries Wagner and Gregg on the northern end of the island, between Fort Sumter and the Union army, held. "With additional guns, a fresh garrison, and a new commander in Brig. Gen. William B. Taliaferro," Stephen R. Wise wrote, "the Confederates prepared to meet their enemy." That a major assault on Wagner would be made was obvious to its defenders. Eight days later, on July 18, 1863, it began: artillery bombardment, naval assault, and then a massive infantry attack on Wagner itself. On that same day, the 32d Georgia was rushed over to Morris Island. Led by Brig. Gen. Johnson Hagood, they arrived in time to seal off the escape route of Union troops caught in the killing fire of the fort's salient, the defensive ditch dug in front of the fort to trap invaders. The 32d Georgia was one of the units that was rotated in and out of Battery Wagner for the remainder of the siege. Colonel Harrison became the fort's acting commander again in mid-August.[24] Cohen was there with him. In August 1863 Cohen described a fierce bombardment and fight. "I never expected to live that night through in the midst of the enemies severest firing of shells, Grape cannister & shrapnel & musketing."[25]

By 1864 the Lincoln administration was trying to hurry the end of the war by granting amnesty to the rebels who would bring Southern states back into the Union. Florida was a serious possibility, and plans were made to occupy the Jacksonville area. There was intense fighting at Baldwin and a major battle at Olustee (Ocean Pond), where the Confederates turned back the Union advance. Octavus Cohen was in the thick of the fighting as aide-de-camp to Colonel Harrison, who had command of a brigade. Although it was "the finest country" Cohen had ever seen, water was scarce and the men drank ditch water. The fight, he wrote his mother, was "a pretty affair…. We lost… about 800, the enemy lost upwards of 3,000 [actually 1,861] … if our cavalry had been worth any thing, we would have captured the whole force, as they were very much demoralized…. Our Regt fought splendidly." Thus ended the only large campaign fought on Florida soil.[26]

When Colonel Harrison was again assigned the command of a brigade in December 1864, Cohen became acting brigade ordnance officer. He continued in this duty through the end of the war. December 1864 through early 1865 found him stationed at Pocotaligo near Beaufort, handling arms, wagons, and ammunition for the entire brigade. He surrendered with the 32d Georgia on April 26, 1865, and was paroled on May 1, 1865, at Greensboro, North Carolina, with the forces under Gen. Joseph E. Johnston.[27]

E J Levy, Capt.

Capt. Ezekiel ("Zeke") J. Levy was a merchant in Richmond and the secretary of Beth Ahabah when the war began. He was elected fourth sergeant of the Richmond Light Infantry Blues in April 1861. He served most of the war as a lieutenant and attained the rank of captain. He was in command of the Blues, Company A of the 46th Virginia, at the Battle of the Crater at Petersburg. (Courtesy of the Jacob Rader Marcus Center, American Jewish Archives, Cincinnati, Ohio.)

At the beginning of the war, prominent men raised and outfitted companies and made themselves captains. Officers were mostly elected by the men during the first year of the war, although this practice was discontinued in the spring of 1862.[28] There were a number of Jewish infantry captains, including Ezekiel J. Levy of Richmond, who earned his captain's rank in combat.

Levy served most of the war as a lieutenant but had succeeded through attrition to captain of the Richmond Light Infantry Blues of the 46th Virginia late in the war. Levy had been a member of the Blues, a prestigious militia company, since 1855. When the company was called into service in April 1861, he was elected fourth sergeant. His younger brother Isaac J. Levy enlisted as a private in his company in March, as did a number of other Jewish soldiers. By June, Levy was first sergeant. The company went to western Virginia under Capt. O. Jennings Wise and soon became Company A of the 46th Virginia Regiment of Brigadier General and former Virginia Gov. Henry A. Wise's Legion. Capt. Wise was killed and more than half the company was captured when Roanoke Island fell in February 1862. The company next served on the Peninsula around Yorktown. Levy was elected second lieutenant in May 1862, and the company saw action during the Battle of Seven Pines and the Seven Days in the summer of 1862. (General Wise said that the Blues "were the damnest hardest set of men to manage he ever had anything to do with, but they were perfect devils in a fight.")[29]

The Levy brothers tried to keep kosher and observe their religious rites during the war. Ezekiel Levy went to great lengths to make a proper Passover Seder while in the Charleston area. This did not affect Levy's standing with the men of his company. By March 1864, he was in command of the company although just a lieutenant. The Blues returned to Virginia from Charleston and arrived in Petersburg in early May. On May 16, as the 46th Virginia went into action north of Petersburg, Lt. Levy was again in command of the Blues. (His captain was temporarily commanding a battalion of several companies of the 46th Virginia.) Afterward, the company was engaged in hard, brutal trench warfare around Petersburg, which did not end until they were surrendered at Appomattox eleven months later.[30]

Levy saw a great deal of combat and led his men courageously during a hard and trying ordeal. The enemy made several charges on the works, which the regiment occupied around Petersburg in the middle of June. During the first charge, Captain Carter was mortally wounded and the first lieutenant put out of action. During the charge the next day, Levy was wounded but remained on the field. He finally went into Petersburg three days later to have his wound dressed, but returned early the next morning. Levy was promoted to first lieutenant in July as a result of Captain Carter's death.[31]

Levy was still in command when the tremendous mine explosion beneath the Confederate works commenced the Battle of the Crater on July 30. Four tons of powder exploded in what has been described as the most awesome spectacle of the war. One soldier reported feeling "a jar like an earthquake." An officer wrote of "a vast cloud of earth borne upward." The Blues were in position about two hundred yards from the explosion. They defended the trenches to the right of the breach that tore a hole in the center of Brig. Gen. Stephen Elliott's brigade. Levy was soon promoted to captain in recognition of his command of the company.[32] His brother, Isaac, who had survived being hit by a spent musket ball two days after the Battle of the Crater, was killed by an exploding shell on August 21.

Samuel Yates Levy, a member of the distinguished Charleston and Savannah Levy family, had an easier time becoming a captain. His sisters were Phoebe Yates Levy Pember and Eugenia Levy Phillips. A tall, dark-complexioned man, Levy was thirty-four when the war began. He joined the City Light Guard of Savannah in August 1861. From that time on he commanded this unit, which became Company D, 1st (Olmstead's) Regiment Georgia Infantry. The company was stationed at various locations in the Savannah area and was at Causten's Bluff Battery from May to November 1862.[33]

Captain Levy described camp life at Causten's Bluff Battery in a letter to his father, written on September 29, 1862, as busy and dangerous: "almost every moment of my time from sunrise to sunset is fully occupied, and the exigencies of the times, forbidding us candles, render it impossible to write at night, or in fact to do anything else, except to sit round the fire, talk and smoke pipes." Levy told his father that he had never worked so hard in his life as he had since he took command of the batteries. The men were constantly plagued by mosquitoes and sand flies. They were sick on account of the unhealthy conditions and the inefficiency of the quartermaster in providing supplies. Some had died. Bread and coffee, which he had not had for months, were luxuries. They lived on rice and all the fresh shrimp they wanted whenever the men decided to go to the trouble of casting nets in the creeks.[34]

This letter also revealed Levy's pessimism about victory at this early date. He could see for himself the energetic preparation made by the Union navy in building improved gunboats. "As for ourselves," he wrote his father, "I cannot see that we have done anything to increase our means of resistance." His command had done nothing all summer, its leaders "looking to the achievement of the Army of Virginia." Levy told his father that he would not be surprised if his superiors abandoned their lines and fell back to Savannah. Levy felt that all he did was build and then dismantle batteries. He was, however, happy that General Beauregard was now in charge of the defense of Georgia and South Carolina: "we shall now probably have less of the 'Sleepy Hollow' course of proceedings," he wrote. "The Yanks will never relinquish the fat pickings of the South," he concluded. "Charleston and Savannah may therefore expect to pass through the fire."[35]

Despite their lack of food, whiskey, or decent clothing, Levy and the men in his unit were cheerful. They had their relaxing moments: "round the camp fire at night and in the free enjoyment of indisputable clay pipes, there is nothing but fun and laughter. Whiskey had become a myth," he wrote his father, "and ranks in the same category as some of the forgotten tipples of the Babylonians." He closed his letter: "Rain, rain, rain: nothing but rain for the past month: it is so disagreeable in camp that I begin to think it, Lincoln's reign. My paper has run out and so I am yours affectionately, Yates Levy."[36]

Levy was not an experienced soldier. He was, however, highly literate and well educated. He spent most of 1862 and 1863 serving as judge advocate in court-martial proceedings in Savannah. He was recommended for promotion to major, but he apparently was not promoted, although The Roster of Georgia Troops in Confederate Service states that he was "Elected Major November 1861."

Levy commanded his company in combat in June 1864 at Marietta, Georgia. At Pine Mountain near Atlanta, Levy's company became separated from his command and, concluding that "discretion was the better part of valor," Levy surrendered his men to the 15th Ohio. He became a prisoner of war and was transferred to the military prison at Louisville, Kentucky, then to Nashville, and finally to Johnson's Island, Ohio.[37]

Levy was clearly a man of peace, an intellectual who hated war. In 1862 he wrote his father reminiscing about the long talks they used to have about "old friendly authors," and wondered, "will those days ever come again, or is Mars to be in the ascendant for the rest of our time?" In November of 1863, after the fall of Vicksburg and defeat at Gettysburg, he had written a long poem entitled "Prayer for Peace." Like many Southerners, he felt that the Union victories were divine punishment for the sins of the South:

We know our sins are manifold, oh Lord

And that thy wrath against us is but right

For we have wandered wildly from thy word and things committed wrongful in thy sight.[38]

Johnson's Island Prison was located in Sandusky Bay on Lake Erie. One mile from the mainland, the prison consisted of army barracks on forty acres. There were three thousand prisoners held there by April 1865, most of them officers. The prisoners ate rats to supplement their poor diet. Deadly brawls took place over bits of food. Clothing was inadequate to the cold, and some prisoners froze to death. Levy wrote home about the "long and bitterly cold winter." It was, in Maj. Henry Kyd Douglas's words, "just the place to convert visions to the theological belief that Hell has torments of cold instead of heat."[39] Yates Levy was released after taking the oath on June 15, 1865, and returned to Savannah.[40]

The few Jewish infantry colonels were native-born Southerners. Col. Leon Dawson Marks, for example, was one of the highest-ranking Jewish infantry officers of the line—that is, a commander who saw combat. Born at Bayou Sara, Louisiana, in 1829, he fought in the Mexican War, practiced law in Shreveport, and edited a weekly newspaper, the Caddo News. His father was a German Jew. His mother was Christian, a Dawson from the St. Francisville area. In 1859 Marks, who was a practicing Jew, married Amelia Jordan of Shreveport, a cousin of Julia Dent, the wife of Ulysses S. Grant, and a Christian.[41]

Marks was a delegate to the Louisiana secession convention and helped organize the "Shreveport Greys," which became Company D, 1st Louisiana Special Battalion (Dreux's Rifles). Once the battalion was formed in Virginia, he served as the battalion adjutant. In April 1862 he returned to Louisiana, where he was appointed colonel of the 27th Louisiana. He served for a period in March 1863 as "commandant of the Post of Vicksburg." On June 28, 1863, during the brutal siege of Vicksburg by the Union army and navy, Marks was mortally wounded by shrapnel from an exploding Union Parrott bomb. He had risked his life in battle on many occasions, but this time he was wounded as he ate his dinner. Vicksburg fell on July 4, and Marks was brought back to Shreveport to be with his family. He died on September 23, 1863, at the age of thirty-four, leaving a widow and a five-year-old son.[42]

Alexander "Alex" Hart, a native of New Orleans and a store clerk, was twenty-two years old when the war broke out.[43] He joined the 2d Company of the Orleans Cadets, Louisiana Militia, on May 4, 1861. Hart was recognized as a leader and was appointed first lieutenant of this company, which became Company E, 5th Louisiana Infantry, in June. He was promoted to captain upon the resignation of Capt. Charles Hobday and was with the 5th Louisiana in the Peninsular Campaign, Seven Days Campaign, Cedar Mountain, and Second Manassas.

The 5th Louisiana went to Richmond as part of Major General Magruder's army. Unlike most Confederate regiments, it was made up of common laborers, "denizens of the New Orleans waterfront," and clerks from the retail district of the Crescent City. Many were immigrants. The Orleans Cadets, Hart's company, for example, was 46 percent foreign-born. By the end of the war, 161 of the 5th Louisiana's 1,074 men would be killed; 66 died of disease. Thirteen officers were killed. One soldier claimed that the regiment was mostly "uneducated Irishmen." Many of the immigrants were from Ireland, but they were also from the German states, England, and France. It was certainly a rough lot and became a part of the famous 1st Louisiana Brigade known as the Louisiana Tigers. One company, the Perret Guards, was said to consist mostly of gamblers. A soldier wrote that "to be admitted one must be able to cut, shuffle, and deal on the point of a bayonet."[44]

The Louisiana Tigers fought valiantly at Antietam. As Stephen W. Sears has written, that "strict Presbyterian Stonewall Jackson always regarded the habits and pleasures of the Louisiana 'foreigners' with some suspicion, but there was no question of their worth in battle." On September 17, 1862, they charged across the pasture at Antietam and toward the cornfield where they were shelled by Union batteries. Hart was seriously wounded in this battle, and his wound would plague him for the remainder of the war. He was hit in his left thigh by grape shot and remained on medical furlough in Richmond for five months. Ezekiel and Lichtenstein relate a story about Hart which probably relates to this time: A surgeon said Captain Hart’s leg must be amputated. The lady of the house where he had been taken after the battle begged the surgeon to wait and give her a chance to nurse Hart back to health. “So young and handsome a man should not lose a leg,” she said. She nursed him back to health. After the war, Major Hart visited his friend every year. On one occasion when the lady’s daughter-in-law complained there was no ham on the table, the old lady said “No, there shall be no ham on my table when my ‘Jewish son’ is here.”[45]

While on leave, Hart was appointed major of the regiment. He returned to his unit in time to participate in the Chancellorsville campaign, where the 5th Louisiana was heavily engaged a prelude and sideshow to Lee’s greatest victory. The 5th provided the primary opposition to the Federal crossing of the Rappahannock River at Fredericksburg on April 29 and was with Maj. Gen. Jubal Early’s division at Fredericksburg while the Battle of Chancellorsville raged. Afterward, at the Battle of Salem Church, the 1st Louisiana Brigade was at the center of the Confederate line which charged the Union army and incurred heavy losses. The 1st Louisiana Brigade also marched with Lee to Gettysburg and led the drive through the town of Gettysburg, pushing the Federals out onto Cemetery Hill. They assaulted the Federal position and carried the crest of Cemetery Hill, but were forced to retreat at great loss of life. Hart was wounded again at Gettysburg by a gunshot to his left hand. He spent the rest of the summer of 1863 recuperating. In November he was certified as permanently disabled and assigned to the Department of Henrico under Brig. Gen. John H. Winder.

Hart chafed to get back into active service. He demanded a medical examining board review his fitness two months before the next review was scheduled. He was declared fit for duty and, by April 30, 1864, had rejoined his command. During his absence, much of his brigade and all of his regiment except one captain had been captured at Rappahannock Station in November 1863. Most of the men were exchanged, and Hart was probably with his command during their heavy fighting at the Wilderness, Spotsylvania, and North Anna. Hart was briefly admitted to a hospital again but went back into action in July 1864, leading a temporary command of men on their way back to rejoin their units in the Shenandoah Valley. He rejoined his regiment in time to participate in the battle at Kernston, Virginia. Hart requested a promotion to colonel as the senior surviving officer of the regiment, but it was never acted upon.

In August he crossed the Potomac and marched through Sharpsburg. “Moved at sunrise,” he wrote in his diary on August 6. “Passed the old battle field. Saw the place I had been wounded at 17th Sept., 1862.” He must have been out of sorts on August 12, as he wrote in his diary:

I am a man,

so weary with disast[er], with fortune

That I could set my life on any chance,

To mend it or be rid on’t.

He continued: “When once sordid interest seizes on the heart, it freezes up the source of every warm and liberal feeling.”[46] Hart’s diary is full of references to hard fighting. “Formed line of battle at Leetown,” he wrote on August 25. “Engaged the Yankee cavalry. Had a rousing fight.” He acted as field officer of the day on the 26th and as a pallbearer for Colonel Monaghan, commander of the 6th Louisiana, killed in action the day before, with other high-ranking officers. “Wet and miserable,” he wrote on September 5. “No shelter from rain.” Then came the third Battle of Winchester against Maj. Gen. Philip Sheridan on September 19, 1864. The Louisiana brigade fought bravely, at one point holding the Federal attackers at bay virtually alone. All of the mounted officers of the brigade were wounded. Hart’s horse was killed, and he was captured.[47]

Hart, now a prisoner of war, was sent to Fort McHenry, Maryland; and ultimately to Savannah, Georgia, where he and many others were exchanged in November 1864. The joyous Confederates were taken to the Pulaski House, Savannah’s premier hotel, where they were treated to a sumptuous dinner. “Crowds waiting to receive us all cheer’d lustily,” he noted. The ladies, he wrote, “did everything in their power to make us comfortable.” He stayed with the Alexander Abrams family in Savannah for two days.[48]

On November 15, 1864, Major Hart was paroled, and he set off for Richmond. He stopped in Columbia, South Carolina, where he visited friends, including Joe Mark. He stayed in Charlottesville, Virginia, with the Heilbrun family. “Received splendidly,” he wrote in his diary. He arrived in Richmond on November 20, where his fiancée, Leonora, “cried some.” Part of the time in Richmond he was confined to the Louisiana hospital. Part of the time he was “having a good time generally.” He likely was waiting to be officially discharged. On December 8 he applied for retirement. In January 1865, Major Hart was ordered to report to his command but was found unfit for field duty. He was allowed to retire to the Invalid Corps in March 1865.[49] He took his time leaving Richmond and made it out on one of the last trains as Richmond was being evacuated in April. He was finally paroled in Atlanta, Georgia, in early May.

Another native-born, high-ranking Jewish Confederate officer and leader of his community was William Mallory Levy. He commenced his military service as a captain of the LeCompte Guard from Natchitoches Parish, a company of the 2d Louisiana in May 1861. The regiment was dispatched to the front in Virginia. On May 21, 1861, the regiment reported to Col. John Bankhead Magruder, who had just been appointed to command the forces on the Peninsula, near Richmond. A week after the Battle of Bethel Church in June, the 2d Louisiana was sent in to occupy the area. On June 18, Magruder sent Captain Levy under a flag of truce to Fort Monroe, and he returned with the intelligence that an expedition of some magnitude was under way, prompting Magruder to move back to Yorktown. In July Levy was back in his old college town, Williamsburg, where his regiment was active in securing the defenses. Undoubtedly, Levy took this opportunity to visit friends and family in and around Richmond. When Col. Lewis G. DeRussy resigned to take a position on the staff of Maj. Gen. Leonidas Polk, Levy was elected colonel of the regiment.[50]

By the spring of 1862, the 2d Louisiana was in the 2d Brigade, 2d Division, Army of the Peninsula, commanded by Brig. Gen. Howell Cobb. General McClellan's campaign to capture the Peninsula began in April. Colonel Levy led his men at the battle at Dam Number 1 (Lee's Mill) at the center of Magruder's defensive line across the Peninsula. He wrote his wife that he was "hearty, healthy and lively. My regiment participated in the skirmish which took place at this position on the 16th [of April] and I am unhurt … We defeated them in beautiful style … killing a large number of them." Major General Magruder, in his report, cited Colonel Levy's "judgment, courage, and high soldierly qualities of conduct and arrangements, which I desire specially to commend." Levy reported to his wife that "our troops behaved with great gallantry and have been highly complimented." On the morning of April 19, Colonel Levy carried a message under a flag of truce proposing a cessation of hostilities so that the Union troops could collect their dead lying in front of the Confederate works.

Despite his success, Levy failed to win reelection as colonel and was replaced by Isaiah T. Norwood, who was killed two months later at Malvern Hill. Levy tried to secure another command. "I beg you to be cheerful and hopeful," he wrote his wife from the Peninsula. "The cause is a righteous one and God is on our side and will watch over us."[51] He wrote to General Magruder in July 1862 that his "sense of duty as well as inclination will keep me in the army as long as the war or my life may last even in the capacity of a private in the ranks."[52]

Like many an officer who failed to secure a promotion, Levy went to Richmond in search of an appointment. Louisiana Gov. Thomas O. Moore wrote Secretary of War Randolph that Levy "failed, as did nearly every good officer, in a re-election, because he discharged his duties with great fidelity and judgment, and I am desirous that he shall renew his service & if possible in this state."[53] Magruder asked Randolph to appoint Levy a brigadier general, and Howell Cobb said in a bit of an overstatement that the loss of Levy's services would be "a public calamity."[54] In July Levy offered to take command of a brigade near Monroe, Louisiana, to be under command of General Magruder in his newly appointed capacity as commander of the Trans-Mississippi Department. His knowledge of the Trans-Mississippi country and its people and his status with the citizens of the area suited him for the position.[55]

Magruder's departure for the new assignment was held up until the conclusion of the Seven Days Battle, which had all of Richmond on high alert. But Levy was unlucky. Magruder was replaced by Maj. Gen. Theophilus Holmes in July, and Magruder was detained in Richmond until October, answering charges arising out of his conduct during the Seven Days Battle. When new orders came, Magruder was reassigned to Texas.

Levy now had no chance for a command of his own. In July he obtained an appointment as a major in the adjutant general's department. He was confirmed by the Confederate Congress in October. He joined Maj. Gen. Richard Taylor's staff as assistant adjutant general when Taylor became commander of the Western District of Louisiana. Levy briefly commanded the post at Fort DeRussy, Louisiana, on the Red River, but was soon at Taylor's side in the field, a position he retained until the war ended. Taylor was an important Confederate military commander. A son of President Zachary Taylor and a former brother-in-law of Jefferson Davis, an influential planter, and Louisiana state senator, Taylor became an outstanding field commander and was promoted to brigadier general, then major general, then lieutenant general. He won many a battle and achieved his greatest success in the Red River campaign in Louisiana.[56] Levy was Taylor's closest aide.

From December 1863 to June 1864, Levy served as General Taylor's commissioner of exchange, negotiating the exchange of prisoners of war with his counterparts under Major Generals William B. Franklin and Nathaniel P. Banks. He helped raise a cavalry unit among the Louisiana Creoles. He also apparently continued to raise or broker cotton throughout the war. Taylor relied heavily on Levy's judgment. In an April 1864 report covering the Red River Campaign, Taylor lamented that he "was deprived of the very valuable services of Major William M. Levy," who was, Taylor wrote, "[d]istinguished time and again for gallantry on the field as well as for patient labor in office work."[57]

Taylor asked to be relieved of his command of the Trans-Mississippi Department in June 1864. He was promoted to lieutenant general, and in September he assumed command of the Department of Alabama, Mississippi, and East Louisiana. He brought Levy with him. Because there was a senior staff already in place, Taylor had the unpleasant duty of choosing which senior officers he would retain and which he would relieve or reassign. "Majors Surget and Levy," he wrote Gen. Samuel Cooper, "have long been with me, and am particularly desirous to retain them. They are fine officers." Levy was retained and in October 1864 was promoted to lieutenant colonel and senior assistant inspector general of the department. With the exception of a few weeks, Levy remained at General Taylor's side. Levy officially surrendered May 4, 1865, and was paroled May 10 at Meridian, Mississippi.[58]

Maj. Adolph Proskauer of Mobile, a Prussian immigrant, rose from the rank of corporal to major of the 12th Alabama. He served at Sharpsburg (Antietam), where he was wounded. He led the 12th "amid a perfect rain of bullets, shot and shell" at Gettysburg. (Courtesy of the Jacob Rader Marcus Center, American Jewish Archives, Cincinnati, Ohio.)

Adolph Proskauer of Mobile was among the few Jewish immigrants who rose to be a higher-ranked Confederate officer. Proskauer had been educated at the gymnasium in Breslau until he came to America at age sixteen. In May 1861, he enlisted in Capt. Augustus Stikes' company, the Independent Rifles, for twelve months.[59] He was appointed first corporal. The company went to Richmond and in July was combined with other companies to form the 12th Alabama Infantry. It became Company C. Like the 5th Louisiana, the 12th Alabama was a cosmopolitan regiment that included a large portion of Germans, French, Irish, and Spanish, sailors and dockworkers from Mobile, and mountain boys from north Alabama.[60] They were noted as foragers, recalled one of its officers, Capt. Robert Emory Park, "and the vast majority of them suffered very little from hunger" despite limited rations.

By December, Proskauer had been promoted to sergeant. In April 1862 he was commissioned as a first lieutenant. He served in that rank for only twenty-six days before being promoted to captain in May, replacing Stikes, who became a major of the regiment. As captain, Proskauer was remembered as handsome and the “best dressed man in the regiment.”

Proskauer participated in many of the fiercest battles of the war. As lieutenant of Company C, he fought in the Siege of Yorktown (April–May 1862), including the Battle of Williamsburg. As captain, he helped lead the 12th Alabama at the Battle of Seven Pines, where the 12th made a “gallant charge … into the very jaws of death.” The regiment suffered heavy casualties: sixty officers and men were killed outright, including their commander. This was the regiment’s first experience in real battle. The men were worn out and were glad to “stretch themselves upon the wet ground and sleep soundly,” one officer recalled, “though the air was filled with the agonizing cries and groans of the wounded and dying men and animals by whom they were surrounded.” The 12th was at Gaines Mill in June and at Malvern Hill on July 1 during the Seven Days Battle before Richmond.[61]

Proskauer and his regiment marched north in Lee’s Maryland campaign as part of Rodes’s brigade. Proskauer was in combat at the Battle of South Mountain and Sharpsburg (Antietam), where he was wounded. On September 17, 1862, the single bloodiest day in the Civil War, Lee’s Army of Northern Virginia faced George B. McClellan’s Army of the Potomac. There were 4,710 men killed, 18,440 wounded.[62] Proskauer was among the wounded, having been shot in the abdomen during intense fighting along the Sunken Road, later called the “Bloody Lane.” He recuperated from September until January 1863 and returned to his company at Orange Court House, Virginia.

While the 12th was encamped near Fredericksburg in 1863, Proskauer, now the senior captain in the regiment, formally applied to become major. Major Stikes had resigned his commission and returned to Mobile. Col. Samuel B. Pickens did not favor his appointment, preferring a junior captain who was apparently well qualified for the position. Colonel Pickens had an examining board appointed. Made up of distinguished senior officers, two generals and a colonel, the board, Pickens hoped, would find Proskauer unsuited for the rank and deny his application. “It was stated in camp,” Captain Park recalled in his Sketch, “that Colonel Pickens hinted to this Committee of Examiners that he hoped they would be so rigid that Captain Proskauer could not pass the examination.” Let Captain Park continue the story as he set it down in 1906, some forty-three years later:

> During the day of the examination there was an unusual interest felt by the officers of the camp, and especially by the Colonel. Late in the afternoon, after an all-day examination had been concluded, one of the officers rode rapidly up to Col. Pickens’ headquarters and in reply to an anxious inquiry, was told that the > Committee had done all they could to defeat Capt. Proskauer, but that after an examination [in] squad drill, in company drill, in regimental drill, in brigade drill, in drill by echelon, and in the army movements as suggested in Jomini's tactics, Captain Proskauer did not fail to answer promptly and accurately every question. The general added, "he knows more about tactics than any of the Examining Committee, and we were forced to recommend his position."[63]

Bertram Korn read into Park's account that Colonel Pickens "was so prejudiced against Jews" that he attempted to block Proskauer's promotion.[64] Yet Park does not say that, nor does his recollection prove this charge. Indeed, Park's personal admiration of Proskauer, his pointed criticism of Colonel Pickens, the interest of the other officers in Proskauer's success, Park's relish in telling the story, and the crucial fact that the board found Proskauer unusually qualified (and he was therefore promoted to major) all attest to the lack of anti-Semitism in the Confederate army.

Proskauer was a popular officer with his men. He was at the Battle of Chancellorsville in May of 1863, when the 12th fought as a part of Stonewall Jackson's famous flanking attack on Major General Hooker's Union army. On the morning of May 3 (still captain) Proskauer led the regiment as Colonel Pickens assumed command of a portion of the brigade after the commander was wounded. Proskauer was wounded in the battle and was transferred to General Hospital No. 4 in Richmond. He was promoted to major by Colonel Pickens while he was in the hospital. His promotion was ultimately confirmed by the Confederate Congress, but not until early 1864.

The 12th Alabama had broken camp on June 4, 1863, on their way to Maryland and Pennsylvania with the Army of Northern Virginia. Major Proskauer caught up with his command on the road and was fit for duty at the Battle of Gettysburg on July 1, 1863. A part of Rodes's division, the 12th suffered heavy casualties at Oak Ridge, northeast of Gettysburg. The poor leadership of both Maj. Gen. Robert Rodes and Col. Edward A. O'Neal, commanding the Alabama Brigade, cost many of Proskauer's men their lives. "Unwarned, unled as a brigade, we went to our death," one soldier recalled. There were 696 of O'Neal's 1,688 men killed or wounded along the Mummasburg Road early in the battle. Union artillery fire killed many others. Colonel Pickens sent Captain Park to the field hospital on Proskauer's horse. Years later, on learning of the major's death, Park wrote Mrs. Proskauer: "I can see him now, in mental view, as he nobly carried himself at Gettysburg, standing coolly and calmly, with cigar in his mouth, at the head of the Twelfth Alabama, amid a perfect rain of bullets, shot and shell. He was the personification of intrepid gallantry, of imperturbable courage." All of Company C's officers were wounded and half of its men.[65] As the Union troops withdrew to Cemetery Hill south of Gettysburg, the 12th Alabama moved into town the next day.

On July 3 the 12th proceeded into Gettysburg, where it participated in the unsuccessful assault on Culp's Hill, the tip of the Union "fishhook" line at Gettysburg. Culp's Hill looked down on Cemetery Hill and Cemetery Ridge, areas of immense tactical importance. If the Confederates could capture Culp's Hill, they could take Cemetery Hill and defeat the enemy. Lee hoped the attck on Culp's Hill would pull men away from General Meade's center, where he planned to send Col. George E. Pickett on that fateful day.[66]

But at 4:30 a.m., as the sun rose, the artillery of the Union XII Corps opened fire on the Confederates. They, too, appreciated the value of Culp's Hill. The fighting raged for seven hours, as the musket fire of thousands of soldiers literally destroyed a forest of oak trees. "The wonder is," the Union commander wrote, "that the rebels persisted so long in an attempt that in the first half hour must have seemed useless." Stopped at almost every advance, the Confederate army, including Major Proskauer and the 12th Alabama, tried again and again against impossible odds to take Culp's Hill. Finally they withdrew. "For decades thereafter," Champ Clark wrote in Gettysburg: The Confederate High Tide, "on Culp's Hill a ghostly forest would stand, its trees shorn of their limbs and stripped of their bark by flying metal—testimony to the savagery of a contest that would nevertheless be overshadowed by events still to come."[67]

Pickett's charge failed, and on July 4, 1863, Lee retreated from Pennsylvania. Major Proskauer and the 12th Alabama, "suffering, wet and anxious," on a dark, dreary, rainy night retreated south. They camped near Orange Courthouse during the remainder of the summer of 1863. Fighting continued in Virginia, and in October Major Proskauer led a force of half the regiment on a mission to destroy railroad tracks near Warrenton Junction.[68]

In November, the 12th saw action at Kelly's Ford on the Rappahannock and during the Mine Run Campaign. Proskauer was in command of the regiment at this time, as Colonel Pickens had been injured and the lieutenant colonel was absent from camp. In late December, Proskauer led the regiment to Paine's Mill to help saw planks for the Orange Road. The army was in winter quarters, and Proskauer was granted a furlough around April 21, 1864.[69]

The war, however, was far from over. The 12th Alabama, now a part of Battle's Alabama brigade, was heavily engaged on the Orange Turnpike early in the afternoon of May 5, when the Battle of the Wilderness began. Temporarily overwhelmed, the 12th rallied and drove back the Union invaders. The regiment saw action again on May 8 at Spotsylvania Court House, where Major Proskauer received his third wound of the war. The surgeon's report described the bullet "entering in front and near lobe of left ear, passing through parotid gland—ranging obliquely downwards … and making its exit on posterium of right side of neck.” The war was over for Adolph Proskauer. He was retired to the Invalid Corps in January 1865 and was assigned to the Alabama State Reserve Forces. In February he requested a leave of absence to go to Europe to recuperate. The request was approved and forwarded to Richmond, but the capital was evacuated before the Confederate government could act on his request.[70]

Jewish officers also fought in Confederate artillery units. Officers commanded gunners and crews who transported, maintained, and fired increasingly complex and deadly cannons or fieldpieces. Artillery units needed ammunition, equipment, horses, and tools. A unit might be as large as a battalion, such as the 2d Alabama Artillery Battalion or the Washington Artillery Battalion consisting of five companies, or it could be an independent battery (a company-size unit).[71] A large number of Jews from Macon, Georgia, for example, served in the Macon German Artillery. Wolf estimated that one-third of the men were “of Hebrew faith” and wrote that Nathan Binswanger served as second lieutenant.

Edwin I. Kursheedt (pronounced “Kur-shet”) of New Orleans was an outstanding officer of the famed Washington Artillery.[72] Born in Jamaica in 1838, Kursheedt came to New Orleans with his family as a child. Raised in an observant Jewish household, he attended its schools and became a merchant. When South Carolina seceded, Edwin was twenty-three years old; joined the Washington Artillery Company in December 1860. This company took possession of the U.S. Arsenal at Baton Rouge and then returned in triumph to New Orleans. Three more companies were added, and the Washington Artillery Battalion volunteered for the war in May 1861. Kursheedt was mustered into Confederate service as a private in Capt. Harry M. Isaacson’s 1st Company, which undoubtedly contained a number of New Orleans Jews. Isaacson was Jewish, and Clara Solomon referred to the Washington Artillery as “Our Battalion.”[73]

Born in Jamaica, Lt. Edwin I. Kursheedt came to New Orleans with his family. He joined the Washington Artillery as a private and served at First Manassas (Bull Run), the Peninsular Campaign, Sharpsburg, Gettysburg, and Petersburg. He was the adjutant of Lt. Col. Benjamin F. Eshleman. (Courtesy of the Jacob Rader Marcus Center, American Jewish Archives, Cincinnati, Ohio.)

The battalion left New Orleans by train for the Virginia front, arrived in Richmond a week later, and was sent to Manassas, where Kursheedt was assigned to the first section of the 1st Company manning a three-inch, eight-pound rifled cannon. This section had the honor of firing the Washington Artillery's first shot against the enemy. Private Kursheedt was in the midst of the Battle of First Manassas (Bull Run) in late July 1861. Early on, his section was placed on Henry House Hill, which soon became the center of the battle. "The Washington Artillery of New Orleans," Clara Solomon wrote with pride in her diary, “did great execution.”[74] The unit remained with the Army of Northern Virginia and its predecessors throughout the remainder of the war.

Kursheedt was promoted to lance corporal by September 1861. He saw action in September at Great Falls, Maryland, and at Yorktown in the Peninsula Campaign and fought with his company through all of the various engagements, including the Seven Days Battle.[75]

New Orleans fell on April 25, 1862. On April 27 Kursheedt, at his camp near Williamsburg, wrote Sarah (“Sallie”) Levy complaining about marching “in a drenching rain—‘for the rain it raineth every day.’” He could not believe New Orleans had been captured. “We are in receipt of the telegraphic news ‘Fall of New Orleans &c’ but do not credit it,’” he wrote. He felt good about his army’s position at Yorktown: “Our position is very strong—our left rests on Yorktown—the centre at Lee’s Mills, & right on Mulberry Island.” He felt his unit might be ordered to Fredericksburg, “as it is believed Massa Geo. B. McClellan [the Union commander] is trying to force a passage to Richmond via that point.” Not only was Kursheedt’s military position strong, but he had plenty to eat. “We are luxuriating in quantities of shad & fresh beef, vegetables, bakers bread & c. So we feast one day and starve the next.” He also looked forward to a visit to Williamsburg. “I intend going into town to see ‘one of the chosen’ whose name was given to me by Eugene Levy, whom I was very pleased to meet here, so au revoir.”[76]

Kursheedt’s unit was under frequent bombardment during the Peninsula campaign. We “are not afar off from our Yankee friends,” he wrote Sarah Levy. He and his men were “enjoying the constant music of their heavy guns.” He and 250 men were crammed in a schooner that brought them from Richmond to the front: “[W]e felt like a lot of chickens cooped up, but were willing to ‘die game.’” Miss Levy had sent him a package of food, which enabled him “to live very high up to yesterday, but had to come down to rations this morning viz, Bacon & crackers—I enjoyed the latter, but have not made up my mind to partake of the former.” Kursheedt was still trying to keep kosher and avoid eating pork.[77]

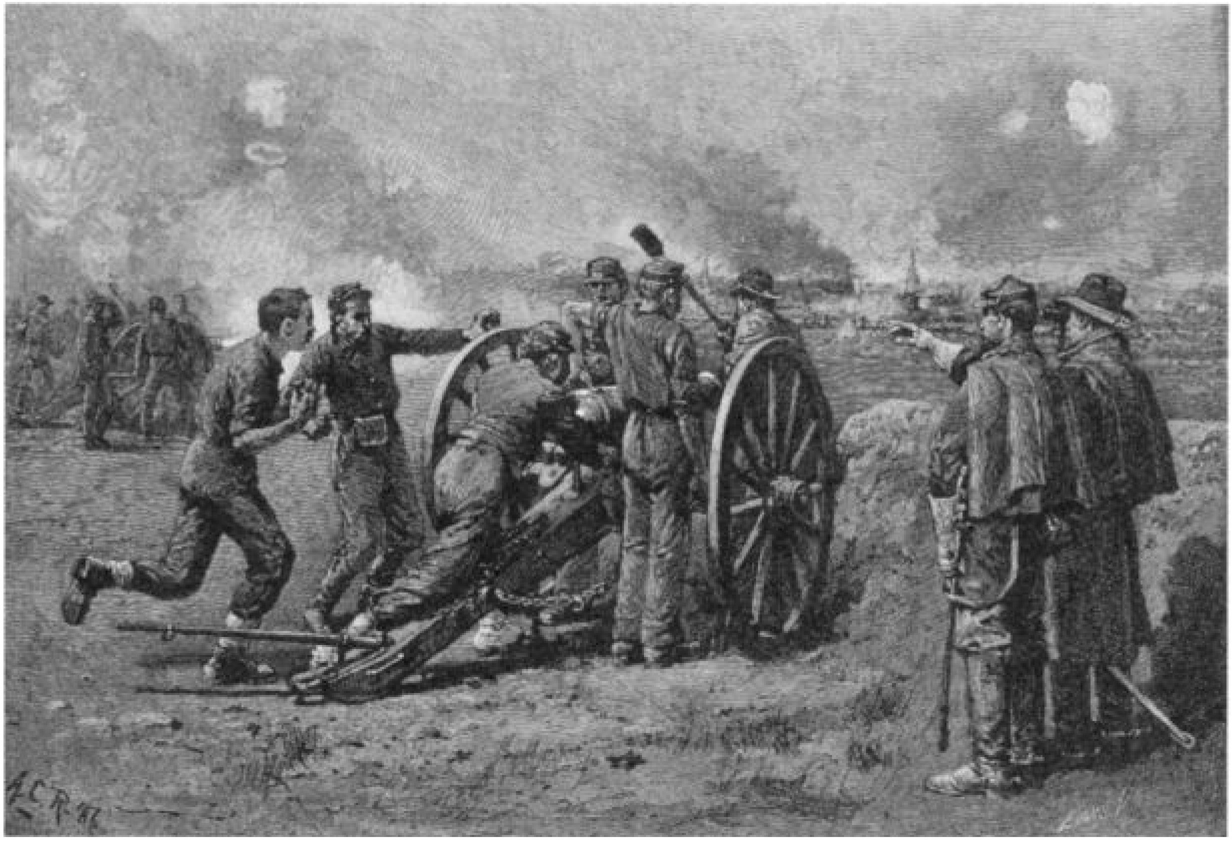
By June Kursheedt began referring to Sarah Levy as “My Dear Miss Sarah” and wrote her frequently about his activities. On June 25 he told her it had been his intention to come to visit her, but his orders prevented it. “I will be busy this evening issuing orders &c to the various Batteries under the Colonel so will not be able to see you.” He had been acting as an adjutant since at least June 9, 1862.[78]

The 1st Company concluded the Seven Days Campaign by successfully attacking General McClellan’s transport ships on the James River on July 6 and 7, doing considerable damage. After a month's rest, the Army of Northern Virginia began to move north from Richmond. Kursheedt's company was in an artillery battle at Beverley's Ford and Rappahannock Station on August 23, 1862. On August 25 Kursheedt wrote Sarah a long letter detailing his participation in the various engagements: "Last Saturday the 3rd Company and our Battery together with others, engaged the enemy at Rappahannock Station & after a hard fight of 4 hours drove the enemy from his position occupying his camp in the evening. The loss of our two companies was very heavy." He also reported that "The little Battle Flag is pretty well cut up by the shells of the enemy and we are all very proud of it." It was the "hottest place we have ever been," but Kursheedt felt that the Confederacy was now winning the war. "The tables have been turned & we are now pressing the enemy to the wall." He knew the army was heading toward Manassas and believed he was about to be involved in a "quite heavy" engagement.[79]

Like many soldiers writing loved ones, Kursheedt was concerned that this might be his last letter. "By the Protection of a kind Providence," he told Sarah, "I am again spared after having had some very narrow escapes. I write today for the purpose of informing you of my safety." He also wrote to tell other Jewish families that "Eugene Levy & brother are both well—we fought side by side in both engagements." And never forgetting one of the strong bonds between him and Sarah, he wrote: "There is no telling when we shall see Richmond as we might march into the Enemy's Country, but I shall certainly try to come down for the Holy days" (Jewish High Holidays, Rosh Hashanah—New Year—and Yom Kippur—Day of Atonement—usually take place in September and early October of each year).[80]

Kursheedt marched north with the Washington Artillery with Lee into Maryland in September 1862. As the troops marched toward Boonsboro, the rear ammunition chest of a caisson exploded. Contrary to the orders of his officers, a private had sat atop a caisson loaded with gunpowder and proceeded to smoke his pipe. The powder exploded and the soldier was hurled twenty feet into the air, fell on the road, was burned from head to foot, and lost all of his clothing. Miraculously, he was not seriously injured. The soldier was barely removed from the scene when the live shells in the chest began to explode. Officers and men ran as far as they could. "Then," in the words of one eyewitness, "Corporals Kursheedt and Ruggles, of the First Company, stepped to the front, and, going deliberately up to the smoking chest, emptied their canteens of water upon the burning cotton used for packing; then taking the shells, some already ignited, threw them into the ditch of water alongside the road, where some exploded, making an awful scatteration of mud and water, but fortunately hurting no one. The danger over, the march was resumed. For this gallant act these corporals quite modestly received the warm approbation of their comrades, and no more was thought of it. But the ‘Victoria’ and the ‘Cross of the Legion of Honor’ have been pinned to a soldier’s breast for acts of lesser heroism.”[81]

The Washington Artillery was now at Sharpsburg, Maryland, near Antietam Creek. Posted on a hill east of the town, the 1st Company was equipped with two three-inch rifles and two ten-pound Parrott cannons. They fired upon Federal troops as they attacked across Rohrbach’s Bridge on the southern end of the battlefield while themselves under constant artillery fire. Attacked four times by Union infantry, the company fought back with the assistance of the Confederate infantry. Kursheedt may have been wounded at Sharpsburg.



The Washington Artillery on Marye’s Hill firing on the Union columns forming for the assault. A number of New Orleans Jews served in the Washington Artillery, including Edwin Kursheedt, its adjutant (Battles and Leaders of the Civil War).

The Army of Northern Virginia next redeployed to Fredericksburg. Three of the Washington Artillery’s four companies, including Kursheedt’s 1st Company, were positioned on Marye’s Heights overlooking the town. The artillery was “spreading havoc among the enemy’s ranks,” and the Washington Artillery was encouraged by Major Sorrel, General Longstreet’s assistant adjutant general, to hold its position despite the ferocity of the Union assault. The battalion's historian recalled the battle this way: "We are fighting under the very eyes of Lee and Longstreet. 'Now, boys, do your level best!' A solid rifle cannon-ball tears its way through the redoubt, scattering dirt and dust in our faces. Kursheedt picks it up, and says, laughingly, 'Boys, let's send this back to them again.' An instant later it is in the gun, and despatched on its mission back to the enemy." Not too long after this show of bravado Kursheedt was wounded. By April 1863 Kursheedt, now only twenty-five years old, was promoted to battalion sergeant major.[82]

The Washington Artillery marched to Pennsylvania with the Army of Northern Virginia and fought at Gettysburg under a new commander, Maj. Benjamin F. Eshleman,[83] who used Kursheedt as his adjutant. After Gettysburg, the Washington Artillery returned to Virginia and Kursheedt officially became the adjutant with the rank of first lieutenant. The battalion went into winter quarters at Petersburg rather than accompany Longstreet to Georgia. Kursheedt was granted a much-deserved leave of absence in the fall. The unit was called back into action in May 1864, when Maj. Gen. Benjamin Butler began his Bermuda Hundred Campaign. Men of the battalion were rushed north to meet the invaders. On May 14, Kursheedt was with Lieutenant Colonel Eshleman and Major Owen on an inspection of their lines south of Drewry's Bluff when they came under heavy fire from enemy sharpshooters. The party halted behind some log cabins. "To go forward or retreat was equally hazardous," Owen later wrote, "so we held a council of war, and determined to run the gauntlet across an open field." The men rode in a bunch so that there would be a small target, and gathering their horses "well in hand, gave them the spur and started…. Instantly the sharp-shooters began firing, and the bullets flew by us like the buzzing of a swarm of bees. Our good steeds seemed conscious of our peril, and went like the wind. Some close shots were made, but no hits. Finally we heard a 'thud' of a bullet, and Eshleman's horse rose up on his hind legs, and Kursheedt and I thought he was a goner, but he came down again, and away we went. We reached the ridge, and were hid from view, right thankful we had run the gauntlet so successfully and with whole skins."[84]

In June the battalion marched north to confront Grant's Army on the Chickahominy River, east of Richmond. By June 18 the men returned to Petersburg, where they were to remain until forced out in April 1865. The battalion was part of the determined Confederate force resisting the brutal siege of Petersburg for almost a year, from June 1864 until April 1865. The Army of the Potomac besieged the small but important railroad town twenty miles south of Richmond for ten months. It was trench warfare at its worst and became a death struggle for the Confederate army, which faced starvation, desertion, and sickness.

In December 1864 Kursheedt wrote to Miss Sallie: “I have not been able to see the Chanucka lights this year. Last year I was with my aunt and officiated in reading the service as I always did at home, for in addition to lighting the lamps in Synagogue we always did so at home. That was our Christmas, as children and we always rec’d presents & enjoyed ourselves—but those times have passed and I only expect to see them again when I shall have a family of my own to hand down these ceremonies to. Don’t you say so too my Pet? … After I shall have been with you in February not many weeks will elapse ere Pesach [Passover].”[85]

When the Army of Northern Virginia retreated toward Appomattox Courthouse, all of the artillery battalions but two were sent off to attempt to reach North Carolina. These units were attacked by Union Calvary on April 8, and some escaped and rejoined Lee’s Infantry. The Washington Artillery destroyed their gun carriages, buried their guns in the woods, and escaped into the mountains to the west. Kursheedt was later paroled in Lynchburg, Virginia, in April 1865.

There were a few Jewish officers in the Confederate cavalry. Exceptional riding skill, which few Jewish Southerners possessed, was a prerequisite for a cavalry officer. An urban and mercantile people, Jewish Southerners were rarely qualified to command these units. But there were a few who served in the cavalry, Edwin Warren Moise and members of the Hyams family among them.

The most illustrious of the Moise family, Edwin Warren Moise grew up in Charleston, where his family belonged to Beth Elohim. His father was a lawyer and a leader in the Reform movement, and young Edwin was brought up as an observing Jew. At fourteen, he left school to help support his family, first as a clerk and then in his own business. He married Esther Lyon of Petersburg, Virginia, in 1854 and soon accepted a position with Raphael J. Moses of Columbus, Georgia, to operate his flour mill, keep his books, and study law.[86]

Moise was opposed to secession, but he volunteered and raised a company of “Partisan Rangers,” or cavalry, in May 1862. According to Harold Moise, of the company’s 120 men, Captain Moise mounted 50 at his own expense, “costing him $10,000—all of his little fortune. This company was officially named the Moise Rangers.” It is the only company named for a Jewish officer, with the possible exceptions of Joseph Benjamin’s company and Capt. Samuel Yates Levy’s company, neither of which is listed in Marcus Wright’s 1876 official list.[87]

The Moise Rangers enrolled in the Confederate service on July 1, 1862. Moise was appointed captain, not elected, because it was a Confederate army unit, not a state volunteer unit. The unit went to North Carolina and joined Col. William C. Claiborne's 7th Confederate Cavalry. Moise's Rangers now became Company A of the 7th Regiment.[88]

The regiment was sent to Ivor, Isle of Wight County, Virginia, near the Blackwater River. The 7th served its entire career either in the southeastern corner of Virginia between Petersburg and Suffolk or in North Carolina. Moise's company engaged in a foraging expedition in January 1863 at Kelly's Store, then was stationed near Petersburg.

In February 1864 Captain Moise and his company had the unusual experience of capturing and destroying a Federal gunboat on Chuckatuck Creek near Smithfield, Virginia. The Union forces sent a joint army-navy expedition to capture some "rebel troops (said to be about 40) and tobacco." When one Union party ran into a much superior force of Confederates, they retreated to Smithfield to the gunboat Smith Briggs. As the Union soldiers attempted to board, Moise's men came charging down a hill, "opened a murderous fire," and captured the gunboat. They next turned the Smith Briggs' gun on the other Federal launches, driving them from the scene. Moise removed the boat's equipment before setting it ablaze.

Moise's company served in the defenses around Petersburg during the Bermuda Hundred Campaign of May 1864. The 7th Cavalry was part of Dearing's brigade. On May 31 Dearing's men attacked the Federal position at Spring Hill but were opposed by Union infantry, artillery, and gunboats on the Appomattox River. Moise's horse was killed. (The next day, he requested reimbursement of $2,500 for his horse, which had been conscripted into Confederate service but for which he had not yet been paid.) The 7th Cavalry continued to harry the Union army. In June it was sent to the Jerusalem Plank Road south of Petersburg to protect the Weldon Railroad. In July it was back on the James River. (On August 14, Moise received his $2,500. He now was able to buy 2 ¼ yards of officer's cloth for a new uniform and two weeks later a new pair of shoes.)

Shortly after Lee selected Maj. Gen. Wade Hampton to succeed the late J. E. B. Stuart as commander of his cavalry corps, Hampton organized what came to be known as the "Great Beefsteak Raid." Dearing's brigade and Moise's men had a key role in guarding the right flank of the main party raiding the Union army's corrals, which contained thousands of cattle. The Confederate raiders brought in 2,468 cattle, covered one hundred miles, fought the enemy twice, and captured 304 prisoners and a large quantity of supplies with a loss of only ten killed and forty-seven wounded. The Confederate soldiers were also delighted to take cigars, liquor, butter, cheese, sardines, pickles, boots, blankets, and firearms. “Who that was there can ever forget the wild grandeur of the scene?” one member of the raiding party recalled five years later. The sunset, the shot and shell, the waving of battle flags, “the galloping of staff officers and couriers over the field, the defiant shouts of our men calling to the Yankees to ‘come and get some beef for supper,’ all made up a scene strangely mingling the sublime and the ridiculous.”[89] This raid cemented a close relationship between Hampton and Moise, which continued for thirty-seven years after the war.

In November 1864 Moise’s company became part of the 10th Georgia Cavalry. In January 1865, Hampton led his troopers south to attempt to counter General Sherman’s invasion of the Palmetto State. Moise saw action at the Battle of Monroe’s Crossroads (humorously known as the “Battle of Kilpatrick’s Pants” because Maj. Gen. Judson Kilpatrick was chased out of his camp in his bedclothes). Moise was also at the last major battle of the Civil War, Bentonville. He was with his command on the retreat to Smithville. He and his men were assigned the unenviable task of burning the bridge over the Neuse River to delay the Federal advance. This he accomplished under a hail of bullets from the Federals, who were in pursuit of the retreating Confederates. Captain Moise was paroled at Greensboro on April 26 as a soldier in Gen. Joseph E. Johnston’s army.

The urban mercantile experience which denied most Southern Jews the background to serve in the cavalry made them highly qualified as quartermasters, adjutants, and commissaries. Quartermasters supply clothing and equipment. Adjutants are administrative officers who write orders and keep a commanding officer’s paperwork organized. Commissaries supply food and other equipment. These jobs, while less glamorous than others, are vital to an army’s success in battle. “An army,” Napoleon is said to have remarked, “travels on its stomach.” There were numerous Jewish officers in these departments throughout the Confederate army.

One of the highest-ranking Jewish Confederates was the quartermaster general of the Confederacy, Col. Abraham Charles Myers.[90] Myers and much of the general staff was formally appointed in March 1861. As quartermaster general, Myers was charged with supplying the army with clothing, supplies, and transportation. His was one of the chief supply bureaus of the Confederate army, along with the Commissary Department headed by Lucius B. Northrop, the commissary general; the Bureau of Ordnance headed by Josiah Gorgas, chief of ordnance; the adjutant and inspector general’s department headed by Gen. Samuel Cooper; and the Medical Department first headed by David Camden DeLeon, surgeon general.[91]

Col. Abraham Myers' job, like that of his cohorts, would prove to be impossible. As Richard D. Goff wrote in Confederate Supply, "The financial base and the transportation network of the Slave States were feeble. Their industrial output was comparatively minuscule." And, while the Upper South had some semblance of heavy industry, the "Cotton States had little to offer a sustained military effort."[92]

But Abraham Myers had faced formidable odds in Mexico and undoubtedly believed that the war would be short and that the South could prevail. Myers began with uniforms, tents, and equipment. He advertised for bids. He negotiated with contractors. He was president of the military board, which designed the first Confederate uniform. (It was not gray, but consisted of a blue flannel shirt, gray flannel pants, a red flannel undershirt, cotton drawers, wool socks, boots, and a cap.) Myers ordered from suppliers he knew in New Orleans and later branched out to mills in Georgia and Virginia. He created supply depots all over the South, from San Antonio to Mobile to Charleston to Richmond. He contracted with steamboat and railroad companies to haul men and material. But the men in the supply corps lacked expertise, and problems arose at the local level, where quartermasters and commissaries, although theoretically responsible to their bureau chiefs, tended to side with field commanders.[93]

Col. Abraham Charles Myers was the great-grandson of the first rabbi of Beth Elohim. After graduating from West Point, he became a career army officer and served in the Mexican War. Fort Myers, Florida, then literally a fort, was named in his honor by his father-in-law, Gen. David Emanuel Twiggs. Colonel Myers served as quartermaster general of the Confederate army. The capital of the Confederacy moved from Montgomery to Richmond as soon after the firing on Fort Sumter as it could. Jefferson Davis arrived in late May. Abraham and Marion Twiggs Myers moved to Richmond. Mrs. Myers immediately became immersed in the Richmond social scene and was a popular member of wartime society.[94]

Myers set up his offices on the southwest corner of 9th and Main Streets, near Capitol Square. His offices were on the second floor of the quartermaster's building. He eventually administered the largest Confederate supply bureau, with eighty-eight clerks versus sixty-one in the inspector general's office, twenty-one in the surgeon general's, and thirty-six in the commissary department. The Quatermaster Department included quartermasters in each state, paymasters and quartermasters in the field, manufacturing plants, special units such as the Tax-in-Kind Office, purchasing agents abroad, and depot and post quartermasters. Colonel Myers reported to the secretary of war.[95]

Despite deficiencies in supply, the Battle of Manassas in July 1861 was a Confederate victory. Both armies were inexperienced and, as President Lincoln put it in response to his commander, "You are green, it is true, but they are green, also; you are all green alike."[96] Nevertheless, this first battle pointed up the critical importance of supply. Many Southerners believed that if the Southern army had been better supplied it could have marched to Washington and won the war.

Public concern, then anger, then outrage at the Commissary and Quartermaster Departments would be a constant theme in the Confederacy as the war went on.[97] It was understandable, if unjustified, that the officers in charge of food, clothing, and supplies would be blamed for the ills of the army. Northrop was the Confederate Congress's main scapegoat; his nomination to full colonel and confirmation as commissary general provoked heated debate. Myers's nomination to full colonel and confirmation as quartermaster general was immediately approved. (By then, Judah Benjamin was making his exit as secretary of war.) T. C. DeLeon believed that Myers's "bureau was managed with an efficiency and vigor that could scarcely have been looked for in so new an organization."[98] Early in the war, Myers enjoyed a good reputation as a competent and honest department head. An 1862 investigating committee found the quartermaster general's conduct "most favorable and satisfactory" with regard to "prudence, economy, integrity and efficiency," according to a letter to the Charleston Courier.[99]

It soon became clear that the war would not be a short one and even clearer that supplying an army of up to 400,000 men would prove to be a formidable task. "You are somewhat in error," Myers wrote to Brig. Gen. J. B. Magruder on August 21, 1861, "as to the resources of the C.S.… You do not know how difficult it is to get any, the most common, thing heretofore abundant." As early as 1861 Myers had to give up on supplying Texas, telling his quartermasters he could not send supplies from the East. Prices rose as the blockade tightened and Northern sources of supply dwindled. States' rights played a part in the Confederacy's problems. North Carolina, for example, supplied its own troops in return for an agreement that the quartermaster would not purchase clothing from its factories. Myers reorganized his supply system, consolidating his efforts in fewer regional depots. To some degree he had been lucky. Blockade-running met with success early in the war. People and states gave generously of clothing. But the Southern economy could not keep pace with the army's huge appetite for supplies, and it fell to Myers and his men to gather every kind of supply from shoes and clothes to horses and fodder in a shrinking economy.[100]

The Union victories of 1862 were a disaster for the Confederacy and especially for the quartermaster general. The loss of key border states, New Orleans and other coastal areas, and the Mississippi Valley constricted the area from which supplies, manufactured goods, and raw materials could be obtained. Blockade-running was severely curtailed, interfering with the importation of European goods. New Orleans had manufactured shoes and clothing. By August 1862 Lee complained that his army lacked "much of the materials of war,… [was] feeble in transportation, the animals being much reduced, and the men … poorly provided with clothes, and in thousands of instances … destitute of shoes." This was an indictment of the quartermaster operation, and, indeed, Lee's invasion of Maryland in 1862 was partly necessitated by supply considerations. Part of Lee's problems after Second Manassas was the simple lack of shoes.[101]

The government now realized that Myers had been correct in his recommendation to send purchasing agents abroad. He received permission to send Maj. J. B. Ferguson, a former merchant, to Europe. He also used the war department's powers to detail men to work in textile factories by allowing them an exemption from military service. Shops were set up to sew uniforms, relying, in many instances, on soldiers' wives and other women desperate to work.[102]

Myers's reorganized department divided the country into eleven purchasing districts, each headed by a principal purchasing agent who controlled purchasing and prices. "On the whole," Goff concludes, "Myers had, by mid-1863, built up a going and growing concern." Congress enacted a new supply law to solve the subsistence problem. Called "the tithe," the law provided for a tax-in-kind rather than money. Thus, a percentage of the South's crops and livestock raised for slaughter would be paid to the Confederate government. Myers's department was charged with enforcement. A chief quartermaster in each state and district quartermasters in each congressional district, together with post quartermasters at regional depots, were appointed to collect the supplies.[103]

Of all Myers's headaches, the railroad was perhaps his greatest.[104] Deeply conservative by upbringing, temperament, and training, Myers did not seek and at times actively resisted government control of the rails. When the president of one railroad company suggested that the government build its own system, Myers opposed the idea.[105] In the first years of the war, the railroads were hardly regulated at all. As the war progressed, however, Myers realized that the failure of transportation was hampering the war effort and that his conservative approach had failed. While he continued to oppose seizure of the railroads or control by field commanders, by October 1862 Myers recommended the appointment of "an able, methodical, and energetic person" to regulate the railroads. Congress demurred, but the secretary of war, James A. Seddon, acted. Without consulting Myers, the secretary appointed William M. Wadley superintendent of railroads with the rank of lieutenant colonel and assigned him to the office of the adjutant and inspector general. Myers complained that this decision would "occasion difficulty and embarrassment to this department," but he received no reply. His relationship with the secretary of war and the president was souring. The railroad industry and the Confederate Congress got involved. Secret sessions were held. Finally, Congress enacted a bill giving the government broad power to control the rails. It lodged that power in the quartermaster general's department. Congress had more faith in Myers than in the secretary of war. The new law gave Myers authority to supervise the Confederacy's railroads, promulgate regulations, dictate freight schedules, and take equipment, rolling stock, and rails as necessary. Myers initially opposed impressment, the practice of appropriating or condemning property and paying a price established by the government, but was forced to resort to it. Yet in a circular to his subordinates, he restricted impressment to instances where "absolutely demanded by the public necessities."[106]

Another Confederate dilemma was the sale of cotton. The early Confederate position, that cotton was king, had failed. Myers's approach was to rely on purchasing agents abroad and to pay for the goods at Southern ports with cotton. Judah Benjamin, then secretary of war, disagreed, preferring to rely on contracts with private parties. Eventually, the government decided to sell cotton in order to buy military supplies, Myers having been among the first to realize that cotton was not king. He supported a change in Confederate policy which forbade trading for supplies through enemy lines. The law had been violated, of necessity and because of greed, from the beginning. By late 1862, it was obvious to those charged with obtaining supplies that there was no choice.[107]

As the war dragged on, the Quartermaster Department came in for severe criticism. The Savannah Daily News noted the suspicion in the public mind "that peculation and plunder, and misuse of authority for private purpose, have often been put before public duty and public service." The Richmond Enquirer complained that "Quartermasters sometimes get rich—they ought never to get rich.… Unfaithful, incompetent, or dishonest quartermasters or commissaries could plunge the country into ruin." Despite the criticism, the leading historian of Confederate supply, Richard Goff, concluded that the Quartermaster Department under Myers “appears to have been as well organized and as efficient as circumstances would allow.”[108]

James McPherson concludes in Battle Cry of Freedom that Q.M. Gen. Abraham Myers could never supply the army with enough tents, uniforms, blankets, shoes, or horses and wagons. “Consequently, Johnny Reb often had to sleep in the open under a captured blanket, to wear a tattered homespun butternut uniform, and to march and fight barefoot unless he could liberate shoes from a dead or captured Yankee.” In an evaluation which gives new meaning to the phrase “damned by faint praise,” Richard Goff concludes: “By Confederate standards his bureau was well run, and his contemporaries praised him. On all major policy innovations Myers had been at or near the forefront, except for railroad regulation, where he shared the conservative outlook of the President.”[109]

Myers’s friends in Congress sought to promote him to brigadier general, and in March 1863 the Congress passed a law providing that the rank and pay of the quartermaster general “shall be those of Brigadier General in the provisional army.” Seventy-six members of Congress sent the president a letter recommending that Colonel Myers be promoted to general. “We think he has shown himself able, honest, and diligent in the discharge of his responsible and laborious duties,” the letter read, “and take pleasure in bearing our testimony to his services and his merits.”[110] Ironically, the law would be used by Jefferson Davis to dismiss Myers from office altogether. On August 7, 1863, Jefferson Davis fired Abraham Myers and replaced him with his old friend Alexander R. Lawton. The only reason Davis gave was that it was in the interest of efficiency.[111] And there does seem to be some basis for the charge. Both the secretary of war and General Lee, among others, had expressed dissatisfaction with Myers’s operation of the department. After Chancellorsville in May 1863, Lee’s army was never again adequately supplied with horses.[112] Capt. Robert G. H. Kean complained in his diary that “Our troops in Lee’s army are barefooted—failure to provide shoes and blankets during all this year conclusive of mismanagement of Q.M.D.”[113] Lee had experienced severe problems at Gettysburg due to a lack of supplies of shoes, clothing, overcoats, and blankets.[114]

Some said that Myers and Davis had feuded in the old army years before.[115] But the true reason, according to Richmond gossip, was that Marian Myers, who considered herself the social superior of Mrs. Davis, had called the president’s wife “an old squaw,” Mrs. Davis being of a somewhat dark complexion.[116] Assistant Secretary of War A. T. Bledsoe passed along the insult in early 1862. The remark was repeated and became well known.[117] Mrs. Myers had apparently made offensive remarks about Mrs. Davis, but the precise role of the quartermaster general’s wife in the controversy is uncertain.[118] “The Congress of 1863,” Mary Chesnut wrote, “gave up its time to fighting the battle of Colonel Myers—Mrs. Myers." Congress was indeed angry. Myers's old friend William Porcher Miles stood by him.[119] Not only had the tactless (some said arrogant) president failed to promote Myers, he now utilized a law enacted to help him to fire Myers. Davis's argument was that the congressional act, which Davis knew was designed to promote Myers, was an unconstitutional encroachment on the president's authority to award promotions and, therefore, Congress must have meant that a brigadier general should replace the current occupant of the office. Davis sought a replacement from June to August and found a brigadier general, Lawton, who had been appointed to that rank in April 1861. Congress was incensed. It devoted the winter of 1863 to debating the issue and, in a colorful description by Mrs. Chesnut, "to a hand-to-hand fight with Mr. Davis on account of Mr. Quartermaster General Myers. Here again, who pulled the wires? Not Colonel Myers, surely? Who cared a fig for him? The friends of Mrs. Myers, led by Mr. [William Porcher] Miles, and the enemies of Mr. Davis formed a brigade of great strength."[120]

Richmond society, government officials, and the newspapers joined the Senate in feeling that Myers had been treated unfairly. Mary Chesnut likened the feud to Andrew Jackson's famous defense of Peggy Eaton, the wife of his secretary of war, who was accused of impropriety. "And now, she wrote, "Richmond plays old Hickory with its beautiful Mrs. M."[121] Captain Kean wrote in his diary: "The event which has put the gossips agog in the last two days is the taking off of the Quartermaster General's head." Josiah Gorgas confided to his diary: "[Myers] has fulfilled his duties very well…. [The President] has, I fear, little appreciation of services rendered, unless the party enjoys his good opinion."[122] Society belle Sallie B. Putnam, author of Richmond during the War, recalled Myers as "one of the most prudent, sagacious and efficient officers under the government." The controversy was "bitterly acrimonious, and gave rise to some unpleasant on dits of a personal character," which, being a lady, Mrs. Putnam deigned not to repeat.[123]

There is no evidence that anti-Semitism played any role in Myers's firing, despite the glee expressed by John Beauchamp Jones, a clerk in the War Department whose memoir, A Rebel War Clerk's Diary, was published in 1866. Jones called Myers the "Jew Quarter-Master General" and claimed he replied, "let them suffer," when told of soldiers' pleas for blankets.[124] But Sallie Putnam, who had no love for the Jews, thought Myers was mistreated and, most importantly, Jefferson Davis not only had no prejudice against Jews, but, to the contrary, maintained warm relationships with many Southern Jews.

Myers was crushed by his termination. In January 1864 he was ill in bed.[125] The Senate in a 15–6 vote resolved “1st. That in the opinion of the Senate, A. C. Myers is now Quartermaster General of the Confederate States army, and is by law authorized and required to discharge the duties thereof. 2nd. That A. R. Lawton is not authorized by law to discharge the duties of said office.”[126] But the Confederate Congress was not about to create a constitutional crisis over the issue, and when Davis sent Lawton’s name to the Senate for confirmation in early February, the Senate complied.[127] Myers could have served under Lawton but refused. It is unclear what Myers’s position was. By June 1864 the attorney general gave an opinion that Myers was no longer in the army, a position Myers himself took at first.[128] Later, he said he was a colonel and a commissioned officer and remained on the army list.

Myers remained bitter for the rest of his life. He had no income, and he and his family went to live in Georgia, where they survived with the help of friends.[129] He tried to secure a field command and wrote to Gen. Braxton Bragg on a number of occasions to ascertain his place in the army. Bragg apparently did nothing and would not see Myers. In August, Myers wrote Bragg that his situation “was painful in the extreme … it is very humiliating to be obliged to live as I do, very much upon the charity of friends and almost in want.”[130]

Abraham Myers was an actor in a drama on the national stage. But there were quartermasters in every regiment in the army. A typical quartermaster in the trenches was Maier Triest of Charleston. Triest immigrated from Bavaria in 1850. He was thirty years old when the war started, and he served as captain of Triest’s Company (Beat 2), 16th South Carolina Militia, from November 9 to December 20, 1861. Like Triest, most young, able-bodied Charlestonians had served in militia units prior to the war. In January 1862 Triest and hundreds of other South Carolinians enlisted in a regiment being raised by Col. Clement H. Steven, who had formerly commanded Triest’s militia regiment and likely knew Triest. The regiment was originally organized by Stevens and Lt. Col. Ellison Capers for twelve months of Confederate service. Six companies were raised for one year when state law changed in March 1862 to require service for the duration of the war. All the men agreed to so serve, and four additional companies were added. The 24th South Carolina then went into Confederate service in April.[131]

Maier Triest, another Bavarian immigrant, was active in Charleston Jewish affairs and served in the militia prior to the war. He served as regimental quartermaster sergeant in the 24th South Carolina. He returned to Charleston when the war ended, and his descendants are members of Beth Elohim today. (Courtesy of Caroline L. Triest and Larry W. Freudenberg, Charleston.)

Colonel Stevens, during the formative period, chose Triest to be sergeant major of the regiment, whereupon Triest reenlisted at that rank on January 20, 1862. In January 1863 he was promoted to regimental quartermaster sergeant, a position he held throughout the war. Rabbi Elzas, who knew Triest's family, wrote that Triest was promoted twice to acting assistant adjutant general, once by General Stevens, who died before the commission was returned, and again by General Capers just before the close of the war.[132]

The 24th saw action throughout the war at Secessionville, South Carolina; Jackson, Mississippi (Vicksburg campaign); Atlanta; Franklin; Nashville; and the Carolinas.

Triest was with the 24th in the weeks before the final capitulation of Vicksburg, when Grant was getting between Vicksburg, the Confederate stronghold on the Mississippi River, and the Confederate forces at Jackson, a city and rail hub to the east of Vicksburg.[133] The South Carolinians were determined to prevent Jackson from falling to Grant's army and engaged in fierce, hand-to-hand combat with the 10th Missouri. At Wright's Farm, a ball hit Col. Ellison Capers's horse, and a number of men of the 24th were killed. Capers wrote afterward that Triest had given him "a most welcomed drink of whiskey." Capers said it was the only time he ever took a drink during the war.[134]

As regimental quartermaster sergeant, it was Triest's job to see to it that the entire regiment was supplied. During the Jackson campaign, for example, he traveled to Canton and Meridian, Mississippi, to obtain shoes and clothing which had been left behind in storage at the beginning of the campaign. He traveled throughout July and August 1863, retrieving and transporting boxes of clothing, cooking utensils, and supplies. In early October 1863, while at Chickamauga, Braxton Bragg sent Triest to Columbia and Charleston to act as agent for the collection of winter clothes, blankets, and other supplies from the South Carolina Relief Association. He returned on October 28, having used his own funds for drayage (movement by wagon) and cooperage (crating) at stops along the way. (The funds were refunded to him.) Triest surrendered with the consolidated and redesignated 16th/24th South Carolina Regiment with Gen. Joseph E. Johnston's army on April 26, 1865. He was paroled on May 1. According to Elzas, Triest was wounded at Atlanta.[135]

The job of the commissary is to provide food and related supplies to the army. In Raphael J. Moses, the Confederate army found its most colorful and dedicated commissary. Moses was a native of Charleston and a resident of Columbus, Georgia, where he lived on a plantation, The Esquiline, named, in true Southern fashion, for one of the Seven Hills of Rome. He was, according to Douglas Southall Freeman, Robert E. Lee's biographer, "the best commissary of like rank in the Confederate service. Moses's stories were endless; his narrative flawless. The darkest, dullest night at headquarters he could enliven." He was a "most intelligent, efficient officer," according to G. Moxley Sorrel, the chief of Longstreet's staff. At the end of his life, Moses prided himself on his service to the cause; prized his memories of Lee, Longstreet, and other luminaries at Gettysburg; and in 1893 his calling card still read, "Major Raphael J. Moses, C.S.A."[136]

Moses and three of his sons—Raphael J. Moses Jr., Albert Moses Luria, and Israel Moses Nunez—fought in the Confederate armed forces.[137] Moses himself was fifty years old, but, while in Virginia on business in April 1861, he volunteered. Moses's old friend Robert Y. Toombs had become a powerful senator. He was seriously considered for the presidency of the Confederacy and was named its first secretary of state.[138] Toombs opposed the firing on Fort Sumter, predicting that it was like striking a hornet's nest and "legions now quiet will swarm out and sting us to death."[139] Toombs found his office unimportant and resigned, becoming a brigadier general, and Moses sought a field position in his brigade. Toombs offered Moses the position of commissary, but Moses declined, preferring a combat role. Howell Cobb, another prominent Georgian, who had resigned from Buchanan's cabinet and was now serving as president of the Provisional Confederate Congress, convinced Moses that he ought to accept, as it was a difficult job to fill with a competent man and, Moses recalled, "he was sure that I could do more good in that position than any other." Toombs and Cobb knew their man. Moses committed four years of his life and his formidable talent to supplying Toombs's brigade, then as commissary officer of Gen. David R. Jones's Division, Army of Northern Virginia, and then in November 1862 as chief commissary officer of Gen. James Longstreet's corps.[140]

Raphael J. Moses was in Virginia in 1862 serving as Toombs's commissary during the Peninsular Campaign, when Gen. Joseph E. Johnston's and then Robert E. Lee's Army of Northern Virginia faced Gen. George B. McClellan's Army of the Potomac on the Peninsula between the James and the York Rivers. Commissaries were charged with the responsibility of feeding the soldiers, but they often were caught in a battle. During this campaign, a Texas commissary's head was blown off. Moses related the story that there were those in the army who said that it served him right. After all, "what the devil right had a Commissary to be in the battle; he should have been with his wagons looking after the commissary stores. On this hint I did not speak, but said to myself if this is the way they talk about Commissaries with their heads shot off, I'll so conduct myself hereafter as to avoid similar comments."[141]

At one point during the campaign, Moses ran Toombs's headquarters. For two or three days, Lee found this headquarters to be the most convenient place for him to locate, and so he sent his cot and personal things down by a wagon. His staff followed. Moses found Lee to be as calm "as a summer cloud." He gave his orders "with precision and courtesy." Moses recalled a dinner at which an officer arrived, saluted, and said, "I am ordered by General Longstreet to inform you that General McClellan has retired." Lee bowed to the officer and then said to Moses, "Well, Major, you can see what trouble that young man has given me!" That was all Lee said. After dinner, Lee moved back to his own headquarters.[142]

Moses's position brought him into contact with many of the major officers of the Confederate army. John Bell Hood, who commanded one of Longstreet's divisions at Gettysburg and was later promoted to temporary full general, was, according to Moses, "one of the best Brigadiers and poorest commanders in the army." Moses remembered "Jeb" Stuart as "a splendid Cavalry Officer, but, oh, how frivolous. He carried a banjo player with him wherever he went, and his favorite pastime when not dancing with the girls was to have his banjo player thrum and sing, 'Come, jine the Cavalry.'… He was as vain and frivolous as he was brave and dashing." Moses saw Robert E. Lee almost daily during his service in Virginia because Lee's headquarters was frequently near Longstreet's. Moses described Lee as "a plain, splendid looking, courteous gentleman, with such wonderful self control… in victory and defeat the same, unruffled exterior, kind to his men and kind to animals." He was present on one occasion when Lee contrived to convince the enemy that reinforcements had arrived when they had not. Lee ordered the men to cut brush and have the horses drag it along the road to cause an immense dust to arise and make it appear that fresh troops had arrived. The ruse worked.[143]

The Army of Northern Virginia was reorganized in 1862 into two corps: the 1st Corps commanded by Longstreet, and the 2d Corps by Jackson. When the staff assignments were completed, Moses was promoted to chief commissary of subsistence in Longstreet's corps, which now consisted of five divisions totaling 41,000 soldiers.[144] Moses became a member of Longstreet's inner circle of his top officers. "He soon became a favorite with the younger members of Longstreet's staff because of his wit and seemingly endless string of stories and anecdotes," concludes Longstreet's biographer, Jeffrey Wert.[145] Moses was with Longstreet at Second Manassas when Lee routed a much bigger Union army under Gen. John Pope and forced it to retreat back to Washington.[146] Moses had been on foraging excursions during these campaigns procuring food and supplies for Lee's army. On one excursion, Moses spied some cattle and sent a detail to drive them along with his unit's herd. After a half mile or so, an old woman came up to him in great distress and said that one of the cattle was her "pet heifer" and wanted to know whether Moses intended to kill it. She seemed almost brokenhearted at the apparent fate of her pet, and Moses's sympathies got the better of him. He said, "Certainly not, take her back." Years later, he reminisced: "I shall never forget the joy that illuminated the old woman's face … as she went back with her pet heifer…. This is a small matter … but… it is one of my good deeds that comes back to memory and cheers me in my waning years."[147]

Some of Moses's excursions lasted weeks and were both dangerous and fatiguing. He arrived in camp the morning before the Battle of Sharpsburg (Antietam) after a two-week foray, and the next night he and his men were forced to retreat and leave the supplies they had so laboriously procured. Moses let the soldiers take what they could in their knapsacks and even on their bayonets. The "adornment of a flitch of bacon being in no case objected to," he recalled, "and except for what was thus saved and the cattle which we could drive, my two weeks labor was lost. So much for the uncertainties of a boarding house keeper in the midst of War, and as I had, including teamsters and other noncombatants, a family of nearly 54,000 to provide for, this depletion of the larder was a very serious matter."[148]

In November 1862 Moses was chief commissary of the right wing, Longstreet's corps of the Army of Northern Virginia, and the next month participated in the first battle of Fredericksburg. One of his small contributions was to locate a friendly home where Mrs. Longstreet could stay.[149] Longstreet's official report after that battle thanked his staff, including Moses, for "the valuable services in their respective departments."[150] Moses next served as acting commissary officer of Gen. Lafayette McLaw's division. He was relieved of that assignment on February 25, 1863, and was ordered to report to General Longstreet at Petersburg, Virginia.

Longstreet's area of operation was now the coastal areas of the Carolinas and Southeast Virginia, areas occupied by Union forces. Moses was chosen to forage and raid in enemy-occupied territory because his skill as a commissary officer was well known. "Longstreet," Freeman writes in Lee's Lieutenants, "had a justly high opinion of Moses and he promptly forwarded to the commanding General the report prepared by the commissary."[151] Lee agreed with Longstreet that it was "of the first importance to draw from the invaded districts every pound of provision and forage we can. It will lighten the draught from other sections and give relief to our citizens." Lee and Longstreet, based on Moses's report of available supplies, determined to capture Suffolk, Virginia, in an effort to pin down the Union forces so that Moses could forage for badly needed supplies behind enemy lines. The troops at Fredericksburg were in need of supplies, and there was no place to obtain them except on the coast of North Carolina, where there were quantities of fish and bacon. Moses and Longstreet agreed that the capture of Suffolk would prevent the Federal troops from interfering with Moses's mission and "gobbling up" all the supplies. Suffolk was taken. Moses and his men and trains went to the coast of North Carolina and procured a large quantity of supplies, which were then sent to Fredericksburg.[152]

While Longstreet's corps was away, the rest of the army fought the second battle of Fredericksburg and the Battle at Chancellorsville. The next great Confederate offensive of the war was the Gettysburg campaign, and for it Longstreet's corps had rejoined the rest of the Army of Northern Virginia. This meant that Raphael Moses was charged with keeping the 1st Corps supplied with food from Virginia to Pennsylvania. The 1st Corps was ordered to proceed along the east side of the Blue Ridge mountains and to cross into Maryland. Moving on to Pennsylvania, Longstreet's corps was in Chambersburg on June 27. Moses had orders to seize property from stores but not private homes and to pay for goods in Confederate money.[153] The storekeepers hid their most valuable goods or closed shop. Moses's job was made more difficult by the fact that General Ewell's corps had just come through a week before. Moses was excited, however, when he discovered a large supply of felt hats hidden away in a cellar, which he "annexed," as he put it, at once.[154] Moses had been ordered to secure three days' rations for the whole army, either voluntarily or by seizing or "impressing" supplies. The town officials had disappeared as had keys to the stores. When Moses's men began using axes to open the stores, however, the keys and townspeople reappeared. Moses and his men worked long hours attempting to find provisions. He returned to the camp very late one evening, having endured much abuse and insults from the local women, who called him "a thievish little rebel scoundrel" and other names. This did not annoy him so much as the hiding of goods in private homes, which he was not allowed to search by General Lee's orders. Next, he had to endure the chaffing of his fellow officers, who, with good humor, made him continually repeat the different names he had been called. He said that at first the women refused his Confederate "trash" [money] with great scorn, but they ended being very anxious to receive the exact amount due.[155]

The Battle of Gettysburg was fought over three days, from July 1 to July 3, 1863. Moses was privy to all of the top-level discussions, even those involving civilian spies. In his memoirs, for example, Moses remembered two spies, Harrison and Schrieber, who gave Lee the exact position of the Union army, but Lee distrusted the men and refused to rely on their reports, which turned out to be correct.[156]

"Moses, like his ancestor in the wilderness," Jacob Marcus wrote, "had to feed an army." By all accounts he succeeded admirably. Moses was well liked and respected by Lee's staff at Gettysburg. "He was much older than most of us," General Sorrel recalled in his memoirs, "but 'bon comrade,' and had an exhaustless fund of incident and anecdote, which he told inimitably."[157] Moses got along famously with Maj. John W. Fairfax, the aristocratic Virginian who owned James Monroe's plantation and volunteered to serve on Longstreet's staff.[158] Courageous and brave, pious and a bon vivant, Fairfax was something of a character. He always had a sack with two pockets, one for his bottle of whiskey and the other for his Bible. One Sunday when Fairfax was drunk, Moses entered his tent and wrote on one sheet of paper, "This in a moment brings me to an end," and on another sheet, "While this informs me I shall never die." He fixed the first to the bottle of whiskey and put the second between the pages of the Bible. When Fairfax awoke, he read the notes and exclaimed, "Moses, by the Lord!"[159]

One event which Moses understandably omits from his memoir (which was written for his family and not for publication) was the theft of his trunk containing more than $10,000 in government funds from his tent during the early morning hours of July 4. His military records contain his affidavit explaining the theft, which Moses felt was not his fault, as iron safes had not been provided by the government. He was not disciplined on account of the incident, and his superiors obviously accepted his explanation without question.[160]

Another of the colorful characters at Gettysburg was Col. Arthur J. L. Fremantle of the British army's Coldstream Guards, who was present as a military observer. Fremantle was a guest in Moses's tent.[161] The colonel later published a memoir of his experience and wrote of Major Moses: "He is the most jovial, amusing, and clever son of Israel I ever had the good fortune to meet."[162]

Moses was not far from Lee during much of the Battle of Gettysburg. "I had a splendid view of the grand and disastrous battle. The thunder of the artillery was terrifically grand, the charge of Pickett's division right up a long hill in the face of Federal cannon was not exceeded in valor by the charge of the six hundred [the Charge of the Light Brigade]." But the Confederate army suffered its worst defeat of the war. Colonel Freemantle related his return to Moses's tent, where he found "that worthy commissary in very low spirits."[163] And then came the retreat amidst a terrible rain storm. "I laid down in a fence corner and near by on the bare earth in an India rubber [sheet] lay General Lee biding the pelting storm."[164]

The retreat from Gettysburg. (Battles and Leaders of the Civil War.)

After the retreat from Gettysburg, Longstreet’s corps was sent to Tennessee to reinforce the Army of Tennessee, commanded by Gen. Braxton Bragg. Major Moses, as Longstreet’s chief commissary, continued his responsibilities for the subsistence of this corps. A portion of Longstreet’s corps arrived in time to participate in the Confederate victory at Chickamauga. Afterward, the Corps participated in major campaigns around Chattanooga and Knoxville, Tennessee. Moses’s job in this war-ravaged state was difficult. His reports relay the near impossibility of securing tens of thousands of pounds of flour and meat, the competition between commissary officers of different divisions, and the refusal of civilians to cooperate. In Sweet Water, Tennessee, for example, a railroad engineer refused to move the train, and Moses took forcible possession of the railroad and ran the engine with an officer detailed from one of the Tennessee regiments. Despite his best efforts, the troops, on occasion, went two to three days and sometimes longer without flour rations.[165]

The Tennessee campaigns went badly for the Confederates. General Bragg suffered defeats at Lookout Mountain and Missionary Ridge, and Longstreet failed to push the enemy out of Knoxville. Longstreet took up winter quarters in the mountainous region of northeast Tennessee, where the terrain was rugged and much of the population pro-Union. Nevertheless, Moses kept the army supplied for six months after Longstreet thought he would be forced to retreat for lack of supplies. Moses’s experience in business enabled him to obtain much-needed wheat from reluctant farmers. He obtained the wheat thrashers’ records identifying those who brought in wheat to be thrashed. When the farmers hid the wheat, Moses and his men went after the sheep that wandered about the hill country. The sheep were not fit to eat, but the farmers wanted to shear the wool for winter clothing. Thus, when Moses seized the flocks (and gave receipts as commissary), he could bargain two pounds of sheep for one pound of bacon. This, he recalled, “unlocked the secret places in which the bacon was hid, and sheep proving good currency, I got nearly all the bacon necessary for rationing the Corps.” He was forced at times to feed the troops sheep meat, which proved to be very unpopular.[166] Longstreet’s biographer credits Moses’s “wizardry of swapping confiscated sheep for bacon, of running mills day and night, and of commandeering trains” with having “fed the men in those difficult weeks in East Tennessee.”[167]

A number of Jewish Confederate doctors, surgeons, and assistant surgeons served in the Confederate army. Indeed, the first surgeon general of the Confederate army was David Camden DeLeon of Columbia. Like many Confederate officers, DeLeon left the regular army to serve the Confederacy. A major in the medical corps of the “old” army, he was appointed surgeon in the Confederate army and chief of the medical staff of Gen. Braxton Bragg's army in Pensacola. In May, he was appointed surgeon general of the Confederacy, but, according to H. H. Cunningham, "his occupancy of the Surgeon General's office, consisting of only one room at that time, was of brief duration."[168] He was relieved on July 12, 1861. It is not clear whether DeLeon was replaced by Samuel Preston Moore because Moore outranked DeLeon in the "old Army," or whether DeLeon was not competent to head the Confederacy's medical department, or whether he had a drinking problem. After all, DeLeon's former military career was a distinguished one.

David Camden DeLeon's Confederate career appears to have been a disaster. The records of the Medical Corps were destroyed in the burning of Richmond, and so the details are lost. In his brief tenure as surgeon general, he sat on a board which designed the Confederate uniform with fellow South Carolinian Abraham Myers.[169] He certainly enjoyed the social life of early wartime Richmond, visiting with the Chesnuts, for example. He gave Mrs. Chesnut a miniature silver gondola he had bought in Venice. He told her he gave it to her as opposed to a Miss Sanders on account of Mrs. Chesnut's "Superior pulchritude."[170]

His career was steadily downhill after being replaced as surgeon general. He was assigned to Gen. Benjamin Huger's forces at Norfolk, where he served briefly as medical director. On June 3, 1862, he became medical director of Lee's Army of Northern Virginia and served in the Seven Days Battle. He was again relieved of duty within a month of his appointment. He resigned his commission in July 1862.[171]

DeLeon may have rejoined the Confederate army in Texas or he may have gone to Europe as an aide to his brother Edwin DeLeon. Charles Cullop writes in Confederate Propaganda in Europe that Dr. David Camden DeLeon was in Europe on Medical Department business in January 1863 and carried dispatches for his brother Edwin.[172] When the war ended, DeLeon left Texas for Mexico with other Confederate officers. He lived in Mexico for a year, returned to New Mexico, took up the practice of medicine, and lived quietly gardening and engaging in "his favorite amusement … to break the wild mustangs." He never returned to South Carolina. He never visited his family.[173]

DeLeon was afflicted with some kind of disgrace, drinking problem, or mental illness. Mary Chesnut noted in March of 1862 that Dr. DeLeon had been drinking and that he repeated "every thing, over & over" and "bored us to death."[174] In June she evidently felt DeLeon had acted improperly: "Edward Boykin told me he heard that old beast of a Camden DeLeon brag of his having given me that silver Gondola. I wish he had it back."[175] In July 1861 she wrote: "Camden DeLeon is sure to lose his place as surgeon general. Dr. Gibbs wants it. Dr. Nott is looked upon by many as a fit person for it. DeLeon is always drunk."[176] In an 1860 letter to his brother Edwin, Camden described an "unaccountable mental depression foreign to my naturally sanguine temperament. I attribute it to the effect of the Climate [he was touring the Middle East and Europe] and think that my namesake Old King David who was a bad man as well as myself and occasionally was guilty of much indiscretion must have suffered in a similar way."[177]

More successful and distinguished medical service was rendered by Simon Baruch, a Prussian immigrant from Camden, South Carolina. Baruch was born in Schwersenz, Posen, Prussia, in 1840. Like many a Prussian Jew, he came to America to avoid conscription in the Prussian army. He lived in South Carolina with Mannes Baum, a native of his hometown who operated a small general store in Camden with his brother Marcus. Baruch was a bookkeeper for Baum, but soon went to Charleston to study medicine. He acculturated quickly into South Carolina society. By December 1860, at the age of twenty, this Prussian immigrant was marching in a parade in Charleston to celebrate signing the secession ordinance. When the war began, Baruch continued in his studies at the Medical College of Virginia in Richmond. He could not resist joining the Confederate army and enlisted in April 1862. His mentor, Mannes Baum, gave Baruch a uniform and sword.[178]

Dr. Joseph Bensadon (pronounced Ben say' dun), a Sephardic Jew from Charleston, was educated at the College of Charleston, served in the Mexican War, and moved to New Orleans in 1847. He was a successful physician, counting Judah Touro among his patients. When Touro established the Touro Infirmary, Dr. Bensadon was its first director. He served as a surgeon in the Confederate army. (Courtesy of the Touro Infirmary Archives, New Orleans.)

Baruch did not need a sword. What he needed were medical instruments, as he was appointed an assistant surgeon "without even having lanced a boil," as he used to tell his children.[179] As an assistant surgeon, Baruch had a rank equivalent to a captain. He was promoted to surgeon in November 1864. (A surgeon was equivalent to a major.)

Baruch joined the 3d South Carolina Battalion in April 1862.[180] His first combat experience was during the preliminary fighting before Second Manassas, when he marched through bursting shells at Thoroughfare Gap to set up his medical tent. His brigade reached the battlefield in time to receive "a volley of minie balls, the first I had ever heard zipping," even though Pope's Union army was in full retreat. It was here that Baruch saw his first wounded man. "While engaged in removing the first dressing a solid shot fell on the other side [of a protecting fence], scattering earth over us."[181] After the battle at Groveton (Second Manassas), Baruch's medical unit camped on the field and "awoke amid the ghastliest scenes of real war. Long lines of ambulances that had come from Washington under flag of truce [sic] were passing with the union wounded to Washington while we stood with bared heads in token of respect for our brave enemy." Details of men from both armies buried their dead. Baruch went to the nearest battlefield hospital, which was in a small house. An operating table was set up by laying a door upon a barrel and a box. Men were waiting to be operated upon. When the surgeon saw Baruch, his face pale, and recognized his uniform as that of an assistant surgeon, he "banteringly offered me the knife, saying, 'Doctor, perhaps you would like to operate.' I accepted the challenge. This was my first surgical operation of any kind. The surgeon was kind enough to commend my work."[182]

The next day, Baruch marched north with his corps, forded the Potomac, and entered upon the first Maryland invasion. Just before the Battle of Antietam, Baruch was involved in the Battle of South Mountain. When he reached the battlefield, the Confederates were in full retreat. Baruch was ordered to stay with the wounded men at Boonsboro, Maryland, while the Union army pursued the retreating Confederates. Baruch was captured and spent six weeks in Boonsboro before being sent to Fort McHenry at Baltimore. Captured officers were treated well in 1862, and Baruch had the run of the town until he was exchanged. (Doctors were exchanged quickly so that the sick and wounded soldiers would have medical treatment.) Indeed, Baruch was entertained at a dance which lasted until two in the morning.[183] According to his son Bernard Baruch's memoir, Simon Baruch and his fellow Confederate officers rode in a carriage to a photographer's studio the next morning and posed for their pictures. ("A copy of this photograph," Bernard Baruch recalled, "which Father's female admirers paid for, hung in our Camden home when I was a boy.")[184] The next day, Simon Baruch was on his way back to Virginia.

Baruch was with the 3d South Carolina Battalion, Kershaw's brigade at Gettysburg. He arose before dawn and marched until noon. He was at the famous Peach Orchard, where he saw "for the first time the charge of the entire division while infantry and artillery were mowing them down with shot and shell that flew around and above my first aid station.” Sent to the Black Horse Tavern, where the division hospital was established, Baruch spent two days and two nights in constant operations and vigils, treating ambulance after ambulance of seriously wounded men.[185] The Union advance on July 5 after Lee’s army began withdrawing placed the hospital in grave danger. Soon shells shrieked overhead and burst all around. The surgeons ran up a yellow flag to signal that they were in a hospital. The doctors treated the wounded while a hail of artillery fire exploded nearby.[186]

When Lee retreated, Baruch was again ordered to remain with his patients. Once again, he was not at the front. The front lines had moved behind him. Dr. Pearce, the surgeon in charge, ordered Baruch to carry a message of surrender to the approaching Yankees because, he said, “You understand these Yankees.”[187] Baruch hastily donned his gray coat and green sash. “As I approached the line,” he recalled, “with the nearest cavalryman’s pistol dangerously pointed at me, I held up my hand and said, ‘I surrender. Where is your captain?’ The man yelled in a distinct Irish brogue, ‘Say, Cap, here is a Reb wants to see you.’”[188] The captain asked if there were many Rebels around to which Baruch replied “only the wounded.”

Baruch spent six weeks treating his men at Gettysburg. The Union medical officers shared their supplies, but many men died, six from lockjaw. Baruch was given a wagon for his supplies, and an officer gave him the New York Herald and told him he could now “learn what has become of General Lee. Read it until one of our wagons arrives.” Some among the local people also came with supplies to help the wounded Confederate soldiers. A physician from Baltimore presented Baruch with “a fine case of instruments” with his name engraved on it.[189]

Once again, Baruch was taken to Fort McHenry in Baltimore as a prisoner of war. Being marched through the hot streets of Baltimore was a trying experience. “What a contrast,” Baruch recalled, “between this tramp through dirty streets and my previous year’s drive through the fashionable streets of Baltimore in a victoria!”[190] His stay this time was not so happy, but was not oppressive. The officers were put in a barracks, and they ate hardtack and coffee for supper; pork and corned beef for dinner. They were allowed to roam the grounds, play ball, exercise, swim, and even receive visitors. It was here that Dr. Baruch wrote a medical paper later published as “Two Penetrating Bayonet Wounds of the Chest.” Eventually Baruch and the other doctors were exchanged for Union medical personnel in October 1863. (“The case of instruments which I had sent to my home in Camden, S.C., was captured eighteen months later by General Sherman.”)[191]

In December 1863 Baruch reported for duty at Newnan, Georgia. The 3d South Carolina Battalion was then with Longstreet in Tennessee. In August 1864, he was ordered to report to the medical director of Longstreet's corps. He was assigned to the 13th Mississippi stationed in Richmond and was promoted to surgeon. He was with Maj. Gen. Joseph B. Kershaw's division as it went to reinforce Lt. Gen. Jubal A. Early's army in the Shenandoah Valley. Baruch recounted a humorous episode at the close of the Battle of Cedar Creek in October 1864. When inspired by the sight of General Early waving a flag and imploring his men to stop the rout, he "foolishly undertook with a colleague to check the flight of a group of soldiers." Galloping toward the front, Baruch yelled, "Rally, men, for God's sake rally." When a shell exploded over his head and his horse bolted and ran away, the men yelled after him, "Why in hell don't you rally?"[192]

Baruch later suffered from some kind of medical disability and spent a part of the remainder of the war in hospitals as a patient. He was relieved from duty with the 13th Mississippi on a certificate of disability and ordered to Raleigh, North Carolina, where he was again in service in Confederate hospitals. He was in charge of a smallpox hospital in Goldsboro. He treated the wounded after the Battle of Kinston, North Carolina, and treated Union prisoners as well. "They were raw Germans," Baruch recalled, "unable to speak English, and were delighted when I addressed them in their own language." He organized a hospital at Thomasville and there treated men who had been wounded at Averasboro. He commandeered wagons, gathered pine straw for bedding, persuaded college girls to help as nurses, went house to house seeking food, and cleaned up abandoned factories to use as hospitals. He came down with typhoid fever and was unconscious for two weeks. When he awoke, the war was over for him and he had been paroled.[193]

Simon Baruch, Bernard Baruch's father, was a Prussian immigrant to Camden, South Carolina. He served as a surgeon in the Confederate army (with the equivalent rank of major) and was left behind to care for the wounded at Boonsboro, Maryland, and at Gettysburg. He was active in the Confederate Veterans after the war. (Courtesy of South Carolina Historical Society.)

The Confederate government was concerned about disloyalty and treason, and special commissioners were appointed with military and judicial authority to investigate and prosecute treason, espionage, harboring deserters, or trading with the enemy. These commissioners were part prosecutor, part judge, part police. Many were distinguished lawyers, including a former attorney general of the Confederacy.[194] There was at least one Jewish military commissioner in the Confederate army, and he had quite an interesting career. Henry J. Leovy was a talented Jewish lawyer from New Orleans.[195] He codified the laws of the City of New Orleans, which were published from 1856 to 1872. After the war he served as city attorney of New Orleans. In addition, Leovy was the principal owner of the Delta newspaper, which he operated until it was seized by Gen. B. F. Butler in 1862, when New Orleans was occupied by the Union army.

Leovy left New Orleans before its capture and joined the Confederate forces. Brig. Gen. Hamilton Prioleau Bee, Gen. Bernard E. Bee's brother, was in contact with Leovy in the fall of 1863. Bee was in Brownsville, Texas, trading cotton for ammunition and war material, and Leovy was somehow involved in the operation. "If you hear that I am killed by a Mexican," Bee wrote, "I want you to kill a dozen or so before you leave the frontier—not the poor devils, but the officials."[196] Leovy was apparently a kind of "troubleshooter," or special assignment agent, for the Confederate government. He went to Richmond undoubtedly at the behest of his old friend Judah P. Benjamin, who likely assigned Leovy the arduous and dangerous task of investigating and routing out spies, deserters, and disloyal citizens.

The area to which Leovy was assigned, Southwestern Virginia, was sorely divided on the issues of secession, slavery, and loyalty to the Confederacy. Many remained loyal to the Union. Many who had supported the Confederacy early in the war had been alienated by the government's inefficiency and now called for a return to the Union. Judah Benjamin, as secretary of state, concerned himself with espionage issues and trusted Leovy to handle this potentially explosive situation. Indeed, the government at Richmond had convinced itself, according to Kenneth W. Noe, that "southwest Virginia, so important strategically as a source of war material and as a transportation corridor, was overrun with 'Red Strings,' members of the unionist Heroes of America." These Appalachian counties, peopled with Scotch Irish and Germans, often clashed with their fellow Virginians to the east over a variety of issues, including slavery, internal improvements, and taxes.[197]

As the war progressed, economic conditions worsened. The currency became worthless, the black market drove prices up, and military impressment depleted stores. The Confederate "tax in kind" and the draft added fuel to the fire. By late 1863 the majority of people in this area were "tired of the war and thoroughly dissatisfied with Richmond's conduct of it," according to Noe.[198] It was into this hornet's nest that the Confederate War Department sent Major Leovy.

Leovy went to Southwestern Virginia in the summer of 1864. He interrogated suspects and those in custody. He brought in detectives, who spent time pretending to be prisoners in jail with some of those arrested, gained their confidence, and learned all about the secret organizations.[199]

The secretary of war gave a detailed report to President Davis on November 8, 1864, describing the secret association dedicated to protecting and hiding deserters and escaped prisoners, and attempting to organize a new state of Southwest Virginia. Seddon's report credited Leovy's "zeal and vigilance" in successfully concluding the investigation and passed on Leovy's recommendation to the president.[200] In December

1864 Leovy was appointed president of the military court for the Department of Southwestern Virginia.[201] He was officially appointed colonel of cavalry and judge.[202]

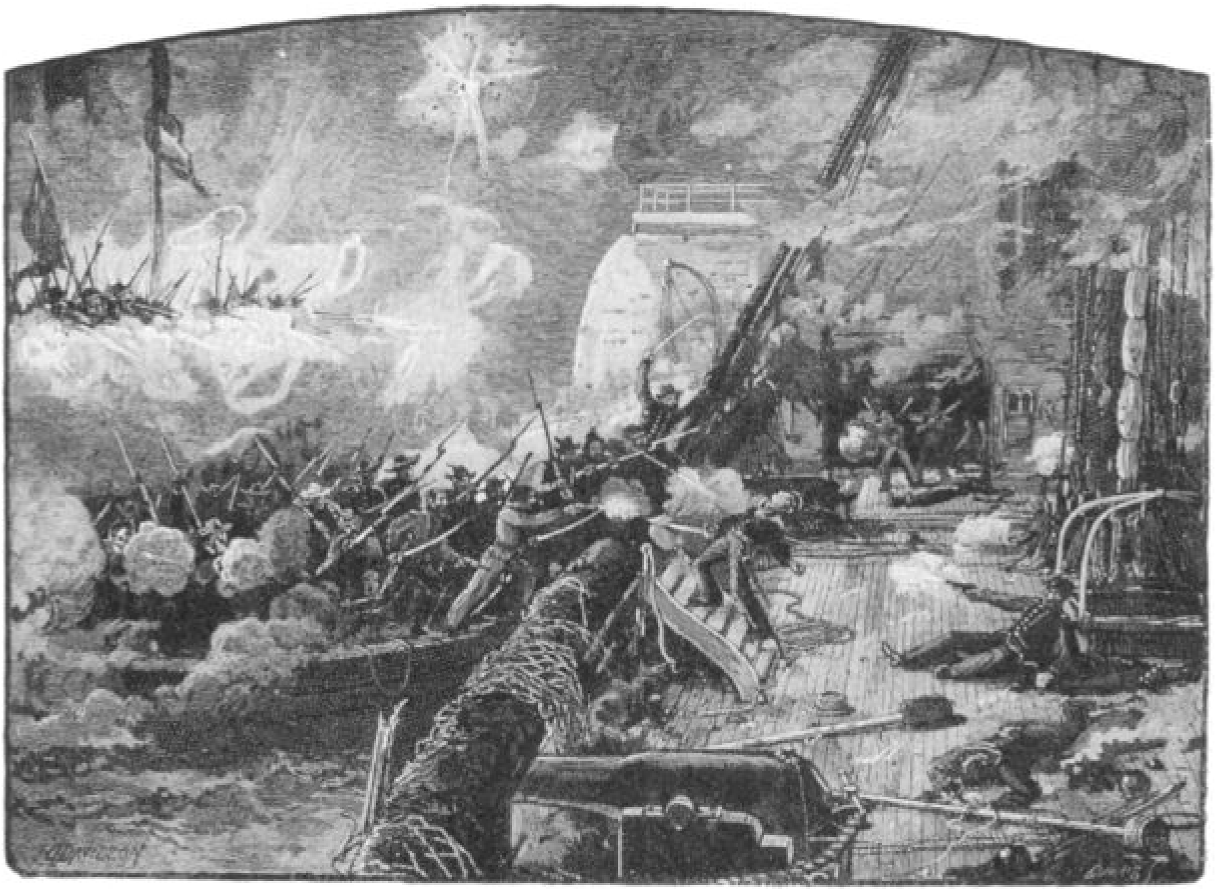
There were also Jewish Confederate officers in the Confederate navy, which defended coastal cities and raided the Union merchant fleet. Perry DeLeon was twenty years old when his native South Carolina seceded. One week later, he was among the first officers to resign from the U.S. Army. From May 1861 until October 1862, he served as a volunteer in the Wise and Hampton Legions and fought at Gaines' Mill and Malvern Hill. In October 1862 he was assigned to duty by the Confederate secretary of the navy as an assistant paymaster. He served in the navy from October until the war ended, serving on the CSS Harriet Lane, the Savannah (Oconee), the Stono, and the Albemarle.[203] DeLeon volunteered for a commando expedition to free Confederate prisoners on Johnson's Island on Lake Erie in the fall of 1863. A group of fifteen Confederate naval officers and sailors left North Carolina, ran the blockade, and traveled to Montreal, where they made plans to capture a Union ship on the Canadian side of the lake and use it to free two thousand prisoners of war. The plan was foiled when the Canadian authorities were alerted to the plot, and the men were forced to return home empty handed.[204]

DeLeon served at the battles of Plymouth, North Carolina, and Albemarle Sound on the ironclad Albemarle. The CSS Albemarle was built in 1864 on the Roanoke River to defend the North Carolina coast. It was 152 feet long and carried two 6.4-inch Brooke guns. Commissioned on April 17, 1864, the Albemarle attacked Union gunboats at Plymouth, North Carolina, two days later. "In Albemarle Sound," DeLeon recalled, "we fought nine boats of the enemy carrying 69 guns, with our little boat carrying two guns. This in April, 1864." He recalled years later, "Our boat did splendid work." In October 1864, however, the Albemarle's luck ran out. Lt. William B. Cushing with seven Union volunteers, "blew us up with a torpedo at the wharf of Plymouth. We captured his boat and crew but not him. We retreated to Halifax and were building another boat when the war ended. I was paroled at Norfolk in May, 1865." The Albemarle sank.[205] Although his rank was denominated "assistant paymaster," DeLeon was a combat naval officer with the relative rank of a captain in the army.

DeLeon was proud of his family's service to the Confederacy. His brief memoir begins: "In our war with the North, every male descendant of Jacob DeLeon between the ages of 15 and 60 served the Confederacy, save one," an uncle with nine children and other family members to support. Of the eleven grandsons and great-grandsons of Jacob DeLeon, two served the Confederacy in civilian capacities: Edwin DeLeon as a diplomat and Thomas Cooper DeLeon as a clerk; eight served in the army and navy. Of the eight, Perry DeLeon wrote simply, “four gave their lives for the Confederacy.”[206]

A career naval officer, Capt. Levi Charles Harby of Galveston, Texas, joined the Confederate cause when his native South Carolina seceded. Born in 1793, Harby was sixty-eight years old when he resigned his commission in the Revenue Service (the early Coast Guard) of the United States and gave up command of the revenue cutter Henry Dodge in Galveston. Having served as a midshipman in the War of 1812 and in the War for Texas Independence, Harby was an experienced officer and a committed patriot. Indeed, the entire Harby family entered the fray, as Captain Harby’s two sons, Henry J. Harby and J. D. Harby, also enlisted—Henry in the 26th Texas Cavalry and J. D. in the Texas Light Artillery. Given his age, Harby was asked to train artillerymen and served his adopted state in the Texas Maritime Service. He was likely commissioned as a lieutenant but, because of his former rank in the Revenue Service, was frequently addressed as “captain.” Later he apparently was actually promoted to captain.[207]



The Battle of Galveston, New Year’s Day, 1863. Seventy-year-old Capt. Levi Charles Harby of Galveston commanded two guns on the small Confederate packet Neptune, which successfully attacked the 619-ton Union warship Harriet Lane. (Battles and Leaders of the Civil War.)

Harby was among the Texans who recaptured Galveston from the occupying Union army and navy on New Year's Day 1863. A combined Confederate land and sea force under Gen. John Bankhead ("Prince John") Magruder launched a surprise attack that day. It was so dangerous that men were asked to volunteer. Col. Thomas Green addressed the men at Harrisburg and asked them to step forward: "Soldiers, you are called upon to volunteer in a dangerous expedition," he said. "I have never deceived you; I will not deceive you now. I regard this as the most dangerous enterprise that men ever engaged in." The whole line stepped forward. These Texas soldiers and cavalrymen, none of them sailors, became "horse marines" and agreed to serve as artillerymen, sharpshooters, and boarding parties on "high-pressure cotton steamers," protected from Union shot and shell only by cotton bales. The Confederates referred to the two small ships, the Neptune and the Bayou City, as "cottonclads."[208]

Captain Harby, now seventy years old, was asked to command the two twenty-four-pound howitzer guns on the Neptune, one of the two ships designated to ram and capture the Harriet Lane, a large side-wheel steamer used as a blockading cruiser carrying five guns, while Magruder's troops attacked Kuhn's Wharf on Galveston Bay. Harby was in command of a small company of infantry acting as artillerymen.[209]

Between 4:00 a.m. and 5:00 a.m. on January 1, 1863, Magruder's forces commenced their attack. The Harriet Lane and other blockading Union warships opened an intense bombardment of the Confederate attackers near Kuhn's Wharf. The Confederate ships "puffing and snorting from their high pressure steam," aimed for the Federal fleet.[210] Harby was in one of the most dangerous positions, commanding the guns on a small mail packet which was ordered to attack a 619-ton Union warship. When one of the nervous sharpshooters asked his colonel whether the cotton bales would protect them, his reply was: "None whatever, not even against grape shot; our only chance is to get along side before they hit us."[211] This is about what actually happened. The plan was for the two "cottonclads" to attack the Harriet Lane from opposite sides. The Neptune was badly damaged in its collision with the Harriet Lane; many men were killed on board; Federal gunners blew a hole in the Neptune's hull, and it began to sink.[212] Fortunately, it sank in eight feet of water, so Harby and his artillerymen and the sharpshooters continued firing. "We had two 24-pounders on board," Joseph Faust recalled, "that roared with extraordinary loud report."[213] This diverted the Harriet Lane so that the Bayou City could successfully ram the Union ship; and its crew boarded the Lane, killed its officers, and captured the vessel with its crew of 109. Magruder recaptured Galveston in one of the most daring battles of the war. Jefferson Davis congratulated Magruder on his "brilliant exploit."[214]

Harby had done his part in the great victory. Magruder thanked all of the successful officers in his official report: "Captain Harby, and the officers and crew of the ship, likewise deserve, as they have received, my thanks for their participation in this brilliant battle."[215] He also reported to the governor of Texas, where he again thanked "The gallant Texans, under their devoted leaders," including Captain Harby."[216] Harby had lost eight out of fifteen men; his lieutenant was killed at his side. He was the last to leave the Neptune.[217]

When the war ended, Captain Harby was in command of the harbor of Galveston. He died in 1870 in Galveston, having never sought a pardon from the United States for his role in the war.

The youngest son of Maj. Raphael J. Moses, Raphael J. Moses Jr. also served in the Confederate navy. Born in Florida in 1844, young Moses was called "Lea" or "Lee."[218] He matriculated at Annapolis in September 1860, when he was not yet sixteen. A popular and lively student, young Raphael resigned when Georgia seceded from the Union. In July he joined the Confederate States navy as a midshipman and was soon in combat. Assigned to the CSS Savannah, young Moses fired several "excellent shots … [while] commanding the after-gun," according to Capt. Josiah Tattnall's report. He was promoted to the rank of master, in line of promotion, in the Confederate navy. He also served on the CSS Arctic out of Wilmington, North Carolina. When yellow fever struck the ship, Moses was left as the senior officer. He had the good fortune to spot a ship on Frying Pan Shoals just below the mouth of the Cape Fear River. The vessel was deserted by her crew except one survivor. Moses's crew saved the survivor and brought the ship to port. "To my surprise," Moses wrote in a letter years later, "I shortly afterwards received form [sic] the prize court $3000.00 in gold and my share of the prize money."[219]

In the fall of 1862 Moses was sent to the CSS Georgia and was involved in several engagements off the coast of Europe. The Georgia was an iron-hulled merchant crew ship, originally named Japan, which was purchased by Confederate agents in Scotland in 1863. One officer called it "a poor miserable little tin kettle." Nevertheless, it captured nine merchantmen prizes while cruising the Atlantic Ocean and, like the Alabama, created panic in Northern shipowners.[220]

In March 1863 the Confederate government sent Moses to England to help take charge of two turreted ironclads known as the Laird Rams, being built for the Confederacy. The British government, however, seized the ships. Young Moses then went to Paris for a year and was ordered to the CSS Alabama, but that legendary vessel was sunk by the USS Kearsage off Cherbourg before he arrived. In September 1864 he returned to the South by running the blockade. Sent to a naval artillery battery known as the Semmes Batteries fifteen miles below Richmond on the James River, he commanded a battery of six eight-inch cannons and had almost daily artillery duels with the Union army. Moses was also assigned the dangerous duty of laying mines (called "torpedoes" during the Civil War) at night in the river. "We had to go with muffled oars in a row boat," he recalled, "pick out a night particularly dark, then tow these torpedoes to the points we wished and anchor them with just sufficient rope to keep the torpedo concealed and as it was concealed from the enemy, it was equally concealed from us on our return trip."[221]

Young Moses was an exacting commander and drove the men in his command hard. For Christmas in 1864, he decided to treat his men to a good Christmas dinner, and, seeing some corn across the river in enemy territory, he decided to raid the cornfield and sell the corn in Richmond to raise the funds. After three boatloads, however, he was captured. He was sent first to the Old Capitol Prison in Washington and then to Fort Delaware, where he passed time usefully, studying law. This he did partly for future use and partly to divert himself and fellow prisoners from the horrors of their surroundings, doing such things as holding mock court with trials by jury.[222]

Two other Jewish Confederates played important roles in the Confederate navy. David Lopez, a builder and contractor in Charleston, was put in charge of much of South Carolina's arms production and repair. The builder of Institute Hall in Charleston, where South Carolina's Ordinance of Secession was signed, Lopez was responsible for building one or more of the innovative torpedo boats that attacked the Union ships blockading Charleston. One, the CSS David, was involved in a number of attempts to break the Union blockade of Charleston harbor by ramming Union warships. Harry Simonhoff claims that the David was named for Lopez, but it was likely named David because its foes were Union Goliaths.[223]

Col. Henry J. Leovy, the military judge and special commissioner, was also involved in naval affairs. Leovy, a lawyer, was Horace L. Hunley's friend. Hunley was a fellow New Orleans lawyer and inventor of the CSS H. L. Hunley, the first submarine in history to successfully attack a ship during wartime. Leovy helped Hunley build his submarine. He acted as a surety on the bond necessary to procure the letter of marque authorizing the vessel to attack enemy ships.[224] When Hunley died in one of the submarine's test dives, it was Leovy who acted as executor of his estate. (Hunley's will, incidentally, requested Leovy to dispose of his sugar and tobacco stores and "use the money for speculation or running the blockade till the end of the war."[225])

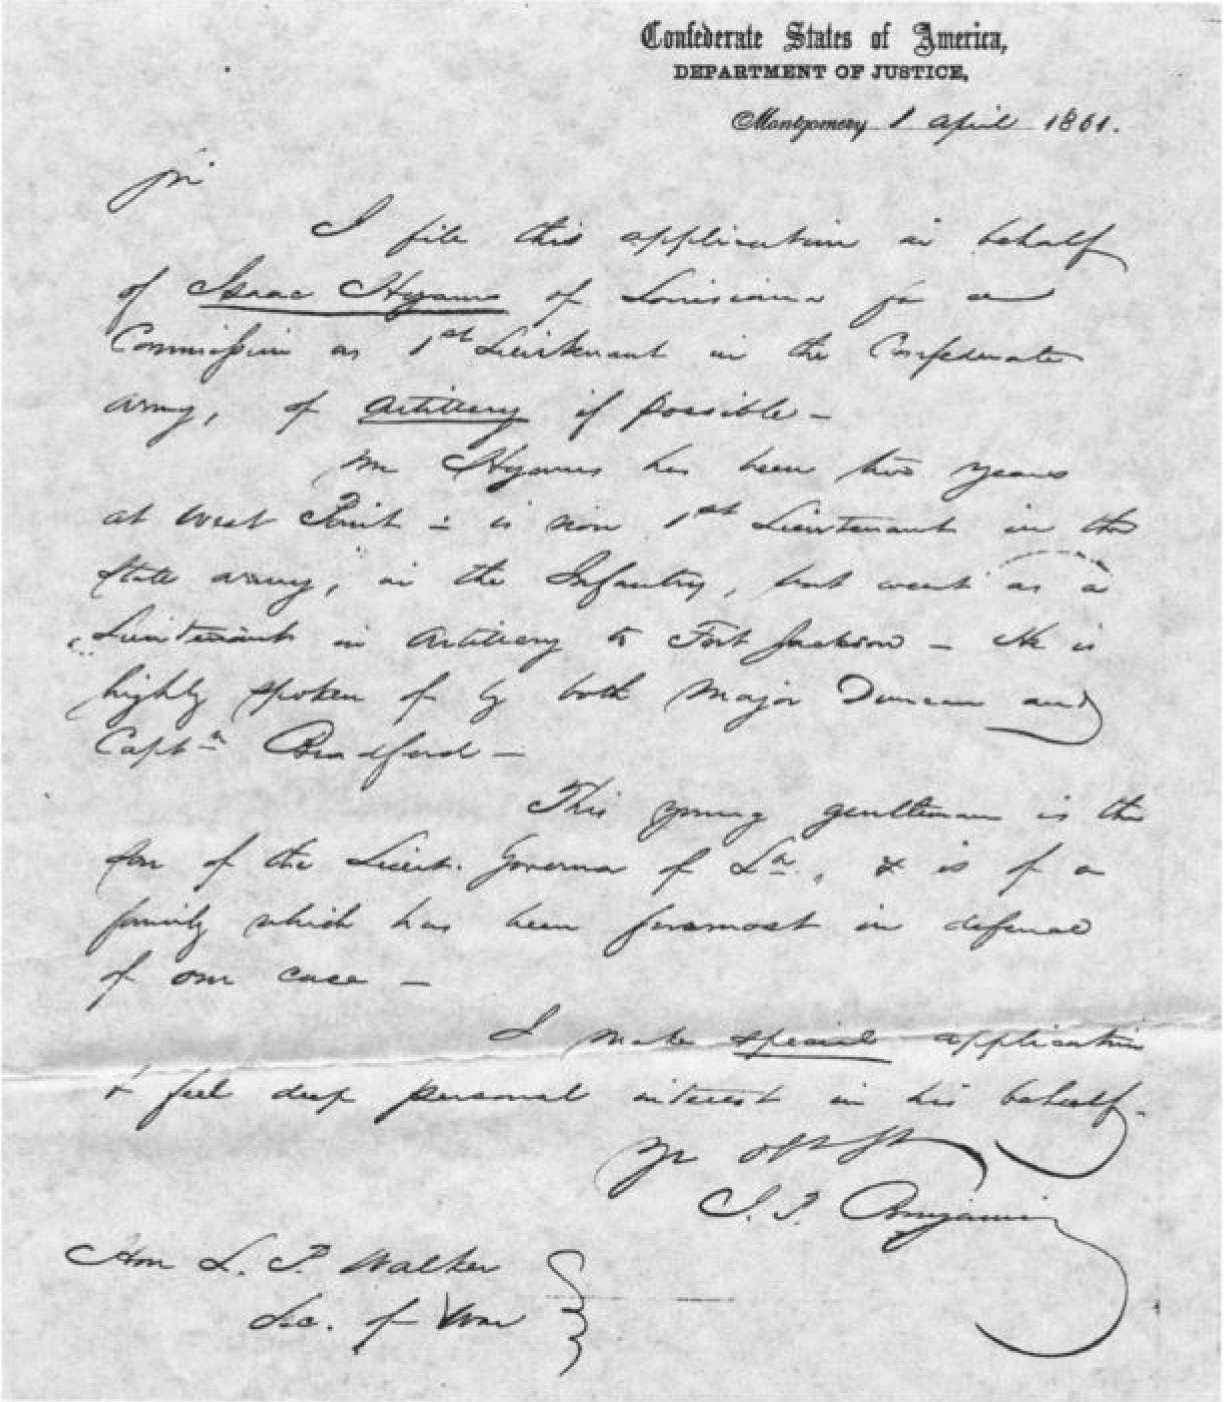
Many Southern Jewish families gave more than one officer to the Southern cause. The Hyams and Jonas clans of Louisiana contributed numerous high-ranking officers to the Confederacy. Henry M. Hyams, an observant Jew, served as lieutenant governor of the state throughout the war.[226] Hyams's sons, his brother Samuel Myers Hyams, and his nephews all saw service in the Confederate army, most as officers. At least three of Henry Hyams's sons served in the armed forces: Isaac Smith Hyams, Kosciusko Ravenkamp Hyams, and Henry M. Hyams Jr.

Henry Hyams had always wanted Isaac to be a soldier. Born in 1837, Isaac entered West Point in 1854, but left the academy in 1856. When the war began, Isaac was twenty-four years old. He joined Company A, 1st Regiment in the Louisiana State Army in January 1861 and was commissioned second lieutenant. When he mustered into Confederate service in March, he was first lieutenant of Company B. Father and son enlisted the aid of their cousin, Judah Benjamin, then attorney general, to write the Confederate secretary of war to obtain a commission for young Hyams in the Confederate States regular army, preferably in the artillery corps. While in Montgomery, Benjamin wrote a request to Leroy Pope Walker, the secretary of war, on April 1, 1861: “Mr. Hyams has been two years at West Point & is now 1st Lieutenant in the State army, in the Infantry…. This young gentleman is the son of the Lieut. Governor of La. & is of a family which has been foremost in defense of our case—I make special application & feel deep personal interest in his behalf.” Benjamin’s recommendation had its effect. Young Hyams was appointed a second lieutenant of infantry in the regular Confederate army in April 1861. He was “temporarily” assigned to Company B of the Confederate States Marine Corps from New Orleans, which was pitted against the Union forces holding Fort Pickens. The men were being drilled in the use of heavy guns, and Hyams was likely an instructor. He saw combat and was commended by Capt. Alfred C. Van Benthuysen for his “cool and gallant conduct” in an artillery duel in November. It was Isaac Hyams’s first experience under fire.[227] Hyams served with this company of the CSMC for ten months.



Confederate States of America,
DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Montgomery 1 April 1861.

Sir

I file this application in behalf of Isaac Hyams of Louisiana for a Commission as 1st Lieutenant in the Confederate army, of Artillery if possible—

Mr Hyams has been two years at West Point & is now 1st Lieutenant in the State army, in the Infantry, but went as a Lieutenant in Artillery to Fort Jackson — He is highly spoken of by both (Major Duncan and Captn Bradford—

This young gentleman is the son of the Lieut. Governor of La., & is of a family which has been foremost in defence of our cause—

I make special application & feel deep personal interest in his behalf.

Yr obt servt
J. P. Benjamin

Hon L. P. Walker
Sec. of War

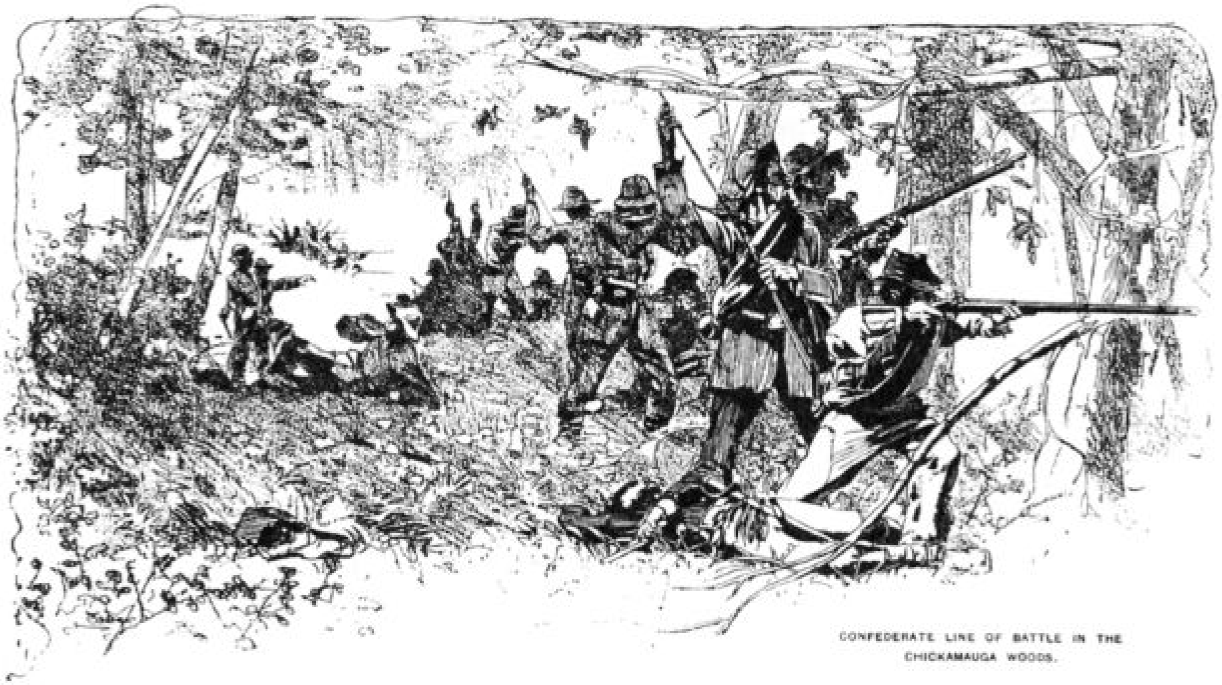
Judah Benjamin's letter to Leroy Pope Walker. The Hyamses eagerly sought commissions as officers. In this letter, written less than two weeks before the bombardment at Fort Sumter, Judah P. Benjamin, then just appointed attorney general, asked the newly appointed secretary of war, Leroy Pope Walker, to give Isaac Hyams a lieutenant's commission "in the Regular C.S. Army in the artillery if possible." Isaac's father, Henry, was Benjamin's first cousin. "I make special application & feel deep personal interest in his behalf," Benjamin concluded. (Courtesy of National Archives, Isaac Hyams compiled service record.)

In 1862 Hyams reported to Maj. Gen. Edmund Kirby Smith for duty as a drillmaster. He was next assigned to the 39th North Carolina and was acting adjutant of the regiment at the Battle of Murfreesboro, Tennessee (Stones River), in December 1862 and January 1863.

Hyams's bravery at the battle led to his selection by the men of his regiment as one of twelve men to be included in the "Roll of Honor" and was recommended for promotion in January 1863. After the only two field officers were borne disabled from the field, his commander wrote, "much of the burden of conducting the regiment devolved upon [Hyams]." He discharged this responsibility "with an activity and efficiency worthy of all praise, and with a gallantry which has been a universal theme of the comment of the command."[228]

In September Hyams participated in the Battle of Chickamauga, where he survived the 39th North Carolina's heavy engagement on the first day but was wounded in the leg on the second day. That day the 39th led the critical assault by McNair's brigade on two batteries of Federal guns. This feat was decisive in breaking the Federal center. Hyams was evacuated to a hospital in Atlanta. Judah Benjamin kept a watchful eye on his young cousin. On December 15 Benjamin, now secretary of state, wrote to James A. Seddon, secretary of war, reminding him of a promise he had made to promote Hyams, enclosing the letter of recommendation from his colonel. Benjamin was quite direct: "Will you be good enough to enclose to me the commission you promised?" That same day, Seddon instructed the adjutant general to appoint Hyams captain in the Provisional Army, while he still retained his second lieutenant rank in the regular army.[229]

By February 1864 Hyams had recovered enough for reassignment, and by the end of the month, he was serving as captain of Company B, Garrison Guard Battalion, at Marietta, Georgia. In May he was ordered, as a second lieutenant, Regular Army, to report to Gen. Edmund Kirby Smith in the Trans-Mississippi Department. In March 1865 he was serving as a drill officer in Maj. Gen. John Austin Wharton's (Dismounted) Cavalry Corps in Texas. He was paroled at Millican, Texas, on July 5, 1865, as a captain.



CONFEDERATE LINE OF BATTLE IN THE CHICKAMAUGA WOODS.

The Battle of Chickamauga. One of the most vicious battles of the war, Chickamauga pitted two major armies in September of 1863, both seeking control of Chattanooga. Killed were 2d Lt. Walter Mordecai of Company B, 22d Alabama, and 2d Lt. Isaiah Jacobs of Company D, 2d South Carolina; Lt. Isaac S. Hyams was wounded. Numerous Jewish Confederates were there, including Maj. Alroy Jonas, who served with Gen. John Bell Hood. (Battles and Leaders of the Civil War.)

Henry M. Hyams's brother Samuel Myers Hyams, who was also born in Charleston, moved to New Orleans in 1830. He later settled in Natchitoches (pronounced Nak-uh-tish), where he was the U.S. deputy surveyor and then clerk of the district court. In the Mexican War, Hyams raised a company in the 5th Louisiana Volunteers and served as captain, although the unit mustered out before going to Mexico. He was elected sheriff and served six years before becoming U.S. marshal of the Western District of Louisiana and register of the Land Office. He was also a successful planter. His plantation, Lac des Mures, was located on the Red River above Grand Ecore and Natchitoches.[230]

When the war began, Samuel Hyams was forty-eight years old and the head of a large family. He was nominated for secretary of the Louisiana secession convention, but was not elected. He raised a company of men, the Pelican Rangers, and became its captain. The Pelican Rangers was the largest company in the state. It traveled 479 miles to the enlistment rendezvous in New Orleans, where it was divided into two companies, the Pelican Rangers No. 1 and No. 2. Samuel Hyams retained command of No. 1. The two companies became a part of the 3d Louisiana, which mustered into service on May 17, 1861.[231]

A Louisiana "Pelican." (Battles and Leaders of the Civil War.)

Hyams became lieutenant colonel of the 3d Louisiana under Col. Louis Hebert when it was mustered into service in the Confederate army in May 1861. He led the regiment to Arkansas that same month. Despite the crippling effects of chronic rheumatism and a kick from a horse, Lt. Col. Hyams successfully led half of his regiment at the Battle of Oak Hills (Wilson's Creek). His command captured five of six guns in a Federal battery and, according to Tunnard's account, was "with the regiment on the march, in their ambuscades, and through the battle, coolly and calmly directing the men."[232]

Hyams was a popular officer, affable, gregarious, and hospitable to a fault. Hyams loved a horse race and participated enthusiastically in the regiment's races. His son, Samuel M. Hyams Jr., raced his horse in these races. On one occasion, a mysterious-looking wagon happened into camp with a keg of whiskey, which was promptly seized by the officers as contraband. "The Lieutenant Colonel did not, then and there, spill the whiskey," Tunnard recalled. "Not he. He had too keen an appreciation of what was good for a soldier on a cold day." Instead, the men were called to Hyams's quarters and everyone given a drink of the “forbidden nectar.” The popular lieutenant colonel was vociferously cheered for his thoughtfulness toward his men.[233]

But his good humor was not equaled by good health, and Hyams was forced to retire in early 1862. He returned to Natchitoches, where he served as provost marshal, enforcing martial law. He did not, however, forget the men of his old command. When the regiment, traveling by boat, came by his plantation in August of 1864 to land a passenger, Hyams appealed to the men to sustain his authority while he prepared a feast in preparation for the whole regiment. Of course, he was upheld in these proceedings. Tunnard recalled: “The Captain was indiscriminately stuffed with a bushel of peaches, washed down with some excellent ‘firewater’ from a Confederate distillery; then followed a cart-load of melons, grapes ad infinitum, milk, fine gumbo, barbecued pork, beef, mutton, etc.—the men being likewise provided for. They bowed most gracefully to the exacting demands of the Colonel, and a scene of hilarity, joy and freedom from restraint ensued such as was seldom witnessed during the late warlike times.”[234]

Samuel Hyams had two sons in the 3d Louisiana, one in the Mississippi Cavalry and one in the Missouri Cavalry. Samuel Myers Hyams Jr. rose to the rank of lieutenant colonel before the war ended.[235] Samuel Jr. was born and raised in Louisiana and joined the Pelican Rangers No. 2 (Company D), 3d Louisiana on May 17, 1861, as the junior second lieutenant. He served as adjutant in the summer of 1861 and was cited by Col. Louis Hebert for his actions at Wilson’s Creek (Oak Hills), where “he left his horse and fought bravely on foot.”

Hyams was also at the Battle of Elkhorn Tavern in March 1862, where he was commended by Col. Elkanah Greer, the acting division commander. By June 1862 he was aide-de-camp to now Brig. Gen. Hebert. He was again commended for gallantry in leading troops in battle at Courtland, Alabama, in July 1862, and was promoted to captain in 1863. In 1864 he was promoted to lieutenant colonel and was to assume command of the 2d Missouri Cavalry. His appointment, however, did not suit the men of the 2d, as they felt their major was entitled to the promotion. Hyams agreed to be bound by a vote of the men, which went against him, and gracefully accepted their decision. Hyams was then assigned to the command of the 1st Mississippi Partisan Rangers at Tupelo, Mississippi (later redesignated as the 7th Mississippi Cavalry). He participated in the defense of Mobile in the fall of 1864.[236] In February 1865, Hyams reported to Brig. Gen. James Ronald Chalmers, commander of Gen. Nathan Bedford Forrest’s 1st Division. In early March 1865, on his way to Jackson, Mississippi, where he was sent to “hurry up” and assist Gen. William Wirt Adams in organizing his brigade, Hyams delivered a message and other orders from General Forrest to Lt. Gen. Richard Taylor. Hyams likely accompanied Forrest’s command into Alabama, where it surrendered in May 1865.

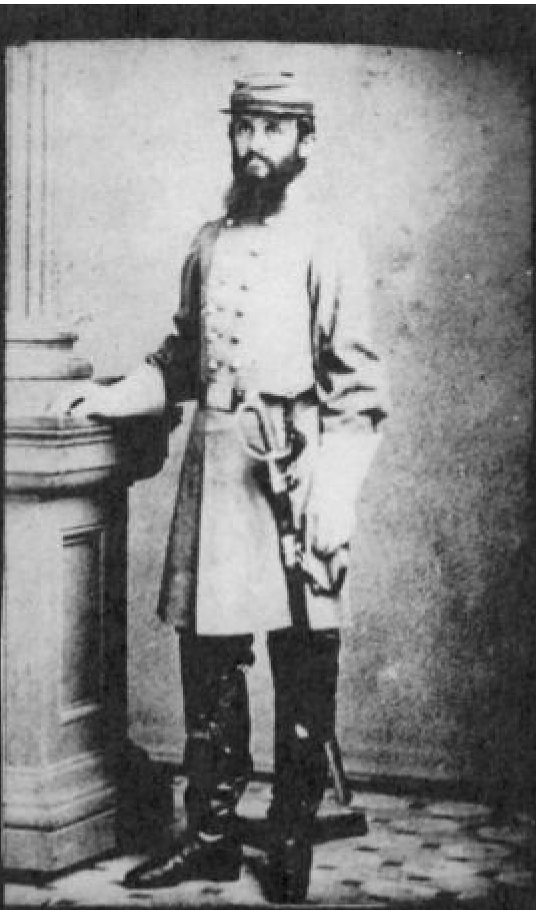
The Jonas family originated in England. Abraham Jonas, the patriarch, emigrated to the United States from England in the early 1800s.[237] He served in the legislatures of Kentucky and Illinois, a grand master of Masons and an early supporter of Abraham Lincoln. He was postmaster in Quincy, Illinois, under three presidents, including Lincoln. Abraham Jonas and his second wife, Louisa Block of Virginia, had ten children.[238] The older children were born and raised in Williamstown, Kentucky, in the 1830s and 1840s and grew up with Southern sympathies. The younger children were born and raised in Quincy, Illinois, and grew up with Northern sympathies. There were at least five Jonases in uniform during the Civil War: the four eldest, Charles Henry, Benjamin Franklin, Julian J., and Sidney Alroy, wore gray, and the youngest, Edward, wore blue. Three of the five became officers. A sixth son, George, probably served briefly in the militia in Louisiana. Alroy served as a major on the staffs of Generals W. H. C. Whiting, John Bell Hood, and Stephen D. Lee. Julian fought with the Louisiana Crescent (24th) Regiment at Shiloh. He then enlisted in the Louisiana Orleans Light Horse Cavalry Company, where he became quartermaster sergeant. Benjamin Franklin, known as Frank, served with Captain Fenner's artillery battery and later with Hood. Charles was a captain and quartermaster. Edward served as a captain and aide-de-camp in the Union army. After the war, Alroy became a well-known editor and political ally of Sen. L. Q. C. Lamar; Edward, a cotton factor and commission merchant; and Benjamin Franklin Jonas, a political force in postwar Louisiana, helping to lead the Redeemer movement and becoming the first practicing Jew to serve in the U.S. Senate.

In 1838 the Jonases had moved to Quincy, Illinois, undoubtedly the first Jews in the town. Abraham Jonas was a storekeeper and studied law in the office of Orville Hickman Browning, a close friend of Lincoln and later senator from Illinois. In 1842 Jonas ran for the legislature on the Whig ticket and was elected. He was defeated for the state senate in 1844 but remained active in the Whig Party and later the Republican Party. He became a close friend and ardent supporter of Lincoln. He arranged for Lincoln to visit Quincy in 1854 to speak on behalf of the Whig candidate for Congress. When Lincoln was later accused of having attended a Know-Nothing meeting on this occasion, he wrote to Jonas to vouch for his whereabouts that night, which Jonas did. Lincoln and Jonas were both presidential electors for Fremont in 1856. When Lincoln came to Quincy as a lawyer, he did much of his legal work in the law office of Jonas & Asbury. In 1860 Jonas was a delegate to the Republican convention in Chicago, where he worked tirelessly for the nomination of his friend.[239]

The Jonas boys knew Lincoln too. In fact, before the war, Frank Jonas, then a young lawyer in New Orleans, was involved in a legal matter with Lincoln. A June 4, 1857, letter in the Lincoln papers from Frank Jonas to Lincoln discusses the arrest of a free black whom Jonas successfully represented. Lincoln must have known the client because he sent Jonas the fee. "I should never have ventured to trouble you," Jonas wrote Lincoln, "had not the boy mentioned your name, as that of one, who would take an interest in his behalf—and had I not recognized in you an old friend of my father—." The letter closes with Jonas's assurance to Lincoln—ironic in hindsight—that "any service I can render you in this part of the world will give me pleasure—."[240]

Even after the war had begun, the Jonases kept in touch with President Lincoln. "Mr. Lincoln always asked after us [the Jonas sons] when he saw anyone from New Orleans during the war," Frank Jonas recalled. In December 1860, Abraham Jonas wrote Lincoln to warn him of an assassination plot: "You perhaps are aware, that I have a very large family connection in the South, and that in New Orleans I have six children and a host of other near relatives. I receive many letters from them, their language has to be very guarded." But, he warned his old friend, he had a letter from "one who is prudent, sound and careful," and this correspondent believed there was a plot organized in New Orleans to kill the president upon his arrival in Washington.[241]

The eldest son of Abraham Jonas, Charles H. Jonas, served in the 12th Arkansas Infantry. He was captain and assistant quartermaster and was captured on July 9, 1863, at Port Hudson, Louisiana, imprisoned first in New Orleans, then sent to Fort Columbus in New York harbor, and finally to Johnson's Island, Ohio. It was while he was a prisoner of war in Ohio that news came of his dying father's wish to see him. At Sen. Orville Browning's urging, Lincoln issued a personal order in May 1864 allowing "Charles H. Jonas now a prisoner of War at Johnson's Island, a parol[e] of three weeks to visit his dying father, Abraham Jonas, at Quincy, Illinois, June 2, 1864."[242] Jonas, in turn, gave his parole: "I, C. H. Jonas, Cpt 12th Ark. Regt—a prisoner of war—do hereby give my parole of honor—to proceed to Quincy, Illinois to visit my father—and that I will do no act or thing prejudicial to the Government of the United States—while absent & further that I will visit no other place—But will return to this Post on the Twenty Seventh day of the present month." Abraham died the day his son Charles arrived "in time to be recognized and welcomed by him," as Charles later recalled. Lincoln appointed Mrs. Jonas postmaster to serve out her husband's term. Captain Jonas honored his parole. He remained a prisoner of war until exchanged on March 14, 1865, at Point Lookout, Maryland.[243]



Charles H. Jonas,

Allow Charles H. Jonas: now a prisoner of War at Johnson's Island, a parol of three weeks to visit his dying father, Abraham Jonas, at Quincy, Illinois. June 2, 1864 A. Lincoln

Charles H. Jonas was the son of Abraham Jonas and a brother of Frank, Julian, and Alroy Jonas. He served in the 12th Arkansas as a captain. He was captured at Port Hudson, Louisiana, and was a prisoner at Johnson's Island, Ohio. When his father was dying, Sen. Orville Browning of Illinois arranged for President Lincoln to issue a parole to allow Jonas to leave the prison to visit his father in Quincy, Illinois. The note above is in Lincoln’s handwriting. (Courtesy of the Jacob Rader Marcus Center, American Jewish Archives, Cincinnati, Ohio.)

The second son of Abraham Jonas, Benjamin Franklin (“Frank”) Jonas, was born in Williamstown, Kentucky, on July 19, 1834, moved to Illinois with his family, and was educated in the public schools.[244] In 1853, at the age of nineteen, he moved to New Orleans, where his uncle George Jonas was a prominent banker. He was admitted to the bar and was offered a partnership by Henry M. Hyams, then a leading attorney and soon to be lieutenant governor. This connection also gave young Jonas a connection to Judah Benjamin, as Hyams was the senator’s cousin. (Later, after the war, Jonas and Benjamin’s nephew Ernest Benjamin Kruttschnitt became law partners.) Jonas was a successful lawyer and an accomplished orator, a skill which served him well throughout his career. He was active in the Jewish community, having served as one of the founders of the Jewish Orphan’s Home in New Orleans. As one of the outstanding young lawyers in the city, Jonas was asked to give the dedication speech of the home.[245]

Jonas may not have been all that enthusiastic about the war. He enlisted as a private for three years on September 9, 1862, at Baton Rouge in Capt. Charles E. Fenner’s Light Artillery Battery. He served under Gen. Joseph E. Johnston in the Mississippi campaign, participating in the four days’ battle around Jackson. In 1863 Fenner’s Battery joined Hood’s corps in the Army of Tennessee, and Jonas became sergeant major and acting adjutant in the artillery regiment commanded by Col. Robert F. Beckham. Jonas’s colonel requested that Jonas be promoted to first lieutenant and adjutant. He served in the terrible Atlanta campaign from May 5 to September 1, 1864, and in Hood’s campaign in Tennessee. His service record describes him as “a good and faithful soldier.” He apparently served at corps headquarters at the same time as his younger brother Alroy until Fenner’s Battery was detached and sent to Alabama. He surrendered with Hoxton’s Regiment, Smith’s brigade at Citronelle, Alabama, on May 4, 1865, almost a month after Appomattox. He was paroled at Meridian, Mississippi, on May 10. His official rank may never have risen from private, but he was considered a sergeant major and adjutant in the field by his commander.[246]

The third son of Abraham Jonas to fight for the Confederacy was Julian J. Jonas, who enlisted March 5, 1862, at New Orleans in Capt. M. A. Tarleton’s company (Twiggs Guards), Crescent Regiment, for ninety days.[247] He fought with the regiment at the Battle of Shiloh, where it played an important role at the famous Hornet’s Nest. Julian was promoted to fifth sergeant in June, just before his ninety days expired. On July 1, after being out of the service less than a month, he enlisted in the Orleans Light Horse

Company in Tupelo, Mississippi, where the army had retired after Shiloh. He was quickly promoted to quartermaster sergeant, a month and a half after enlisting. His company was the cavalry escorts for Lieutenant Generals Leonidas Polk's and Alexander D. Stewart's corps headquarters.

It is possible, although uncertain, that Julian and his brother Edward, a Union soldier with the 50th Illinois, fought against each other at the "Hornet's Nest," so called because the bullets flew like angry hornets.[248] The Crescent Regiment made its assault at Shiloh on that portion of the line held by Brig. Gen. William H. L. Wallace, to whose division the 50th Illinois was assigned, and the division of Brig. Gen. Benjamin M. Prentiss. Edward had been detailed as an orderly to Prentiss, so he may very well have stared across the battlefield at Julian. Prentiss had lived for a while in Quincy, Illinois, in the early 1840s, so he was probably acquainted with Edward's father.

The fourth son, Sidney Alroy Jonas, left Aberdeen, Mississippi, when the war broke out.[249] He quit his job as a civil engineer working for the New Orleans, Jackson & Great Northern Railroad, enlisted in the Van Dorn Reserves, and left for Virginia. That unit afterward became Company I of the famous 11th Mississippi Volunteers.[250] When the regiment was organized at Corinth, Mississippi, Jonas's captain, W. H. Moore, was elected colonel, and Moore appointed Jonas adjutant. This appointment apparently was not legal, as military law required the detail of a lieutenant to that post. According to Jonas, his good friend Colonel Moore then "made me in the language of the opera 'Lord High Everything else.'"

Jonas served as unofficial adjutant until Harpers Ferry, where Maj. William H. C. Whiting, chief engineer of the Army of the Shenandoah, was ordered by Gen. Joseph E. Johnston to destroy the fortifications incident to evacuation. Whiting called on Colonel Moore for a civil engineer, and Moore sent Jonas. "I think I rendered good service in the work of demolition," Jonas recalled. From Harpers Ferry, Jonas's unit reinforced Gen. P. G. T. Beauregard in the Battle of First Manassas (Bull Run). "In that great battle," Jonas wrote, "Gen. Barnard E. Bee, our brigade commander who christened Jackson 'Stonewall,' was killed, and Major Whiting was promoted to succeed him and had me commissioned a Major on his staff." Jonas served as commissary of the 3d Brigade, 2d Corps, Army of the Potomac. He was appointed major and commissary of subsistence.

Gen. John Bell Hood succeeded to Whiting's command and was promoted to major general in October 1862. Jonas was transferred along with the general staff. He served on Hood's staff and served as commissary at Gettysburg. In his memoir, Advance and Retreat, Hood listed Jonas as among those who "rendered gallant and efficient service" in this great battle.[251] Jonas remained with Hood and went with the division from Virginia to Georgia in September 1863 for the Battle of Chickamauga. He remained in the Army of Tennessee and participated in all of its many movements and battles. By March 1864, Jonas was serving as a major and chief commissary of Hood's newly formed 2d Corps, Army of Tennessee. Hood recommended Jonas for lieutenant colonel, but apparently the appointment was never approved, as he was always referred to as "Major" or "Mage" after the war. When General Hood was promoted to temporary general and commander of the Army of Tennessee, Lt. Gen. Stephen D. Lee became commander of the 2d Corps, and Jonas was transferred to his staff. Jonas served at corps headquarters as chief commissary under Lee from the summer of 1864 until Lee surrendered with Gen. Joseph E. Johnston's forces in North Carolina in April 1865.

A fifth son of Abraham Jonas, George, may also have served the Confederacy. There are two George Jonases listed in the roll of the Confederate Guards Regiment, Louisiana Militia. One is undoubtedly George B. Jonas, the president of the Canal Bank in New Orleans and Abraham's brother, who served in Company K. The other is probably George Jonas, another son of Abraham Jonas, who served in the militia in Company B.[252]

The youngest son of Abraham Jonas fought for the Union. Edward Jonas was raised in Illinois and enlisted as a private at the age of seventeen in Company C of the Adams County Regiment, the 50th Illinois, "the blind half-hundred." He was detailed as an orderly and was captured at Shiloh (Pittsburgh Landing) while serving on the staff of Brigadier General Prentiss, who was also captured.[253] He was imprisoned at Madison, Georgia, until sent to Virginia for exchange on October 12, 1862. He rejoined the staff of General Prentiss, was promoted to lieutenant, and served as aide-de-camp during the Confederate attack on Helena, Arkansas, in July 1863. Jonas later served with Maj. Gen. Stephen A. Hurlbut and on the staff of Maj. Gen. Grenville M. Dodge. He was promoted to captain and aide-de-camp, U.S. Volunteers, in February 1865. He received a brevet promotion to major on October 13, 1865, and lieutenant colonel on June 22, 1867, for "gallant and meritorious services during the war," both to rank from March 13, 1865.[254]

The Jonas family was not the only Jewish family with officers serving in opposing armies. "I never fully realized the fratricidal character of the conflict," Charleston-born Septima Levy Collis wrote, "until I lost my idolized brother Dave [2d Lt. David Cardoza Levy Jr., 13th Louisiana Infantry killed at Murfreesboro] of the Southern Army one day, and was nursing my Northern husband [Col. Charles H. T. Collis, 114th Pennsylvania] back to life the next."[255] A captured Confederate general could not understand how Mrs. Collis, a Southern woman, could espouse the Northern cause just because she had married a Northerner. "I told him," she later recalled, "that I had only followed the example of many other Southerners—I had gone with my state, mine being the state of matrimony."[256]

The beautiful Rebecca Gratz of Philadelphia, founder of the Hebrew Sunday School Society and said to have been the inspiration for "Rebecca" in Sir Walter Scott's Ivanhoe, suffered a severe blow in the death of her nephew Cary Gratz. Cary was the youngest of four sons of Benjamin Gratz, Rebecca's brother and an heir to the Gratz mercantile fortune. He was one of the most distinguished citizens of Lexington, Kentucky.[257] When Benjamin's wife died, he married Anne Boswell, who had a son, Joseph ("Jo") Shelby, by her first husband. Benjamin's first wife had been Anne Boswell's aunt, so Cary and Jo were cousins as well as stepbrothers. Only one year apart, Jo and Cary were raised together as brothers. Like many Kentuckians, they moved to neighboring Missouri, and when the war came, Cary enlisted in the Union Missouri Infantry and Jo enlisted in the Missouri State Guards, Confederate Cavalry.[258] Both became captains. Jo was Joseph Orville Shelby, later a major general in the Confederate army and arguably the best cavalry general of the South.[259]

On August 10, 1861, Capt. Cary Gratz led his men under the command of Brig. Gen. Nathaniel Lyon toward Wilson's Creek, where the Federals hoped to surprise the Confederates. Capt. Jo Shelby was at Wilson's Creek with the Missouri State Guards. The Battle of Wilson Creek was an important early battle. It has been described as the Bull Run of the West, where the Southern troops prevailed but failed to pursue their victory. Soon, there "was not half a mile's distance between Capt. Cary Gratz and Capt. Jo Shelby when Lyon struck at Wilson's Creek," Daniel O'Flaherty wrote in General Jo Shelby, The Undefeated Rebel. "It is possible that Shelby saw the face of his stepbrother and cousin amid the smoke that rolled across the field that morning, without recognizing it. Whether he did or not will never be known; but undoubtedly he saw it afterward on the battlefield, stilled in death."[260]

The extended Levy family of Richmond was sorely divided by the war. Two sons of Jacob A. Levy served in the Confederate army: Capt. Ezekiel J. Levy and Pvt. Isaac J. Levy of the Richmond Light Infantry Blues. Jacob Levy's brother Isaac had left Richmond, and his two sons grew up in the North and served in the Union army, as did Mrs. Levy's nephew, Col. Jacob E. Hyneman. After the evacuation of Richmond, Jacob Hyneman looked up his relatives in Richmond and found a deep-seated anger.

Prominent Jewish Confederates served in many capacities in the government in addition to the armed services. Edwin Warren Moise served as a Confederate district judge in Louisiana.[261] After his retirement from the army, Samuel Hyams served as provost marshal in Rapides, Aroyelles, and Natchitoches. As such, he was the chief law enforcement officer in the area and charged with enforcing martial law.[262] Jacob DeCordova was collector of taxes of District 60 in Texas for the Confederacy.[263]

Edwin DeLeon, a journalist and diplomat before the war, was asked by Jefferson Davis and Judah Benjamin to wage a Confederate propaganda campaign in France and Great Britain during the war. His efforts to win over public opinion to the Confederate cause proved futile, and he embarrassed the Confederate government in reports captured by the enemy. (DeLeon, Belles, Beaux, and Brains of the '60s.)

One interesting Confederate official was Edwin DeLeon, a member of the prominent Columbia, South Carolina, family.[264] DeLeon was living in France in 1861. Anxious to be of service to the Confederacy, DeLeon returned from Europe in the winter of 1861.[265] He traveled to New Orleans by way of Savannah on a "blockade-breaker" out of Havana and then made his way to Richmond, where he presented himself to his old friend Jefferson Davis "in sorry plight, my clothes covered with mud, and stained with travel. I was received with great cordiality and congratulation." He met with Davis for two hours, explaining the Confederacy's poor image with European governments and popular opinion. There was a crying need for an organized Confederate propaganda effort, DeLeon told the president.[266]

It took Davis some time to make a decision on Edwin DeLeon's proposal for an organized Confederate propaganda effort. When Judah Benjamin became secretary of state in March 1862, he realized the importance of such an effort. But Benjamin wanted his old friend John Slidell, then in Paris as commissioner to the French government, to head up the effort. Benjamin and Davis realized that an official diplomat would be limited in blatantly political efforts. Thus, DeLeon was chosen to lead the propaganda effort, and a dispatch was sent to Slidell which first designated Slidell for the job, but a postscript from Benjamin informed Slidell of DeLeon's superior role in the matter of propaganda. "Thus," Charles P. Cullop wrote, "Benjamin planted one of the seeds of future discord between the two men." Nevertheless, this "scion of a prominent southern family, thus seemed well qualified for his new position. He would bring to the post of propaganda chief experience as a journalist, a diplomatic official, and as a traveler."[267]

Edwin DeLeon went to Europe in April 1862 as a special envoy to promote the South's cause with the French and British press, intelligentsia, and populace as well as their governments. A January 1863 letter from Benjamin to DeLeon refers to the funds sent to DeLeon as "secret service money." These accounts and vouchers were kept confidential, did not leave the department, and did not "pass through the Treasury books," Benjamin told DeLeon, and therefore DeLeon had to be scrupulous in providing receipts.[268] DeLeon states in his memoirs that at his own request, Davis and Benjamin "gave me full secret instructions, but did not label and advertise me."[269]

DeLeon returned to Europe in 1862 as a passenger once again on a "blockade-breaker," this time the Theodora sailing from Wilmington, North Carolina, for England. The captain gave him a cigar, and "out of bravado I lit mine; but must confess I never enjoyed my tobacco less." Chased and almost captured by a Union blockader, the captain "ground his unlit cigar to pulp between his teeth" before they made their escape.[270]

On the way to Europe, however, DeLeon made a serious error in judgment. He opened confidential diplomatic dispatches which had been entrusted to him to deliver to Confederate agents. One of the dispatches was intended only for Slidell and contained a proposal to offer the emperor of France a large bribe of cotton to break the blockade.[271]

When DeLeon arrived in England in June 1862, he went to see Lord Palmerston but was no more successful in his efforts to secure his support for the Confederacy than his predecessors had been. DeLeon was granted an interview with Palmerston through mutual friends. "Had you come to me, in any official character," the minister told DeLeon, "I must have declined seeing you … but as a private Southern gentleman and friend of Henry's [the grandson of Lady Palmerston], I am most happy to see and converse with you."[272]

DeLeon published a pamphlet titled "Three Letters from a South Carolinian Relating to Secession, Slavery and the Trent Case," in which he vigorously set forth the Southern position. He lambasted the views of Cassius M. Clay, Lincoln's minister to Russia, as reported in the Times: "Mr. Clay has drawn upon his imagination for his facts and figures," he argued, telling his readers that secession was now a "part of history; and never in the annals of mankind has such entire unanimity of sentiment and of action been manifested by any people as in the formation, deliberations, and action of the cotton States." He answered Clay's assertion that the "revolted States" could be subdued by military force by harking back to the Mexican War: "The bloody battle-fields of Mexico, where the South furnished about 45,000 and the North about 20,000 men, can attest to Southern valor and discipline…. The old watchword of the Jacobins in France's darkest day of blood and tears, 'Fraternite, ou la mort (Be my brother, or I will kill you!)' is now the rallying cry of the 'free North,' not of the South, who stands with drawn sword beside her own altars." The North, he wrote, would find it impossible to subjugate twelve million people who would fight to the death against their former allies, "now their most inveterate and unscrupulous enemies."

DeLeon soon found that Henry Hotze, a Confederate commercial agent sent to London by former Secretary of State Robert M. T. Hunter in November 1861, had accomplished much of what DeLeon thought needed to be done. Hotze had already created a well-organized propaganda operation, which included publication of a pro-Confederate weekly newspaper, the Index.[273]

Finding Confederate efforts to influence British public opinion under way, DeLeon departed for Paris. Once settled at the Hotel du Rhin at the Place Vendôme, he wrote a pamphlet titled La vérité sur des États Confédérés, complete with a picture of President Davis, a positive description of slavery, and the Confederacy's argument for its place in the family of nations. He sought out members of Emperor Louis-Napoléon's entourage and made valiant efforts to influence newspapers all over France, using his contacts from his days in Egypt. He reported back that his efforts, which involved the generous use of bribes and payments to journalists, were succeeding. Imitating Hotze's success in London, DeLeon made financial arrangements with the editor of the Paris Patrie, which became a pro-Confederate publication until funds ran out in 1864.[274]

DeLeon's mission succeeded in the limited sense that he got the Southern message out to the French people. But it failed because the French opposed slavery and their government had no reason to become involved in the war. "It is vain to tell them," DeLeon wrote Benjamin, "how utterly impracticable [emancipation of the slaves] must be, and that the Southern people never would consent to purchase recognition [by France] at the price of such a confession of wrong doing as it would imply."[275]

DeLeon made an enemy of the powerful Slidell when Slidell was given the dispatch DeLeon had carried with the seal broken. Slidell undermined DeLeon at every turn. He refused to give him any information or introduce him to those who could help him. He wrote critical letters to his old ally, Benjamin. DeLeon reacted in kind and accused Slidell of speculating in Confederate bonds. DeLeon began to express these opinions in letters to Davis, together with descriptions of the French as money-hungry, corrupt, and a "far more mercenary race than the English."[276]

Unfortunately for DeLeon, these letters came into enemy hands in November 1863 when they were thrown overboard from the Lady Davis.[277] The Union officer who seized them realized their value: "This paper is interesting," he wrote Gideon Welles, "and apparently of value, as it relates to the intrigues and disappointments of the rebel emissaries abroad." When DeLeon's letters were published in the New York Daily Tribune on November 16, 1863, Benjamin was enraged. He had had enough of DeLeon. "As a propagandist his usefulness was over with the publication of his criticism of the French," Frank Owsley concluded, "and his criticism of Slidell made it impossible for the Confederate government to maintain them both in France."[278]

DeLeon was notified of his dismissal in February 1864. He was angry and defensive and realized he had been outmaneuvered by Benjamin, a Slidell ally. DeLeon defended his actions. He was, he told the Secretary of State, the "confidential personal friend and correspondent" of President Davis and contended he was only doing his duty in giving Davis his frank opinions. He felt that "the gallio jade is not J. W. Slidell but one of the men [that is, Benjamin!] who surround the President at home."[279] He appealed directly to the president, but Benjamin prevailed.[280]

DeLeon did not return to the Confederacy. He realized his position was indefensible and that Benjamin had far more influence with Davis than he. In June 1864 he was still in Paris. DeLeon's failure was due to Benjamin and Slidell as well as "an inordinate personal ambition" and an exaggerated view of his friendship with Davis.[281]

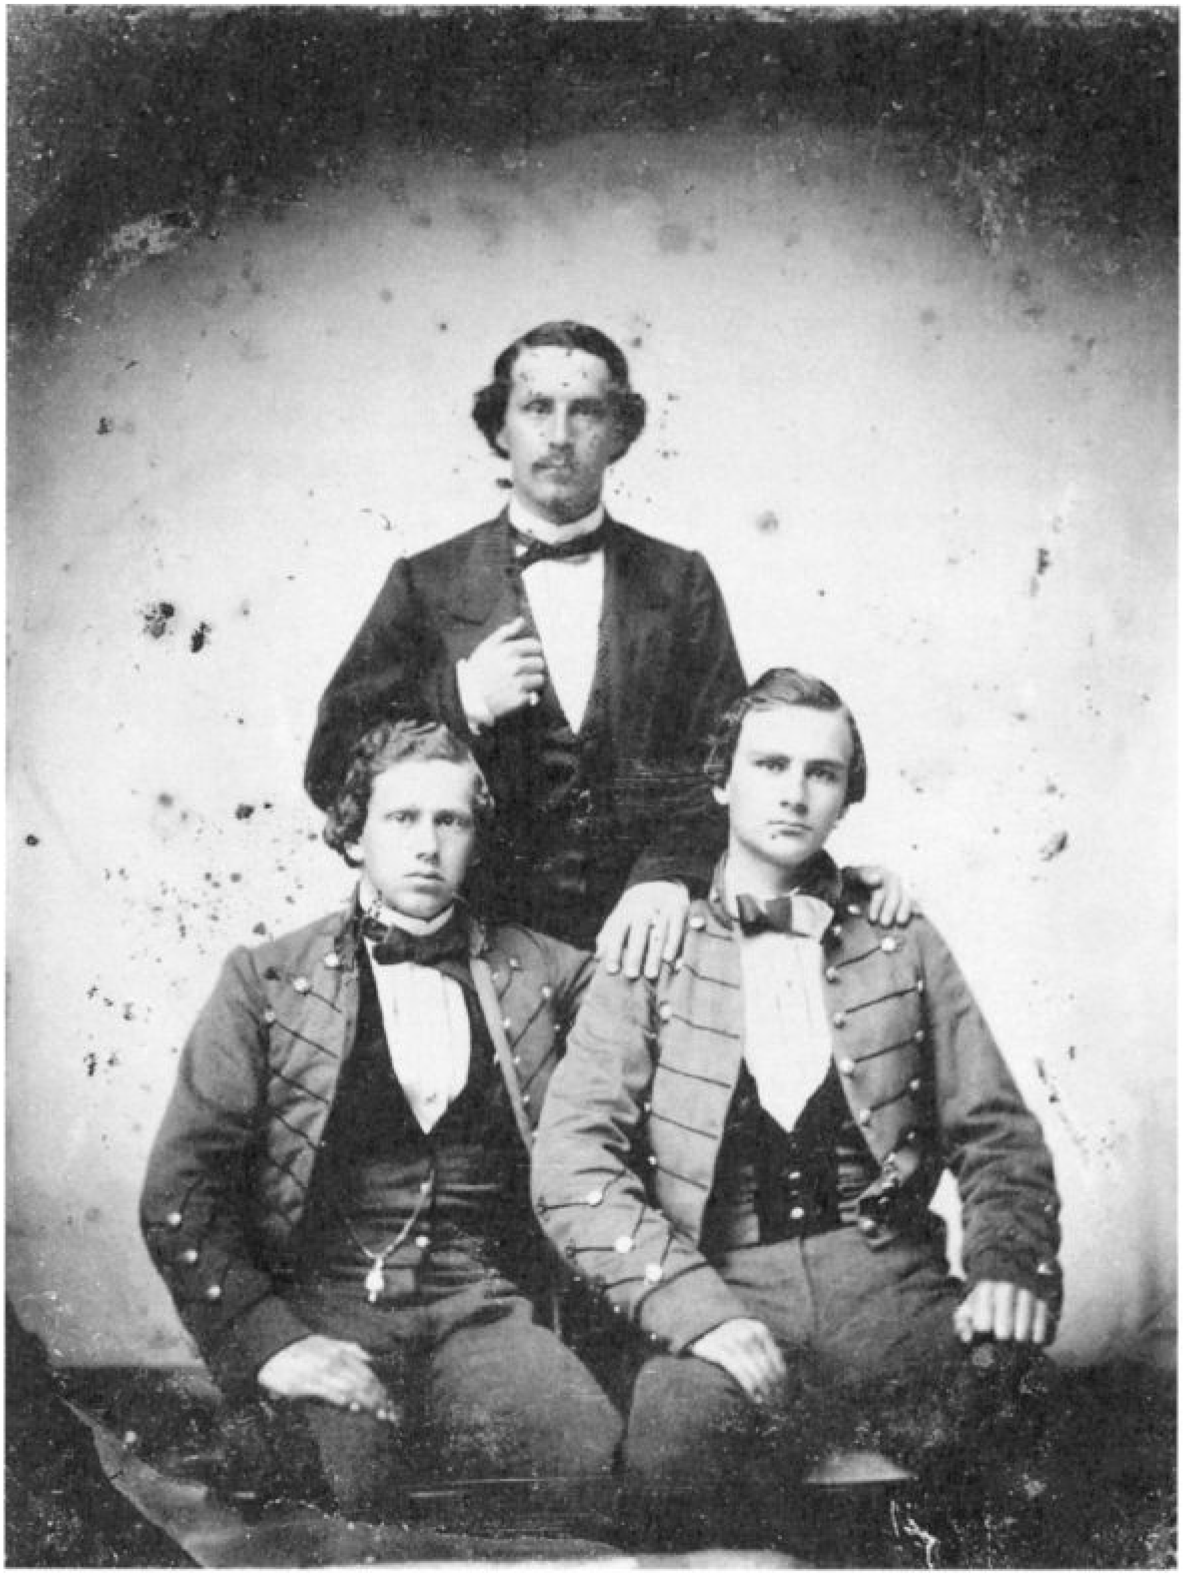
The South lost the flower of its young manhood in the Civil War. Its civilian population suffered grievously. It has been estimated that the Confederacy mobilized between 750,000 and 850,000 men and that 258,000 of them died on the battlefield or from disease. Another 200,000 were wounded.[282] "What had taken place," J. G. Randall and David Donald wrote, "was the collapse of a civilization."[283]

Southern Jewry also lost many a fine young officer to the cause. Hebrew officers and Israelite gentlemen were among the casualties. In addition to Col. Leon Marks, Lt. Albert Luria, Lt. Joseph Calhoun Levy, and Lt. Isaiah Jacobs, numerous other Jewish officers were killed. Capt. Madison A. Marcus of Company I, 15th Georgia, was wounded at Chickamauga and killed near Darbytown Road, Virginia, in October 1864.[284] Twenty-one-year-old 1st Lt. Will Meyer Wolf of Company G, 11th South Carolina, was killed defending Petersburg at Swift Creek, Virginia, May 9, 1864. "Although many and sad have been the casualties," his colonel wrote Wolf's father in Ridgeville, South Carolina, "few have been missed and more felt than that of your son…. I looked upon him as one of the most efficient, active and charming officers of his rank in my Regiment." Wolf was buried in a coffin procured by his company, and he was buried in "a patriot's grave on the battlefield upon which he fell."[285]



The Moses brothers of South Carolina. This photograph, which depicts Joshua Lazarus Moses (standing), Isaac Harby Moses (left), and Perry Moses (right), was taken at the beginning of the war. Perry is wearing his Citadel uniform. Josh Moses was killed at Fort Blakely near Mobile. Perry Moses survived the war, was active in the Confederate Veterans, and served as commandant of his camp in Sumter, South Carolina. He died in 1916. Isaac Harby Moses served as a private in the Citadel Cadet Rangers and was known as "Lord Shaftsbury" because of his scholarly style of writing. He saw action late in the war and survived. As to Isaac Harby Moses, see Gary R. Baker, Cadets in Gray (Columbia, S.C.: Palmetto Bookworks, 1989), 171, 199. (Courtesy of Anne F. Jennings of Charleston, South Carolina.)

One of the Jewish community's most poignant deaths was that of Lt. Joshua Lazarus Moses. One of five Moses brothers who served the Confederacy, Joshua attended the South Carolina Military Academy (the Citadel) in the late 1850s. He enlisted in the spring of 1861 in (Palmetto Guards) Company I, 2d South Carolina, and was wounded at First Manassas. He next served in the (Wilson Light Artillery), Company C, 3d (Palmetto) Battalion, and became a first lieutenant in January 1862. In April 1865 three Moses brothers, Perry, Joshua, and Jack (Andrew Jackson) were serving in the defense of Mobile. Perry was wounded. On April 2, the Union forces surrounded Fort Blakely as Confederate forces evacuated Richmond. Josh was killed in action at Fort Blakely near Mobile on the very day Lee surrendered at Appomattox, April 9, 1865. His last words were "For God's sake, spare my men, they have surrendered."[286]

"Josh Moses the flower of our circle was killed at Blakely," Eleanor Cohen wrote in her diary. He was "a noble man, another martyr to our glorious cause."[287] He lies buried in the Confederate Rest Section of Magnolia Cemetery in Mobile. The inscription on his monument reads:

He fired the last gun in defense of Mobile.

He fought for the cause from its birth and refusing to surrender gave his life to die with it.

Oh death where is Thy Sting?[288]

In 1868, Josh Moses's mother, Octavia Harby Moses, wrote a long poem "To My Dead Son, J. L. Moses, Killed at the Battle of Blakely, Ala." She was still an unreconstructed rebel:

Sleep sweetly in thy lonely grave,

my good, my beautiful, my brave, and honored thou, and happy I that thus my gallant son should die.[289]

Jewish Johnny Rebs

WE WILL NEVER KNOW the number of Jewish men who served in the Confederate armed forces. Neither Union nor Confederate armed services recorded men's religion; many Jewish communal records were lost or destroyed; and many Jews did not affiliate with their synagogues. Identifying Jews by their names is useful but uncertain. In the 1890s, Joseph Goldsmith, a Jewish arms contractor from Richmond, recalled a visit he and Rabbi Max Michelbacher had with Adj. Gen. Samuel Cooper to request furloughs for the Jewish boys for the 1864 High Holidays. General Cooper received his visitors kindly but declined their request for a general furlough. "Gentleman," he said, "look, we have here a roster of all our soldiers and we know, as far as possible from their names, how many of them belong to your religious denomination, and astonishing it is that we count about 10,000 to 12,000 Jews who are serving in our Army." Cooper felt that if he granted the furloughs, it would decimate certain commands in the field.[1]

There is little reason to doubt Goldsmith's recollection, although the numbers are clearly erroneous. Indeed, if the names men like Cooper thought were Jewish were totaled today from the list of more than one million Confederates, the number would be greater than twelve thousand. What was a Jewish-sounding name to nineteenth-century Americans? Most Americans believed that all German names were or could be Jewish names. For example, the Confederate secretary of the Treasury, Christopher G. Memminger, a German Protestant, was believed by many in both the North and the South to be Jewish. And there were thousands of recent German Jewish immigrants in the South. Thirty years after the war, Brig. Gen. Thomas N. Waul stated that Waul's Texas Legion contained two infantry companies with a large number of Jews. A roster of the Legion contains many German-sounding names which may or may not be Jewish, and Waul probably did not know the difference.[2]

In 1895 Simon Wolf, a prominent Jewish lawyer in Washington and national spokesman for Jewish causes, published a book, The American Jew As Patriot, Soldier and Citizen, in reply to anti-Semitic charges that Jews had not fought in the Civil War. He attempted to list every Jew who had served in the armed forces of the North and South as well as earlier wars. While his compilation is seriously flawed, it is the only one ever attempted. Wolf lists a total of 1,340 Jewish Confederates.[3] Given the gargantuan nature of the task, which even today is impossible, Wolf omitted hundreds and possibly thousands of names and included some with Jewish-sounding names who were not Jews. Carolyn LeMaster points out that "well over seventy Jewish Arkansans fought on the Confederate side," as opposed to Wolf's 52.[4] Eric Brock found 78 Jewish Confederate soldiers in Shreveport, but Wolf only lists 35. Booth's Records of Louisiana Confederate Soldiers lists a number of Jewish Rosenthals. Wolf lists none. Using Shreveport as an example, Wolf could have omitted a thousand Jewish Confederates. He likely had less connection with the newer German, Polish, and Russian Jewish communities of Louisiana, Texas, western Tennessee, and Mississippi than he had with the eastern states, and his count is therefore low.[5]

Pvt. Leon Fischel was drilling with the Tensas Cavalry Company, a state militia unit from Tensas Parish, Louisiana, as early as March 15, 1861. He enlisted for the war with his company at age twenty-seven in August at Memphis. The company became Company A, Wirt Adams's Confederate Cavalry Regiment (1st Mississippi Cavalry) in October. It later became Company A, 15th Louisiana Cavalry Battalion. The battalion was still later a part of the 3d (Isaac F. Harrison's) Louisiana Cavalry. According to family tradition, Fischel was a courier or aide to Gen. Albert Sidney

Johnston. (Courtesy of Bert Fischel, Dallas, Texas, and Frieda [Kline] Fischel, Vicksburg.)

It is possible that there were three thousand Jewish Confederate soldiers, although two thousand is a good estimate. Recordkeeping in the critical period of the 1860s in the South was unreliable. The Jewish immigrants of the 1850s and even the early 1860s (the first shot at Fort Sumter was in April 1861) were overwhelmingly single males who had come to America to seek their fortune first and marry later. These immigrants frequently lodged together or with a family. Thus, there was a disproportionately large percentage of young males in the Jewish population of 1861 compared to the general population and traditional demographics.

The typical Jewish soldier, like the typical Johnny Reb, served in the infantry. Wolfs 1895 list reflects this simple fact: Of the 1,340 men listed, 967 served in the infantry, 116 in the cavalry, 129 in the artillery, and 11 in the navy or marines. Rabbi Elzas's more precise list of Jewish South Carolinians shows 117 in the infantry of a total of 167 men. Ezekiel and Lichtenstein's The History of the Jews of Richmond list is consistent, showing approximately 70 of 100 in the infantry, as is Brock's Shreveport list.[6] There were Jewish Johnny Rebs in every aspect of the war. They were privates in infantry units all over the South and in every major campaign. They were cooks, sharpshooters, orderlies, teamsters, and foragers. They dug trenches, cut trees, guarded prisoners, and served on picket duty.

Solomon Solomon of New Orleans. A sutler with the 14th Louisiana and the 18th Mississippi, Solomon went to Virginia to sell merchandise. Soldiers needed basic supplies, food, cigars, and other items sold by sutlers. According to his letters home, Solomon was also in combat. (Courtesy of Alice Dale Cohan of Great Neck, New York.)

Most of the historical data about Jewish Confederate soldiers is contained in the letters, diaries, reminiscences, and biographies of well-known, powerful, and therefore much older men, such as Judah Benjamin or Raphael Moses. Yet the average Confederate soldier was in his twenties, and this was undoubtedly true of the Jewish Johnny Rebs. We know nearly nothing about most of these young men except their names and units, but there is information on enough men in the ranks to make some generalizations.[7]

The majority enlisted in companies in their home towns with men whom they knew, often fellow Jews. The young men who enlisted in the Confederate army, like soldiers at all times and places, preferred serving in units with their friends and relatives. Jewish Johnny Rebs were no exception. There were seven Rosenbalms in Company H of the 37th Virginia. Philip Rosenheim of the Richmond militia was proud of his service and his friends: "Charley Marx and David Mittledorfer, Julius Straus, Moses Hutzler, Sam and Herman Hirsh, Simon Sycles, Gus Thalheimer, Abr. Goldback and a good many other Yuhudim all belonged to the same company, which I did." Louis Merz came to LaGrange, Georgia, from Durkheim, Bavaria, in 1853, and when the war came he enlisted in the West Point Guards, Company D, 4th Georgia, with Isaac Heyman, Jacob Friesleben, Anselm Sterne, and Levi Stern. But unlike Irish and German immigrants and their sons, who formed ethnic companies, the Jews who fought in the Civil War did not form distinctively Jewish companies. The reason is obvious: Jews fervently desired to be seen as citizens of their state and nation, not as a separate nationality. They had no desire to stand out as a group as they had been forced to do in Europe. Unlike the Irish, who also wanted to be seen as equal citizens, the Jews had been forced to live in ghettos in Europe, and true equality to them meant belonging to the general population. Judaism was a religion, not a nationality, and Jews did not want to be seen as a separate nationality. Their mission, therefore, was the exact opposite of other ethnic groups, such as the Irish, who took pride in their ethnic organizations. Jewish soldiers sought to prove that they could be like everyone else. They avoided anything smacking of the ghetto. There were no Catholic or Lutheran units in the Confederate army, and, therefore, there would be no Jewish units. In addition, as a practical matter, there were few wealthy Jewish men with the military background and political influence needed to organize a company of troops. Unlike a Moise of South Carolina or a Hyams of Louisiana, the majority of Jewish Confederates were recent young immigrants. They were followers, comrades-in-arms, not leaders.[8]

The story has been told that there were two Jewish companies in the Confederate army, both from Georgia. One was supposed to have been organized at West Point, Georgia, at the start of the war and the other at Macon in 1862 for the purpose of defending Savannah.[9] But the story is not verifiable. A history of Macon Jewry by Rabbi Newton J. Friedman discounts the Macon company story, and Louis Merz, a Jewish Confederate, states that the Jewish men of West Point enlisted in the West Point Guards. Thirteen Jewish Confederates served in the Macon German Artillery, a home guard unit.

Nevertheless, there were units with many Jews in them. Because Louisiana had the largest Jewish population, it was natural that the closest thing to a “Jewish Company” was Company K, 11th Louisiana Infantry, “The Shreveport Rebels” of Caddo Parish. Doubtless, the influential Hyams family had a hand in raising the company and the regiment. Its second lieutenant was Isaac R. Hyams.[10] Other Shreveport Jews served in Companies E, F, and I, 3d Louisiana. Samuel Meyers Hyams was lieutenant colonel of the 3d Louisiana and helped raise the regiment. J. B. P. (“Pink”) Hyams served with Company E and was wounded at Iuka and captured at Vicksburg, as was Pvt. David March with Company I. Julius A. Jacob served in Company F of the 3d Louisiana. The 1st Georgia contained many Jews from Savannah, including seven Cohens and four Levys.[11]

Lewis Leon’s first company, the Charlotte Grays, Company C, 1st N.C. Volunteer Infantry, included 1st Lt. E. B. Cohen, Cpl. George Wolffe, and privates Jonas Engle, John R. Israel, Jacob Katz, I. C. Levi, Jacob Leopold, Sam Oppenheim, and two Wolfes in addition to Leon. His second unit, Company B, 53d North Carolina, included J. Eigenbunn, Jonas Engal, Sgt. Maj. Aaron Katz, three Markses, and Cpl. Henry Wertheim.[12] Leon spent much of his leave time with his brother Morris Leon, originally in Company I, 44th Georgia. By May 1863, the Leon brothers’ regiments were assigned in brigades in Rodes’s Division of Ewell’s corps.[13]

The majority of Jewish Confederates served as privates or corporals in the infantry, but there were Jews in all branches of the service and in all departments. In Wolfs listing for Alabama, for example, 105 served in the infantry and 21 in the cavalry. His Arkansas list shows almost as many cavalry as infantry. Texas had 73 Jewish infantrymen and 21 cavalrymen. As the Jews went west, they apparently rode horseback more often and tended to live in small towns. One requirement of a cavalry soldier was to provide his own mount (for which he was paid sixty cents per day).[14]

Leopold Levy and his brother Sampson served in Company G, 1st Virginia Cavalry. A third brother, Solomon, was in Company C, 23d Virginia. Leopold, a native of Altenstadt, Bavaria, had married a landsman (fellow citizen of the same country), Rosena Hutzler of Richmond. Her parents, Abraham and Yetta Hutzler, had emigrated from Hagenbach, Bavaria. They lived in Amelia County and operated a general merchandise business. Leopold was a member of the Amelia County Troop before the war. It became part of the 1st Regiment of Cavalry commanded by Col. J. E. B. Stuart and remained in his commands as he was promoted.

Emanuel Gerst, another immigrant from Bavaria, joined Company G, 6th Virginia Cavalry Regiment. Gerst was twenty-six when he became a citizen of the United States at Williamsburg in 1845. His brother Julius was a merchant or peddler living in Richmond. Emanuel married a Gentile, Mary W. Cunningham, who owned a large plantation, “Glenmary,” on the Dan River in Halifax County. Emanuel remained a lifelong member of the German synagogue in Richmond, Beth Ahabahh. He served as a sergeant in the 6th Virginia from the fall of 1861 to 1863. His unit initially served in Manassas and acted as a screen to delay the expected Federal invasion from Washington. In his forties, Gerst became ill during the war and was forced to return home, where he likely joined the home guard. He hired a substitute to replace him in the ranks.[15]

Jacob Holberg left his German homeland at age nineteen. Beginning as a peddler, he established a small store in Macon, Mississippi. In 1861 he enlisted in Company G, 1st Mississippi Cavalry, and served four years, being promoted to sergeant. According to family tradition and at least one memoir, Leon and Sam Fischel from Alsace-Lorraine served in the 15th Louisiana Cavalry Battalion. Leon Fischel was drilling with the Tensas Parish Cavalry, a state militia unit, as early as March 15, 1861. He enlisted for the war at age twenty-seven in August 1861 at Memphis. The Tensas Cavalry became Company A, Wirt Adams’s Confederate Cavalry Regiment (also known as the 1st Mississippi and Wood’s Confederate Cavalry) in October 1861. The company later became Company A of the 15th Louisiana Cavalry Battalion. Leon Fischel was an aide to Gen. Albert Sidney Johnston at Shiloh, according to Jews in Early Mississippi. The Fischels lived in Vicksburg, and after the war Leon named his son Albert Sidney Johnston Fischel.[16]

Jews also served in artillery units such as the Washington Artillery of New Orleans. Wolf’s list for Texas shows five artillerymen; five for Alabama; and eight for Arkansas. Both Edwin Kursheedt and Eugene Henry Levy served in the artillery. Marx Cohen and Gustavus A. Cohen served in James F. Hart’s Company (Washington Artillery, South Carolina), initially a part of Hampton’s Legion, as did five other South Carolina Cohens. Young Marx E. Cohen was killed as General Johnston made a final stand against Sherman at Bentonville. Perry Moses of Sumter served in a number of units, including Culpepper’s Battery. In 1863, he was in charge of a twelve-pound Napoleon. “I fought a battery of four guns for over an hour,” he wrote his mother, Octavia Harby Moses, in 1863, “giving them gun for gun.”[17]

Some Jewish Johnny Rebs served in the local militia or home guards, which were organized for local self-defense. At the beginning of the war, many men who did not want to leave home or serve in the regular army joined the militia. As the war progressed and conscription instituted, the home guards consisted of those too young, too old, or too infirm to serve, as well as those exempt by virtue of their occupations or political office. Philip Rosenheim of Richmond was a youngster who served in the local militia in the summer of 1863, when Richmond was under attack. Mayor Joseph C. Mayo issued a broadsides warning of the approach of the Union army: "TO ARMS! REMEMBER NEW ORLEANS! Richmond is now in your hands. Let it not fall under the rule of another BUTLER."[18] Philip and others responded, "I, as well as all the Boys rallied to the call and we stood firmly at our Flag ready to meet the foe," he wrote his sister and brother-in-law, Amelia and Isaac Meinnart. "We were held in readiness and we drilled every afternoon from 4 til 7 in the square and our orders were at the Toll of the Bells to meet promptly at our places of Rendevous." Philip was moved by the mayor's plea, as were others, "as old men with grey locks, whitened from the frosts of many winters, came forth with their muskets, ready at any moment to drive the foe from our glorious city."[19]

Like their fellow Johnny Rebs, many Jewish Confederate soldiers were anxious to enlist when the war began, believing that the war would be short and they did not want to miss it. This was a widespread Southern belief. Sen. James Chesnut told one Charlestonian "there will be no war…. I will drink all the blood shed in the war."[20]

Albert Luria of Columbus, Georgia, enlisted within a week of the firing on Fort Sumter, as did the sons of the old established families who were expected to lead the way.[21]

Octavus S. Cohen was the son of Octavus and Henrietta Levy Cohen, members of Mikve Israel and Savannah society. (Young Octavus's mother, Henrietta, was the sister of Phoebe Yates Levy Pember and Eugenia Levy Phillips.) His father was a wealthy and distinguished commission merchant and cotton exporter with offices on Bay Street. When the war began, Octavus was a volunteer in the Savannah Artillery, a state unit, then a volunteer artillery instructor, and, finally, a volunteer aide-de-camp to Brig. Gen. William D. Smith, before he even enlisted as a private. Meanwhile, the elder Cohen and other family members attempted to secure a cadetship in the Confederate army for his son, who was only seventeen years old. (The elder Octavus served briefly as a major and quartermaster in the Georgia State Troops, but was unsuccessful in obtaining a commission in the Confederate army. G. B. Lamar wrote to George Randolph, the secretary of war, "His being an Israelite should be no objection—he has lived long in this community.")[22] Octavus Cohen's cousin, Frederick Myers, like Cohen, joined Captain Claghorn's Artillery Company (Chatham Artillery) of the 1st (Olmstead's) Georgia Infantry. He remained with it when it became Captain Weaton's Chatham Artillery Battery with the reorganization of the 1st Georgia into strictly an infantry regiment in late 1862.[23]

The Moses family had been in South Carolina for a hundred years by 1860. Their ancestors had arrived from Barbados before the Revolution, and the founding father, the colonial merchant Myer Moses, had served as a private in Bentham's Company of Militia in the American Revolution. The Moses boys from Sumter, South Carolina, joined Company D, 2d South Carolina Infantry. Henry Claremont Moses enlisted as a private on April 8, 1861; his brother Meyer B. Moses enlisted the next day; Joshua and Perry Moses both enlisted as privates on May 1. Henry was wounded at First Manassas, was discharged in October 1861, reenlisted in Company B, 15th (Lucas's) South Carolina Artillery Battalion as a lieutenant in December, and assisted in the construction of fortifications in Charleston harbor. Meyer, who rose to the rank of quartermaster sergeant, was wounded at Fredericksburg, captured at Cedar Creek, and sent to Point Lookout Prison.[24]

Leading Jewish Richmonders had been members of the Richmond Light Infantry Blues for generations. The unit participated in quelling the Gabriel slave revolt in 1800 and was called into service in 1807, when the British man-of-war Leopard attacked the Chesapeake off Norfolk. Thus, when the Richmond Blues left the city for the war on April 24, 1861, fifteen of its ninety-nine members were Jewish, including Ezekiel J. ("Zeke") Levy, fourth sergeant; Henry Adler, Bernard Goldstein, Abraham Isaacs, Thomas W. Lyon, William Lovenstein, Joseph Levy, Lewis and Calvin Myers, Hugo

Plaut, Henry Rosenheim, Jacob Semon, Joseph Schoenthal, Jacob Son, and Levi Wasserman. The Blues, now in Confederate services as Company A, 46th Virginia, served in West Virginia and saw combat at Roanoke Island in February 1862. "Soon a ball [bullet] came from the Yankees," the company's record states, and "one of our boys, Mr. L. Wasserman, replied." Henry Adler was mortally wounded. Isaacs, Lyon, Levi Wasserman, and Joseph Levy were captured. They were exchanged in August. Adler, after suffering a great deal from his wounds, died at the naval hospital in Portsmouth and was buried by the Blues, who turned out en masse to honor their first private killed in the war. The Blues served throughout the war in Virginia, North Carolina, in the defense of Charleston, and later in the defense of Richmond and Petersburg. They fought to the end at Appomattox. In June 1864, the Blues' captain killed and first lieutenant wounded, Lt. Ezekiel J. Levy became commanding officer.[25]

The Richmond Grays, Company A of the 1st Virginia Volunteers (later Company G of the 12th), also contained a number of Jewish soldiers, including Ellis Ellis, Herman Hirsh, Isadore Lovenstein, Ezekiel M. Ezekiel, Philip Whitlock, and Simon Rosenfels or Rosenfield. The company was called into service in 1859, before the war began. It was ordered to Harpers Ferry to help capture John Brown, who had seized the arsenal there and taken two local planters as hostages, including Lewis Washington, a great-grandnephew of the first president. Later, it went to Charlestown, Virginia, to witness Brown's hanging. When the war began, the Grays went to Norfolk on detached service, where they became part of the 12th Virginia.[26] The Jewish boys were the sons of Jewish merchants in downtown Richmond. Rosenfield's father had a store on Seventeenth Street opposite the old market. (He later obtained a substitute and left the army.) Marx Myers was killed in action early in the war. Herman Hirsh was the son of Abram Hirsh, who kept a dry goods store on Broad Street.[27]

Myer Angle, the first president of Beth Ahabah, had six sons in the Confederate army: James Beale, Company D, 1st Virginia, who "took part in the immortal charge [presumably Pickett's charge] at Gettysburg" and was wounded; Joseph, of the Richmond Blues, who was killed in battle; Meyer, who enlisted in April 1861, in Company A, 12th Virginia, and was captured at Sayler's Creek; Montrose, who served in the Richmond Fayette Artillery, Company I, 1st Virginia Artillery; Benjamin M., in the Home Guard; and Solomon, with Company E, 23d Virginia. Three Levy brothers of Richmond served: Leopold and Samson, with the Amelia Troop (Company G) of the 1st Virginia Cavalry, and Solomon, who died of wounds, in Company C, 23d Virginia.[28]

The Myers brothers of Richmond. This wartime photograph shows Herman Myers (right), Isidore (left), and Marx Myers (center). All of the brothers served in the Confederate army. Marx served in Company A, 1st Virginia, and Company G, 12th Virginia (Richmond Grays). He was killed at Manassas. (Courtesy of the Beth Ahabah Museum and Archives, Richmond.)

Eugene Henry Levy of New Orleans was born in Grand Gulf, Mississippi, in 1840. His father, like many acculturated Louisiana Jews, was born in Charleston and moved first to Mississippi and then to Louisiana. His ancestors were English Sephardim, and one was a Captain Lazarus, who fought in the American Revolution. Eugene's mother was a Marks from Philadelphia. Eugene was quite literate and graduated from the University of Louisiana with honors. The Levys had three sons who fought for the Confederacy: Eugene Henry Levy in Company C, 1st Louisiana Battalion (Rightor's) and the Donaldsonville Artillery; Julian H. "Doc" Levy in the Donaldsonville Artillery; and

Joseph Calhoun Levy in Company C, 1st Louisiana Battalion, then in the 1st Louisiana Regulars (Strawbridge's), who was killed at Shiloh.[29]

Young Jewish boys, like youths throughout the South, attempted to enlist even if they were too young to serve. Fifteen-year-old Isaac Cohen of Richmond enlisted one evening, and, early the next morning, his father found his new uniform and musket and promptly returned them to the recruiting officer. Cohen said later he had the shortest term of service on record: two hours and a half. Simon Sycle of Richmond enlisted, but he was underage and his father withdrew him from the army. On his way back to school in Baltimore, he was arrested as a spy and sent to prison. Augustus Smith enlisted upon the last call of the authorities in 1865 at the age of sixteen.[30]

Moses Jacob Ezekiel, a Sephardic Jew, the fifth of fourteen children of modest merchant parents, grew up in a Richmond neighborhood where whites and blacks and Jews and Christians "were all jumbled together." When the war began, young thirteen-year-old Moses, along with all the little boys in Richmond, "howled and jumped for joy." He was so enthusiastic that he begged his grandparents to let him go to the Virginia Military Institute (VMI) so that he could somehow get into the war. "Mose" Ezekiel was one of the first Jewish cadets to attend VMI. A fellow cadet said that Ezekiel "never could chisel himself into a pretty soldier… he looked like a tin soldier that had been broken in the middle and mended with sealing wax. There was but one worse soldier than myself in the world, and that was Ezekiel."[31]

According to Charles W. Joyner, the Jews of Georgetown, South Carolina, contributed a number of men to Confederate service during the Civil War. The Emanuel family sent at least four men into the service. Maj. W. P. Emanuel commanded the 12th Cavalry Battalion, which later formed part of the 4th S.C. Cavalry. Edwin C. Emanuel, a butcher and sergeant in Company A, 10th S.C. Infantry, died of fever in Oxford, Mississippi, in the summer of 1862. His nephew, eighteen-year-old Pvt. Washington Emanuel, served in the same company and was wounded in the Battle of Atlanta in the summer of 1864. His arm was amputated and he later died. Solomon ("Sol") Emanuel, Washington's older brother, also enlisted in the same company and served throughout the war as a private in the infantry and as clerk to Lt. Col. Cornelius Irvine Walker. He fought at Corinth, Mississippi, in 1862 after Beauregard's retreat from Shiloh, in the Kentucky and Tennessee (Murfreesboro, Chickamauga, Missionary Ridge) campaigns and in the bloody battles around Atlanta in 1864. He was admitted to the hospital in January 1865, but when his regiment was ordered back east to resist Sherman's march through his native state, "Sol hobbled out and took his place in ranks."[32]

Haiman Kaminski immigrated to Charleston from Posen, Prussia, in 1854 at the age of fifteen and moved to Conwayboro, near Georgetown, two years later. He was working as a clerk in Elkan Baum's store when the war began. Like many of the men of the Georgetown area, Kaminski enlisted in the 10th South Carolina in the spring of 1861. He was promoted to sergeant and served as a commissary until his surrender at Greensboro. Sol Emanuel, who would go into business with Kaminski after the war, was clerking in his father's dry goods and general merchandise business when the war came.[33]

Young German Jewish recruits swelled the Confederate ranks, as did a substantial number of Polish and Eastern European Jews as well. Marcus Baum, a native of Schwersenz, Prussia, moved to Camden, South Carolina, just before the war and enlisted in Company E, 2d South Carolina, in July 1861, although as a foreigner he was exempt from military service. Two Oppenheim brothers, Edwin and Henry H., also enlisted in Company K, 2d South Carolina on May 12, 1861. They would later serve along with Sgt. Julius H. Oppenheim in Company B, 17th S.C. Cavalry Battalion. Levi Wasserman, a clerk in Isaac Robinson's store in Petersburg before the war, was the first member of the Richmond Light Infantry Blues to fire a shot in battle. The Jews of Petersburg, Virginia, twenty-one miles south of Richmond, enlisted many in the local Petersburg Grays, 12th Virginia. Virtually all of these men were immigrants from either England or one of the German states. Mark E. Kull, whose father, Jacob, immigrated from Germany, enlisted as a private within days of the firing on Fort Sumter. Aaron S. and Isadore Reinach, H. Seligman, and Uriah Feibelman served in the Grays. Aaron Kadden of Petersburg served in the 10th Virginia Cavalry; Alexander Myers was a private in the Confederate Guards, 9th Virginia, Pickett's division, Longstreet's corps; Simon Frankenthall and Jonas Weinburg served in Company B, 1st Virginia.[34]

The smaller communities of Virginia also furnished German Jewish immigrants to the Confederate cause. Max Guggenheimer, born in Bavaria, arrived in Lynchburg in Southwest Virginia in 1856 to study English and to visit his relatives who had settled there in 1838. He stayed, and at the age of nineteen enlisted in Company G, 11th Virginia. A cousin, Maurice Guggenheimer, served in the 2d Virginia Cavalry throughout the war. Henry Gintzberger, a peddler and a recent immigrant, arrived in Salem, Virginia, in 1860. He enlisted in the Salem Flying Artillery, which was the 1st Company A, 9th Virginia.[35] Twenty years old, Isaac Hirsh came to Fredericksburg, Virginia, in 1860. His parents had brought the family to America from Baden in 1856. They lived in New Haven and Baltimore before moving to Spotsylvania County just before the war started. In May, Isaac joined Company A, 30th Virginia and saw action.[36]

Jews from small towns in Texas, Arkansas, and Mississippi, mostly German and Polish immigrants, were no less patriotic than their eastern co-religionists and flocked to the Confederate banner. Mississippian Max Frauenthal enlisted as a private in Company A, 16th Mississippi, as a drummer. He was joined by Jews from Natchez and Woodville, which was called “Little Jerusalem” because of its large Jewish population. Solomon and Mike Loeb joined the Wilkinson Rifles (Company K, 16th Mississippi). Joseph Kohn and F. Rosenberg joined the Wilkinson Guards (Company D, 38th Mississippi), and brothers John Cline and Henry Cline joined the Hurricane Rifles (Company E, 21st Mississippi). The smallest towns of Mississippi contributed Jewish Confederates. Sampson Weiner from Heinsheim, Baden, married a fellow passenger Caroline Forscheimer aboard the boat bringing them to America in 1852. They settled in Canton. Weiner served in Company A, 1st Mississippi Cavalry and had several horses shot out from under him, according to family legend. In the 1850s Ferdinand Krauss from Leimersheim, Rhein Pfalz, Germany, settled in Fayette, halfway between Natchez and Port Gibson. He served in Claiborne Guards, Company H, 12th Mississippi, and was wounded at Seven Pines. Isadore Moise of Portigny served in Company A, 16th Mississippi, with Max Frauenthal. Emanuel Levy of Buchsweiler joined Company A, 14th Mississippi Partisan Rangers Cavalry Battalion. Both were from Alsace-Lorraine and immigrated to Summit, Mississippi. They both served as privates.[37]

The same was true of the German Jewish immigrants to Arkansas. There were nearly two hundred Jewish merchants in the state in 1860. More than a third of them served the Confederacy. David Felsenthal of Camden, Arkansas, closed his business, lost his investment, and enlisted in Captain Purifoy’s Company B, 15th (Johnson’s) Arkansas. He was captured at Fort Donelson. Brothers Ferdinand, Isaac, and David Gates of Hickory Plains joined the army. Isaac Gates, like many other Jewish Confederates, served as a quartermaster and commissary. Isaac was wounded at Chattanooga and Murfreesboro. Other brothers from Arkansas, David and Samuel Bluthenthal, served in the Company K, 9th Arkansas, and Company G, 3d Arkansas Cavalry, respectively. Three Gans brothers—Morris, Jacob, and Simon—fought, as did Peter, Jacob, and Pool Cohen. Isaac Hirst of Pocahontas fought in numerous battles in Company A, 7th Arkansas, and was badly wounded in 1864. According to Dr. Junius N. Bragg, Sam Winter of Camden, who was in Company K, 6th Arkansas, was “one of the bravest Confederate soldiers I ever knew. He would walk without hesitation to the mouth of a cannon if ordered to do so.” At least two Arkansas Jewish Confederates were killed: Isaac Burgauer in 1863 and Julius H. Levy of Company A, 6th Arkansas at Shiloh.[38] According to Eli Evans, Pvt. Isaac Gleitzman received the Cross of Honor for “conspicuous gallantry in the field,” but he was prouder of never having eaten any nonkosher food, or “trefa.”[39]

Benedict (“Ben”) Oppenheimer from Tennessee had the distinction of being one of a few deaf men who enlisted in either army. According to family tradition, Oppenheimer was born in 1827 and was deaf from the age of two as a result of scarlet fever. His father died, and he and his mother immigrated from a small town in Alsace-Lorraine to Cincinnati. Ben's mother died, and he went to live with his brother in Trenton, Tennessee. When the war began, young Ben tried to enlist in various Confederate units, but they would not have him because of his disability. Ben then ran away from home to join the army and was "a gallant soldier in the Confederate Army and was in 11 separate engagements."[40] Oppenheimer's great-niece recalled that he used to tell her in sign language or with pencil and paper some of his many experiences. The only way he would know that the enemy cannons were firing was when he would see a comrade on his right or left fall from his horse or see the horse shot out from under him. He told of how the company always picked him to fire the cannon because he was deaf anyway and it did not hurt his ears.[41]

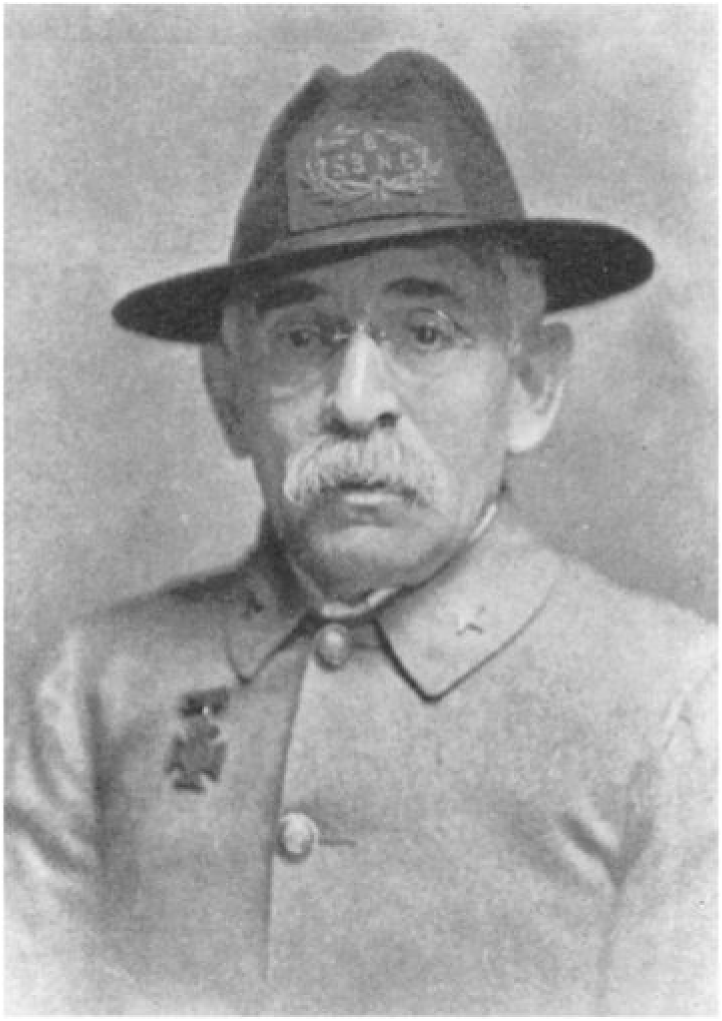
Jacob Samuels of Fort Worth enlisted in June 1861 in a mounted company of the Texas State Troops, the Tarrant County Rifles. He later served in Capt. J. C. Terrell's Company F, Waller's 13th Battalion, Texas Cavalry. His friends Bero Berliner and John S. Hirchfield joined the same company. Samuels was born in Warsaw in 1836, a subject of the Russian czar and a resident of a ghetto where he and fellow Jews were strictly controlled by a hostile government. He declined the invitation to remain a third-class citizen of Russian Poland and left for America in 1847 at the age of eleven. He likely arrived in New Orleans, like many a young Jewish immigrant with only the clothes on his back, willing to risk everything for a chance to breathe the free air of America. He worked as a peddler and, at some point in the 1850s, moved to Fort Worth, Texas, where he went into general merchandising with Bero B. Berliner.[42]

Samuels's company saw action in Louisiana throughout 1862, defending Louisiana and east Texas from the invading Union army and navy. In April 1863 the Confederates under Brig. Gen. Alfred Mouton successfully defended Fort Bisland against the Union army near Morganza, Louisiana. In June, Samuels and his comrades were engaged in vicious combat in and around Bayou Teche near Pattersonville to the west of Brashear City. Samuels was with Maj. Hannibal H. Boone when he was shot and lost his arm. Samuels saw action at the Battles of Mansfield and Pleasant Hill in April 1864, where Maj. Gen. Richard Taylor's troops held back the Union advance.[43]

Shreveport, Louisiana, in 1860 is a striking portrait of the Southern Jewish immigrant's contribution to Confederate military service. Eric J. Brock has estimated that three hundred Jews lived in Shreveport in 1860 and that seventy-eight served in the Confederate armed forces. Almost all of them were recent immigrants who arrived in Louisiana in the 1850s. Most, like Marx Baer, were born in one of the German states or Alsace-Lorraine. David March of Company I, 3d Louisiana, was from Hechingen; Pvt. Henry Simon, Company K, 11th Louisiana, from Sausenheim, Bavaria; Abraham Sour of Company A, 8th Louisiana Cavalry, Leona, Germany; Marx Blum of the Donaldsonville Artillery, Sam and Nathan Weil, and the Dreyfusses from Alsace. Some were from

Poland: Jack Citron, Company I, 3d Louisiana, from Koval; and Jacob Gall, Company D, 19th Louisiana, from Meschisko. And some were from France: Marx Israel of Company 5, 3d Regiment, European Brigade, Onepie, near Metz; and Gottlieb Blum of the Company F, 3d Louisiana, Hatte, Elsas.[44]



Pvt. Lewis Leon as an older man. Leon was a German immigrant whose parents and a few siblings lived in New York City. He and his brother Morris lived in the South and fought for the Confederacy. Leon first enlisted in the 1st North Carolina Vounteers and later became a sharpshooter in the 53d North Carolina State Troops. He fought throughout the war with the Army of Northern Virginia and was captured at the Wilderness. (Author's collection, Diary of a Tar Heel Confederate, 1913.)

The wartime experiences of Jewish Johnny Rebs are illustrated by three men: Lewis Leon of Charlotte, North Carolina; Isaac Hermann of Washington County, Georgia; and Eugene Henry Levy of New Orleans. Leon and Hermann were immigrants. Leon had emigrated from one of the German states with his family. His father was a peddler in New York City, and Lewis and his brother Morris had left their parents, brothers, sisters, and their home on Norfolk Street on the Lower East Side in the late 1850s to seek their fortunes in the South. Lewis went to Charlotte and Morris to Georgia. Lewis worked as a clerk in a dry goods store. “Ike” Hermann had just come to America in 1859 from France. He worked in a store in rural Georgia. Eugene Henry Levy was an acculturated Sephardic Jew from Louisiana whose South Carolina ancestors included at least one Revolutionary War soldier and a grandfather who came to Charleston from Jamaica in the early 1800s.[45]

Lewis Leon was a nineteen-year-old clerk, five feet and four and a half inches tall, with a ruddy complexion and dark eyes. He enlisted on April 20, 1861, in Raleigh, and his company, the Charlotte Grays, seized the Branch Mint in Charlotte the same day. The Grays were mustered into state service for six months as Company C of the 1st N.C. Volunteer Infantry in May. The regiment was in the thick of the fighting at the first major engagement of the war at Big Bethel, Virginia, on June 10. In August, they were mustered into Confederate service at Ship Point, Virginia, for the balance of their six-month enlistment.[46]

Leon described his first months in the Confederate army in much the same way as a young college student might describe his first six months away from home: travel, girls, bad food, and some unpleasant work. Like all Johnny Rebs, Leon quickly discovered that war was unglamorous. His first tasks were digging ditches and cutting down trees, neither of which he could do very well. "Why, of course, I never thought that this was work for soldiers to do, but we had to do it…. I know I never had a pick or a shovel in my hand to work with in my life." While Leon was attempting to cut down a tree, his lieutenant, "seeing how nice I was marking it," asked him what he had done before becoming a soldier. "I told him I was a clerk in a dry-goods store. He said he thought so from the way I was cutting timber." Leon was then told to bring buckets of water to the men who could cut. But he quickly learned why digging breastworks was important: "If it had not been for them many of us would not be here now." Even though they had to sleep in horse stables, Leon and his comrades did not care. "They didn't even give us a looking-glass," he joked.[47]

Leon remained with his company for the six months, but after it returned to Charlotte to be mustered out; he did not rejoin when it was reorganized in the 11th North Carolina State Troops. Instead, five months later, on April 24, 1862, now twenty years old, he joined Company B, 53d North Carolina State Troops, for the duration of the war. His brother Morris enlisted on March 4, 1862, at Madison, Georgia, "for three years or the war." His unit, the 44th Georgia, arrived in Virginia just after the Battle of Seven Pines in the summer of 1862.[48]

Leon's regiment saw action all around North Carolina: at the Battle of Deep Gully, Weldon, and the Siege of Washington, North Carolina. He served in Virginia in the early defenses around Richmond and Petersburg; at Drewry's Bluff, Suffolk, Smithfield, the Blue Ridge, Warrington Springs, and Bristoe Station; and at Beverly Ford in support of J. E. B. Stuart. His unit was assigned to Daniel's brigade from 1862 to 1864 and Grimes's from 1864 to surrender. The 53d, while Leon was present, was with Lee at Gettysburg, the retreat from Pennsylvania, Mine Run, and the Wilderness.[49]

Even in the early days of the war, Pvt. Lewis Leon heard the "long roll"—the drumbeat for soldiers to wake up at 2 or 3 a.m.—fell into line at daybreak, got into the line of battle, and fought for hours, even days, in the sweltering heat and freezing cold. He and his comrades were shelled by Union artillery for days and weeks at a time. He volunteered for perilous service: going near the Yankee line as a scout and volunteering as a sharpshooter or as a skirmisher, whose job it was to go in the front of the line of infantry in battle and reconnoiter and "engage the enemy until a general engagement, then we fall in line with [the] balance of the army." Leon charged with his fellow skirmishers, giving the famous Rebel yell. He became a proficient marksman. “I hit a bull’s-eye to-day,” he noted proudly in April 1864.[50]

Johnny Rebs idolized Robert E. Lee, and Jewish boys were no exception. Lewis Leon referred to him reverently as “our father.” He saw a lot of Lee as a soldier in the Army of Northern Virginia. He was concerned about Lee’s health in May 1863. At a review, he observed a great change in Lee’s appearance from the last time he saw him at Yorktown in 1861. “Then his hair was black. Now he is a gray-headed old man.” He admired Lee’s courage: “our father, Lee, was scarcely ever out of sight when there was danger. We could not feel gloomy when we saw his old gray head uncovered as he would pass us on the march, or be with us in a fight. I care not how weary or hungry we were, when we saw him we gave that Rebel yell, and hunger and wounds would be forgotten.” On another occasion on a freezing cold winter day, when Leon was working in a sawmill, he and his detail saw Lee ride by with his daughter. Soon after a courier appeared and gave the men some woolen socks and gloves from the general’s daughter. Leon believed Lee to be a very great general. The Union won, in his view, only because of greater resources and more men. “If General Lee only had half their men,” he wrote in May 1864, “and those men were rebels, we would go to Washington in two weeks.”[51] Like many Southerners, particularly those in the army, Pvt. Simon Mayer, even though fighting in the Army of Tennessee, believed in April 1864 that the South would win the war because of Lee’s leadership. “I doubt not but that ere this reaches you, the victorious shouts of Lee's invincible heroes will be reverberated throughout the length & breadth of our land." He looked forward to the next battle, which he and his comrades believed would be "a second Chickamauga. … All looks bright & glowing, and soon we hope to be gathered under 'our vine & fig tree' in Peace, Happiness, & Independence."[52]

Lack of food was one of a Confederate soldier's biggest problems, and Leon's diary records the obtaining of food as a signal event. Ladies were always feeding Leon and his friends on the highways. In December 1862 he traveled by railroad to Goldsboro. "The ladies on the road, especially those at Wilson, were very kind to us. They gave us plenty to eat, which we were very much in need of." Leon, Henry Wortheim, and the Katz brothers all received packages of food from home, which were very much appreciated by the men. One Eigenbrun "came to see us to-day from home," Leon recalled, "and brought me a splendid cake from Miss Clara Phile." The Confederates lived better on the march up North than they did in the South. On the march from Virginia through Maryland and Pennsylvania to Gettysburg during June 1863, Leon ate better than he had in a long time. "So far we have lived very good in the enemy's country."[53]

But, as the war progressed, food became scarce. As early as February 1863, Leon complained that "the worst of it is we have no rations." Coffee could not be had at any price. When Leon made coffee, he meant "Confederate coffee—parched corn—that is our coffee." Like many a Johnny Reb, Leon adjusted to the deplorable conditions. "Ate our corn bread and bacon," he wrote in February 1863, "and retired to our couches and slept as good if not better than Abe Lincoln." In May, he was marching and countermarching in all kinds of weather "and very often without anything to eat." As with most Confederate soldiers, his new uniform was long gone by 1863. By June he described his misery and his comrades as "poor, ragged rebels."[54]

Disease, exposure, the strain of war, and accidents killed far more Confederates than did the enemy. Bell Wiley quotes a Tar Heel private: "they hev Been 11 Died with the fever in Co A since we left kinston and 2 died that was wounded so you now See that these Big Battles is not as Bad as the fever." Lewis Leon's experience was the same. He saw a naval officer's leg cut off in a railroad accident in which he and his friend Henry Wortheim were also injured. Leon's friend Henry Wortheim got sick during the war, possibly from constant exposure to rain and cold without sufficient shelter or food. On February 25, 1863, Leon noted: "Henry Wortheim was sent home on a sick furlough, as he is very bad off." He soon died. Leon was a tough young man, but he too suffered from the cold, exposure, and cut-up feet, as did many other Jewish Confederates. By September 1862, after Antietam, Ansel Sterne of the West Point Guards wrote from Winchester, Virginia, “The army is in poor condition, half naked and bare footed. My own clothes and shoes are in pieces and there is no chance of getting them replaced.”[55]

Leon and his friends, all young men in their twenties, were interested in the girls they met along the way, especially the young ladies who worked in the factories around Petersburg, where his regiment spent much of the war. His diary, published in 1913, gives no details of his amorous adventures, but there certainly were some. Leon, Aaron Katz, Mike Etlinger, and Henry Wortheim knew their way around Petersburg. On June 21, 1862, “We reached Petersburg, Va., this morning at half-past two, and had barely laid down with a brick wall for my pillow when breakfast was announced … I ran the blockade [that is, sneaked away from camp without permission] with Katz.” Leon’s and Katz’s behavior must not have been too bad. Katz was promoted to sergeant major. In July he and his friends “return[ed] to our factory girls again—all O.K., you bet.” In April 1863 Leon was detailed to go to Wilson, North Carolina, to pick up the baggage for his officers. At Rocky Mount, he “[s]aw some fun with a girl and an old woman. The young one had stole a petticoat from the old one, and was compelled to take it off and return it in the presence of at least fifty men.”[56]

Leon was not alone in looking for female companionship. Jacob Samuels from Texas went into Galveston with his captain and fellow soldiers in the winter of 1863-64, where they were accosted on the street by a bevy of beautiful girls who importuned the soldiers to buy tickets to a lottery to benefit war widows and orphans. Samuels told his captain that if the “dice were all right the law of gravitation would make the result, which would be providential.” They won a number of necklaces, which they gave their new female acquaintances, spent two more days “in riots most uncouth,” but justified their behavior because they were bachelors. Many a Jewish soldier found himself in a city or town with Jewish families and Jewish daughters, and occasional marriages resulted. It was only natural that the young men would seek out eligible girls. Others, like Harris Levin of the 2d Virginia Reserves, sought out prostitutes. “Several nights a week our lovely post [at Drewry’s Bluff],” he wrote in 1864, “is visited by two sisters who are rentable for riding.”[57]

Like most Confederate soldiers, Leon liked his whiskey. “Katz and myself went to Petersburg to-day,” he wrote in December 1862. “We met with friends, and the consequence you can imagine. The headache we had next day was caused by too much whiskey.”[58]

His brigade was transferred to General Lee’s Army of Northern Virginia in May 1863. Leon marched to Gettysburg with the 53d North Carolina, a regiment in Daniel’s brigade, Army of Northern Virginia. In Middleburg, the people were downhearted and “showed their hatred to us by their glum looks and silence.” The townspeople shut their doors in the men's faces, including Leon's, but the Confederates proved to the Pennsylvanians that they were not "wild animals nor thieves" and procured the supplies they needed. Leon told the townspeople he dealt with that Lee had given the men strict orders not to burn the towns through which they passed.[59]

Leon's regiment arrived at Gettysburg at 1 p.m. on July 1 and met the enemy one mile south of town "and a little to the left of the Lutheran Seminary [Seminary Ridge]. We then advanced to the enemy's line of battle in double quick time. We had not gotten more than 50 paces when Norman of our company fell dead by my side. Katz was going to pick him up. I stopped him, as it is strictly forbidden for anyone to help take the dead or wounded off the field except the ambulance corps." Leon's company was now in the fight in earnest in the push to Seminary Ridge as a part of Daniel's brigade. Two of his company's lieutenants were wounded. In a fight that lasted four hours, Company B took heavy losses. The Yankees also suffered terrible losses, and Leon's company took Union prisoners. One soldier whom Leon took as a prisoner could not speak English. He asked Leon in German, "Will I get my pay in prison?" Leon recalled that Maj. James J. Iredell, his acting regimental commander, shook his hand and complimented him for his actions.[60]

On the second day at Gettysburg, Leon's regiment was in reserve until dark but supported a battery of artillery all day. "We lost several killed and wounded, although we had no chance to fire—only lay by a battery of artillery and be shot at." At dark his division was sent into combat under terrific shelling. "Still, it was certainly a beautiful sight," he wrote. "It being dark, we could see the cannon vomit forth fire." His unit was pinned down near a fence; his friend Aaron Katz was wounded by a piece of a shell that struck him in the side, and he was sent to the rear. On the third day, July 3, Leon's brigade under General Daniel was ordered up Culp's Hill under very heavy fire. "We were on the brow of one hill, the enemy on the brow of another. We charged on them several times, but, of course, running down our hill, and then to get to them was impossible, and every time we attempted it we came back leaving some of our comrades behind." Leon's gun became so hot that the ramrod would not come out, so he picked up a gun from the ground. For a time, his regiment was trapped on the field, and the two couriers sent for help were killed. They eventually retreated safely. Pickett's charge was Lee's answer to these reverses.[61]

Leon believed that his brigade, the strongest in his division before the battle, had lost the most men. "I know that our company went in the fight with 60 men. When we left Culps Hill there were 16 of us that answered to the roll call." There had been 12 sharpshooters in his company. Now there were two, including Leon. Eleven men in Company B were killed at Gettysburg; twenty-six were wounded, three of whom would later die. Nine were taken prisoner besides the wounded. All three lieutenants were wounded and taken prisoner. “This day none will forget, that participated in the fight. It was truly awful how fast, how very fast, did our poor boys fall by our sides—almost as fast as the leaves that fell as cannon and musket balls hit them, as they flew on their deadly errand.” Leon saw many men killed, heads shot off, men cut in two or their legs severed. He heard dying men begging for water or begging their comrades for “God’s sake” to kill them. Like all the soldiers who fought at Gettysburg, Leon remembered the stench of rotting corpses, some of which were black and bloated. Leon helped bury the dead.[62]

Leon, his brother Morris, and his friend Aaron Katz all survived, but Katz was taken prisoner. At the time, Leon believed the great battle had been a draw. Each side, he thought, lost an equal number of men, and the South took more prisoners. “An army that has gained a great victory,” he wrote, “follows it up while its enemy is badly crippled; but Meade, their commander, knows he has had as much as he gave, at least, if not more.” Actually, Lee’s army lost 3,903 men as opposed to Meade’s 3,155. There were 18,735 Confederates and 14,529 Yankees wounded. The battle was a great victory for the North because Lee’s charmed army had failed in its objective, to bring the war to Northern soil and rout the Union army. Leon participated in the sad retreat from Pennsylvania in the rain and mud. “One consolation we have got,” he noted humorously, “it is raining so hard that the mud is washed off our clothing.” He would never forget Gettysburg. “We had hard marching, hard fighting, suffered hunger and privation, but our general officers were always with us.”[63]

By July 13, he was crossing the Potomac. “The river was up to my chin, and very swift.” He carried his cartridge box around his neck to keep the powder dry. Leon’s friend J. Engle got stuck in the mud until some of the boys pulled him out. “We went six miles further, and I honestly believe more of us were asleep on our night’s march than awake.” Having reached Virginia, he wrote, “We are now, thank, God, on Confederate soil, but oh, how many of our dear comrades have we left behind. We can never forget this campaign.”[64]

Leon spent the rest of the summer in Virginia, reaching Orange Court House on August 1. His regiment continued to see hard service in the Bristoe and Mine Run Campaigns. Leon was a sharpshooter, which required him to be at the forefront of many battles, sometimes spending a whole day in a pit with two other sharpshooters firing continually at the enemy. He recalled Mine Run as “cold, sleety, disagreeable weather,” and the soldiers could not even make large fires, as it would be “a sure target for the Yankees.” As the war dragged on, the early chores like cutting timber seemed like a vacation. By 1864 Leon’s company, veterans of hard combat, were put to work for a time running two sawmills to make wooden planks for roads.[65]

In March 1864, when the men were at a dress parade, an order was read stating that all troops in the army would be held until the end of the war. It did not faze Leon. “This was nothing of importance to us,” he wrote ,”as we enlisted for that time.” Actually, on that cold March day he took more interest in a snowball fight, first between his regiment and the 43d North Carolina and then with Battle’s brigade. “It was lots of fun.”[66]

Letters were a very important part of the life of Confederate soldiers. “Mail call was the brightest part of a soldier’s day—if he received a letter from home,” wrote James McPherson. In April 1864, having not heard from his family up North since the war began, Leon asked a Yankee picket to put a personal advertisement in a New York newspaper to let them know that he and brother Morris were well: “To A. [Abraham] Leon or any of my relatives: Let me hear from you all through Richmond Enquirer, and let me know your address. Have not heard from you since August, 1862. Morris and myself are both well. Lewis Leon.”[67]

Lewis Leon was captured at the Battle of the Wilderness, but not before he helped capture a Union sharpshooter who had positioned himself high up in a tree and was doing considerable damage to the Confederate advance with his long-range rifle. Col. James T. Morehead relates, in his history of the regiment, that “Private Leon, of Company B (Mecklenburg), concluded that this thing would have to stop, and taking advantage of every knoll, hollow, and stump, he crawled near enough for his rifle to reach, took a pop at this disturber of the peace, and he came tumbling down.” Leon then discovered the sniper to be a Canadian Indian, and, “clutching his scalplock, dragged him to our line of sharpshooters.” As General Daniel attempted to storm a Federal artillery battery near the Lacy House, Leon and five of his fellow sharpshooters had gotten too far in advance of their regiment. They mixed in with Gen. John Brown Gordon’s men and were captured as they were moving to the right to rejoin the regiment.[68]

Now a prisoner of war, he was first sent to a battlefield collection point seven miles west of Fredericksburg, where he was kept penned up with hundreds of other Confederate prisoners for three days before moving to the main collection point at Belle Plain for three days. From there he was sent to the Point Lookout, Maryland, prisoner of war camp. His friend Engle was captured the day after he was. “They think I was killed, so does my brother, but as yet the bullet has not done its last work for your humble servant.” At Point Lookout, he saw some of the men captured almost a year before at Gettysburg. On July 25 he was transferred to the notorious Elmira, New York, prison.[69]

A week after his capture and still at the battlefield collection point near Fredericksburg, Leon was surprised to see his brother Morris among the prisoners. Doles’s brigade had been overrun at Spotsylvania the day before, and Morris was captured after having "sent two of the enemy to their long home with his bayonet." The brothers were separated at Belle Plain. Morris was sent to Fort Delaware, where he took the oath of allegiance on February 13, 1865, and then returned South to Augusta, Georgia.[70]

Lewis Leon faced an ordeal while at Point Lookout that was much more difficult than being in combat. He and his fellow prisoners were guarded by "negro troops, who are as mean as hell." Jewish Johnny Rebs were no more fond of African American soldiers than their Christian comrades. When Lewis Leon was captured, he noted the "terrible cursing" and abuse the Confederate prisoners took from black soldiers. One group hollered "Fort Pillow" at his group, referring to the alleged massacre of black soldiers at fort Pillow, Tennessee, in April 1864. "I am only sorry that this brigade of negroes was not there, then they certainly would not curse us now," Leon concluded. On another occasion, Leon was delighted that one black guard accidentally killed another guard while playing with his gun and bayonet. A fellow prisoner was shot when he crossed the forbidden "Dead Line," a boundary within the perimeter fence that a prisoner could not cross. He got "five crackers with worms, a small piece of pork and coffee for breakfast and for dinner four crackers, a quarter of a pound of mule meat, and a cup of bean soup."[71]

By May 25 his friend Engle received a letter from his father, who told him they had seen Leon's parents in New York and he would hear from them soon. "This is the first time that I have heard about my parents since the commencement of the war," Leon wrote in his diary. "Thank God, my parents, as well as my sisters and brothers, are well." (They, of course, were civilians in New York, and Leon had just emerged from the Wilderness.) His family sent a box of "eatables, one or two shirts, and one pair of pants." He endured the monotony of prison life for a year until Lee surrendered in April 1865. Somehow he survived the bitter cold at Elmira, the frequent outbreaks of smallpox, and eating rats (at twenty-five cents each) to supplement his diet.[72]

According to Leon's diary, on the morning of April 12, 1865, the men learned that Lee had surrendered. Four hundred men took the "cursed oath" and were transported to wherever they wanted to go. He also told Union authorities that he had family in New York, that he was drafted, when in fact he volunteered, and that he had given himself up voluntarily rather than having been captured. These statements were obviously made in order to obtain a speedier release from a deadly prisoner of war camp. Leon went to New York City, where he was reunited with his parents and siblings, whom he had not seen for seven years. He returned to Charlotte after the war was over.[73]

Ike Hermann's war experiences were very different from Leon's. Leon was a modest soldier who did his duty, obeyed orders, fought valiantly, endured hardships without complaint, and served in hard combat throughout the war. Hermann was boastful, a soldier who sometimes did his duty, often disobeyed orders, was regularly disciplined and punished, was in and out of combat, and was out on medical disability a great deal. Like Leon, however, he too was a typical Johnny Reb.

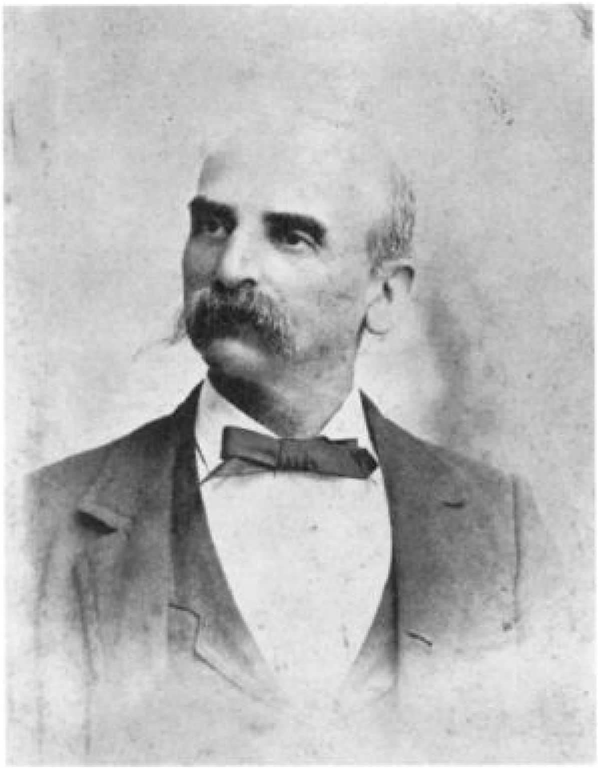
When war came, the men of Washington County flocked to the Washington Rifles, 1st (Ramsey's) Georgia Infantry, including "Ike" Hermann, who joined in the summer of 1861. The boys met at the rural railroad station. "We were all in high spirits on the day of our departure," he recalled years later. "The people of the neighborhood assembled to wish us Godspeed and a safe return. It was a lovely day and patriotism ran high. We promised a satisfactory result as soldiers of the Confederate States of America."[74]

From Davisboro, Georgia, the group of twenty-one men went to Richmond, where they were met by President Davis, "who came to shake hands with the 'boys in gray,' and speak words of encouragement." Hermann's unit participated in Robert E. Lee's disastrous Cheat Mountain campaign in western Virginia in July 1861, and General Jackson's Romney campaign in January 1862. The 1st Georgia disbanded in March 1862, and Hermann enlisted in Captain Martin's Company of Light Artillery in the fall of 1862. He served at Fort McAllister on the Ogeechee River near Savannah, the siege of Jackson, Mississippi, and in Hood's Tennessee campaign. Hermann, of course, was a curiosity more as a Frenchman ("a rather scarce article in those days in this country") than as a Jew. His major had told the men that "we'd brought a live Frenchman with us," and many went to get a glimpse of him. Hermann then jumped up on an old stump and introduced himself to the crowd: "Gentlemen, it seems that I am eliciting a great deal of curiosity; now all of you will know me as Isaac Hermann, a native Frenchman, who came to assist you to fight the Yankees."[75]

Isaac Hermann's first brush with war in the Battle of Cheat Mountain in western Virginia was also Robert E. Lee's first operation. Hermann respected Lee, who looked, he said, "every inch a soldier. His countenance had a very paternal and kind expression. He was clean shaven, with the exception of a heavy iron gray mustache. He complimented us for our soldierly bearing." Despite Lee's leadership the battle did not go well, and it propelled Gen. George B. McClellan to command of the Union forces in the East. Hermann felt that the Confederate army was poorly led, the officers elected "on account of their cleverness at home," and that "the men and officers knew more about farming than about military tactics."[76]

In his memoir, Hermann relates a story, which is implausible at best, of how he met Judah Benjamin in Richmond during this time. He was on a mission to deliver a package to General Beauregard while on his way home to Georgia after being discharged early because of poor health. According to Hermann, he went to the Treasury Department on Saturday evening to cash his paycheck. The department was closed, but Private Hermann ran into a very affable gentleman who told him to return on Monday morning and was kind enough to lend him ten dollars until then. When he had cashed his check, he found his benefactor sitting at a desk busily at work. Hermann handed him a ten dollar bill and again thanked him for his kindness. The gentleman refused it, saying, "Never mind, you are a long ways from home and may need it." Hermann replied that he did not accept gifts from strangers, whereupon the official replied, "We are not strangers, my name is Juda [sic] P. Benjamin." Hermann then goes on to say that Benjamin "was at that time Secretary of the Treasury of the Confederate States." Benjamin, of course, was never secretary of the Treasury; at that time, he was secretary of war and would not even have been at the Treasury Department. Hermann was a store clerk in rural Georgia recently arrived from France, and Benjamin was the former senator from Louisiana, so it is almost inconceivable that their paths had crossed. Nevertheless, Hermann wanted his readers to believe that he personally knew the most eminent Jewish Confederate.[77]

After serving a year as a private in Virginia, Ike Hermann went home, only to rejoin an artillery company in the fall of 1862 as a bugler with the rank of sergeant.[78] In late 1862 and early 1863, he was stationed at Fort McAllister on the south bank of the Ogeechee River near Savannah. Hermann's artillery unit was a part of the heroic and dangerous defense of the fort from a series of bombardments by Union warships and Gen. Quincy Gillmore's artillery siege. Union artillery had facilitated the capture of Fort Pulaski in April 1862, and Savannah could not long resist the Union offensive if Fort McAllister fell. According to Hermann, on one occasion he was sent up the Ogeechee to report the position of the invading gunboats. "While thus observing I noted a strange move of one of the boats, suddenly I saw an immense flash, and a splash in the river a couple of yards in front of me." The Yankees were firing at Hermann, who was on horseback, apparently because they thought he was an officer. The fort was badly damaged—"our breast-works had been blown to atoms"—but Hermann's unit went to work, together with slaves from neighboring plantations, with spades, shovels, and pickaxes, to repair and reinforce the fort. His artillery unit was next sent to Pocotaligo, South Carolina, to defend the railroad from a Union demolition squad. At ten o'clock one night, the Yankees came out of the marshes with torches. When they came within range, "we sent canister and schrapanel [sic] into the ranks." Hermann next served with the artillery in the Mississippi campaign. He claimed to have twice been wounded in action in Jackson, Mississippi, in May 1863, and, following a series of medical problems, he never returned to duty with his artillery unit. He also claims to have been captured, to have escaped, been wounded again at Spring Hill, Tennessee, and to have been sent on spy missions during the last months of the war.[79]



Pvt. Isaac Hermann emigrated from Alsace in 1859 and settled in rural Georgia. He enlisted in the Washington Rifles, 1st (Ramsey's) Georgia when the war began. He served in Virginia, Georgia, and Mississippi. At one time, he was a bugler and an orderly. This photograph was taken after the war. (Courtesy of the Jacob Rader Marcus Center, American Jewish Archives, Cincinnati, Ohio.)

Isaac Hermann was a true believer in the Southern viewpoint of the war. He favored secession. He believed the North had won the war because of superior manpower and paying bounties to emigrants, who were "the scum of the world." He blamed the North's refusal to exchange prisoners for the deplorable conditions at the Andersonville prison. Like Leon, Hermann wholeheartedly accepted Southern racial attitudes. After the war, Hermann derided Reconstruction measures, black officeholders, and the Freedmen's Bureau. African Americans needed no protection from white Southerners, he wrote, "as their devotion to their master and their behavior at home while every white man able to bear arms was at the front … leaving their families in the hands of their slaves … was exemplary."[80]

Hermann was, according to his own boastful account, frequently disobedient when he disagreed with the orders of his superior officers. He was reduced from bugler to the ranks on March 12, 1863, by his lieutenant for insubordination, and rather than turn over his bugle to his successor, he broke it in two, as it was his "private property." Like Leon, he had no experience at cutting wood and failed miserably when he obeyed orders to do so. Unlike Leon, however, he lost his ax and was arrested. Fortunately, the colonel to whom he reported discovered that Hermann had clerked in a store and could write well, so he was assigned a clerking position. “I had warm quarters and was relieved from camp duties for a little while,” he recalled. But this was only the beginning of Ike Hermann’s run-ins with authority. He was arrested by military authorities at least twice more during the war, once when he wrote a satirical song about officers drinking the army’s whiskey (“That’s the way Confederate whiskey goes, pop goes the Government”) and for being absent without leave. When chastised for his ditty accusing officers of drinking government whiskey, Hermann denied accusing anyone by name, “but if the cap fits,” he told his lieutenant, “you can wear it. I have nothing to retract.” Reduced in rank and ordered to wear a ball and chain as a punishment, Hermann claims to have replied: “I volunteered in the Confederate army to do my full duty … but when it comes to degrading me by making me wear ball and chain, I give you fair notice that I will kill any man who attempts to place the same on my limbs.”

That night he slept with one eye open and his pistol and sword by his side. Ike volunteered for a two-week assignment in Charleston, and when he returned to his unit, somehow the ball and chain disappeared. But Hermann knew exactly where it was: in the Ogeechee River. Later in the war, Hermann was accused of being a deserter. He refused to be arrested in Macon, where he was known. “I’ll die first, right here, before I’ll march through Macon, guarded like a horse thief,” he claims to have told the arresting officer. Once again, a colonel who did not even know Hermann intervened and agreed to see that Ike showed up at the guard house. On his arrival, Hermann got in a fistfight with the Yankee prisoners but did not stay long. He was acquitted of any wrongdoing as he had a valid furlough.[81]

In December 1863 Hermann was arrested a third time for not having proper papers on a furlough. He fought with the twelve men who had arrested him. “Luckily in my school days, which were close to an army post [in France], I went twice a week to the armory to take lessons in boxing and sword exercise,” he recalled. Once again, he was saved by the intervention of a lieutenant colonel who just happened by. He was returned to Atlanta under guard and turned over to a provost marshal who knew him. After being told that he was being charged with striking a superior officer, the provost asked Hermann, “What did you do it for?” “Well, Captain,” Hermann replied, “I fought for the rights of the Confederacy for the last three years and thought five minutes for myself was not too much.” If Hermann has given truthful accounts in his memoirs, it is a miracle he did not land in a Confederate prison for the duration of the war.[82]

It is surprising to modern students of the Civil War to learn just how insubordinate, individualistic, rude, and hardheaded Confederate soldiers really were. According to James I. Robertson Jr., “Civil War troops were the worst soldiers and the best fighters that America has ever produced.” Disrespect for authority was rampant. These observations apply to Jewish Confederates as well. Even Lewis Leon, a modest and obedient soldier, according to his diary, nevertheless freely admits to disobeying orders on occasion. In April 1863 he asked to go on picket with his company rather than stay with the colors; his colonel told him he could not, but he “went all the same.”[83]

Like many a Johnny Reb, Hermann had become accustomed to sleeping on the hard ground with his knapsack as a pillow. When he was invited to stay with a Mr. Rothschild in Columbus, Georgia, in 1863, he was given a nicely furnished room and a feather bed. But he was uncomfortable and unable to sleep. So he got up, put his knapsack under his head, and fell asleep by the side of the bed on the carpet. Unfortunately, when the young servant came to his room to blacken his boots, he thought that their houseguest had fallen off the bed and lay dead on the floor, and he ran to report this tragedy to Hermann’s worried hosts.[84]

Isaac Hermann never mentions his religion in his memoir, but he constantly refers to Jewish acquaintances like the Rothschilds, friends, relatives, and fellow soldiers. He stayed with the Rothschilds in Columbus; his cousin Abe Hermann, who was drafted into the Georgia militia late in the war and became a sutler in Carswell’s 1st Georgia brigade; another cousin in Macon, a Mrs. Wurzbourg; a Mrs. Lyons in Yazoo City, Mississippi; and Abe Einstein, a Savannah wholesale dry goods merchant. There were a couple of other Jewish men with him in the Washington Rifles: A. H. Wessalowsky was a private, as was H. Solomon, who began the war as a private and was later promoted to captain of the 14th Georgia.[85]

The war for Hermann was as dirty and harsh as it was for Lewis Leon. The Confederate government was never able to provide adequate uniforms, and by 1863 many Southern soldiers were not even sufficiently clothed to protect them against the elements. Later in the war, Hermann, like many a Confederate soldier, lost all of his personal effects in battle and retreats, and “our wardrobes only consisted of what we carried on our backs and filth begot what we called ‘creepers,’” that is, lice. By 1864 Hermann, again like most Confederate soldiers, experienced hunger. When issued rations for three days, the men “walloped” them “out of sight at one square meal on account of its meagerness.” Ike did the same and “trusted to the future. I never felt any remorse of conscience to get something to eat, if I could; I felt that the people for whom I devoted my services in those days, owed me a living, and when the authorities failed to supply it, I took it where I could find it.” In other words, he stole food when he could.[86]

Hermann witnessed physical suffering in others. Early on he observed in the cold mountains of western Virginia that Southerners were not used to rigorous climates, and "many of our men had to succumb from exposure. My Company lost three men from pneumonia." Hermann himself was sick for much of the war. He suffered from malaria and was hospitalized near Savannah in late 1862, recovered, and went on to serve in combat at Fort McAllister. In late 1863, he complained of "Angina Pectoris" and was hospitalized in Macon. In February 1864 he was assigned by a medical examining board to hospital duty for sixty days. Then he rejoined his company only to go before another board in April, which declared him "unfit for field service." He was assigned to the medical corps as a nurse at the Fair Grounds Hospital Number 2 in Atlanta.[87]

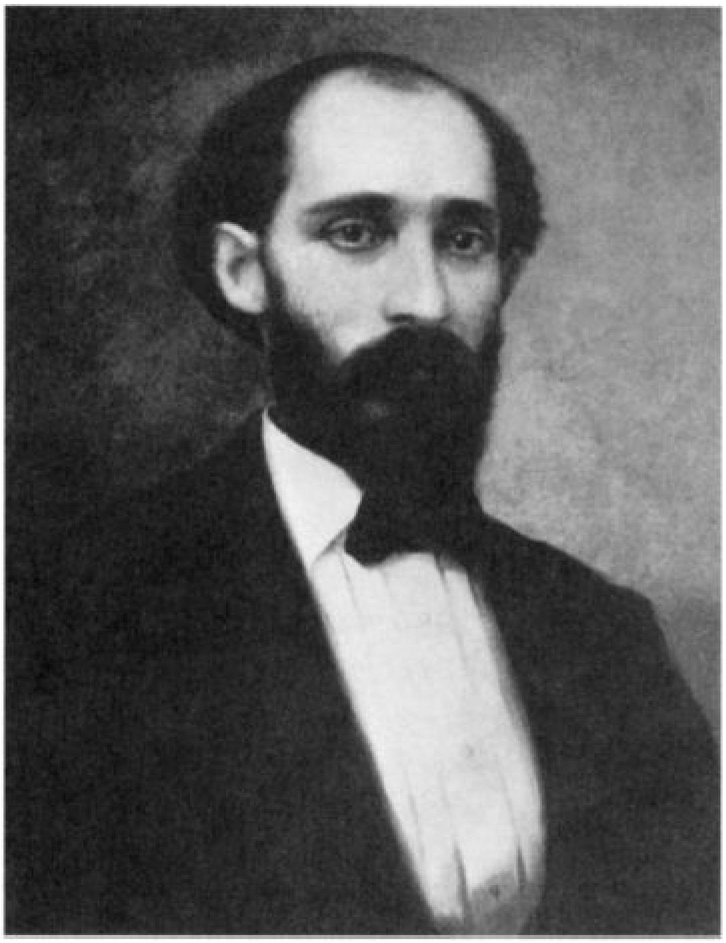
Pvt. Eugene Henry Levy was raised in an educated, affluent, and acculturated Jewish family in New Orleans. He felt himself the social superior of Jewish immigrants in general, and German Jews in particular. His father, after all, had "married into one of the best Jewish families" of Charleston, according to Dr. Marcus. He found the Jewish girls of Richmond disappointing. By 1861 the old Jewish families were a small minority of Southern Jews. Proud, educated, affluent, and successful, accepted easily by Southern aristocrats, they were conscious of the differences between themselves and their less Americanized co-religionists. While Lewis Leon was courting factory girls at Petersburg, Eugene Levy was borrowing a volume of Shakespeare from a Miss Scribner and dropping in to visit plantation mistresses.[88]

When the war began, the Levy sons all enlisted. All served in Dreux's/Rightor's 1st Louisiana Special Battalion during its short existence. Joseph Calhoun Levy subsequently served as a second lieutenant in the 1st Louisiana Regulars (Strawbridge's). Julian H. "Doc" Levy enlisted in Dreux's Battalion with Joseph in April 1861, and Eugene joined the unit in Virginia in November. Julian's service was brief; he was discharged by the end of May. Lt. Col. Charles D. Dreux was a popular young officer, and the battalion went off to fight, first in Pensacola with the 1st Louisiana Regulars and then to Virginia in late May. In June, Dreux's companies became the 1st Louisiana Special Infantry Battalion. It included a number of companies with substantial Jewish membership, including the Shreveport Grays before they were transferred to the 1st Louisiana in June 1862.[89]

Dreux was well respected in the Sephardic community in New Orleans. When he was killed commanding an expedition on July 5 near Newport News, Virginia, he became the first Louisiana officer killed in the war. His death horrified Clara Solomon. "He was so fine, intelligent and well-liked, [a] man." His death, she wrote, "has cast a universal gloom over the community." The funeral, one of the biggest in the city's history, jammed New Orleans. Clara and her family went down Camp Street to see the procession. “The hearse was beautifully decorated,” she wrote, the Colonel’s horse “draped in mourning” walked slowly behind the car.[90]



Pvt. Eugene Henry Levy, from New Orleans, joined Dreux's Battalion and later the Donaldsonville Artillery. A native Southerner whose family had deep roots in the region, Levy was committed to the preservation of the Southern way of life, including the institution of slavery. He served throughout the war, including Appomattox. (Courtesy of the Jacob Rader Marcus Center, American Jewish Archives, Cincinnati, Ohio.)

Maj. Nicholas H. Rightor was promoted to replace Colonel Dreux. As members of Company C, Eugene and Joseph Levy were likely on picket duty on the Peninsula near Richmond until February 1862. The company was involved in minor skirmishes. Joseph was discharged by order of the secretary of war in February 1862. Eugene probably remained with the company until the battalion was disbanded in May 1862. Julian returned to Virginia in March 1862 to enlist in the Louisiana Donaldsonville Artillery. Eugene joined the same unit after his release from the 1st Special Battalion.[91]

Like Leon and Hermann, Levy was a thoroughgoing Southerner. "The news from the front is glorious," he wrote in his diary in May 1864. "Our brave boys, although weary, are busily engaged in the good work of slaughtering Yanks. The enemy, under the influence of liquor, have fought desperately, charging our breastworks as frequently as eight times in succession." Like his fellow Confederates, he refers to July 4th as "the once glorious fourth." On July 4, 1864, at Petersburg, he wrote, "our brass bands and those of the enemy indulged in a musical duel. The Yanks played 'Dixie,' which we cheered; then followed Yankee Doodle,' which elicited groans and catcalls from our boys." Levy took pleasure in noting in his diary during the Battle of Cold Harbor that the heavy fighting had caused large Union losses. "Their dead and wounded cover acres of ground in solid bloody phalanx."[92]

Private Levy was a gentleman and so his social life varied considerably from that of his poor immigrant co-religionists. For example, he relates an incident near Petersburg in 1864 when he found himself at an elegant mansion being importuned by the lady of the house to stay and visit. "She is evidently fast, vain, and frivolous," he wrote in his diary, "romantic in the extreme, fond of admiration, and disposed to hold lightly the hymenial pledge." He was frequently the guest of prominent Jewish families in Richmond and attended both Beth Shalome, the synagogue of the elite families, and Beth Ahabah, the German synagogue, but makes no mention of the Polish congregation. The Jewish soldiers were invited to Christian services and included in Christian religious celebrations. Eugene Levy spent a memorable Christmas Day in 1864 enjoying "a sumptuous dinner" at four o'clock, consisting of "turkey, mutton, and pork, a variety of choice vegetables and the usual appendage of a delicious dessert. After dinner all hands went to work to arrange the Christmas tree." After playing chess and a late eight o'clock supper, “the door of the sitting room was thrown open amid exquisite strains of music, and the tree in all its glory was displayed, each bough loaded with presents.” The family did not forget their Jewish guest, “as a pair of fine woolen socks and a heart pincushion fell to my share.”[93]

Levy’s behavior was similar to Leon’s and Hermann’s in many respects. Like all Confederate soldiers, he was willing to break the rules when it came to food. He joined in a raid on a train containing commissary stores near Petersburg in 1864. “My share of the plunder,” he recorded in his diary, “was ten lbs. rice, two lbs. of sugar, and a half gallon beans.” In the aftermath of Cold Harbor, Levy wrote in his diary that “all was quiet in front. Doc was sent on business to the wagon yard and started designing to run the blockade [that is, leave camp without permission] and visit father.” (The Levy brothers’ father, Jack Levy, was in Richmond at the time.) In early July, Levy “ran the blockade” to attend a church service and have a meal with some comrades. (He was disappointed in the service, which he described as “quite flat without sacred music.”) As late as March 29, 1865, Levy was anxious to visit Richmond and decided to “run the block [blockade]” on the “sick furlough” of a fellow soldier.[94]

Levy was wounded defending Petersburg. “On our left, the forces are so near each other that an incessant fusillade is kept up during the day and night. The shelling of Petersburg continues … and, as yet, the brutal Grant has not notified the authorities to move noncombatants,” he wrote in his diary on July 8, 1864. On July 30, Levy was in the Confederate trenches when a huge explosion was set off by the Union army. For a month, coal miners of the 48th Pennsylvania had been digging a tunnel nearly six hundred feet long. When it exploded, “the earth appeared to throb beneath our feet and, a moment after, as if a volcano had burst from the bowels of the land (200 yards to my left), men, wheels, spades, logs, vast boulders of earth, and an indescribable debris obscured the rising sun. The enemy had sprung a mine, and while we yet stood transfixed with horror at the appalling spectacle, a crash of artillery came whizzing, shrieking, tearing at us.” Levy was wounded in the back, on his face, and then in his ribs by a burning shell. “The shock turned me quite around, and I immediately assured my companions that I was not badly hurt. A little water soon cleared my right eye.”[95]

On his way back from the Battle of the Crater, Levy realized that Gen. Robert E. Lee and his staff were approaching. He stood aside and saluted. “My noble commander … remarked in a tone which indicated profound sympathy: ‘My friend, I hope you are not badly hurt?’ This exhibition of his noble nature overcame me. I answered: ‘No, General, thank God!’ and pressed quickly on to avoid his beholding the tear of gratitude which coursed down my cheek. Can it be wondered at that this man has won our hearts and minds? Opposed as I am to hero worship, I shall never utter the name of Robert E. Lee unless with respect and veneration.” Levy walked to the Confederate hospital on Washington Street accompanied by his brother "Doc." He was apparently not too badly hurt, as he immediately "commenced a flirtation with the good-looking Miss W … the matron of my ward." Doc returned to the front.[96]

Unlike Leon and Herman, Levy felt the personal horror of losing loved ones. His brother Joseph Calhoun Levy was killed at Shiloh and buried in the Dispersed of Judah Cemetery in New Orleans. We do not know his feelings firsthand because his diary from 1862 was destroyed, but on Sunday, July 31, 1864, he records in his diary the deaths of the "courteous" Captain Rush and "the gallant Lieutenant Levy." They "were numbered among many choice spirits who, on the fatal Saturday, 'slept the sleep that knows no waking.' Peace to their ashes! Poor Jacob [Levy] came to see me in the course of the day. He seems absolutely brokenhearted."[97]

In May and June of 1864 Levy described the fighting at Cold Harbor, jotting down the news as a private in the ranks heard it while Grant and Lee maneuvered for the best strategic positions to pit their armies against each other. "It is now conceded," he wrote, "that Butler's advance … has proved a failure; he has been slipping his force down the river and reinforcing Grant. Beauregard's army is passing through Richmond on the way to our lines." On June 3 he wrote, "A heavy engagement commenced directly East of our bivouac shortly after daylight this morning … we could frequently distinguish amid the din of battle the shout of the Yankees as they advanced in drunken array to charge the earthworks which our men had erected during the night … General Lee has just passed the battalion conveyed by a light Jersey wagon. The old patriot looks as calm and pleasant as if Grant's defeat has been already consummated." Levy continued to believe in Confederate victory and fought all the way to Appomattox.[98]

Lewis Leon, Ike Hermann, and Eugene Levy represent the typical Jewish Johnny Reb. They served as privates and lived to tell about it. None of them considered himself a hero, although all of them risked their lives for the Southern cause. Jewish Johnny Rebs, like most Civil War soldiers, were modest. Fischel Cohen, a telegraph operator on Beauregard's staff, once told his nephew, "Yes. I was a brave man in the war—always where the bullets were thickest—under the ammunition wagon."[99]

The “Bloody Angle” at Spotsylvania. (Battles and Leaders of the Civil War.)

There were some Jewish Johnny Rebs who were genuine heroes. Max Frauenthal, Summit Rifles, Company A, 16th Mississippi was, according to Carolyn LeMaster, “an unsung hero…. For those who knew him and served with him during the conflict, his name became synonymous with the word bravery.” He fought in many battles, but particularly distinguished himself at Spotsylvania Court House, Virginia, in May 1864. Southeast of the Wilderness, where a major battle had been fought the week before, Spotsylvania was the scene of the continued maneuvering between Grant and Lee. Lee’s army valiantly held its position at a terrible cost against three corps sent against the entrenched Confederates. At 4:30 a.m. on May 12, after four days of ferocious fighting, Grant hurled Winfield Scott Hancock II’s corps against the Confederate’s “Mule Shoe” salient, the forwardmost projection of the Confederate fortifications. The armies battled for twenty hours in some of the most murderous fighting of the war. The lines were only a few yards apart, and at one point called “The Bloody Angle,” where the heaviest combat occurred, stood Max Frauenthal. Col. A. T. Watts later recounted how trees with trunks from eight to ten inches were mowed down by the “leaden hail.” He also recalled how “Fronthall [sic], a little Jew, though insignificant in appearance, had the heart of a lion. For several hours he stood at the immediate point of contact, amid the most terrific hail of lead, and coolly and deliberately loaded and fired without cringing. After observing his unflinching bravery and constancy, the thought occurred to the writer—I now understand how it was that a handful of Jews could drive before them the hundred kings; they were all Fronthalls!” Years later in Texas, it was said that people referred to a courageous person as “a regular Fronthall.”[100]

Spotsylvania was a terrible and bloody battle. Even those who held staff or headquarters positions were called on to risk life and limb. One "Israelite" ordnance sergeant, Morris Guggenheimer of Company C, 2d Virginia Cavalry, whose job was to manage Col. Thomas T. Munford's "mess" and write letters and reports, was in the midst of a very dangerous assignment before the battle ended. In a letter to the sergeant's daughter after the war, Colonel Munford said that he sent two couriers back for ammunition; one was shot and the other "dodged." Munford sent for a third courier and "told him to tell your father to bring me some ammunition himself, and not to let anybody or thing deter him. In a very little time he came galloping to me with a big bag of ammunition before and behind him on horseback, and just as he arrived we were heavily pressed; a mince [minie] ball killed his horse and down it fell. But he went on getting out the cartridges amid the cheers of his comrades, who saw his gallant behavior.… He was a faithful soldier often tried."[101]

Toward the end of the war in a battle with Union forces under Gen. Hugh J. Kilpatrick, Pvt. Isaac Harby Moses, a mere cadet at the Citadel, had his horse shot out from under him. When he got up, Moses was attacked by a Union soldier wielding a saber. "Though small in stature," Gary R. Baker wrote, "Moses lowered his head and charged the bluecoat, grabbing him around the middle and wrestling him to the ground." A fellow cadet shot and killed the Federal.[102]

Many a Jewish Confederate died a heroic death. Perry Moses Jr. was mortally wounded at Malvern Hill in 1862. Aaron (Company B, 35th Mississippi) and Jacob (Company C, 13th Mississippi) Rosenbaum's names appear on the Confederate monument in the town square in DeKalb, Mississippi. Sons of Carolyn and Marx Rosenbaum, they apparently were killed on the battlefield and lie buried in unknown graves. Marcus Baum was a thirty-two-year-old Prussian immigrant serving as an orderly or aide on General Kershaw's staff. He was accompanying Brigadier Generals Kershaw and Micah Jenkins and Lt. Gen. James Longstreet as they were making arrangements for a flank attack on the southern end of the Union line in the Wilderness. In a moment of confusion, they were caught in a volley of friendly fire. General Jenkins, General Kershaw's aide-de-camp, Capt. Alfred E. Doby, and Marcus Baum were instantly killed. Lt. Gen. Longstreet was gravely wounded in the throat and right shoulder. Baum's body was never recovered. He lies in an unmarked grave on the blood-stained soil of the Wilderness. Dr. Simon Baruch wrote of this "German and a Hebrew" in Confederate Veteran magazine in 1914: "No braver man, none truer to the cause, no soldier more loyal to his chief ever breathed than Marcus Baum, of Camden, S.C., special aide to Gen. Joseph B. Kershaw, his friend."[103]

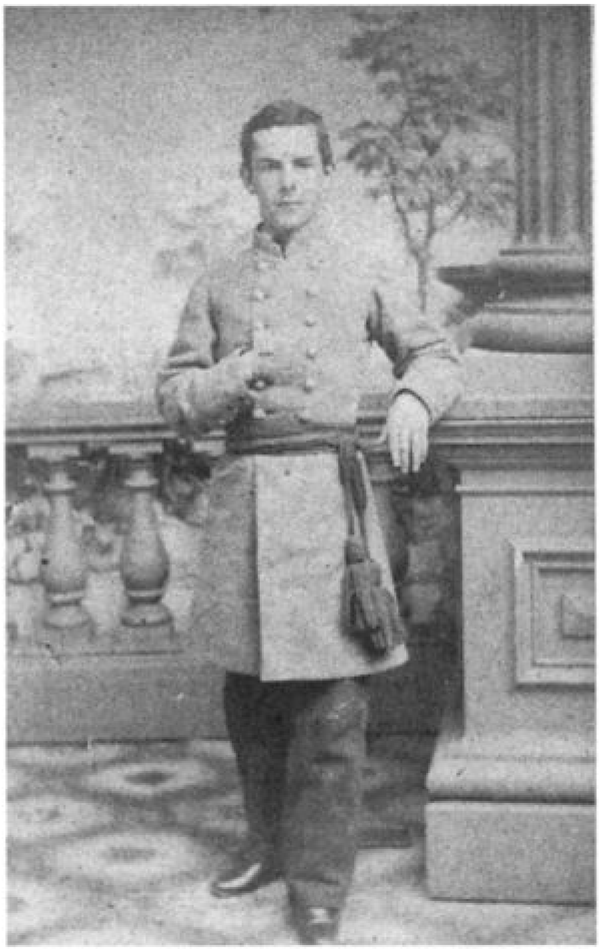
Several Jewish Johnny Rebs were killed alongside their Christian comrades. The Jewish community of Columbia, South Carolina, which numbered fewer than two hundred souls in the 1860s, lost three boys: Pvt. Thomas W. Mordecai died of disease at Fort Moultrie in 1861, Pvt. Samuel S. Levin at Sharpsburg in 1862, and Pvt. Clarence J. Pollock at Spotsylvania in 1864. Levin, a machinist, had enlisted as a private in Capt. Thomas W. Radcliff's Company A, 15th South Carolina, on August 15, 1861, for the war. In Augusta, Georgia, where the sole synagogue, B'nai Israel (Children of Israel), had only forty members, four Jewish Confederates were killed: 1st Lt. Jacob J. Jacobus, a former president of the congregation at Shiloh; Capt. George W. Rush and 1st Lt. Nathaniel Elcan Levy at the Battle of the Crater; and 1st Lt. Jake R. Levy (Elcan's brother) at Hatcher Run. Pvt. Conrad Weil, Company H, 16th Louisiana, a native of Lagerheim, Bavaria, was wounded at the Battle of Spanish Fort, Alabama, and died at Mobile in May 1865. He is buried in the Old Hebrew Section of Magnolia Cemetery in Mobile.[104]

There were Jewish Confederate casualties in every major engagement of the war. Ten Jewish Confederates were killed at the Battle of Shiloh (Pittsburg Landing). Capt. Isadore P. Girardey reported the death of Jacobus: "In this engagement, Lieutenant J. J. Jacobus fell mortally wounded while gallantly commanding his section." He was shot above the left eye. Second Lt. David C. Levy of Company G, 13th Louisiana, was killed at Murfreesboro (Stone's River) on December 31, 1863. In less than an hour of combat in two actions during that battle, the 13th Louisiana lost 19 officers and 332 men killed, wounded, or missing in action. According to Mel Young, seven Jewish Confederates, including Albert Luria, were killed at Seven Pines (Fair Oaks) in May 1862. At the Seven Days Battle in late June and early July 1862, 19 Jewish Confederates were killed, according to Young.[105]

Louis Merz of West Point, Georgia, emigrated to the United States from Bavaria in 1853 and became a peddler. He settled in West Point, Georgia, between LaGrange and Columbus. When the war broke out, Merz enlisted in the West Point Guards and was killed in action at Sharpsburg

(Antietam). (Courtesy of Cobb Memorial Archives, H. Grady Bradshaw, Chambers County Library, Valley, Alabama.)

The roll of the Jewish Confederate dead can be called for the remaining battles of the war: Five dead at Second Manassas; seven at Sharpsburg (Antietam) including the Bavarian immigrant Louis Merz, who had settled in West Point, Georgia. Merz was an infantryman in the West Point Guards, Company D, 4th Georgia, Ripley's brigade, D. H. Hill's division. He was killed early in the battle near the little brick church. His body was found by Union officers, who "on account of his cleanly appearance," decided to bury this particular Confederate private. They dug a hole with their swords and buried him on the battlefield in an unmarked grave. The LaGrange Reporter concluded his obituary as follows: "May the brave and true-hearted soldier rest in peace; and his noble spirit inspire emulation in the hearts of others."[106]



Gratz Cohen of Savannah, the son of Solomon Cohen, was fatally wounded at the Battle of Bentonville, North Carolina, late in the war. He is buried in Laurel Grove Cemetery in Savannah. This is a carte de visite taken in Charleston at a time when Cohen was probably an aide with the

Theodore Belitzer, a member of Beth Elohim, served in Company B (Wilmington Rangers) 17th South Carolina Cavalry Battalion, and in Company G (German Hussars), 3d South Carolina Cavalry. According to his family, he was captured at Wilmington and died when the Federal steamer taking prisoners to Fort Monroe caught fire at sea. (Courtesy of Selina Leidloff Rosen and K. K. Beth Elohim Archives, Charleston, South Carolina.)

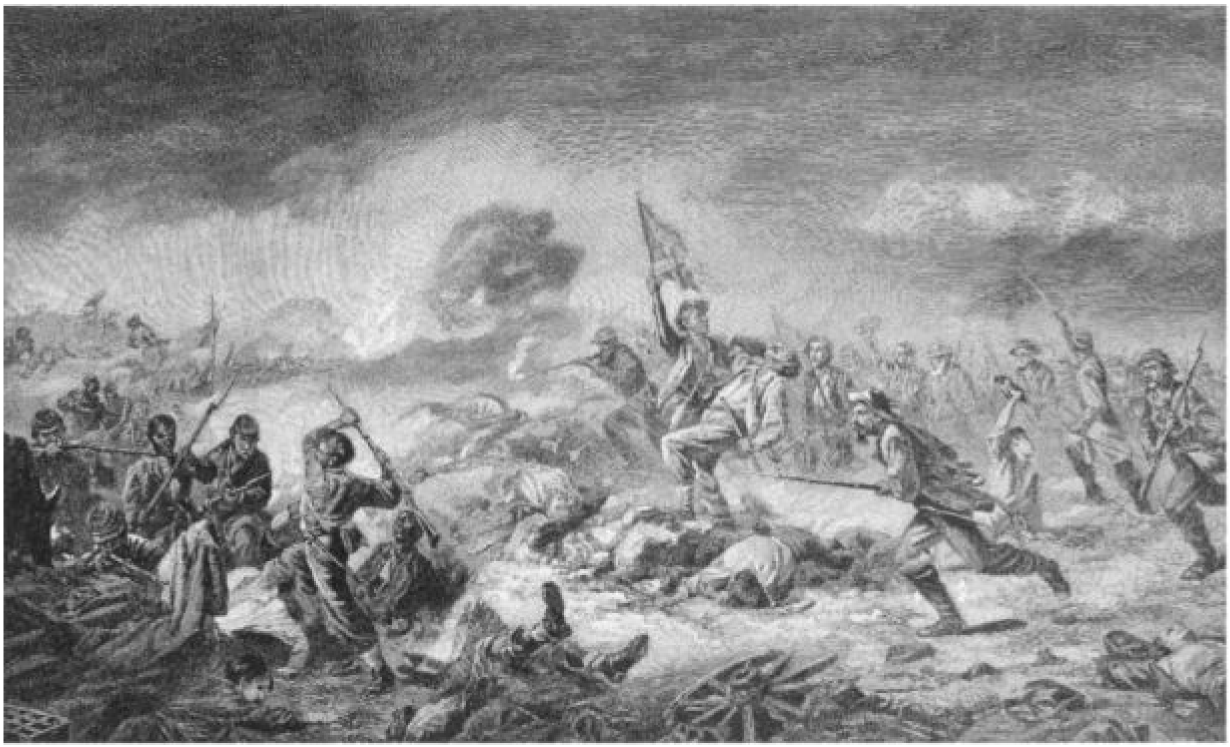
There were six Jewish Confederates killed at Vicksburg, including Col. Leon D. Marks; seven at Chancellorsville; three at Brandy Station; six at Gettysburg (three from Texas); two each at Chickamauga and the Wilderness. Six Jewish Confederates were killed at Spotsylvania and twelve defending Atlanta late in the war. Three were killed at the war's end in defense of Mobile. Some Jewish Confederates died in prisoner of war camps. There are at least twenty buried at the notorious Union prison camp at Elmira, New York. Most died from exposure during the severe winter of 1864–65.[107]

Cadet Moses Ezekiel finally realized his dream of being a Confederate soldier. He served as a cadet at the Virginia Military Institute (VMI) during the war and participated in the famous Battle of New Market. (Courtesy of the Jacob Rader Marcus Center, American Jewish Archives, Cincinnati, Ohio.)

Henry Gintzberger, the immigrant peddler, served with the Salem Flying Artillery until his death in battle in 1864. He served at Williamsport, Fredericksburg, Chancellorsville (where he was wounded), Gettysburg, and Spotsylvania Court House, and was killed at Cold Harbor in June of 1864. A fellow soldier, Pvt. N.B. Johnston, recalled that “the only Jewish soldier in the Command was shot through the head while peering over the breastworks immediately alongside him.” The register of his death shows he had no money and that his only “effects” were “1 pr. shoes.” The muster roll states: “Jew:

killed at Cold Harbor June 2, 1864," and that he was interred at "Jews burying ground, Richmond, Virginia."[108]

Moses J. Ezekiel experienced the death of a special friend. Ezekiel, along with the entire corps of young cadets at VMI, had joined Gen. John C. Breckinridge's army in May 1864 in its efforts to halt the Union invasion of the Shenandoah Valley. On their march down the valley the young lads, aged fifteen to eighteen, were met by the young ladies of Staunton and greeted with buckets full of lemonade and baskets filled with sandwiches and cakes. They had no tents. The VMI cadets fought valiantly at the Battle of New Market. Ten cadets were killed. When the battle was over, Ezekiel and a cadet officer went out on the battlefield to find their classmate Thomas G. Jefferson, a descendant of the famous president. On discovering his mortally wounded friend, Ezekiel walked to town to secure a wagon to transport the boy. The young cadets took their comrade to a nearby home and tended to him. Ezekiel put his own shirt on his dying friend. "I never closed my eyes once during the whole time of his illness," Ezekiel recalled. Jefferson asked him to read from the Bible, and Ezekiel asked him what he would prefer to hear. "Please read the chapter in St. John where there is a chapter which says: In my Father's house are many mansions.' So I read that for him." That evening, when everyone else was asleep, Jefferson asked Ezekiel to light a candle. "A cold chill ran over me, because I remembered once having heard my Grandmother say, that when anyone is dying they lose their sight first of all; so without telling Jefferson that the candles were burning, I went to the bedside and took hold of his hand." The sixteen-year-old VMI cadet breathed his last breath.[109]



The Battle of the Crater at Petersburg. (Battles and Leaders of the Civil War.)

One of the most poignant Jewish deaths of the war was that of Pvt. Isaac Levy of the 46th Virginia, who had written to his sister about Passover in Adam’s Run, South Carolina, and his brother Zeke’s procuring matzo. His captain endorsed him with “conduct as soldier and gentleman worth of emulation in every respect.”[110] He was twenty-one when he was killed by an exploding shell in the Petersburg entrenchments. “Gusta brought me the sad news of the death of Isaac Levy,” Emma Mordecai wrote in her diary. “A fine young solder, killed in the trenches near Petersburg. He & his brother Ezekiel Levy have observed their religion faithfully, ever since they have been in the army, never even eating forbidden food.” Emma Mordecai went to visit the Levy family. “Isaac was an example to all young men of any faith—to those of his own most especially,” she wrote afterward. “A true Israelite without guile—a soldier of the Lord & a soldier of the South.” The orthodox funeral service at the Hebrew cemetery in Richmond was filled with emotion as Isaac’s brother-in-law, Rev. George Jacobs, read the ancient burial rite.[111]

Young Levy’s tombstone, most of it in Hebrew, reads as follows (in its English transliteration):

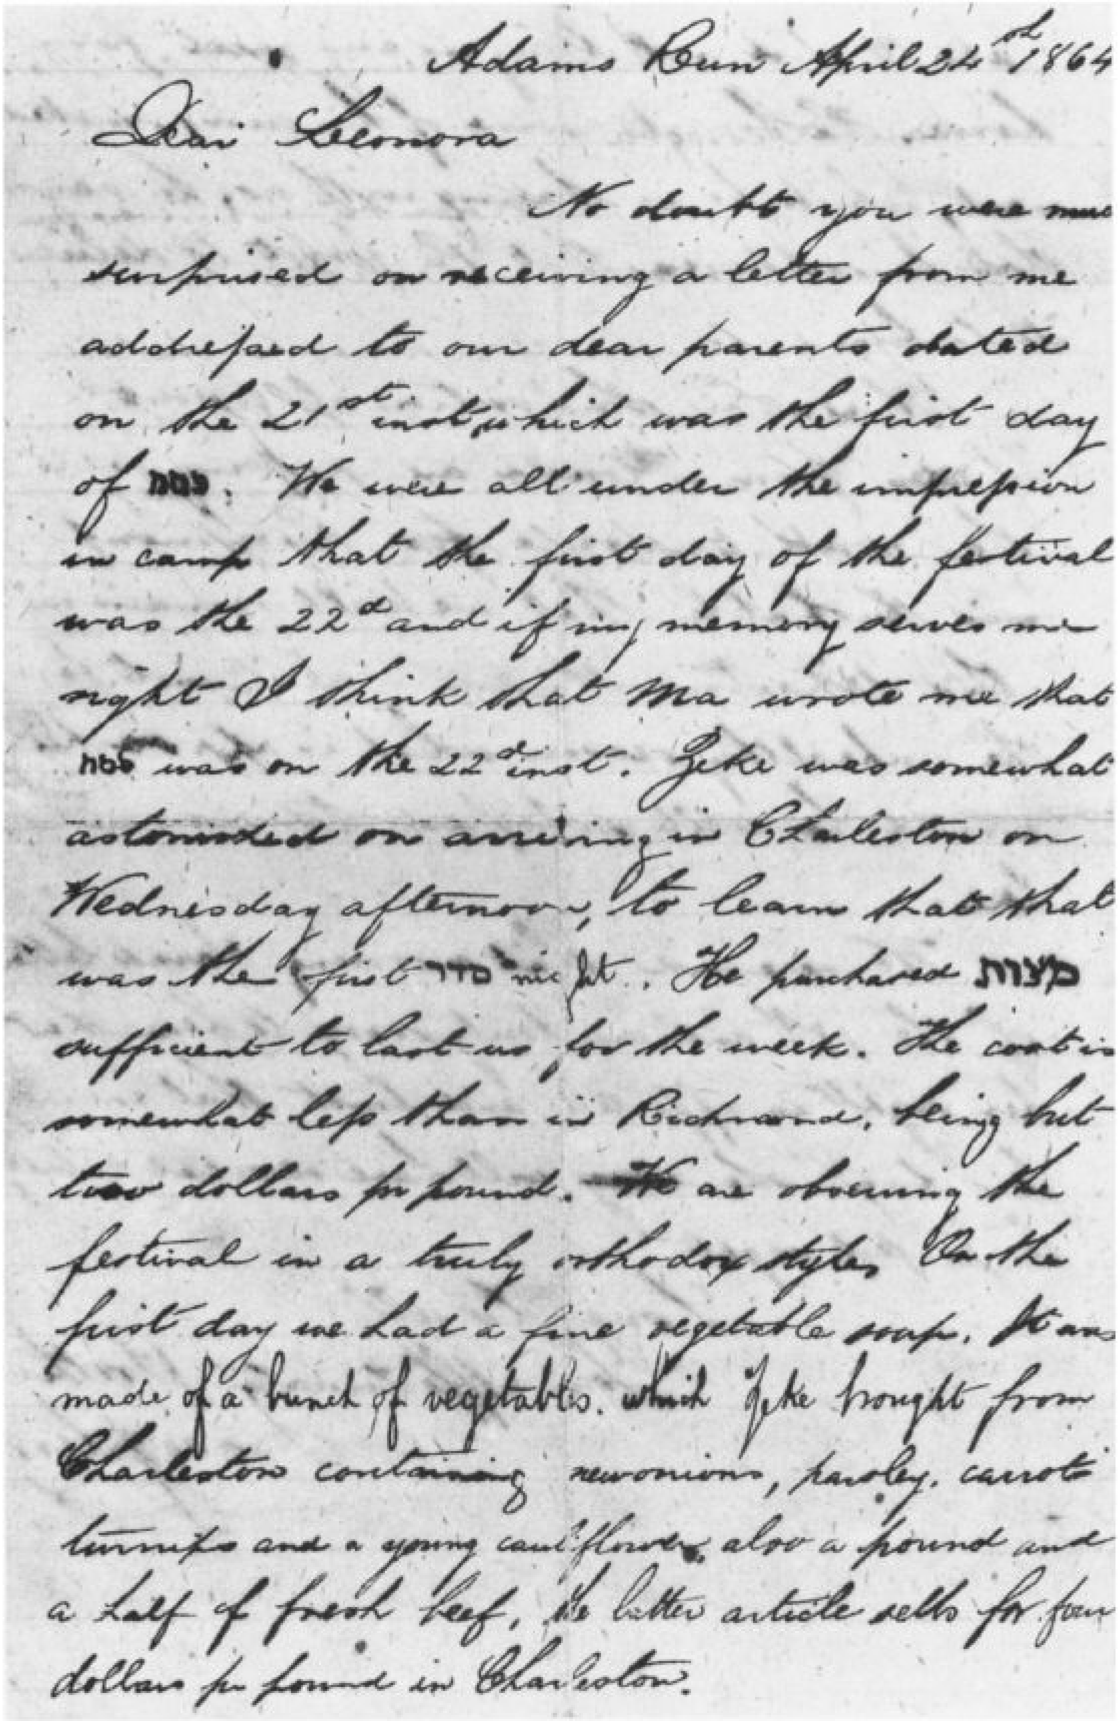
Three Jewish boys were killed at the Battle of Secessionville on James Island, South Carolina, in June 1862: Robert Cohen, a private in the Company A, 22d S.C. Infantry; Gustavus Poznanski Jr., a private; and Isaac D. Valentine, a corporal in Company D (Sumter Guards), 1st South Carolina Battalion. In the summer of 1862 the Union army hoped to cross James Island, overwhelm the Confederate defenders, and capture Charleston, the Cradle of Secession. It would have been a dramatic and important victory. But the Confederate defenders of Charleston were not about to lose the symbolic capitol of the South and so when Union troops landed, a pitched battle ensued at Secessionville, a tiny hamlet on a creek that led out to the harbor.[113]



Adams Run April 24th 1864

Dear Leonora

No doubt you were much surprised on receiving a letter from me addreſsed to our dear parents dated on the 21st inst which was the first day of פסח. We were all under the impreſsion in camp that the first day of the festival was the 22d and if my memory serves me right I think that Ma wrote me that פסח was on the 22d inst. Zeke was somewhat astonished on arriving in Charleston on Wednesday afternoon, to learn that that was the first סדר night. He purchased מצות sufficient to last us for the week. The cost is somewhat leſs than in Richmond, being but two dollars per pound. We are observing the festival in a truly orthodox style. On the first day we had a fine vegetable soup. It was made of a bunch of vegetables which Zeke brought from Charleston containing new onions, parsley, carrots turnips and a young cauliflower, also a pound and a half of fresh beef, the latter article sells for four dollars per pound in Charleston.

Zeke E did not bring us any meat from home. He brought some of his own, smoked meat, which he is sharing with us, he says that he supposes that Pa forgot to deliver its to him.

No news in this section at present. Troops from Florida are passing over the road enroute for Richmond. 'Tis probable that we will remain in this department, and were it not for the unhealthy season which is approaching would be well satisfied to remain here.

We received this morning Sarah's letter of the 18th and are truly sorry to hear that her sight is affected, and trust that in a few days she ~~may~~ will have recovered entirely her perfect sight.

Love to all
Your affectionate Brother
Isaac J Levy

Written at Adam's Run, South Carolina, in April 1864, Levy's letter describes his Passover, which is spelled in Hebrew (Pesach) on the fifth line down (page 1). He describes his brother Zeke's purchase of matzo, also written in Hebrew (middle of page 1). (Courtesy of the Jacob Rader Marcus Center, American Jewish Archives, Cincinnati, Ohio.)

The Charleston Battalion (1st South Carolina Battalion), made up of Charlestonians defending their homes, was a part of the vigorous Confederate defense. On June 16, 1862, according to Patrick Brennan in Assault on Charleston, the "sons of Charleston responded as one as Capt. Henry King led his cheering company, the Sumter Guard, up the parapet to support the decimated artillerists." King was badly wounded, as was Isaac D. Valentine, who fell in the same rifle fire that wounded his captain. Isaac's brother Hertz was shot through the arm. Defending the Tower Battery, the Charlestonians held their position against killing Union fire. Privates Cohen and Poznanski were killed in this same battle.[114]

Simon and Phillipena ("Pena") Brown. The Browns (Braun in German) were immigrants from the German states. They lived in New York but moved to South Carolina to establish a new life in Blackville, South Carolina, because Pena feared Simon's involvement with Russian anarchists. Family tradition has it that Simon was a reluctant Confederate. His records show that he enlisted in the 7th South Carolina, but not until April 1864. He was captured in August. (Courtesy of Max and Marcelle Furchgott, Charleston.)

Poznanski, the rabbi's son, had, according to the Charleston Courier, expressed to several friends his "solemn presentment that he was to fall in battle, and yet went forward to repel the stormers and received his death wound on the rampart." On June 21 the newspaper reported that "After serving upon other fields, [Poznanski] joined the Sumter Guard and through the campaign on James Island cheerfully labored by the side of his comrades in the trench, or exposed his life in the perilous duties of the picket. "This sad event," the Charleston Courier wrote of Valentine, "has poured the most agonizing sorrow into the hearts of his family, and cast a terrible gloom over a large circle of friends." The obituary noted that, through the monotony and "dull routine of camp life," he was always cheerful; when South Carolina seceded, he sought no position, but joined his company seeking only to defend the interest and honor of his state. He "fell gallantly endeavoring to protect the former and preserve unsullied the latter."[115]

Many Jewish Confederates were captured and suffered as prisoners of war. Leopold Levy of the 1st Virginia Cavalry served at First Manassas, Williamsburg, and Winchester. He was captured in 1863 by Stoneman's raiders and was sent, under very trying conditions, to the Old Capitol prison in Washington. He was incapacitated as a result of his trials and, when paroled, he served out the remainder of the war in the quartermaster general's department.[116] A. F. Woolfe enlisted as a private in Company A (Bayou City Guards), 5th Texas, in Harris County (Houston) in July 1861. He was later wounded at the Battle of Seven Pines in June 1862, wounded again near Richmond eight days later, and mortally wounded at Antietam three months later. He died in a Federal prisoner of war hospital and is buried in the Confederate cemetery in Hagerstown, Maryland.[117] The 1st Sgt. of Company A, 33d Alabama, Julius Yaretzky, was taken prisoner and sent to Johnson's Island on Lake Erie. Pvt. Marcus Levy of the Pointe Coupee Louisiana Artillery was captured at Island No. 10. He was transported to Camp Douglas, Illinois, where he died one month later as a result of his wounds. Sergeant Isadore Lovenstein, "a gallant soldier" of Company G, 12th Virginia, was wounded at Malvern Hill in July 1862 and was captured on the retreat to Appomattox.[118]

Not all Johnny Rebs rushed out to enlist the day after Sumter was bombarded. Indeed, the majority did not. It was one thing for unmarried young clerks like Lewis Leon and Isaac Hermann to enlist, but it was quite another for married men with children to leave home. When the war broke out, Philip Sartorious was living in Milliken's Bend, Louisiana, a tiny village on the Mississippi fifteen miles north of Vicksburg. He did not enlist. He and his young wife, Rose, were working hard to support their family, and many farmers, merchants, and planters could only leave their businesses at great sacrifice. “Volunteers were called for, and all thought it was a picnic, but found it before long a sad reality,” Sartorious wrote in his memoirs. He continued to operate his store, sold goods to the Confederate army, and went about his business. Once he went to New Orleans to collect on a debt for wood he had sold to the crew of a Confederate gunboat. The Federal fleet arrived that very day and Sartorious was lucky to escape with his life.[119]

By February of 1863 Grant and Sherman were literally in Sartorious’s backyard. The Confederacy was drafting all men who could fight, and Sartorious, who had an exemption as postmaster, now joined the 15th Louisiana Cavalry Battalion as a private. “We had to furnish our own horses and accouterment, or march on foot to Munroe [Monroe] and join the infantry,” he recalled. “I got my accouterment from a Yankee deserter.” He was made steward of the unit’s mess.

Milliken’s Bend was located in a large bend in the Mississippi River upstream from Vicksburg. General Grant vowed to capture Vicksburg and made Milliken’s Bend his headquarters. From that base he planned his campaign from January to July 1863. Philip Sartorious went with the Confederate army into the swamps, bayous, and rivers surrounding Vicksburg to stop Grant and Sherman. His unit spent a great deal of time tracking Grant’s movements. One day Sartorious attempted to visit his family, but Rose begged “me to return at once, as the Federal cavalry were expected every moment, and had been there several times looking for me. Very reluctantly I bid poor Ma good-bye and returned to camp.” On March 29, 1863, General McClernand went on the march to open a road from Milliken’s Bend to New Carthage, Sartorious and his comrades got in the way, and Sartorious was wounded. “I thought my arm was shattered. The gun fell out of my hand, and, after staggering some twenty feet, I fell on my face. The bullets fell around me like rain, and I thought that if the bullet that hit me would not kill me, some stray one would, and I wanted to see the sky when I died.” Sartorious was captured by the Union army, and “a young excuse of a surgeon” from an Indiana regiment treated him. “He cut my clothes off. The bullet lodged under my skin at the end of my shoulder blade. He had no instruments with him but an old rusty pocket knife. Some of the soldiers that were there said: ‘Doctor, don’t hurt him any more than you can help.’ He replied: ‘Oh hell! He is nothing but a d—d Rebel s–b.” Sartorious survived, but he could never again use his hand to write.[120]

Sartorious’s family heard he had been killed because his new uniform was stolen by a Union officer. But Sartorious was treated kindly by his captors. They allowed his wife to come and visit him. The sutler of the Union regiment turned out to be his second cousin. A doctor gave him a certificate stating that he could no longer fight, and consequently he was paroled and allowed to return home rather than being sent up North to prison. Sartorious had done his duty but was glad to be excused from more of it.[121]

Of course, not all Jewish Confederates did their duty. Jewish Southerners, like all Southerners, preserved the memories of patriotic and noble deeds and tried to forget about the cowardly and unpatriotic ones. Thus, community histories are replete with the stories of heroes, but little or nothing is to be found on shirkers, deserters, and cowards. Ezekiel and Lichtenstein's History of the Jews of Richmond and Rabbi Elzas's History of the Jews of South Carolina were published in the early years of the twentieth century, when Confederate veterans and their children were still living. Both depict the loyal service of Jewish Confederates at a time when many Jews in Richmond, Norfolk, Petersburg, Charleston, Sumter, and Columbia well knew who had fought bravely and who had run from the fight. As Bell I. Wiley has written, "Cowardice under fire, being a less gratifying subject than heroism, has not received much attention from those who have written or talked of the Confederate Army."[122]

Heyman Herzberg was living in Cartersville, Georgia, when the war began. He recalled in a memoir that the excitement was great and every young man was expected to join some military organization. His brother Herz went to Pensacola, Florida, with the 36th Georgia (Villepigue's) and brother Sol joined Company B, 40th Georgia, and became a corporal. Business was at a standstill, so Heyman closed his store, packed up his young family and his merchandise, sold his house and furniture, and sent his family and all of his belongings to his brother-in-law in West Point, Georgia. Herz returned from his unit in Florida, where he participated in the bombardment of Fort Pickens, and the two brothers joined Villepigue's regiment, now designated the 1st Confederate Infantry and went to Fort Gaines on Dauphin Island on the Gulf of Mexico. Life was monotonous except for an occasional ship attempting to run the blockade. "I remember well the excitement we had one morning to see the gunboats chasing a blockade-runner who had succeeded during the night in getting close to the shore under the protection of the guns of Ft. Morgan. We were all ordered to the fort to assist in keeping off the vessels. … A good many of the shells came screeching over us and fell harmless in the sand on the island." The living conditions were abominable, and, had it not been for the kindness of friends in Mobile, "we would have fared badly indeed."[123]

One day, Heyman and Herz were pleasantly surprised by the arrival of brother Sol, sick from exposure as a result of the severe winter camping out in the Cumberland Mountains of east Tennessee. Sol had secured a substitute for himself, had been discharged from the Confederate army, and offered to find a substitute for Herz. Herz immediately accepted Sol's offer, and the two brothers left for Philadelphia to live with their parents. Heyman, left alone, decided to secure a substitute also. "I had to wait another month, however, as our captain would not accept more than one substitute a month. I succeeded, however, in getting an able-bodied man who was beyond the age limit of the soldier. Every male person over eighteen and up to fifty was obliged to serve in the Army unless employed in some other capacity of the government. My substitute was about sixty years, and, by giving our first lieutenant my handsome gold watch as a souvenir, I succeeded in getting my discharge from the Confederate States Army."[124]

Heyman resumed his occupation as a merchant but moved to Atlanta. In searching for goods in the country, he traveled with a friend to Lafayette, Alabama, where the two men were accosted by a recruiting officer. Not having papers showing their military status with them, Herzberg and his friend were ordered to a military camp. Herzberg asked the officer to let them first take dinner at the hotel. The officer agreed and said he would wait at the tavern next door. Herzberg recalled: "Now was our chance to escape. I gave a colored man a dollar to hitch up in the yard and place the buggy back of the hotel, paid for our dinner but did not stay to eat it, got in the buggy, and used our whip to such advantage that we soon left the town with the recruiting officer far behind." The officer fired several shots, but the men were too far away. They "never stopped until we were out of the country and got again in Lafayette. We left there to West Point the next day, having had sufficient experience in trying to buy country stocks of goods." Herzberg later traveled illegally up North to buy merchandise to sell down South, and, believing the South doomed, eventually took his family on a long harrowing journey out of the South.[125]

Philip Whitlock of Richmond, a Russian Polish immigrant and a tailor, was a member of the Richmond Grays before the war. He went with his company to witness the hanging of John Brown and claimed to have stood next to John Wilkes Booth during the execution. When the war began, Whitlock served as a private with the Grays, then Company G, 12th Virginia. He later recalled that he "did not see any chance to improve my condition as the profession of a 'sodier' [sic] was not to my taste." By 1862 Whitlock was convinced that the South could not win. He tried to hire a substitute so that he could quit the army "honorably if possible." When he got sick, he somehow obtained leave and wrangled an appointment in the Quartermaster Department in Richmond. By "being friendly" with the army doctor, he somehow continued on sick leave. "In his account," Ernest B. Ferguson concluded, "Whitlock never uses the word bribe, but repeatedly hints at it in explaining how he crossed the lines [to bring in goods from the North] and retained his safe assignment." Whitlock wrote in his memoirs that he was not in "any way unpatriotic but in the way things looked to me then, that it was a lost cause, and every human being that lost his life was a useless sacrifice."[126]

Herman Whitlock, Philip's brother, felt no allegiance to the Southern cause and left Richmond with his family in early 1864. Philip, now married, lived in his brother's house and attended to his duties while his wife ran a small store they had purchased.[127]

There were even a few Jewish "Galvanized Yankees"—that is, Confederate soldiers recruited in Federal prisoner-of-war camps who served in the Union army. One such "repentant Rebel" was Louis Wolf, who arrived from Germany in 1856, lived in Savannah just before the war, and fought for the Confederacy for eighteen months when he was taken prisoner. (He lived in Lynn, Massachusetts, after the war, and when he died the Lynn Item called him a "veteran of both sides in Civil War.")[128]

And there were Jewish deserters from the Confederate army. Bernard Rosenblatt, a native of Warsaw who lived in Charleston, was drafted into the Confederate army. According to Hartford Jews by Rabbi Morris Silverman, "Upon learning that the Confederate Army was fighting to uphold slavery, he [Rosenblatt] ran away and enlisted in the Union army in the 4th N.Y. Heavy Artillery, an Irish Regiment." Isaac Arnold, a young immigrant and a member of Company D, 8th Alabama, was arrested for cowardice and absence without leave in the presence of the enemy. He was given the death sentence. Rabbi Michelbacher petitioned General Lee for mercy and enlisted a number of prominent people, including Confederate Congressmen from Alabama and Mississippi, in an effort to spare Arnold's life. "From what we have heard," the rabbi told the general, "we fear that the fact of being an Israelite and of foreign birth, has had an injurious tendency towards the decision of his deplorable fate—we hope for the sake of the common humanity of our race, that this report may be untrue." Michelbacher argued that Arnold did not appreciate the seriousness of his behavior. However, he had confidence that Lee would not hesitate to attest "to the courage and soldier-like abilities of the Israelites in those legions of our beloved Confederacy that have aided in giving an heroic name to the army."[129]

Max Neugas was a clerk in Darlington, South Carolina, at the beginning of the war. He had two brothers in New York City and most likely came South in the 1850s seeking employment. He had no family in South Carolina. Neugas nevertheless enlisted as a private for the duration of the war in Capt. David Gregg McIntosh's Company, the Pee Dee Rifles, 1st Regiment, S.C. Volunteers, in July 1861. The regiment, originally commanded by Col. Maxcy Gregg, was later commanded by Col. Comillus W. McCreary. In March 1862 Neugas's Company D became the Pee Dee Artillery Battery and was sent to Virginia. On June 27, 1862, during the Seven Days Battle, he was severely wounded at Gaines' Mill.[130]

Neugas returned to Darlington to recuperate. He therefore missed some of his battery's hardest fighting, including Sharpsburg (Antietam) in September 1862, where McIntosh's battery was captured on the heights above Rohrbach Bridge. He soon returned to his unit and fought at Fredericksburg and Chancellorsville. His company saw heavy fighting at the former in support of Maj. Gen. Ambrose P. Hill's Division, and in the latter it was engaged after Gen. “Stonewall” Jackson’s flanking move around Gen. Joseph Hooker’s army on May 2 and 3.[131]

But Neugas had enough of the war and deserted on the first day of the Battle of Gettysburg, July 1, 1863. In a letter petitioning President Lincoln to pardon him, Neugas described how he hid in a shed just as his battery was going into battle, that he walked through the Confederate lines by “putting on a bold face,” and slept in the woods. “After a short nights rest I got up the next morning, thankful to the Almighty of having me released, out of the clutches of the Rebel tyrants.” Neugas relates how he stayed at the homes of friendly townspeople who also gave him a change of clothes. He was picked up by pickets of the 21st New York Militia at Cashtown on July 5. He offered to take the oath of allegiance but was sent to Fort Delaware as a prisoner.[132]

In his petition, Neugas told the president that prior to the “breaking out of this wicked Rebellion, I was clerking in South Carolina and as I remained longer in that State than I ought to have done, I was forced to enter the rebel army after the Conscription Act passed in April 1862.” This statement was false, as Neugas enlisted on July 29, 1861. He said he “tried several plans” to leave the state, but failed. “I own no property down South,” he told Lincoln, “and no slaves and I am in nothing interested there whatever, also I have no relatives in the South.”

Neugas was not pardoned and was not released until the war was over. In 1863 and 1864, Neugas and several other Jewish Confederate prisoners wrote to Rabbi Isaac M. Wise in Cincinnati for help. Wise’s October 16, 1863, issue of the American Israelite contains this story:

> MUST WAIT—Several weeks ago we received a letter from Jewish prisoners at Fort Delaware, stating that they were forced into the service of the Confederacy, and were desirous to return to civil life as loyal and peaceable citizens. We sent the letter and our remarks appended to Washington, and received the following reply: OFFICE COMMISSARY GEN. OF PRISONERS (WASHINGTON, D.C., Oct. 8, 1863) Rev. Isaac M. Wise, Rabbi of Cincinnati, Ohio—Sir: I am directed by the Commissary General of Prisoners to inform you that the petition forwarded by you, recommending the release of Henry Maas, Dalton Brannshweiger, Max Newgas, A. Wausserman, Louis Meyersburg, S. Cohen, H. Brash, prisoners of war, now confined at Fort Delaware, has been submitted to the Secretary of War, by whom the cases have not been favorably considered.
> Very respectfully,
>
> Your obedient servant,

W. H. HUNT, Captain and A.A.G.

One year later Neugas, Louis Meyersburg of Mobile, and Aaron Waterman of Hawkinsville, Georgia, wrote to the Israelite again stating that they still had not been released and were now appealing "through you to your congregation to assist us…. We are in need of some pecuniary aid or food, especially coffee." (Henry Brash later became mayor of Marianna, Florida. On December 9, 1889, he issued a proclamation upon the death of "the illustrious chieftain of the late Confederacy"—Jefferson Davis.)

And, sad to say, there were even a few traitors. A sutler, Levi Strauss, from Lexington, Virginia, and a neighbor of Stonewall Jackson's, was discovered missing one night during one of the Valley campaigns in Virginia. His wagon was searched, and military plans and other information were discovered. He was court-martialed and hanged as a Union spy.[133]

Jewish soldiers hunted and punished deserters. Lewis Leon relates constant problems with desertion in his regiment. He witnessed men whipped and executed for desertion. In May 1863, his unit was marched to an open field and drawn up in line to see two men shot for desertion. "Their coffins were by their sides, right close to their graves, so that they could see it all." In August 1863 Leon and Si Wolf were sent on a detail looking for deserters. They went house to house, searched the woods, barns, and, at times, private homes. Leon once found a deserter in a hayloft after the owner of the house objected to his squad searching the area. They were sometimes invited for meals by the people who appreciated their fighting for the Southern cause. On one occasion, some rural Virginians, apparently never having seen a Jew, asked, "Is there a Jew in your detachment that caught a deserter yesterday?" They wanted to see him. One of the soldiers told the people that Leon was the Jew in question. "After that," he recalled, "I had a very good time there, and in fact wherever I went I was received very kindly." Indeed, Leon was sorry to leave when the time came. Pvt. Louis Merz, of the West Point Guards, was assigned to guard a deserter, but was elated when another deserter was spared execution. "What a narrow escape," he wrote in his diary, "and what a lesson to such who indulge in liquor and cannot master and govern themselves when under its influence."[134]

Jewish Johnny Rebs, or at least a portion of them, sought out religious worship services and the assistance of rabbis or Jewish "ministers," in the parlance of the Reform Jewish faith. There were no Jewish chaplains, as such, in the Confederate army, but there were laymen who ministered to the Jewish Confederate soldiers. Rabbi B. Nordlinger served the Jewish community of Macon, Georgia, and joined F. H. Burghard's Light Artillery (the Macon German Artillery). His military record shows that he served as a bugler and a musician, not a chaplain, but he likely ministered to the Jewish men in his unit. Uriah Feibelman, Company C, 12th Virginia, of Petersburg, Virginia, a musician, was recognized as “a minister of gospel in the Hebrew Church” in 1864, but enlisted as a private, and no surviving record shows him as a chaplain. Rabbi Korn speculates that both men progressed from blowing the shofar, the ancient ram’s horn used on the Jewish New Year, to the bugle.[135]

The Confederate Congress, unlike the U.S. Congress, made no distinction between religions in the appointment of chaplains. Northern Jews were forced to launch an extensive lobbying effort against a law limiting chaplain appointments to ministers “of some Christian denominations.” The Confederate law referred to “every minister of religion.” Rabbi Korn concludes that, in this instance, “the Confederate Congress was more liberal and tolerant than its Washington counterpart.”[136]

Like their comrades of the Christian faith, Jewish Johnny Rebs frequently brought the Holy Scriptures with them to the front. (Jews do not refer to the Holy Scriptures as the Bible.) The Holy Scriptures (which Christians call the Old Testament) consist of the Five Books of Moses (the Torah, the Law, or the Pentateuch, “five books” in Greek), the Prophets, and Writings (which include Psalms, Proverbs, and Ecclesiastes, for example). When Henry Smith (who was Jewish, despite his name) was killed at the front, his captain wrote his father, “His Bible and effects I will endeavor to have forwarded to you.”[137] And like their Christian comrades, Jewish Johnny Rebs called upon God to help them achieve victory. Pvt. Simon Mayer was a religious Jew who, like his fellow Confederate soldiers, called upon God, “the great ‘Ruler of the Universe,’” to aid him, his family, and the Southern cause. “May the God of Israel guard & protect you … and may He vouchsafe to us all good health,” he wrote his family.[138]

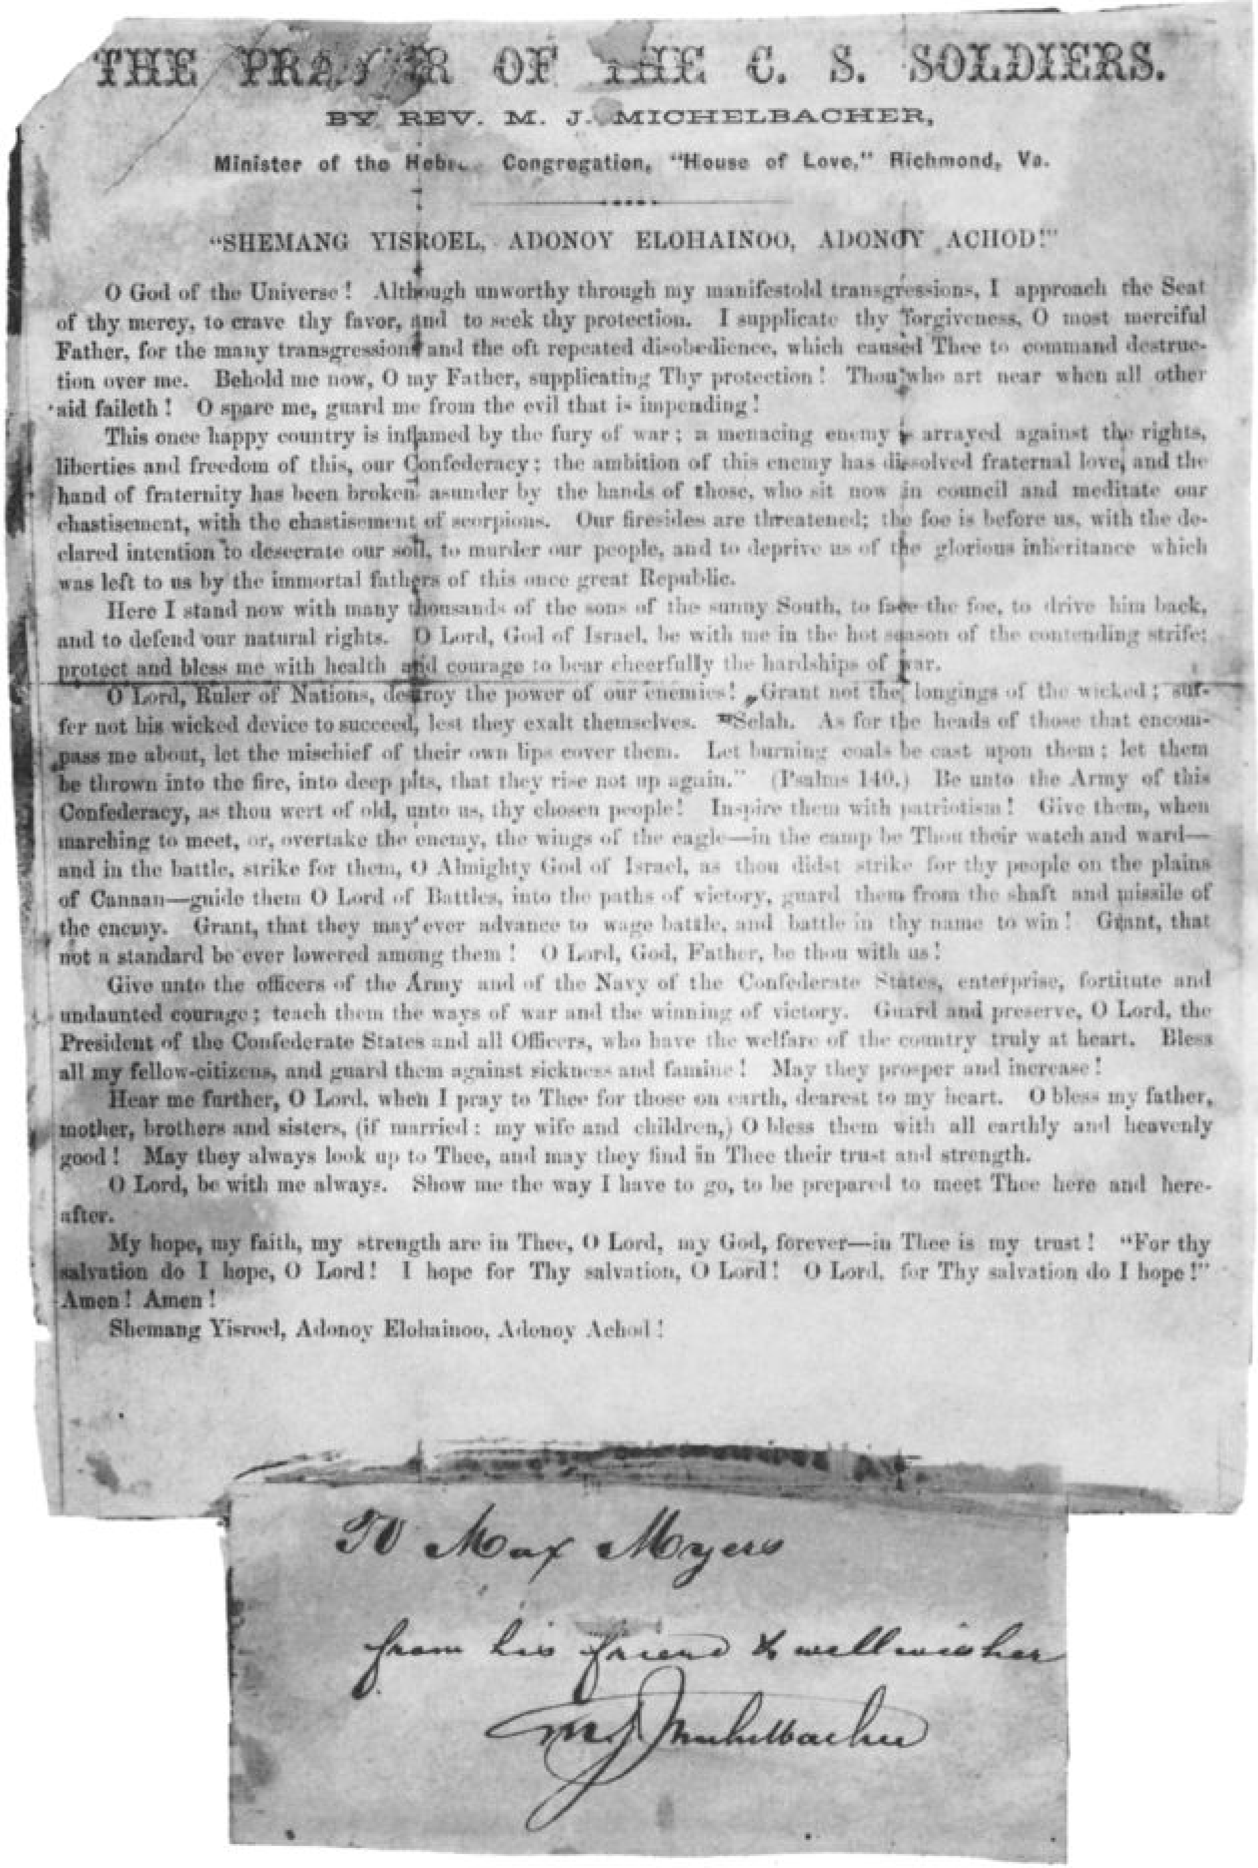
Many Jewish Johnny Rebs attended services at the synagogues in Richmond or at one of the Charleston, Savannah, or Memphis congregations. Some of the soldiers in Virginia were able to obtain individual furloughs on some occasions to attend services on the High Holy Days, and on at least one occasion, General Lee allowed a general furlough. Lewis Leon noted in his diary: “Brother Morris returned from Richmond yesterday, where he has been for ten days on a furlough. Before our Jewish New Year there was an order read out from General Lee granting a furlough to each Israelite to go to Richmond for the holidays if he so desired. I did not care to go.” Ezekiel and Lichtenstein wrote that the commandant of the provost guard, the military police, put a detail outside the synagogue in Richmond on Friday nights to catch the Jewish soldiers absent without official leave. “The soldier boys were true to their faith,” the authors concluded; a “prettier tribute could not be paid them.”[139] Many a young Jewish Confederate “walked from his sweetheart," Herbert Ezekiel said in 1915, "into the arms of the guard, and the visions of a good Friday night supper melted into the stern reality of an enforced sojourn in the guardhouse."[140]

It is safe to assume that many Jewish Johnny Rebs observed the High Holidays in camp or on the field, some in small groups and others alone. Capt. Marcus Hofflin, Company K, 4th North Carolina, told of a Kippur (Day of Atonement) service held in a tent in the Shenandoah Valley in 1862 after the battle at Sharpsburg (Antietam). Stonewall Jackson, a student of religion, was said to have observed a part of the service. Lewis Leon always recorded the New Year (Rosh Hashanah), but he never attended a synagogue. On September 15, 1863, he recorded in his diary: "Still some firing in front. We are in reserve. I went to see the fight. I saw the enemy very plainly, and thus I spent my New Year's Day." On September 23 he records, "Day of Atonement to-day."[141] Ike Hermann never mentions the holidays or attending a service in his memoir, probably because his non-Jewish readers would not have been interested.

On Saturday, October 1, 1864, Eugene Henry Levy decided to attend synagogue on account of Reverend Michelbacher's appeal to General Lee for a furlough for the Jewish soldiers. He attended to demonstrate his gratitude to his commander. Levy, however, was "not sufficiently affected by the religious ceremonies to feel in the humour for praying." The next day, Rosh Hashanah, Levy attended the service at the German synagogue, Beth Ahabah. The next week Levy was "called up" for a blessing while the Torah was being read. He observed Yom Kippur by attending Beth Ahabah in the evening and "the Mayo Street Shool [that is, the Sephardic Synagogue] in time to hear Mr. [George] Jacob's excellent and appropriate sermon." Levy fasted on Yom Kippur as is the Orthodox custom. He spent from 8:30 a.m. until 1:00 p.m. at synagogue on Kippur Day, October 10, 1864. Despite the war, Jewish Confederate soldiers were still Jews and still had the traditional complaints about the length of the service. "Did not feel impressed by the Hebrew service," Levy wrote, "and am more than ever convinced of the necessity of reforms in the mode of service." He spent the rest of the day and evening visiting local Jewish families and broke his fast at 6:30 with "coffee and cakes à la mode d'Europe." A devout and practicing Jew, Levy attended services at the synagogues throughout the war. On Saturday, December 17, 1864, he attended "devine services and had the honor to carry the 'scroll of the law.' Bade many of my friends farewell at the door of the synagogue."[142]

Reverend Michelbacher wrote and published a prayer, which the Jewish soldiers took with them to the front. Entitled "The Prayer of the C.S. Soldiers," it was in English except for the Shema, which Michelbacher wrote as "SHEMANG YISROEL. ADONOY ELOHAINOO, ADONOY ACHOD" (Hear, O Israel. The Lord our God is one.). This prayer or proclamation called the Shema ("hear") is the central and most important theological statement in Judaism, its confession of faith. Its modern translation is “Hear O Israel, the Lord our God, the Lord is one,” and expresses the ancient Jewish belief in monotheism.[143] The prayer connected ancient Jewish imagery with the Confederacy and linked Jewish soldiers with the Southern cause. “This once happy country is inflamed by the fury of war; a menacing enemy is arrayed against the rights, liberties and freedom of this, our Confederacy…. Here I stand now with many thousands of the sons of the sunny South, to face the foe, to drive him back, and to defend our natural rights. O Lord, God of Israel, be with me in the hot season of the contending strife; protect and bless me with health and courage to bear cheerfully the hardships of war. … Be unto the Army of this Confederacy, as thou wert of old, unto us, thy chosen people! Inspire them with patriotism! Give them when marching to meet, or, overtake the enemy, the wings of the eagle—in the camp be Thou their watch and ward—and in the battle, strike for them, O Almighty God of Israel, as thou didst strike for thy people on the plains of Canaan—guide them, O Lord of Battles, into the paths of victory, guard them from the shaft and missile of the enemy.”[144]

Jewish Confederate soldiers in the field had to fend as best they could on the Jewish holidays. Obtaining kosher food was impossible and matzo, unleavened or flat bread, was difficult to find during Passover. In fact, when the soldiers were in the field, they had trouble determining the exact dates of the Jewish holidays. “No doubt you were much surprised on receiving a letter from me … on the 21st [April 21,1864], which was the first day of [Passover],” Isaac J. Levy of Richmond wrote his sister Leonora. “We were all under the impression in camp that the first day of the festival was the 22nd and if my memory serves me right I think that Ma wrote me that [Passover] was on the 22d inst. Zeke [Capt. Ezekiel J. Levy of Richmond] was somewhat astonished on arriving in Charleston on Wednesday afternoon, to learn that was the first [Seder] night.”[145]



THE PRAYER OF THE C. S. SOLDIERS.

BY REV. M. J. MICHELBACHER,

Minister of the Hebrew Congregation, "House of Love," Richmond, Va.

"SHEMANG YISROEL, ADONOY ELOHAINOO, ADONOY ACHOD!"

O God of the Universe! Although unworthy through my manifestold transgressions, I approach the Seat of thy mercy, to crave thy favor, and to seek thy protection. I supplicate thy forgiveness, O most merciful Father, for the many transgressions and the oft repeated disobedience, which caused Thee to command destruction over me. Behold me now, O my Father, supplicating Thy protection! Thou who art near when all other aid faileth! O spare me, guard me from the evil that is impending!

This once happy country is inflamed by the fury of war; a menacing enemy is arrayed against the rights, liberties and freedom of this, our Confederacy; the ambition of this enemy has dissolved fraternal love, and the hand of fraternity has been broken asunder by the hands of those, who sit now in council and meditate our chastisement, with the chastisement of scorpions. Our firesides are threatened; the foe is before us, with the declared intention to desecrate our soil, to murder our people, and to deprive us of the glorious inheritance which was left to us by the immortal fathers of this once great Republic.

Here I stand now with many thousands of the sons of the sunny South, to face the foe, to drive him back, and to defend our natural rights. O Lord, God of Israel, be with me in the hot season of the contending strife; protect and bless me with health and courage to bear cheerfully the hardships of war.

O Lord, Ruler of Nations, destroy the power of our enemies! "Grant not the longings of the wicked; suffer not his wicked device to succeed, lest they exalt themselves. Selah. As for the heads of those that encompass me about, let the mischief of their own lips cover them. Let burning coals be cast upon them; let them be thrown into the fire, into deep pits, that they rise not up again." (Psalms 140.) Be unto the Army of this Confederacy, as thou wert of old, unto us, thy chosen people! Inspire them with patriotism! Give them, when marching to meet, or, overtake the enemy, the wings of the eagle—in the camp be Thou their watch and ward—and in the battle, strike for them, O Almighty God of Israel, as thou didst strike for thy people on the plains of Canaan—guide them O Lord of Battles, into the paths of victory, guard them from the shaft and missile of the enemy. Grant, that they may ever advance to wage battle, and battle in thy name to win! Grant, that not a standard be ever lowered among them! O Lord, God, Father, be thou with us!

Give unto the officers of the Army and of the Navy of the Confederate States, enterprise, fortitute and undaunted courage; teach them the ways of war and the winning of victory. Guard and preserve, O Lord, the President of the Confederate States and all Officers, who have the welfare of the country truly at heart. Bless all my fellow-citizens, and guard them against sickness and famine! May they prosper and increase!

Hear me further, O Lord, when I pray to Thee for those on earth, dearest to my heart. O bless my father, mother, brothers and sisters, (if married: my wife and children,) O bless them with all earthly and heavenly good! May they always look up to Thee, and may they find in Thee their trust and strength.

O Lord, be with me always. Show me the way I have to go, to be prepared to meet Thee here and hereafter.

My hope, my faith, my strength are in Thee, O Lord, my God, forever—in Thee is my trust! "For thy salvation do I hope, O Lord! I hope for Thy salvation, O Lord! O Lord, for Thy salvation do I hope!" Amen! Amen!

Shemang Yisroel, Adonoy Elohainoo, Adonoy Achod!

Passover was difficult to celebrate on the field of battle. Isaac and Zeke Levy and their Jewish comrades were fortunate during the Passover of April 1864 to be stationed at Adam’s Run, South Carolina, as it was close enough to Charleston for Zeke to buy matzo sufficient to last them for a week. Isaac noted in his letter that the “cost is somewhat less than in Richmond, being but two dollars per pound.” Isaac and Zeke Levy made the best of their situation: “We are observing the festival in a truly orthodox style. On the first day, we had a fine vegetable soup. It was made of a bunch of vegetables which Zeke brought from Charleston containing new onions, parsley, carrots, turnips and a young cauliflower, also a pound and a half of fresh beef, the latter sells for four dollars per pound in Charleston.”[146]

And, of course, the Jewish boys sought the comfort of their religion when they were dying. Adolph Rosenthal, Company D, 38th Georgia, a German Jew from Savannah, was severely wounded in Virginia in May 1864, at Spotsylvania Court House, and lay dying for two weeks. He was cared for by his sweetheart, Rachel Semon, at her home and by others in the Richmond Jewish community. Rachel was brokenhearted at Adolph’s death and wrote Joe Rosenthal, Adolph’s brother, that Adolph “died a good Jew. We even had him benched [blessed by the giving of a new name]. His name was Moses. I will tel you all som day as he told me every thing what to do four days befor he died…. God bless his sole. May he rest in peace. I even toock his remains to Savannah and burried him.”[147]

When all is said and done, Southerners respected the willingness to fight, the bravery under fire, and sacrifices of their Jewish comrades in arms. “They were all volunteers, and I know there was not a Jew conscript in the Legion,” Gen. Thomas Waul wrote. “As soldiers they were brave, orderly and well-disciplined and in no respect inferior to the gallant body of which they formed a prominent part.” No Jewish soldier was court-martialed, they did not seek a disproportionate amount of leave, nor were they on the hospital rolls, according to Waul. “I will say,” he concluded, “I neither saw nor heard of any Jew shrinking or failing to answer to any call of duty or danger.”[148] Henry E. Henderson of Louisiana recorded in his memoirs that his unit, Company B (Stafford Guards), 9th Louisiana, consisted largely of the sons of planters, but also included a few “roughs” from the “piney wood region” north of Alexandria, Louisiana, “and perhaps half-a-dozen Jews, most of whom had carried a pack along the Red River.”

Henderson continued: “These Jews, singular as it may seem, proved themselves as faithful and efficient soldiers as any in the command, and shed their blood for the cause of the South as freely as the natives ‘to the manner born.’”[149]

After the war, Jewish Confederate veterans passed on their guns and swords to their sons. They also passed on their good names and pride in their war record. Julius Yaretzky wrote a touching letter to his son after the war:

> You wish to know about what I, if any, had left and brought home with me from the War, such as arms or otherwise. So I will inform you fully of it. I did not bring anything home with me for the following good reasons. When I was in the army, I possessed a large knife, pistol and sword. The knife I found useless in battle and left it at Pensacola, Fla. Navy Yard, as we evacuated that place to go to Corinth, Miss. to participate in the battle of Shiloh.… The pistol was a Colts powder & ball and it was damaged in the battle of Perriville, Ky. and became useless. The cylinder of same was struck by a ball from grape shot and, therefore, [I] did not have any further use for it. The sword was taken from me when I was captured at > the Battle of Franklin, Tenn. near Nashville. I tried to get the Yanks to let me keep it so I could bring it home but was refused and was compelled to give it up. So, dear boy, I have none of the war relics left to send you but a good record of a faithful soldier I then was.[150]

An Augusta, Georgia, editor wrote after the war that no one could “impugn their patriotism in this war.” A Charleston newspaper wrote in 1892 that “the list of South Carolina Jews who remained true to their country and to their country’s cause in the darkest hours and who proved their fidelity and patriotism by laying down their lives upon the field of battle could be greatly extended…. They possessed what Napoleon called ‘the two o’clock in the morning courage,’ and they followed the flag with superb loyalty to victory and defeat.”[151]

Sympathetic Soul and Busy Hands

THE JEWISH CONFEDERATE HOME FRONT

’Tis mercy’s self in woman’s form appears,

Whose untold kindness every heart endears.

Behold in hospitals, where dread disease

Lurks …

this noble woman ‘midst the gloom,

Dispenses sunlight thro’ each darken’d room.

Admist the suffering sick, this angel stands,

With sympathetic soul and busy hands;

Bends o’er the soldier’s couch with mother’s care,

And soothes the palid brow so deadly fair,

Cheers the sad heart, and hope reviving springs,

And health returning, waves her joyous wing….

This Most Suffering Land

Trembling before thy awful throne we kneel,

Beseeching mercy at thy gracious hand,

Praying that in compassion thou wilt heal

The bleeding wounds of this most suffering land.

—Capt. Samuel Yates Levy, November 2, 1863

FROM RICHMOND TO NEW ORLEANS and from Memphis to Mobile, Southern Jewish civilians—women, the elderly, the young, and the men who would not or could not serve in the armed forces—contributed to the war effort and suffered through the war alongside their neighbors. The largest Jewish populations were in the major Southern cities, which in turn were the chief objects of the Union military juggernaut. The Union navy planned the assault on the Confederacy's largest port, New Orleans, early in the war. Richmond, the capital of the new nation, was the Union army's foremost objective from the first week of the war until it fell on April 3, 1865. Charleston, the "Cradle of Secession," was a principal target of combined land and sea operations, both for its symbolic value as "the place where the Rebellion began" and for its strategic importance. The port cities of Savannah, Mobile, and Memphis, home to smaller Jewish communities, were also Union targets. Thus, the majority of Southern Jewish civilians lived in cities under siege for some or all of the war. In the peculiar demography of the South, despite their small numbers in the region, Jewish Southerners constituted a meaningful percentage of the white population of Southern cities.[1]

Many other Jews lived in smaller cities, towns, and villages in every part of the Confederacy. Some, like Sumter, South Carolina, and LaGrange, Georgia, became a refuge from the fighting in larger urban areas. Others, like Natchez, Vicksburg, and Nashville were battlegrounds and were occupied by Federal forces. Still other small towns, like Georgetown, South Carolina, and Woodville, Mississippi, were fortunate in being located away from the chief theaters of the war.

Jewish Southerners who were not serving in the military continued to engage in selling merchandise as peddlers, or in some other aspect of the mercantile trade. Many men served in the home guard or local militia. More provided services, such as innkeepers, tanners, apothecaries, doctors, or teachers. Unlike the overwhelming majority of Southerners, who lived on farms in rural areas, the Jewish population was dependent on trade in urban areas and small towns for their livelihood. Therefore, once the naval blockade was implemented, Southern cities and Jewish merchants immediately began to suffer economically. When, for example, the siege of Charleston began and the city was shelled by Union artillery, Jewish merchants, store clerks, and their families were forced to close their businesses on lower King Street and either refugee inland or remove to another location beyond the shelling. In Richmond, the city's population swelled, and, at least in the early years of the war, many civilians' businesses improved. In New Orleans, the blockade disrupted commerce, and after the surrender of the city in April 1862, New Orleanians lived under military rule. Thus, each of these Jewish communities experienced a different aspect of the Civil War.

Jewish women, like Southern women generally, ferventlfy supported the cause, tended to the wounded, knitted clothing, and were involved in a variety of war-related activities. Mary Chesnut recorded one typical event in June 1862 when her "Hebrew" friend, Miriam ("Mem") DeLeon Cohen, went to the hospital in Columbia, South Carolina, with "a beautiful Jewess friend," Rachel Lyons:

> Rachel we will call her (be it her name or not) was put to feed a very weak patient. Mem noticed what a handsome fellow he was, and how quiet and clean. She fancied by those tokens that he was a gentleman.
>
> In performance of her duties, the lovely young nurse leaned kindly over him and held the cup to his lips. When that ceremony was over and she had wiped his mouth, to her horror she felt a pair of by no means weak arms around her neck and a kiss upon her lips—which she thought strong indeed. She did not say a word. She made no complaint. She slipped away from the hospital and hereafter she will in her hospital work fire at long range no matter how weak and weary, sick and sore, the patients may be.
>
> "And," said Mem, "I thought he was a gentleman."
> "Well, a gentleman is a man after all—and she ought not to have put those red lips of hers so near &c&c&c."[2]

Rachel “La La” Lyons, the daughter of Jacob and Louisa Lyons of Columbia, South Carolina, had grown up as a Southern Jewish belle. Her aunt Isabel Lyons married Moses Cohen Mordecai, owner of the Mordecai Steamship Line, and her uncle Henry Lyons served as mayor. At thirteen she gave the graduation address at the annual Israelite Sunday School Examination.[3] Now at twenty-three she was the most beautiful young Jewish woman of Civil War South Carolina. Her brother, Capt. Isaac L. Lyons, commanded Company A, 10th Louisiana, in Virginia. She was described by Cooper DeLeon as “a marked woman in Columbia society and her quick wit and sinuous grace at once attracted attention at the capital.”[4]

Rachel “La La” Lyons was born in Columbia in 1838 into an observant Jewish home. She was a student at Boanna Wolff’s Hebrew Sunday School. During the war, she was a femme fatale who enchanted Henry Timrod, later the “poet laureate” of the Confederacy, as well as Mary Chesnut, who described her as a “beautiful Jewess.” She married Confederate surgeon Dr. James Fontaine Heustis and moved to Mobile after the war. (Author’s collection.)

Miriam DeLeon, first cousin to Edwin, Camden, Agnes, and Cooper DeLeon, was born and raised in South Carolina. She married Dr. Lawrence L. Cohen. Miriam and Mary Boykin Chesnut were old friends. “Mrs. Cohen was Miriam DeLeon,” Mary wrote in her diary, “I have known her intimately all my life.” Indeed, Mary Chesnut knew all of the DeLeons.[5] Miriam had two children, a young daughter, Isabel (“the sweetest little thing,” according to Mary), and a son, Lawrence Ludlow Cohen Jr., his “mother’s idol.” Young Cohen served in John Chesnut’s cavalry company, Boykin’s Rangers, initially organized by Mary Chesnut’s uncle, Capt. Alexander Hamilton Boykin.[6] The South Carolinians called it “Company A No. 1.” Mem was very fond of Capt. John Chesnut and proud of his courage. “Lieutenant Chesnut’s horse bolts with him,” she told Mary in June 1862, “but right into the heart of the enemy.” She was worried, however, about her son’s safety. By June of 1862, his unit was part of Whiting’s brigade, which had now been sent to Stonewall Jackson’s corps. “[S]he has persistently wept ever since she heard the news,” Mary recorded on June 16, 1862. “It is no child’s play, she says, when you are with Stonewall. He don’t play at soldiering. He don’t take care of his men at all. He only goes to kill the Yankees.”[7]

Mem’s life in Richmond revolved around her family and her friends. She worried about everyone and assisted the ailing. In May 1862, she took Mary Chesnut scarce medicine. “Mem Cohen missed me,” Mary wrote. “The Jewish angel. She came with healing on her wings (She found me very ill.) That is, in her hands she bore opium.”[8] Mem and Mary joked incessandy. They nicknamed Brig. Gen. Johnson Petügrew, who was reportedly killed at Seven Pines and lived to read his own “splendid” obituary, “Insensible to Fear.” They talked on a daily basis. One entry in Marys diary begins, “Miriam’s story today” and relates how a friend of Mem’s heard that her son had been killed then heard it was all a mistake. She fell on her knees with a “shout of joy,” only then to see next the hearse drive up in the midst of her family’s celebration with “the poor boy in his metallic coffin.”[9]

Adah Isaacs Menken as a French spy. A voluptuous, witty, risqué, and mysterious actress from Louisiana, Menken may or may not have been born Jewish, but she became an active Jew after marrying Alexander Isaac Menken in 1856. She was outrageous, appearing "nude" (in a flesh-toned body stocking) while strapped to a horse in Mazeppa. She was active in Jewish causes even after divorcing Menken a few months after the wedding. In December 1862, just after Fredericksburg, Menken made a public spectacle of herself in Baltimore by loudly supporting the Confederate cause. She had her dressing room painted Confederate gray and decorated with pictures of Davis, Lee, Bragg, and Van Dom. The newspapers had a field day; one of her gentleman callers was arrested as a Confederate spy. Next, Menken was arrested "for Being a Secessionist." She retorted, "Of course, I did not deny the charge." She refused to leave for Dixie or swear an oath of allegiance. The publicity helped her career. She tried the same publicity stunt again in Baltimore in March 1864, but was arrested and sent to Washington, where the government was too busy to prosecute her. Menken has fascinated historians, but she had little real connection to the Confederacy or the war. See John S. Kendall, '"The World's Delight': The Story of Adah Isaacs Menken," Louisiana Historical Quarterly 21, no. 3 (July 1938): 846–68 (no, she was not born Jewish); Wolf Menkowitz, Mazeppa: The Lives, Loves and Legends of Adah Isaacs Menken (New York: Stein and Day, 1982), 90–92, 125–29; Allen F. Lesser, "Adah Isaacs Menken: A Daughter of Israel," PAJHS 34 (1937): 143–47 (yes, she was born Jewish); Leo Shpall, "Adah Isaacs Menken," Louisiana Historical Quarterly 26, no. 1 (January 1943): 162–68 (yes, again). Sen. James Chesnut of South Carolina and his wife, Mary Boykin Chesnut. The Chesnuts lived in Richmond for much of the war. Mr. Chesnut was a close advisor to and confidante of Jefferson Davis. Like many Southern aristocrats, Mrs. Chesnut had a number of Jewish friends, including Miriam ("Mem") DeLeon Cohen, Rachel Lyons, Cooper DeLeon, and Phoebe Pember. This is a prewar photograph recently found by descendants. (Courtesy of Martha Williams Daniels, Camden, South Carolina.)

Like all Southerners, Mem was anxious for the safety of her family. She had long periods of silence and was sometimes absentminded, worrying about her son. If she were suddenly aroused, she would exclaim, "with overflowing eyes and clasped hands, 'If it please God to spare his life.'" During the Battle of Seven Pines, daughter Isabel warned Mary not to mention the battle raging around Richmond—"young Cohen is in it." Like most Jews, she was also anxious for the safety of her co-religionists. She once gave Mary a clipping about a battle. "[O]ne of her Jews is in it," Mary wrote. When there was a battle and her sons survived, "Mem takes up on her Hebrew Bible and sings that glorious hymn of her namesake Miriam: 'Sing ye to the Lord, for He hath triumphed, &c&c&c.'" (In the Torah, Miriam was said to be the sister of Moses, and the song of Miriam celebrates the victory of the Israelites over the Egyptians.)[10]

Another South Carolina Jew, Penina Moise, a poet and the first well-known Jewish woman in the field of American literature, had a different wartime experience. She left her home in Charleston for the safety of inland Sumter. She was accompanied by her widowed sister, Rachel, and Rachel's daughter, Jacqueline. They lived in a two-room cottage and eked out a bare living by running a school. Sixty-four when the war began, Penina Moise was almost totally blind and in poor health. She had been published in the local newspapers, Godey's Lady's Book (Philadelphia), newspapers in Boston and New York, and the national Jewish press. Her 1833 collection of poetry, Fancy's Sketch Book, was the first published book of poetry by an American Jewish woman.[11]

When the war began, Miss Moise, like the rest of the Jewish community, was excited about secession. She wrote “Cockades of Blue”:

Hurrah for the Palmetto State!

Whose patriots the “Minute” await

That shall summon their band

To engage hand to hand

Any foe that dare enter its gate!

But as the war dragged on, lives were lost and Southern fortunes declined, and she became despondent. She wrote “A Reverie”:

A chilling dream of brighter days to come, When peace shall be the angel of each house—

And mapped on Freedom's atlas will be found

The old Palmetto state with glory crowned …

As with the prophet's dream in ages past

Coming events may now their shadows cast,

The blest design of Providence to show,

Which sendeth balm for every chastening blow.

Lift Carolina—proudly lift thy head,

God, through the desert, hath thy children led.[12]

In Galveston, Texas, Rosanna Osterman gave so much of her time and resources to wounded soldiers that, upon her death in 1866, the Galveston News predicted she would never be forgotten by those she helped. Col. Alfred M. Hobby wrote, "Amidst the suffering sick, this angel stands / with sympathetic soul and busy hands." Isabel Adeline Moses was, at age fourteen, the youngest member of the Soldiers Aid Society of Columbus, Georgia. Like many a Southern girl, she nursed the wounded at the local hospital.[13]

Southern women worked in sewing circles making clothes. The "Jewess ladies" of Charlotte raised $150 to assist the volunteers of the Charlotte Grays. Even the aristocratic Eugenia Phillips considered it her duty to make garments for the soldiers "and looking to the well being of their poor families—making lint bandages as far as in our limited power doing everything to encourage the cause we thought ourselves right in espousing." Southern women were "all heroines," Eugenia Phillips wrote, "everything like dress, amusement, or frivolity was abandoned." Eleanor H. Cohen of Charleston lamented, "We struggled for freedom, but found it not."[14]

Before the war, Jewish immigrant women, like their sisters in Europe, worked beside their husbands (and often their children) in small stores and shops, in the market stalls, sewing clothes to sell, and in the petty trades in which most Jews were engaged. Most Jewish women in the 1860s were hard-working storekeepers, seamstresses, merchants, grocers, peddlers, dressmakers, and small boardinghouse operators. Frederick Law Olmsted described a German Jewess operating a small hotel with her husband in Washington, Louisiana.[15] Both Moses Ezekiel's grandfather Ezekiel and grandmother

Hannah worked in their family store.[16] Judah Benjamin's mother opened her small shop on the Sabbath.[17] "Constant references in memoirs and autobiographies to Jewish female work in the nineteenth century," Hasia Din concluded, "contrast sharply with the conventional image of Jewish women of that time as predominantly middle-class … while official records may have only portrayed the male 'Jewish shopkeeper,' gender made little difference behind the counter."[18]

While many a well-to-do Southern woman had never learned to sew before the necessities of war introduced them to knitting and dressmaking, most Jewish women were adept at their newly important skill.[19] And while most Southern women lived on farms and experienced the Civil War as both devastating and liberating, the role of Jewish women, who lived in cities and towns and who had always worked in the same marketplace as their husbands, did not change.[20]

The Jewish women of Richmond had a special responsibility to keep families together and give comfort to Jewish soldiers from throughout the South. Beth Shalome and Beth Ahabah cooperated to provide relief especially to the Jewish poor. The women of Beth Shalome met daily in the basement of the synagogue to make clothes. The women of Beth Ahabah did likewise. Jewish women served in the hospitals and took wounded soldiers into their homes. The Jews of Richmond, Herbert Ezekiel wrote, "were just like other people. They fed the hungry, clothed the poor, nursed the sick and wounded, and buried the dead."[21] Emma Mordecai visited Richmond's Seabrook and General Winder hospitals. She wrote in her diary of the "distressing picture … of the condition of our brave men, now more prostrate and helpless than infants." She traveled by train from her sister-in-law's plantation, where she resided, to take a supply of buttermilk, sweet milk, and other items. She nearly fainted on one occasion while assisting a surgeon in dressing a wound, but "got over it by sitting near an open window when no longer needed." Others, like Rachel Semon, cared for Jewish soldiers in their homes. Adolph Rosenthal, wounded at Spotsylvania, died in the Semon home before his family could arrive from Savannah. Phoebe Pember, the daughter of Fanny and Jacob C. Levy of Savannah, came to Richmond to serve as matron of Chimborazo Hospital.[22] In this she was quite the exception. "A number of women of prominent background did take matron posts during the war," Drew Gilpin Faust has written. "For the most part, however, Southern ladies regarded a matron's duties as too laborious, too indelicate for women of their social standing."[23]

As the capital of the Confederacy and the chief target of the Union invasion, Richmond was sorely tested by the Civil War. Its population tripled from 37,000 in 1861 to 100,000 by 1865. Housing was scarce; services were disrupted; food and goods were in short supply. The Jewish population increased as Jewish soldiers and government officials arrived. All of the city's congregations and Jewish organizations now took on much greater responsibilities. Both Rabbis Michelbacher and Jacobs ministered to the needs of Jewish boys away from home, refugees, people in want, widows, and grieving families, and they defended their co-religionists against anti-Semitic attacks on the Jewish community. Religious services continued throughout the war. In October 1864, Emma Mordecai recorded in her diary that she "passed into Richmond, where I went to attend Rosha Shannah services" on the very day of a battle raging around the city. On October 10, she went back to town "to spend several days, Monday being Yom Kippur…. The services on Kippur eve were solemn and impressive. Mr. Jacobs delivered a short but excellent discourse." She returned on the fifteenth to stay for a week "to keep the Feast of Tabernacles which commenced that evening." She attended "all the services at the Synagogue" and "visited most of my friends and acquaintances."[24]

The Jewish population of Richmond was caught up in the excitement, exhilaration, patriotism, and pathos of the war. The leading Jewish families were ardent supporters of the Confederacy, and their sons and husbands served in the Confederate army. Jacob Levy had come to Richmond forty years earlier and established himself in the dry good business on Main Street. His store, like those of many Jewish merchants, remained opened throughout the war. A well-respected merchant, Levy had two sons in the war, Capt. Ezekiel J. "Zeke" Levy, the eldest, and Pvt. Isaac J. Levy. Daughter Adeline was married to Rev. George Jacobs, the rabbi at Beth Shalome. Two other daughters would later marry Jewish Confederate officers they met during the war.

Some Richmond families were divided by the war. Jacob Ezekiel, born in Philadelphia, was loyal to the Union, but his grandson, whom he raised as a son, Moses Ezekiel, was an ardent Confederate. Jacob stayed in Richmond on account of his large family, which was pro-Confederate. He contributed, however, to the relief of the Union prisoners at Libby prison in Richmond.[25]

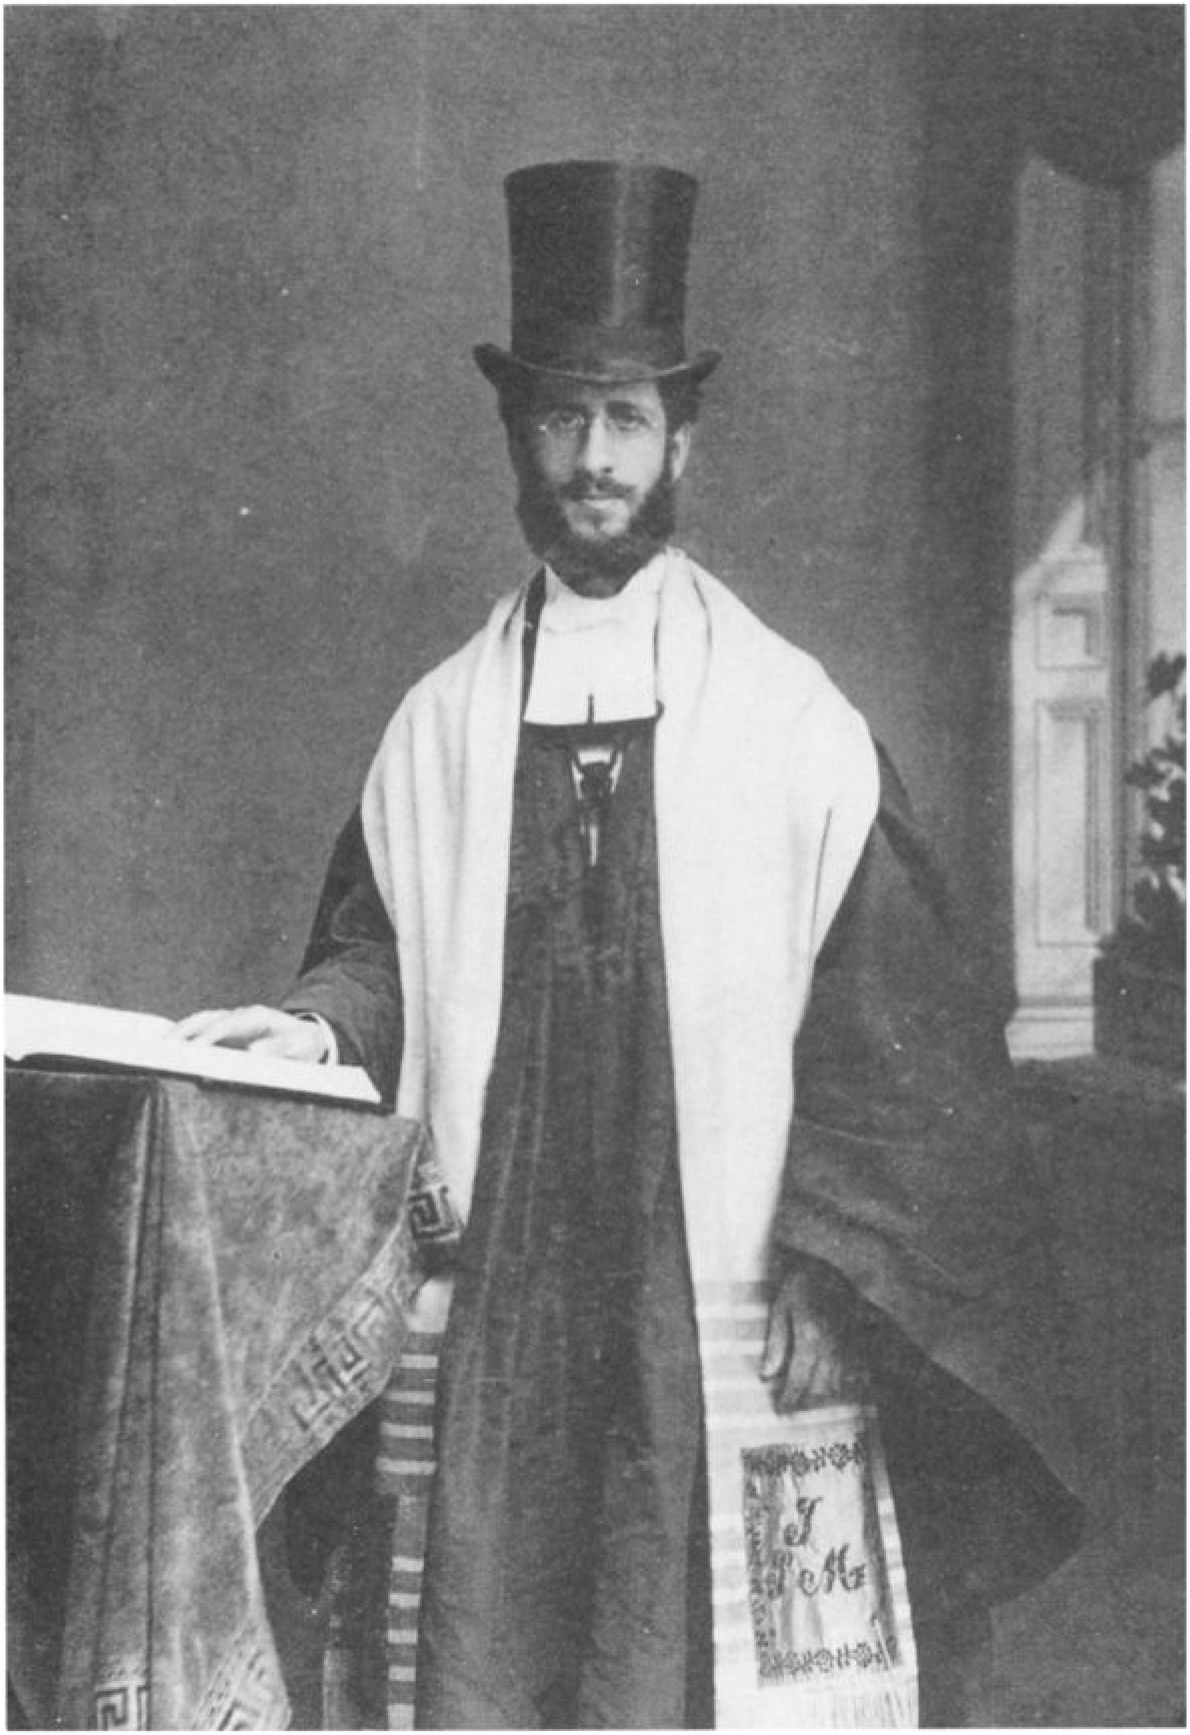
Members of the Richmond Jewish community lived throughout the city, but many, if not most, of them lived above and behind the stores where they worked—on Main, Broad, and Franklin. The Milhisers lived at and operated a dry goods store on Broad between Fifth and Sixth. Isaac Rosenheim sold shoes and lived at 23 West Main. Mrs. C. Abram operated her grocery store on Broad near Jefferson. A. Bodecker & Company sold drugs, medicines, and spices at 10 Main Street. F. Cohen ran a "lager beer saloon" on Seventeenth Street between Main and Franklin. Jacob A. Levy's store was at 15 West Main, as was his residence. The Lichtenstein's clothing store and home was on Franklin between Seventeenth and Eighteenth. The "Old Market" on Seventeenth Street was home to German and Jewish merchants. One "might be at a loss," Samuel Mordecai wrote, "to know whether German or English is the language of the country."[26]

There were few great Jewish merchants in Richmond in 1860. Indeed, the 1860 city directory lists few Jewish names in its section showing "the best in their respective business." The same directory shows that the clothing and retail trade was dominated by small Jewish establishments and that half of the dry goods stores were owned by Jewish Richmonders. There were few doctors, lawyers, or professionals.

Beth Shalome, then still known as the Portuguese synagogue, although there were few Sephardic members, was located on Mayo Street near the state capitol. Beth Ahabah, the German synagogue, was on Eleventh between Clay and Marshall, only one block from Jefferson Davis's residence.

The Richmond rabbis, who referred to themselves as “reverend” and “minister,” were ardent Confederates. George Jacobs, in the early 1860s, was a tall, handsome, outgoing young man in his late twenties. Born in Jamaica and speaking with a British accent, he was a popular figure in Richmond, active in the Masons as well as Jewish fraternal organizations. Married to Adeline Hyneman Levy, Jacobs had two brothers-in-law in combat and was committed to serving the cause which now enveloped the Levy and Jacobs families, as well as the entire Richmond Jewish community. Jacobs became the eloquent champion of Richmond’s old Jewish families. Max Michelbacher ministered to the needs of Richmond’s large German Jewish population. Rabbi of Beth Ahabah, he was a tireless activist on behalf of the Jewish community and the Jewish boys serving in the Confederate army in the Richmond area. His “Prayer for the C.S. Soldier” was presumably printed by Beth Ahabah and distributed to Jewish Confederate soldiers.

Michelbacher worked throughout the war to obtain furloughs for the Jewish soldiers in the Richmond area, especially during Jewish holidays. He first wrote to Robert E. Lee on August 23, 1861, seeking furloughs for the High Holidays in September. The letter, addressed to “His Excellency R. E. Lee General of CSA,” reflects Reverend Michelbachers continuing struggle to learn the English language: “Excuse me that I intrude on you but the case is important to a class of citizens, being Israelites, who take the greatest interest in the welfare of this confederacy…. These ten days from the 5th to the 14th of September (both days inclusive) are the 10 days of Penitence & Prayer, the most sublime of the höhest days of the year.”[27]



Rev. George Jacobs was rabbi at Beth Shalome, Richmond's "Portuguese Synagogue" during the Civil War. Although a native of Jamaica, Jacobs embraced the Confederate cause. He had the sad duty of officiating at the funeral of his own young brother-in-law, Isaac Levy. The top hat was traditional for Sephardic rabbis of the period and was worn during the service, as Orthodox Jews cover their heads in synagogue. (Courtesy of the Beth Ahabah Museum and Archives, Richmond, Virginia.)

Rev. Maximillian ("Max") J. Michelbacher was the spiritual leader of Beth Ahabah, Richmond's "German Synagogue" during the Civil War. Although not an ordained rabbi, he was a vigorous, effective leader of Richmond Jewry, supporting the Confederate effort wholeheartedly and ministering to suffering Jewish soldiers from all over the South. (Courtesy of Beth Ahabah Museum and Archives, Richmond, Virginia.)

Lee, then a general in the Confederate army, replied to Michelbacher's request in a courteous letter on August 29. "It would give me great pleasure to comply with a request so earnestly urged by you, & which I know would be so highly appreciated by that class of our soldiers," Lee wrote the rabbi. "But the necessities of war admit of no relaxation of the efforts requisite for its success." Lee continued, "I feel assured that neither you or any member of the Jewish congregation would wish to jeopardize a cause you have so much at heart by the withdrawal even for a season of a portion of its defenders."[28] In March 1863 he wrote General Lee concerning Passover. Lee agreed to comply with the rabbi's requests "as far as the public interest will permit," but he thought it "more than probable that the army will be engaged in active operations, when, of course, no one would wish to be absent from the ranks." The Battle of Chancellorsville occurred a month later in May 1863.[29]

In September 1864 Reverend Michelbacher once again wrote Robert E. Lee about furloughs for the High Holidays to allow the boys to "repair to Richmond to observe the holy days appointed by the Jewish religion." Lee patiently explained that he could not grant a general furlough to one class of soldiers, but that he would do "all in my power to facilitate the observance of the duties of their religion by the Israelites in the army and will allow them every indulgence consistent with safety and discipline."[30] Lee was a deeply committed Christian and tolerant of the religious beliefs of others. On one occasion, an application of a Jewish soldier for permission to attend synagogue was denied and endorsed by his captain: "Disapproved. If such applications were granted, the whole army would turn Jews or shaking Quakers." Lee wrote out the order: "Approved and respectfully returned to Captain _____ with the advice that he should always respect the religious views and feelings of others."[31]

Jewish families in Richmond lived in constant dread of receiving news of the death of a family member. Herman J. Myers, Company G, 1st Virginia Cavalry, a cavalryman from Richmond, was wounded near Winchester, Virginia, and left for dead. According to Ezekiel and Lichtenstein, "he was carried to the residence of a fine old Virginia family nearby. There the daughter of the house nursed him back to health and strength." His family had given him up for dead and had sat shiva—that is, observed the seven traditional days of mourning. When Myers recovered, he set out for his home in Richmond. Stopping at a hotel in Staunton on the way, he was unable to sleep and woke up early. He went down to the office, where he happened upon his cousin, who had been sent by the family to recover the body. "The 'remains' had indeed been recovered, but in a very unusual manner," the authors concluded. Only the government could use the telegraph lines, so there was no way to inform the family, “all of whom in deep black were down at the depot [in Richmond] to meet the body when the train arrived.”[32]

Like Jewish Virginians, Charleston Jewry had rejoiced at the bombardment of Fort Sumter, but the Union naval blockade disrupted the port and worried Charlestonians. Blockade-running became big business, and Jewish merchants joined their Christian colleagues in purchasing goods in this new wartime business environment. Simon Fass, for example, purchased goods from blockade-runners. The Fass children remembered stories of their young mother: “She was at a sale carried on, when a ship would ‘smuggle in’ or ‘run the blockade’ during the war and the folk would go to the wharf to get delicacies that the South did not have during that time.”[33]

Rabbi M. J. Michelbacher
Preacher Hebrew Congregation
"House of Love" Richmond Va:

Revd Sir

I have just recd your letter of the 23rd Inst: requesting that a furlough from the 2nd to the 15th Sept: be granted to the soldiers of the Jewish persuasion in the C. S. Army, that they may participate in the approaching holy services of the synagogue.

It would give me great pleasure to comply with a request so earnestly urged by you, & which I know would be so highly appreciated by that class of our soldiers. But the necessities of war admit of no relaxation of the efforts requisite for its success, nor can it be known on what day the presence of every man may not be required. I feel assured that neither you or any member of the Jewish Congregation would wish to jeopardize a cause you have so much at heart by the withdrawal even for a season of a portion of its defenders. I cannot therefore grant the general furlough you desire, but must leave to individuals to make their own application to their several commanders, in the hope that many will be able to enjoy the privilege you seek for them, & should any be deprived of the opportunity of offering up their prayers according to the rites of the Church, that their penitence may nevertheless be accepted by the Most High, & their petitions answered.

That your prayers for the success & welfare of our Cause may be granted by the great ruler of the universe is my ardent wish.

I have the honour to be with high esteem

General Lee's letter to Reverend Michelbacher, August 29, 1861. In one of his many letters to Rev. Maximillian Michelbacher, General Lee expressed his respect for "the soldiers of the Jewish persuasion in the C. S. Army," but felt he could not grant a general furlough for the High Holidays because it might "jeopardize a cause you have so much at heart.” (Courtesy of the Jacob Rader Marcus Center, American Jewish Archives, Cincinnati, Ohio.)

David Lopez of Charleston was a member of Beth Elohim, the builder of Institute Hall, where the South Carolina Ordinance of Secession was signed, and the builder of the Confederate torpedo boats called the “Davids,” which were designed to do battle with the Union “Goliaths.” (Author’s collection.)

The Union navy assault and the fall of Port Royal near Beaufort were of great concern to the people of Charleston, who knew that the Union army would show their city no mercy. To make matters worse, a terrible fire swept the city in December 1861, destroying much of the business and retail district. Fortunately, Beth Elohim and Shearith Israel were just north of the burned-out areas and were not damaged. By the summer of 1862, many Charlestonians had left the city for safer climes. The Middleton girls went to their summer home in Flat Rock, North Carolina; Emma Holmes moved to Sumter; and the Smythes inland. The wives and children, and in some cases the elderly men of prominent families, left for the safety of inland towns like Sumter and Columbia. Martial law was declared in order to police a city flooded with refugees, undisciplined Confederate soldiers, and restless slaves. Half of the free black population left also. Beth Elohim's trustees did not meet from 1862 to 1865.[34]

The Union army and navy combined to lay siege to Charleston in April 1863. Much of the civilian population had left the city before the siege began. Once the huge Union guns began the terrible bombardment of the city and its civilian population, most of the residents south of Calhoun Street left their homes. This included much of Charleston Jewry because many lived in and near the retail district on King Street and near their synagogues, Beth Elohim on Hasell Street and Shearith Israel on Wentworth Street. Much of the city's business stopped. The former retail district and exclusive residential area south of Broad Street became a ghost town, known to locals as the "Shell District," on account of the Federal shelling. Most churches, homes, and businesses were closed and shuttered. A rare funeral, conducted at St. Mary's Catholic Church across the street from Beth Elohim, was interrupted by an exploding shell from Union cannons. Beth Elohim was closed, boarded up, and bombarded. Federal shells damaged its roof. The Hebrew Orphan House on Broad Street also closed down.[35]

Berith Shalome apparently remained open, possibly because of its location away from the shelling. It had a functioning board in 1863. Many of its members, including Pincus Pinkussohn, Lippman Rich, Jacob Volaske, and Simon D. Jacobowsky, served in the Confederate army or local militia.[36] Many of the churches sent their valuables to Columbia. Beth Elohim sent its Torah scrolls, the controversial organ, and its magnificent chandelier.[37] Eleanor Cohen, Dr. Philip Melvin Cohen's young daughter and a direct descendent of the first Moises, recalled "how determined the enemy were to possess dear old Charleston, how they shelled the city and we were hurried away, how my home city and forts held out." Eleanor lost her journal of these events, "but thank God," she wrote in 1865, "it lives in my heart and in the heart of every fine southern man, woman, and child."[38] Like many Charlestonians, the Cohens left Charleston for the safety of Columbia. The family remained until the capital city burned in February 1865.

Life, of course, went on, even in Charleston. Before the war, Henry Timrod, a well-known Charleston poet, was obsessed with the beautiful and witty society belle, Rachel Lyons.[39] He and Rachel developed a close relationship that was somewhat flirtatious. Timrod confided in Rachel about his personal life, enjoyed her letters, and craved her compliments about his poetry. He was frustrated with both wartime Charleston and Columbia. "Both places, to be sure, are dull enough," he wrote Rachel in September 1861, "but Columbia, being little more than a country town, is at least legitimately so," while Charleston suffered from "its miserable metropolitan pretensions."[40] Timrod was nervous about his close relationship with a Jewish woman. His letters to Rachel contain numerous references to the Old Testament ("my spirit has become a Dead Sea into which no Jordan flows").[41] He admitted that Rachel "is rapidly conquering my old prejudices against the Hebrew."[42] Timrod, always conscious of Rachel's Jewishness, wrote a poem about her in late 1861. It was originally entitled "Rachel," and later given the title "La Belle Juive" (The Beautiful Jewess) and was published in the Charleston Daily Courier on January 23, 1862, and in other Southern newspapers.[43] It reads, in part:

Is it because your sable hair

Is folded o'er brows that wear

At times a too imperial air;

Or is it that the thoughts which rise

In those dark orbs, do seek disguise

Beneath the lids of Eastern eyes;

Or may it be because your soul

Looks out in features that control

The Fancy, howso'er it stroll;

That choose whatever pose or place

May chance to please, in you I trace

The noblest women of your race?

By the standards of the time it was not inappropriate for a poet to publish such a poem about an aristocratic Jewish woman, and Jewish Southerners, aware of their distinctiveness in a predominantly Christian culture, took no offense.

Timrod's health, both emotional and physical, was failing him by the fall of 1863. He could not summon up the courage to meet Rachel in Charleston while she was there on a visit in September. "I did not call upon you because I felt sure that it would be impossible for me to meet you except in the midst of the circle which you always draw around you. Once, I heard of your being in St. Michael's steeple," he admitted, but he "was not daring (God forgive me!) enough to hazard an intrusion." (During the war, the young people of Charleston would walk up the steps in the steeple of St. Michael's Church to get a look at the Union fleet and the Union army bombarding the city from the islands across the Ashley River.)[44]

Savannah's Jewish community struggled to survive. "All talk was of war," Rebecca Solomons Alexander of Savannah recalled years later. "It was Saturday and my nurse was putting the finishing touches to my toilet for Synagogue." When Rebecca's cousin Nellie arrived, she called to her, "Nellie, the war has begun." To which Nellie replied, "Then I am going straight back home." Rebecca recalled, "She flew and I felt as if war must be just around the corner." But her mother reassured her and "together she and I went to pray 'that the South would win.'"[45] Union Adm. Samuel F. Dupont vowed that he would "cork up Savannah like a bottle," and the Union army and navy did. Fort Pulaski, which guarded the mouth of the Savannah River, was captured on April 11, 1862. While the city itself was not captured until Sherman's march in December 1864, it ceased functioning as a port. Business came to a standstill. Families left. "Our commerce is perfectly prostrated," one merchant wrote. "A strange, mysterious, weird quietude reigns perpetually." A visitor wrote, "Stagnation and paralysis obstruct the channels … the whole town—every thing—seems to have halted."[46]

Abraham Alexander Solomons, his wife, Cecilia, and their children lived near Pulaski Square when the war began. Solomons was in the drug business with his younger brother Joseph, and his company, A. A. Solomons & Co., had been in business since 1845. When Fort Pulaski fell, little Rebecca Solomons recalled that it "meant the fall of Savannah. So all who could, left the city, our family amongst the refugees." The Solomons refugeed to Columbus, where Mrs. Solomons's sister Sarah Alexander and her brothers Isaac and Ezra Moses lived.[47] Joseph volunteered for Company C (Republican Blues), 1st (Olmstead's) Georgia. As an apothecary, he was appointed acting assistant surgeon.[48]

Mikve Israel continued to function. It remained Orthodox and, despite the large majority of Germans, it followed the Sephardic Minhag.[49] Wartime was not the best time for this small Jewish community to engage in its own civil war, but Rabbi Jacob Rosenfeld, who had served at Shearith Israel in Charleston (founded by Beth Elohim dissenters to return to orthodoxy), seceded from Mikve Israel and founded a new Ashkenazic congregation. This was preceded by a number of disagreements with the adjunta. When the rabbi requested a salary increase in August 1862 in the midst of the Union blockade, his timing could hardly have been worse. The adjunta told him he could earn more by instituting a Hebrew school. They quarreled over the activities of the school. The shochet, Mr. Zechariah, the rabbi, said, left the city and failed to provide kosher meat. The rabbi resigned, and the board locked him out of the synagogue. Rosenfeld then founded B'nai B'rith Jacob. Services were conducted during the war years by lay readers at Mikve Israel. B'nai B'rith Jacob met at Armory Hall.[50]

Jewish residents of Savannah lived and worked throughout the city, but most, according to Mark I. Greenberg, lived in an area stretching sixteen blocks from Bryan to Jones Streets and nine blocks from West Broad (now M. L. King Boulevard) to Abercorn. German immigrants lived along Bryan, Congress, and Broughton in the midst of shops and businesses. Elias Cohen, for example, lived at 150 Broughton; his store was next to his house. Third- and fourth-generation Savannah Jews moved south of the commercial district to Elbert, Jackson, and Brown wards. Many lived along Liberty Street between Drayton and Jefferson. There lived Solomon Cohen, Samuel Yates Levy, and Abraham Minis. Affluent Germans Abraham Einstein, Joseph Sichels, and Samuel H. Eckman lived nearby.[51] The Solomon Cohen home still stands at Barnard and Liberty.[52] Many Jewish residents of Savannah lived within walking distance of Mikve Israel, near Liberty and Whitaker. This Jewish elite was well connected with and married into the city's Christian elite. Jacob Florence Minis, for example, married Phoebe Pember's friend, Louisa Porter Gilmer, whose father, Maj. Gen. Jeremy F. Gilmer, served as chief of the bureau engineers of the Confederacy and for a time as second in command of the Department of South Carolina, Georgia, and Florida. Solomon Cohen's daughter Miriam married James Troup Dent, a descendant of a governor of Georgia.[53] Octavus Cohen and his family lived on Lafayette Square (Macon and Abercorn).[54] His office was at 82 Bay Street near the riverfront.
